ENCYCLOPEDIA OF ANCIENT CHRISTIANITY

PRODUCED BY THE
INSTITUTUM PATRISTICUM AUGUSTINIANUM

GENERAL EDITOR ANGELO DI BERARDINO

CONSULTING EDITORS
THOMAS C. ODEN AND JOEL C. ELOWSKY

PROJECT EDITOR JAMES HOOVER

Publication of the Encyclopedia of Ancient Christianity has been made possible in part by the generous support of the Green Scholars Initiative.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF ANCIENT CHRISTIANITY

Produced by the Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum

GENERAL EDITOR

Angelo Di Berardino

CONSULTING EDITORS

Thomas C. Oden

Joel C. Elowsky

PROJECT EDITOR

James Hoover

PRINCIPAL TRANSLATORS

Joseph T. Papa

Erik A. Koenke

Eric E. Hewett

IVP Academic

An imprint of InterVarsity Press

Downers Grove, Illinois

InterVarsity Press
P.O. Box 1400, Downers Grove, IL 60515-1426
Internet: www.ivpress.com
Email: email@ivpress.com

Translated from the Italian Nuovo dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane, 3 volumes, ©2006–2008 Casa Editrice Marietti, S.p.A., Genova-Milano. Published in the United States of America by InterVarsity Press, Downers Grove, Illinois, with permission from Casa Editrice Marietti.

InterVarsity Press® is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®, a movement of students and faculty active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 53707-7895, or visit the IVCF website at www.intervarsity.org.

Design: Cindy Kiple

Cover image: Christ and the Apostles (I am the life), Icon at De Agostini Library. G. Dagli Orti, The Bridgeman Art Library

ISBN 978-0-8308-9717-9 (digital)
ISBN 978-0-8308-2940-8 (Vol. 1)
ISBN 978-0-8308-2941-5 (Vol. 2)
ISBN 978-0-8308-2942-2 (Vol. 3)
ISBN 978-0-8308-2943-9 (set of 3 vols.)

InterVarsity Press

PROJECT STAFF

Senior Editor/Project Editor
James Hoover

Managing Editor
Benjamin M. McCoy

Copyeditors
Jeffrey A. Reimer
Susan Carlson Wood

Additional Translators
Lewis Berry, C.O.
Jeffrey Paul Orrell
Peter Knuffke
Joshua Furnal
Brother Richard A. Bailey
John Taylor Carr and Lydia Brooke Carr

Editorial & Administrative Assistants
Rebecca Carhart
Allison Rieck
Rachel Neftzer Snavely
Claire VanderVelde

Design
Cindy Kiple

Content Production
Kirsten Pott
Maureen G. Tobey
Jeanna L. Wiggins

Proofreaders
Jeffrey A. Reimer
Michael D. Gibson

InterVarsity Press

Publisher
Robert A. Fryling

Associate Publisher for Editorial
Andrew T. Le Peau

Associate Editorial Director
James Hoover

Production Manager
Anne Gerth

Print Coordinator
Jim Erhart

CONTENTS

Preface to the Second English Edition

A scholarly encyclopedia of Christian antiquity faces the daunting task of drawing together the results of research on a vast field of study. The Dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane (DPAC) was first published from 1983 to 1988 by Casa Editrice Marietti. Soon it became a prevailing resource for patristic scholars. It was evident that it needed to be translated into English. So in 1992 the two-volume Encyclopedia of the Early Church (EEC) was published by James Clarke & Co. in Great Britain and Oxford University Press in the United States, translated by Adrian Walford with a foreword and bibliographic amendments by W.H.C. Frend.

The field of patristic studies has grown exponentially in the years since 1992, yet no comparable encyclopedia has appeared in English since that time.

For more than twenty years the 1992 English edition from James Clarke/Oxford remained the standard of the world of patristic studies. An ongoing process of revision by the original collaborators called forth the Italian publication of the second edition of the Dizionario in Italian during the years 2006 to 2010—the Nuovo dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane (NDPAC); see the preface to the second Italian edition, which follows, for indications of the additions and changes that were made.

This is the English translation of that expanded second edition of the Dizionario under the title Encyclopedia of Ancient Christianity (EAC), published by InterVarsity Press. Both the Oxford and IVP editions have been produced by the indefatigable Professor Di Berardino and his colleagues at the Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum in Rome. To them a great debt is owed by all who engage in patristic studies now and in the future. A new baseline of competence and information has been set. This new standard is characterized by concise argument, breadth of international scholarship and richness of bibliography. This new edition has been expanded by more than 35 percent, to 3,220 articles, written by 266 contributors from 26 countries. Thirty new articles have been added since the Italian publication at the behest of Professor Di Berardino—apostolic see, Capua, Carmen de synodo Ticinensi, China, cosmopolitanism, death, diakonia/diaconate, Dialogi de sancta Trinitate IV-V, doorkeeper (porter), dynamis/energeia, eternity, forgiveness, freedom/free will, good, Hierotheus, incubatio, infinity/infinitude, libelli miraculorum, love, Mara bar Serapion (letter of), oikeiōsis, old age, presanctified, Serapeion (Serapeum), subdeacon, Theosebia, Triumphus Christi heroicus, Tychon, unity and Virgo Parens—and the article on matristics has been updated.

Nothing like it exists in English. It covers key topics in early Christian studies with special attention to authors, texts and contexts of the first through eighth centuries. Many articles are offered on figures and subjects not found in previous patristic encyclopedias. This edition incorporates a far wider range of entries than its antecedents, more fully embracing archaeological, philosophical, historical, geographic and theological arenas. Art historians, linguistic experts, epigraphers and papyrologists are playing an increasing role in these findings. New insights into Eastern European (Polish, Czech, Bulgarian and Hungarian) and Syriac traditions of patristic studies are better represented than before. New entries have been added from Arabic, Coptic, Armenian and Gothic experts.

The expanded bibliographies alone are priceless for all who might venture into the study of the persons, events and ideas of early Christian thought. Primary sources, texts and commentaries open up a vast theater of reading on any of its subjects. W.H.C. Frend was right to say of the Encyclopedia of the Early Church in 1992: "There is no work that can properly be compared with it." This is a more extensive continuation of that work.

The time frame of the Encyclopedia encompasses the period from Clement of Rome to Bede and John of Damascus—roughly AD 90 to 750, but with allowance for special cases such as Syria, Ethiopia, Mauretania and Arabia.

The sheer mass of scholarly work on early Christianity is astounding. New studies with new methods have been included. These contributors, along with our English translation editorial team of Joel Elowsky and James Hoover, are offering an unrivaled resource in English for scholars around the world.

The purpose of an encyclopedia is to condense massive information about locations, figures, interpretations and subjects into a suitably concise format commensurable with the importance of the subject. Its goal is succinct summaries of complex data, offering an impartial, fact-based summation of diverse scholarship along with sufficient bibliographies to guide readers further into this vast literature.

—Thomas C. Oden

Preface to the Second Italian Edition (2006)

The first edition of the Dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane (DPAC) met with notable success, addressing a felt need for an informed and complete resource on Christian antiquity in general and on the church fathers in particular. Besides the reprint in Italian in 1999, it was translated into various other languages (Spanish, English, French and Portuguese); in recent years publishing houses in Eastern Europe have asked for translations. Twenty-two years after the first edition, therefore, the editors felt the need, not for a simple reprint—of limited value in this field—but for something new and different. Respecting the structure and tone of the first edition, and with the significant commitment of the Italian publisher Marietti, we have brought forth this new edition. (In the meantime Marietti, in a spirit of continuity and of service to Christian antiquity, published two large volumes—the fourth and fifth—of the Patrology.) The addition of Nuovo (Nuovo dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane = NDPAC) to this edition is intended to indicate continuity with the preceding work, as well as the profound reworking accomplished in the new edition. In fact three possible strategies were considered: a simple revision of the work, correcting any errors; something totally new in a different tone—not easily realizable in the brief time available—or an in-depth revision of the already-existing text, with additions and some rewriting.

We chose the third option, involving various kinds of work: revision of all entries, with correction and updating of the text and bibliography, if possible done by the original author (if still living, of course, and available); new entries to be inserted (around 500 have been added); replacement of many entries with a new article written by a different author. These replacements were sometimes made necessary by new discoveries or the progress of research, or because the previous article was judged to be inadequate. Among those that were replaced, some of the most important are Athanasius, Augustianism, audientia episcopalis, Bardesanes, cathedra, Cosmas and Damian, Germany, gnosis/gnosticism, Gregory the Great, Hippolytus, lay/layman/laity, Lusitania, Mani/Manicheans/Manicheism, mysticism/mystical theology, paideia, world. In recent decades, moreover, so-called apocryphal writings have had a notable development. Rather than a single entry, we chose to offer a brief general treatment and then to insert specific entries for each Christian apocryphal text. The same was done for the popes: previously, only some had a specific entry, while the majority were included in a general entry, "popes." Now many have a brief individual presentation. Christian archaeology, in continual evolution, also required much rewriting and updating. Among the new entries we may note: (accusation of) atheism, autobiography, bishop, crown, dreams and the Fathers, Father/Fathers of the Church (in the Medieval and Renaissance periods), Gothic literature, Homer, (Christian) intolerance, Judaism, Lent, matristics, Mesopotamia, metempsychosis, miracle, panegyric, (Christian) poetry, (apostolic) presbyters, progress, relics, saint and holiness, (Holy) Scripture (ancient versions), seal, ship, suicide, theologia negativa/via negativa, (patristic) translations (in Eastern languages).

The insertion of new entries of a certain length and the space given to the apocryphal writings and the popes have significantly increased the size of the work, which is now divided in a more balanced way among three volumes.

A word of thanks is due to the great patrologists who collaborated on the first edition and were extremely generous in their counsel and collaboration, among whom were Jean Gribomont, Charles Pietri, Michele Cardinal Pellegrino, Vincenzo Loi, Achille Triacca, Cyril Vogel, Salvatore Costanza, Henri Crouzel, Carmelo Curti, Irénée-Henri Dalmais, Ivan Dujčev, Umberto Fasola, Paul-Albert Février, Margherita Guarducci, Adalbert Hamman, Richard Hanson, Sandro Leanza, Roger Le Déaut, Joseph Lecuyer, Pierre Nautin, Burkhard Neunheuser, Joseph-Marie Sauget, Victor Saxer, Agostino Trapè.

We offer heartfelt thanks, also on behalf of the Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, to the Casa Editrice Marietti, which enabled us to complete the work in two years.

—Angelo Di Berardino

Preface to the First Italian Edition (1983)

The Dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane (DPAC) was born out of the simple recognition of the fact that no such work has existed to date; that is, a tool for the immediate use of those with a certain level of culture who are desirous of ready and precise information on any theme pertaining to the first eight centuries of the history of Christianity. We became aware of this lack during the preparation of the third volume of the Patrology—continuing the volumes of Prof. Johannes Quasten, published by Casa Editrice Marietti—and immediately set to work gathering suggestions and proposals on the structure and tone of the Dictionary.

Because of the many scholars of Christian antiquity associated with the Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, both as teachers and as participants in the traditional May Meetings, it was clear that this center could assume responsibility for the preparation of the Dictionary. Moreover an ample network of associations and friendships allowed for immediate contact with many competent scholars in the various sectors of Christian antiquity, allowing the work to be prepared in a short period of time. To this end it was also necessary to ensure an ample number of collaborators, whether as authors of the articles or as translators in the case of articles written in languages other than Italian.

This wide involvement was achieved: 167 scholars from 17 different countries, from different religious confessions and with various cultural interests. These scholars, each according to his or her expertise, intend to make available to everyone the significant progress in research in the field of Christian antiquity attained in recent decades; in doing so, they bring to the work not only broad scholarly knowledge, but also variety in approach and sensibility in treating the themes. The DPAC, therefore, with its multidisciplinary character, offers a well-documented historical and patristic background to theology, to Christian culture and to the life of the church today, including in the variety of its confessions of faith. The DPAC will thus be useful for a wide and varied public, whether desirous of an initial orientation or the further investigation of a theme, the latter thanks to a select and updated bibliography.

Chronologically, the Dictionary covers from the age of Christian origins to the end of the patristic period: for the West until Bede (ca. 673–735), and for the Greek East until John of Damascus (ca. 675–ca. 749). For the other Christian areas (Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopian, Georgian and Armenian), in some cases the chronological criteria have been more elastic due to the way in which evangelization took place, and to the peculiar nature of the writings and translations in those languages.

The articles that the DPAC comprises regard persons, doctrines, cultural currents, Christian sects, historical events, geography, liturgy, monasticism, spirituality, artistic works and archaeological evidence, while not ignoring the social, political, moral and ascetical aspects of the first eight centuries of Christian history.

When possible and considered appropriate, a comprehensive study of some themes was chosen, so as to offer a global and structured discussion of the theme (e.g., apocrypha, cemeteries, churches, wisdom books, etc.). Special priority has been given to prosopography: many personalities, including secondary, have been included for the first four centuries in specific detail; for the subsequent period more selectivity was exercised, because the period was less important for the origin and foundation of Christianity and because of the entry of many new nations with a host of new characters. The Dictionary, though not without inevitable lacunae, presents a surprising richness of information, as a quick glance through its pages will show. As an illustration, ancient philosophy in its relation with Christianity is approached from different angles in a variety of entries: in properly theological entries, in regard to some Fathers, and in specific treatments (Aristotelianism, Hellenism and Christianity, philosophy and ancient Christianity, Platonism and the Fathers, Stoicism and the Fathers), in addition to the inclusion of various pagan thinkers of the patristic period and of philosophical currents of the time. Frequently the composition of an article required the contribution of various specialties: for example, "Alexandria" required the contribution of a Coptologist (Orlandi), a patrologist (Simonetti) and an archaeologist (Falla Castelfranchi). In such cases it may prove useful to read the various treatments, inasmuch as they each offer a different approach, complementing the others. An example would be "angel," with an article by a patrologist (Studer) which expounds on patristic theological reflection, and one by an art historian (Carletti) which documents how those reflections found artistic expression through iconography. Themes have also been included that have received little treatment elsewhere:

for example, (patristic) argumentation (Studer), protology (Bianchi and Sfameni Gasparro; this entry offers a different approach to other themes: creation, original sin, marriage, virginity), Paleoslavonic (Dujčev; regarding translations in that language), and so forth.

Heartfelt thanks are due to Fr. Claude Mondésert, director of "Sources Chrétiennes," who graciously hosted us on 12 May 1978 at the offices of Sources Chrétiennes in Lyons to plan the Dictionary, with representatives of the Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum and some publishing houses present. Special recognition should also be given to Casa Editrice Marietti, who made possible the completion of the work in the brief period of four years.

—Angelo Di Berardino

A Note on Using the Encyclopedia

Several features of the Encyclopedia of Ancient Christianity (EAC) are worth noting at the outset. Extensive, though not exhaustive, cross-referencing has been introduced to point readers to additional articles within the EAC worth exploring in relation to various topics. Such references are indicated by asterisks (*) preceding the approximate names of any additional articles to consult. So long as the referenced entry appears alphabetically within the flow that readers should expect, the form may not be exact. Thus "*celibate" refers readers to the article titled "celibacy of the clergy." Where the appropriate entry would not be found alphabetically in proximity to its expected place, additional information is supplied within parentheses, as in the case of references to "deacon," which take the following form "deacon (see *diakonia - diaconate)." Note that the form (see * . . .) always points to an article within the EAC. When "see" is in roman type, readers are being directed to a standard outside reference work or to a work cited in the bibliography for the entry.

Readers are cautioned that not all cross-referencing is unambiguous; there are no fewer than seventeen entries for "Eusebius" in the EAC, and while nearly all cross-references in this case are to Eusebius of Caesarea in Palestine, readers may need to consult more than one entry to ascertain whether they have identified the proper article. Context should make things clear. Generally, cross-referencing is supplied only at the first mention of a related topic within an article or, in the case of long articles, at first mention within each subsection. Common words that readers would undoubtedly expect to find within the EAC (bishop, priest, pope) are usually not cross-referenced.

Facing the daunting task of reformatting the bibliographies and various elements of classical references to conform to North American standards, we have decided to leave these items essentially as we found them in the Italian edition. Thus readers are likely to find references in the form "Eusebius, HE V,16,5" where they might expect "Eusebius, HE 5.16.5," following the general European conventions that use commas where North Americans are more inclined to use periods, and vice versa. This means on occasion, though rarely, readers will find periods separating items in a series of page references. Readers should find no difficulty locating sources once they accustom themselves to these conventions. The bibliographies likewise tend to use italics for titles regardless of whether the titles indicate books, chapters within books, or journal articles. We have also adjusted all instances of the feminine eadem and its abbreviation to Id. (the masculine abbreviation for idem). We hope this provides no offense to women scholars, since we have done so in the interests of treating all alike, of avoiding what is a highly uncommon abbreviation, and of precluding unintentional mistakes in gender identification from mere initials.

Given the origins of the EAC, it will come as no surprise that, despite the multiple-languages sources found within them, the bibliographies are nevertheless weighted toward secondary sources in Italian. No systematic effort has been made to supplement them with additional bibliography in English, though this should not pose an obstacle to further research given the wide range of sources provided. Readers will note that frequently, though not universally, important reference works that are available in multiple languages are so noted.

Despite the extensive list of bibliographical abbreviations, readers will still find abbreviations not listed there. As the Italian edition notes, "Approximate abbreviations that can be easily understood are not included in this list," though we have added quite a few as an aid to readers. Occasionally, critical editions or standard reference works are referred to simply by their editors. In referencing Cyprian's letters, we have sometimes inserted Hartel following the reference to indicate his numbering of the letters, which differs substantially from the ANF numbering. Frequently, well-known works of ancient authors are referred to by abbreviations either in Latin or in English without further explanation. We have followed the lead of the Italian edition in this regard, allowing Latin to stand as is and translating Italian into English. Occasionally, it has seemed preferable to use an unambiguous Latin title rather than a loose English title.

In the interests of space, we have frequently used abbreviations for common words ("c." for either "century" or "centuries"; "ca." for "circa"; "esp." for "especially"; "acc." for "according"). We trust these will not prove an obstacle to our readers.

It has been a joy to work together in providing readers with this marvelous resource. We hope you will find much of value within it and be spurred to further research.

CONTRIBUTORS

ALAND, Barbara, University of Münster
ALEO, Francesco, Studio Teologico San Paolo, Catania
ALLEN, Pauline, Catholic University, Brisbane
AMATA, Biagio, Salesian Pontifical University, Rome
AMODIO, Mara, University of Naples Federico II
ANGRISANI SANFILIPPO, Maria Luisa, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
APPELLA, Antonio, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
AULISA, Immacolata, University of Bari
BACKUS, Irena, University of Geneva
BAGATTI, Bellarmino (†), Studium Biblicum Franciscanum, Jerusalem
BARNEA, Jon (†), University of Bucharest
BEATRICE, Pier Franco, University of Padua
BETTIOLO, Paolo, University of Venice
BIANCHI, Ugo (†), University of Rome "La Sapienza"
BIANCO, Maria Grazia, Libera Universitá Maria SS. Assunta, Rome
BISCONTI, Fabrizio, University of Rome Tre; Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome
BOLGIANI, Franco, University of Turin
BØRRESEN, Kari, University of Oslo
BORZÌ, Salvatore, University of Catania
BOU MANSOUR, Tanios, Holy Spirit University of Kaslik
BRAIDOTTI, Cecilia, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
BRANDENBURG, Hugo, Istituto Archeologico Germanico, Rome
BROCCOLI, Umberto, Rome
BROCK, Sebastian P., Oxford University
BUENACASA, Carles, University of Barcelona
BURINI DE LORENZI, Clara, University of Perugia
CABRERA MONTERO, Juan Antonio, Augustinianum, Rome
CALCAGNINI CARLETTI, Daniela, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
CALTABIANO, Matilde, University of Milan
CAMBI, Nenad, University of Split
CAMPLANI, Alberto, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
CANART, Paul, Vatican Apostolic Library, Vatican City
CANTINO WATAGHIN, Gisella, University of Eastern Piedmont, Vercelli
CAPONE, Alessandro, University of Salento
CARLETTI, Carlo, University of Bari
CARR, Ephrem, Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
CARUSO, Giuseppe, Augustinianum, Rome
CATTANEO, Enrico, Pontifical Oriental Institute, Rome
CAVALCANTI, Elena (†), University of Rome Tre
CECCHELLI, Margherita, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
CHAHINE, Charbel, University of Saint Joseph, Beirut
CHUPUNGCO, Anscar, Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome
CICCARESE, Maria Pia, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
CIMOSA, Mario, Salesian Pontifical University; Augustinianum, Rome
CIPRIANI, Nello, Augustinianum, Rome
CLAUSI, Benedetto, University of Calabria
COCCHINI, Francesca, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
CONSOLINO, Franca Ela, University of L'Aquila
CONTI, Marco, Salesian Pontifical University, Rome
COSTANZA, Salvatore (†), University of Messina
COYLE, Kevin J., University of Ottawa
CROUSE, Robert, University of Halifax; Augustinianum, Rome
CROUZEL, Henri (†), Catholic Institute of Toulouse; Augustinianum, Rome
CURTI, Carmelo (†), University of Catania
CUSCITO, Giuseppe, University of Trieste
D'ANNA, Alberto, University of Rome Tre
DAL COVOLO, Enrico, Salesian Pontifical University, Rome
DALMAIS, Irénée-Henri (†), Catholic Institute of Paris
DASSMANN, Ernst, Franz Josef Dölger Institute, Bonn

DATTRINO, Lorenzo, Lateran Pontifical University, Rome
DE ANDIA, Ysabel, Catholic Institute of Paris
DE ANGELIS, Bernardo, Bologna
DE BERNARDI FERRERO, Daria, Polytechnic of Turin
DE LUIS, Pio, Augustinian Seminary, Valladolid
DE NAVASCUÉS, Patricio, San Dámaso, Madrid; Augustinianum, Rome
DE NICOLA, Angelo, University of Pavia
DE PALOL, Pedro, University of Barcelona
DE SIMONE, Russell J., Villanova University, USA; Augustinianum, Rome
DELL'OSSO, Carlo, Istituto Teologico Pugliese, Molfetta; Augustinianum, Rome
DEN BIESEN, Kees, Terni
DERITIOTIS, Lazaros, Archaeological Museum, Larissa
DI BERARDINO, Angelo, Augustinianum, Rome
DI NINO, Antonella, Rome
DÍAZ Y DÍAZ, Manuel C. (†), University of Compostela
DRESKEN-WEILAND, Jutta, University of Regensburg
DROBNER, Hubertus R., Theologische Fakultät, Paderborn; Augustinianum, Rome
DUJČEV, Ivan (†), Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, Sofia
DULAEY, Martine, École Pratique des Hautes Études, Paris
DUVAL, Noël, University of Paris IV (Paris-Sorbonne)
EVANS, G. R., University of Cambridge
FAHEY, Patrick, Augustinianum, Rome; Sydney
FALLA CASTELFRANCHI, Marina, University of Salento, Lecce
FARINA, Raffaele, Vatican Library, Vatican City
FASOLA, Umberto (†), Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome
FATTI, Federico, University of Perugia
FÉVRIER, Paul-Albert (†), University de Provence
FILORAMO, Giovanni, University of Turin
FIOCCHI NICOLAI, Vincenzo, University of Rome Tor Vergata; Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome
FITZGERALD, Allan, Augustinianum, Rome
FLORES, Miguel, Madrid
FOLGADO, Segundo (†), Royal University College Maria Cristina, El Escorial; Augustinianum, Rome
FONTAINE, Jacques, University of Paris IV (Paris-Sorbonne)
FORLIN PATRUCCO, Marcella, University of Turin
FREND, William H.C. (†), University of Glasgow
GARRISI, Alessandro, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
GELSI, Daniele (†), Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome
GHILARDI, Massimiliano, Istituto Nazionale di Studi Romani, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
GIANNARELLI, Elena, University of Florence
GIANOTTO, Claudio, University of Turin
GIORDANI, Roberto, University of Perugia
GIRARDI, Mario, University of Bari
GIUNTELLA, Anna Maria (†), University of Chieti
GORI, Franco, University of Urbino; Augustinianum, Rome
GRAPPONE, Antonio, Vatican City
GRECH, Prosper, Augustinianum, Rome
GRÉGOIRE, Réginald, University of Pavia
GRIBOMONT, Jean (†), Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
GRISBROOKE, W. Jardine (†), Oscott College, West Midlands, Great Britain
GROSSI, Vittorino, Lateran Pontifical University, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
GROSSMANN, Peter, German Archaeological Institute, Cairo
GUARDUCCI, Margherita (†), University of Rome "La Sapienza"
HAMMAN, Adalbert (†), Augustinianum, Rome
HANSON, Richard (†), University of Manchester
HEID, Stefan, Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome
HEN, Yitzhak, University of the Negev, Beersheba
HONINGS, Bonifacio, Lateran Pontifical University, Rome
IOANNIDIS, Fotios, University of Thessaloniki
IRMSCHER, Johannes (†), Berlin Academy of Sciences
JIMÉNEZ, Juan Antonio, Universidad Central de Barcelona
JIMÉNEZ, Oscar, Augustinianum, Rome
KANNENGIESSER, Charles, Concordia University, Montreal
KINZIG, Wolfram, University of Bonn
KLIJN, Albertus, F.J., University of Groningen
LABATE, Antonio, University of Messina

LADOCSI, Gaspar, Seminary of Esztergom
LAHEY, Lawrence, Tulane University, New Orleans
LAM, Joseph Cong Quy, Würzburg
LAVENANT, René, Sources Chrétiennes, Lyon
LE DÉAUT, Roger (†), Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome
LEAL, Jerónimo, Pontifical University of the Holy Cross, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
LEANZA, Sandro (†), University of Messina
LECUYER, Joseph (†), Lateran Pontifical University, Rome
LENTINO, Francesco, Pontifical Theological Faculty, Naples
LIBAMBU, Michel, Catholic University of Congo, Kinshasa
LILLA, Salvatore, Vatican Apostolic Library, Vatican City; Augustinianum, Rome
LOASSES, Chiara, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
LOI, Vincenzo (†), University of Cagliari
LOMBINO, Vincenzo, Pontifical Theological Faculty, Palermo
LONGOBARDO, Luigi, Pontifical Theological Faculty, Naples
LOUTH, Andrew, University of Durham
LUISELLI, Bruno, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
MALASPINA, Elena, University of Rome Tre; Libera Universitá Maria SS. Assunta, Rome
MALINGREY, Anne-Marie (†), University of Lille
MARA, Maria Grazia, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
MARCHETTA, Antonio, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
MARINONE, Mariangela, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
MARITANO, Mario, Salesian Pontifical University, Rome
MARONE, Paola, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
MATTEI, Paul, University of Lyon; Sources Chrétiennes, Lyon
MAYMÓ I CAPDEVILA, Pere, Universidad Central de Barcelona
MAZZEI, Barbara, Pontifical Commission of Sacred Archaeology, Vatican City
MAZZOLENI, Danilo, Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome; University of Rome Tre
MEES, Michele (†), Augustinianum, Rome
MELONI, Pietro, Bishop of Nuoro
MENDOZA, Mario, Augustinianum, Rome
MILAZZO, Vincenza, University of Catania
MILELLA, Alessandra, Rome
MIMOUNI, Simon-Claude, École Pratique des Hautes Études, Paris
MIRABELLA ROBERTI, Mario (†), University of Trieste
MONACI CASTAGNO, Adele, University of Vercelli
MONTECCHIO, Luca, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
MORESCHINI, Claudio, University of Pisa; Augustinianum, Rome
MUNIER, Charles, University of Strasbourg
NALDINI, Mario (†), University of Perugia
NARDI, Carlo, Pontifical Theological Faculty, Florence
NAUTIN, Pierre (†), University of Paris IV (Paris-Sorbonne)
NAVARRA, Leandro, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
NAZZARO, Antonio, University of Naples
NEUNHEUSER, Burkhard (†), Monastery of Maria Laach; Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome
NOCE, Carla, University of Rome Tre; Augustinianum, Rome
NOCENT, Adrien (†), Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome
NOVEMBRI, Valeria, University of Florence
NUZZO, Daniela, University of Salento, Lecce
ODROBINA, Lázlo, University of Szgeged
OPELT, Ilona (†), University of Düsseldorf
ORBE, Antonio (†), Gregorian Pontifical University, Rome
ORLANDI, Tito, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
OSBORN, Eric, University of Melbourne
PADOVESE, Luigi (†), Pontifical University Antonianum, Rome; Apostolic Vicar of Anatolia
PAINTER, Kenneth, British Museum, London
PALLAS, Demetrios (†), University of Athens
PALMIERI, Mauro, Istituto Teologico Abruzzese-Molisano, Chieti
PANI ERMINI, Letizia, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
PANI, Giancarlo, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
PAPPALARDO, Carmelo, Studium Biblicum Franciscanum, Jerusalem

PASCHOUD, François, University of Geneva
PASQUATO, Ottorino, Salesian Pontifical University, Rome
PAVAN, Vincenzo, University of Bari
PELEKANIDOU, Elli, Thessaloniki
PELLAND, Gilles, Gregorian Pontifical University, Rome
PELLEGRINO, Michele Cardinal (†), Turin
PERETTO, Elio, University of Chieti; Marianum, Rome
PERGOLA, Philippe, Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome
PERRAYMOND, Myla, University of Rome Tre
PERRONE, Lorenzo, University of Bologna
PIERI, Francesco, Fac. Teologica dell'Emilia-Romagna, Bologna
PIETRI, Charles (†), University of Paris IV (Paris-Sorbonne); Augustinianum, Rome
PIETRI, Luce, University of Paris IV (Paris-Sorbonne)
PILARA, Gianluca, Libera Universitá Maria SS. Assunta, Rome
PINELL, Jordi (†), Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome
PIZZANI, Ubaldo, University of Perugia
POLLARD, T. Evan, University of Otago, Dunedin
POLLASTRI, Alessandra, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
PRICOCO, Salvatore, University of Catania
PRINZIVALLI, Emanuela, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
QUAQUARELLI, Antonio (†), University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
RAINERI, Osvaldo, Vatican Apostolic Library, Vatican City
RAMELLI, Ilaria, Catholic University of the Sacred Heart, Milan
RAPISARDA, Grazia, University of Catania
RAPONI, Santino (†), Accademia Alfonsiana, Rome
RECCHIA, Vincenzo (†), University of Bari
RICCI, Cristina, University of Bern
RIGHI, Davide, FacoltàTeologica dell'Emilia-Romagna, Bologna
RILLIET, Frédéric, Geneva
ROBERTO, Umberto, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
ROMERO POSE, Eugenio (†), Auxiliary Bishop of Madrid
RONZANI, Rocco, Augustinianum, Rome
RORDORF, Willy, University of Neuchâtel
ROUILLARD, Philippe, Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome
RUBIO, José Fernando, Universidad Externado de Colombia; Pontifical Lateran University, Rome
SALES, Jordina, University of Barcelona
SALZANO, Aniello, University of Salerno
SAMULOWITZ, Stefan, Paderborn
SANTAGATA, Giuliana, Rome
SARDELLA, Teresa, University of Catania
SAUGET, Joseph-Marie (†), Vatican Apostolic Library, Vatican City; Augustinianum, Rome
SAXER, Victor (†), Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
SCHEMBRA, Rocco, Catania
SCORZA BARCELLONA, Francesco, University of Rome Tor Vergata
SEVERIN, Hans-Georg, Berlin
SFAMENI GASPARRO, Giulia, University of Messina
SHERIDAN, Mark, Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum; Augustinianum, Rome
SIMONETTI, Manlio, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
SINISCALCO, Paolo, University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
SMOLAK, Kurt, University of Vienna
SÖLL, Georg (†), Salesian Pontifical University, Rome
SOTOMAYOR, Manuel, Pontifical Faculty of Theology, Granada
SPERA, Lucrezia, University of Rome Tor Vergata; Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
ŠPIDLÍK, Thomas Cardinal, Pontifical Oriental Institute, Rome
SPINELLI, Mario, Augustinianum, Rome
STAROWIEYSKI, Marek, University of Warsaw; Augustinianum, Rome
STEAD, George Christopher (†), University of Cambridge
STEWART-SYKES, Alistair, Dorset, Great Britain
STIERNON, Daniel, Lateran Pontifical University, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
STUDER, Basil(†), Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome; Augustinianum, Rome
TESTINI, Pasquale (†), University of Rome "La Sapienza"; Augustinianum, Rome
TIBILETTI, Carlo (†), University of Macerata

TRAPÈ, Agostino (†), Augustinianum, Rome
TREVIJANO, Ramón, Pontifical University of Salamanca
TRIACCA, Achille (†), Salesian Pontifical University, Rome
TUREK, Waldemar, Pontificia Università Urbaniana, Rome
UNGARO TESTINI, Lucrezia, Sovrintendenza Beni Culturali, Rome
UTHEMANN, Karl-Heinz, University of Utrecht
UTRO, Umberto, Vatican Museum, Vatican City; Augustinianum, Rome
VALERIANI, Emanuela, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
VAN ESBROEK, Michael (†), Pontifical Oriental Institute, Rome; University of Monaco
VANYÓ, Lazló (†), University of Budapest
VICIANO, Albert, University of Murcia
VILELLA, Josep, University of Barcelona
VOGEL, Cyril (†), University of Strasbourg
VOGT, Hermann, University of Tübingen
VOICU, Sever J., Vatican Apostolic Library, Vatican City; Augustinianum, Rome
WALLRAFF, Martin, University of Bern; Augustinianum, Rome
WEBER, Dorothea, University of Vienna
WIPSZYCKA, Ewa, University of Warsaw
YARNOLD, Edward (†), University of Oxford
ZANGARA, Vincenza, University of Turin
ZINCONE, Sergio, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
ZOCCA, Elena, University of Rome "La Sapienza"
ZUPI, Massimiliano, Gregorian Pontifical University; Saint Anselm Pontifical Athenaeum, Rome

BIBLICAL ABBREVIATIONS

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Amos	Amos
Bar	Baruch
Bel	Bel and the Dragon
1-2 Chr	1-2 Chronicles
Col	Colossians
1-2 Cor	1-2 Corinthians
Dan	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
1-2 Esd	Esdras
Esth	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ezek	Ezekiel
Ezra	Ezra
Gal	Galatians
Gen	Genesis
Hab	Habakkuk
Hag	Haggai
Heb	Hebrews
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jdth	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Jn	John
1-3 Jn	1-3 John
Job	Job
Joel	Joel
Jon	Jonah
Josh	Joshua
Jude	Jude
1-2 Kgs	1-2 Kings
Lam	Lamentations
Lev	Leviticus
Lk	Luke
1-4 Macc	1-4 Maccabees
Mal	Malachi
Mk	Mark
Mic	Micah
Mt	Matthew
Nah	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah
Num	Numbers
Obad	Obadiah
1-2 Pet	1-2 Peter
Phil	Philippians
Philem	Philemon
Pr	Proverbs
Pr Azar	Prayer of Azariah
Ps	Psalms
Rev	Revelation
Rom	Romans
Ruth	Ruth
1-2 Sam	1-2 Samuel
Sir	Sirach
Song	Song of Songs
Sus	Susanna
1-2 Th	1-2 Thessalonians
1-2 Tim	1-2 Timothy
Tit	Titus
Tob	Tobit
Wisd	Wisdom of Solomon
Zech	Zechariah
Zeph	Zephaniah

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ABBREVIATIONS

Approximate abbreviations that can be easily understood are not included in this list.

AA	Archäologischer Anzeiger, Berlin, 1896–
AAAd	Antichità altoadriatiche, Udine 1972–
AAAH	Acta ad archaeologiam et artium historiam spectantia, Oslo 1962
AAP	Atti dell'Accademia Pontaniana, Naples 1832–
AAPal	Atti dell'Accademia di Scienze, Lettere e Arti di Palermo
AARC	Atti dell'Accademia Romanistica Costantiniana
AAS	Acta apostolicae sedis, Vatican City 1909–
AASS	Acta Sanctorum, ed. Socii Bollandiani, Antwerpen 1643–; Venice 1734–; Paris 1863–
AAT	Atti e Memorie dell'Accademia delle Scienze di Torino. Classe di Scienze morali, storiche e filosofiche, Turin
AATC	Atti e memorie dell'Accademia Toscana di Scienze e Lettere "La Colombaria." Florence
AAWB	Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Berlin, 1788–
AAWG	Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, 1942–
AAWW	Anzeiger der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Vienna
AB	Analecta Bollandiana, Brussels
ABAW	Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philos.–hist. Klasse, Munich
ABR	The American Benedectine Review, Collegeville, MN
ABSA	Annual of the British School at Athens, London
AC	F.J. Dölger, Antike und Christentum, Münster i.W. 1929–1950
ACCS	Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture, ed. Th.C. Oden, Downers Grove, IL 1998-2010
AClass	Acta Classica: Journal of the Classical Association of South Africa, Pretoria
ACO	Acta Conciliorum Oecumenicorum, ed. E. Schwartz – J. Straub, Berlin 1914–
ACT	Ancient Christian Texts, ed. Th.C. Oden and G.L. Bray, Downers Grove, IL 2009–
ACW	Ancient Christian Writers, ed. J. Quasten – J.C. Plumpe, Westminster, MD – London 1946–
AD	Archaiologikon Deltion, Athens, 1915–
ADAW	Abhandlungen der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Berlin 1815–
AE	Archaiologikè Ephemerís, Athens
AEA	Archivo Español de Arqueología, Madrid
AEHE, IVe sect.	Annuaire de l'École Pratique des Hautes Études, IVe section, Sciences hist. et philol., Paris
Aevum	Aevum. Rassegna di Scienze storiche, linguistiche e filologiche, Milan

AFLM	Annali della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia, University of Macerata
AFLPer	Annali della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia, University of Perugia
AG	Analecta Gregoriana, Rome 1930–
AGSU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des Spätjudentums und Urchristentums
AHC	Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum, Amsterdam
AHB	Ancient History Bulletin, Calgary 1987–
AHP	Archivum Historiae Pontificiae, Rome 1963–
AIPhO	Annuaire de l'Institut de Philologie et d'Histoire Orientales de l'Université Libre de Bruxelles
AJ	Apocryphon Johannis
AJA	American Journal of Archaeology, New York 1897–
AJPh	American Journal of Philology, Baltimore 1880–
AJT	American Journal of Theology, Chicago 1897-1920
AK	Antike Kunst, published by Vereinigung der Freunde antiker Kunst in Basel, Olten
AKGWG	Abhandlungen der Königlichen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen and Philologisch-Historische Klasse
AKPA	Abhandlungen der Königlich Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften Philosophich-Historische Klasse, Berlin
Allen	P. Allen, Evagrius Scholasticus the Church Historian, Louvain 1981
ALMA	Archivum Latinitatis Medii Aevi, Brussels
Altaner	B. Altaner - A. Stuiber, Patrologia, Turin ^{7}1977
ALW	Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft, Fribourg 1950–
ANF	Ante-Nicene Fathers (reprint Grand Rapids, MI 1950–)
ANRW	Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt, Berlin
AnSE	Annali di Storia dell'Esegesi, Bologna 1984–
AnTh	L'Année théologique
AntTard	Antiquité tardive: revue internationale d'histoire et d'archéologie (IV^{e}-VIII^{e} s.), Turnhout 1993–
ARAM	Aram Periodical, Leuven 1989–
AS	Anatolian Studies. Journal of the British Institute of Archaeology at Ankara, London
ASE	Anglo-Saxon England, Cambridge
ASNP	Annali della Scuola Normale Superiore di Pisa
AST	Analecta Sacra Tarrconensia, Barcelona
AugL	Augustinus Lexikon, Basel-Stuttgart 1986–
AugM	Augustinus Magister
BA	Bibliothèque Augustinienne. Œuvres de S. Augustin, Paris 1949–
BAA	Bulletin d'Archéologie algérienne, Algiers
BAB	Bulletin de la Classe des Lettres de l'Académie Royale de Belgique, Brussels
BAC	Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, Madrid 1954–

BACr	Bullettino di Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1863–1894
BAGB	Bulletin de l'Association G. Budé, Paris
BALAC	Bulletin d'ancienne littérature et d'archéologie chrétiennes, Paris
Bardenhewer	O. Bardenhewer, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, I, 1902 (²1913); II (²1914); III (²1923); IV, 1924; V, 1931
Baumstark	A. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur, Bonn 1922
Baz	Bazmavep, Venice 1943–
BBKL	Biographisch-Bibliographischen Kirchenlexikon, Herzberg
BbM	Banber Matenadarani
BCH	Bulletin de Correspondance Hellénique, Paris
BCLL	M. Lapidge - R. Sharpe, with foreword by Proisians MacCanna, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature. 400–1200, Dublin 1985
BECh	Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, Geneva
Beck	H.-G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, Munich ²1977
Bedjan	Acta Martyrum et Sanctorum (syriace), ed. P. Bedjan, 7 vols., Paris 1890–1897
BEL-Subs.	Bibliotheca Ephemerides Liturgicae, Subsidia
Benoit, Sarc.	F. Benoit, Sarcophages paléochrétiens de Arles et de Marseille, Paris 1952
Bertolini	O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941
BETL	Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium
Bettiolo, Lineamenti	P. Bettiolo, Lineamenti di patrologia siriaca, in Complementi interdisciplinari di patrologia, ed. A. Quacquarelli, Rome 1985, 503–603
BG	Berolinensis Gnosticus 8502
BGPhM	Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters, Münster
BHG	Bibliotheca Hagiographica Graeca, ed. Socii Bollandiani, Brussels ³1957
BHL	Bibliotheca Hagiographica Latina, ed. Socii Bollandiani, 2 vols., Brussels 1898–1901 (reprint 1949) Supplementum ²1911
BHO	Bibliotheca Hagiographica Orientalis, ed. P. Peeters, Brussels 1910
BIAO	Bulletin de l'Institut français d'Archéologie Orientale, Cairo
BiblPatr	Biblioteca Patristica
BICS	Bulletin of the Institute of Classical Studies of the University of London
BIEH	Boletín del Instituto de Estudios helénicos, Barcelona
Bieler	L. Bieler, Ireland and the Culture of Early Medieval Europe, London 1987
BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands Library
BKV	Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, ed. F.X. Reithmayr - V. Thalhofer, Kempten 1869–1888
BKV²	Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, ed. O. Bardenhewer - T. Schermann - C. Weyman, Kempten–Munich 1911–1930
BKV³	Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, Zweite Reihe, ed. O. Bardenhewer - J. Zellinger - J. Martin, Munich 1932–1938

Blaise	Albert Blaise, *Dictionnaire latin-français des auteurs chrétiens. Turnhout, 1954-1967, ^{2}2005
BLE	Bulletin de Littérature Ecclésiastique, Toulouse 1877–
BLTW	Bede: His Life, Times and Writings, ed. A.A. Hamilton Thompson, Oxford 1935
BO	S. Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana, 3 vols., Rome 1719–1728
Bolton	W.F. Bolton, A History of Anglo-Latin Literature (597–1066), vol. 1, Princeton 1967
Bonser	W. Bonser, An Anglo-Saxon and Celtic Bibliography (450–1087), 2 vols., Oxford 1957
Bovini, Sarc.	G. Bovini, I sarcofagi paleocristiani della Spagna, Vatican City 1954
BROB	Berichten van de Rijksdienst voor het Oudheidkundig Bodemonderzoek, 1950-2006
Brown, Bede	G.H. Brown, Bede the Venerable, Boston 1987
Brunhölzl	F. Brunhölzl, Histoire de la littérature latine du moyen age, tr. H. Rochais, 4 vols., Turnhout 1990–
BS	Bibliotheca Sanctorum, Rome 1961–
BSEAA	Boletín del Seminario de Estudios de Arte y de Arqueología, Valladolid
BSNAF	Bulletin de la Société nationale des antiquaires de France, Paris 1871–
BStudLat	Bollettino di Studi Latini, Naples
BT	Bibliotheca scriptorum graecorum et romanorum Teubneriana, Leipzig
BullMusRoyArtHist	Bulletin des Musées royaux d'art et d'histoire, Brussels 1901–
BVAB	Bulletin van de Vereeniging tot Bevordering der Kennis van de Antieke Beschaving, Leiden 1926–
Byzantion	Byzantion. Revue internationale des Études byzantines, Brussels
ByzF	Byzantinische Forschungen, Amsterdam
ByzS	Byzantinoslavica, Prague.
ByzZ	Byzantinische Zeitschrift, Munich
BZ	Biblische Zeitschrift
BzA	Beiträge zur Altertumskunde
BZNW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
CAG	Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca, Berlin 1882–1909
CahSion	Cahiers Sioniens : Revue trimestrielle, Paris 1947–1955.
CALMA	Compendium Auctorum Latinorum Medii Aevii (500–1500), SISMEL-Edizioni del Galluzzo, Florence 2000–
CANT	M. Geerard, Clavis Apocryphorum Novi Testamenti, Turnhout 1992
CArch	Cahiers Archéologiques. Fin de l'antiquité et Moyen Age, Paris
Cath	Catholicisme, Paris 1948–
CAVT	J.C. Haelewyck, Clavis Apocryphorum Veteris Testamenti, Turnhout 1998
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly, Washington DC 1939–
CCAB	Corsi di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina, Bologna

CCAp	Corpus Christianorum, Series Apocryphorum, Turnhout
CCC	Civiltà Classica e Cristiana
CCG	Corpus Christianorum. Series Graeca, Turnhout 1977–
CCL	Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina, Turnhout 1953–
CCHag	Corpus Christianorum Hagiographies
CCM	Corpus Christianorum. Continuatio Mediaevalis, Turnhout 1966–
CD	Ciudad de Dios, El Escorial
CE	The New Catholic Encyclopedia, New York 1967
CEA	Collection d'études anciennes
Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp.	C. Cecchelli - G. Furlani - M. Salmi, The Rabbula Gospel, Lausanne 1959
CF	Classical Folia. Studies in the Christian Perpetuation of the Classics, New York
CFP	Corpus dei papiri filosofici greci e latini: Testi e lessico nei papiri di cultura greca e latina, Florence 1989–
CGG	Das Konzil von Chalkedon. Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. A. Grillmeier - H. Bacht, Würzburg 1951–1954; reprint 1962
Chabot	J.B. Chabot, La littérature syriaque, Paris 1935
Charlesworth	J. H. Charlesworth, Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, 2 vols., New Haven, 1983–1985
Chevalier, Rep. Hymn.	U. Chevalier, Repertorium Hynnologicum, 6 vols., Louvain 1882–1921
ChHist	Church History. American Society of Church History, Chicago
ChQ	Church Quaterly
ChrOr	Christian Orient, Kerala, India, 1980–
CI	Codex Justinianus
CIG	Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, Berolini 1828–1877
CIL	Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, Berolini 1869–
CISA	Contributi dell'Istituto di Storia antica, Milan 1972–2002
CivCatt	La Civiltà Cattolica, Naples, then Rome 1850–
CJ	Corpus Juris Civilis, Justinian
CJA	Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity
CLA	E.A. Lowe, Codices Latini Antiquiores, 12 vols., Oxford 1934–1972
CM	Classica et Mediaevalia, Copenhagen
CMCS	Cambridge Medieval Celtic Studies, Leamington Spa, Warwickshire
CMG	Corpus Medicorum Graecorum
Coccia	E. Coccia, La cultura irlandese precarolina miracolo o mito?: SM 8 (1967) 257–420
Cod. Barb. lat.	Codex Barberini Latinus,Vatican
CoeD	Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta, Bologna ^{3}1973
Cordiolani	A. Cordiolani, Les traités de comput du haut moyen âge: ALMA 17 (1943) 51–72
CORPUS	G. Valenti Zucchini - M. Bucci, Corpus della scultura paleocristiana bizantina ed altomedievale di Ravenna, II. I sarcofagi a figure e a carattere simbolico, Rome 1968

CP	Corona Patrum
CPG	M. Geerard, Clavis Patrum Graecorum, Turnhout 1974–
CPG/S	Clavis Patrum Graecorum, Supplement
CPh	Classical Philology, Chicago
CPL	E. Dekkers - A. Gaar, Clavis Patrum Latinorum, [3]1996 (SEJG 3)
CPPM	Clavis Patristica Pseudoepigraphorum Medii Aevi, Brepols, Turnhout, I, 1990; II, 1994
CPS	Corona Patrum Salesiana, Turin 1934–
CQ	Classical Quarterly, Oxford
CRAI	Comptes rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, Paris
Craveri	M. Craveri, I vangeli apocrifi, Turin 1969
CSCO	Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, Paris-Louvain 1903–
CSEL	Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, Vienna 1865–
CSHB	Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn 1828–1897
CSt	Cristianesimo nella Storia, Bologna 1980–
CTh	Codex Theodosianus
CTNT	Commentario teologico del Nuovo Testamento
CTP	Collana di testi patristici, Rome 1976–
CUF	Collection des universités des France, Paris 1920–
DA	Dissertation Abstracts, Ann Arbor, MI 1938–
DACL	Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, Paris 1907–1953
DAFC	Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi Catholique, Paris 1909–1931
DAGR	Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines, ed. Ch. Daremberg - E. Saglio, Paris 1877–1919
DB	Dictionnaire de la Bible, Paris 1895–1912
DBF	Dictionnaire de biographie française, Paris 1923–
DBI	Dizionario Biografico degli Italiani, Rome 1960–
DBS	Dictionnaire de la Bible. Supplément, Paris 1926–
DCB	Dictionary of Christian Biography, Literature, Sects and Doctrines, ed. W. Smith - H. Wace, 4 vols., London 1887
DDC	Dictionnaire de droit canonique, Paris 1924–1965
Delehaye PM	H. Delehaye, Les passions des martyrs et les genres littéraires, Brussels 1921
Denis	Concordance grecque des pseudepigraphes d'Ancien testament: concordance, corpus des textes, indices, Louvain-la-Neuve 1987
DHEE	Diccionario de Historia eclesiástica de España, Madrid 1972–1975
DHGE	Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastique, Paris 1909–
Díaz	M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Index Scriptorum Latinorum Medii Aevi Hispanorum, Madrid 1959
Diehl	E. Diehl, Inscriptiones Latinae Christianae Veteres, 3 vols., Berlin 1925–1931; ed. J. Moreau, [2]1961
Diekamp	F. Diekamp, ed. Doctrina Patrum de incarnatione Verbi, Münster 1907; II ed. magazine, ed. B. Phanourgakis - E. Chrysos, Münster 1981

DIP	Dizionario degli Istituti di perfezione, Rome 1974–
DissA	Dissertation Abstracts, Ann Arbor, MI 1938–
Diz. Ep.	Dizionario epigrafico di antichità romane
DNP	Der neue Pauly: Enzyklopädie der Antike, ed. H. Cancik and H. Schneider, Stuttgart 1996–
Domínguez del Val	U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispanocristiana, 5 vols., Madrid 1997–2002
DOP	Dumbarton Oaks Papers, Cambridge, MA 1941–
DPAC	Dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane, ed. Angelo Di Berardino, Casale Monferrato 1983–1988
DPha	Dictionnaire des philosophes antiques, ed. R. Goulet, Paris 1989–
DR	Downside Review, Bath, Downside Abbey and Exeter
DS	H. Denzinger - A. Schönmetzer, Enchiridion Symbolorum, Freiburg-Barcelona [35]1973
DSp	Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, Paris 1933–
DTC	Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Paris 1903–1970
Duchesne LP	Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne, 2 vols., Paris 1886–1892; III ed. C. Vogel, 3 vols., 1955–1975
Duchesne, Fastes	L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 vols., Paris 1910
Duval	R. Duval, La littérature syriaque, Paris 1907
EAA	Enciclopedia dell'Arte Antica, Classica e Orientale, ed. R. Bianchi Bandinelli, Rome 1958–1961; Supplements 1970–
EAC	Encyclopedia of Ancient Christianity, ed. A. Di Berardino, T.C. Oden, J.C. Elowsky, J. Hoover, 3 vols., Downers Grove, IL 2014.
EApC	Écrits apocryphes chrétiens, ed. F. Bovon - P. Geoltrain, Paris 1997
EAEHL	Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, 4 vols., New York 1975–1978
EAM	Enciclopedia dell'Arte Medievale, Treccani, Rome 1991–2002
EB	Estudios Bíblicos, Madrid.
EC	Enciclopedia Cattolica, Vatican City 1949–1954
EHBS	Epeterís Hetaireías Byzantinon Spoudon, Athens
EHR	English Historical Review
EI	Enciclopedia Italiana (Treccani), Rome 1929–1977, and Supplements
EJ	Encyclopaedia Judaica, Jerusalem 1971–
Elliott	J.K. Elliott, The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation Based on M.R. James, Oxford 1993
Emerton	E. Emerton, The Letters of St. Boniface, New York 1940
EntAC	Entretiens sur l'Antiquité classique, Geneva 1954–
EO	Échos d'Orient, Bucharest
EOMIA	Ecclesiae occidentalis monumenta iuris antiquissima, ed. C.H. Turner, 2 vols., Oxford 1899–1934
EPapi	Enciclopedia dei Papi, Istituto della Enciclopedia Italiana, Treccani, Rome 2000

EphLit — Ephemerides Liturgicae, Vatican City

EphemMar — Ephemerides Mariologicae

Eranos — Eranos. Acta Philologica Suecana, Uppsala

Eranos-Jb — Eranos-Jahrbuch, Leiden

Erbetta — M. Erbetta, Gli apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, Turin 1966–1981

ES — E. Flórez, España Sagrada, Madrid 1747–

Esposito — M. Esposito, Latin Learning and Medieval Ireland, London 1988

EstEcl — Estudios Eclesiásticos, Madrid

EtByz — Études Byzantines, Bucharest

EThL — Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses, Louvain

EtudTheolRelig — Études théologiques et religieuses, Montpellier

ExcPhilol — Excerpta philologica, Cádiz 1991–

FBSM — Forschungen und Berichte, published by Staatlichen Museen, Berlin

FC — The Fathers of the Church, ed. R.J. Deferrari, New York 1947–

FCh — Fontes Christiani, Freiburg 1990–2001, Turnhout 2002–

Fedalto — G. Fedalto, Hierarchia ecclesiastica orientalis, 2 vols., Padua 1988

Ferrua Via Latina — A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba della via Latina, Vatican City 1960

FHG — Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, Paris 1841–1870

FIFAO — Fouilles de l'Institut Français d'archéologie orientale, Cairo

Fil&Teol — Filosophia e Teologia

FKDG — Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte

Fliche-Martin — A. Fliche - V. Martin, Storia della Chiesa, It. tr. Turin, I ^{2}1958; II ^{3}1972; III ^{3}1972; IV ^{3}1972; V ^{2}1971

FMS — Frühmittelalterliche Studien, Berlin

FP — Florilegium Patristicum, Bonn 1906–

FR — Felix Ravenna, Faenza

Frend — W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972

FRLANT — Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments, Göttingen 1903–

FS — Festschrift

FZPhTh — Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie, Freiburg 1954–

Gams — Pius Bonifatius Gams, Series episcoporum Ecclesiae Catholicae, Regensburg, 1873

Garrucci, Storia — R. Garrucci, Storia dell'arte italiana nei primi otto secoli della Chiesa, Prato 1873–1881

Gaudemet — J. Gaudemet, Conciles gaulois du IV^{e} siècle, SC 241, Paris 1977

GAZ B.A. — Gazette des Beaux–Arts, Paris

GCS — Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller, Leipzig–Berlin 1897–

GGA — Göttingische gelehrte Anzeigen, Göttingen

GGB — Geschichtliche Grundbegriffe: Historisches Lexikon zur politisch-sozialen

	Sprache in Deutschland, ed. O. Brunner et al., Stuttgart 1972–1997
GIF	Giornale Italiano di Filologia, Rome
GLNT	Grande Lessico del Nuovo Testamento (trad. del TWNT), Brescia
GNO	Gregorii Nysseni Opera, ed. W. Jaeger, Leiden 1952–
Glotta	Glotta. Zeitschrift für griechische und lateinische Sprache, Göttingen
GRBS	Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies, Duke University, Durham, NC
Grillmeier	A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, Freiburg–Basel–Vienna 1979–
Griffe	E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine. 3 vols. Paris 1964–
Grumel, Regestes	V. Grumel, Les regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople, I, 1, Kadikoy–Bucharest 1932
HA	Handes Amsorya, Vienna
Harnack, Die Überlieferung	A. Harnack, Die Überlieferung und Bestand der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, Leipzig 1893
Harp	The Harp, a Review of Syriac and Oriental Studies, Kottayam, Kerala, India 1989–
HAW	Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft, Munich 1922–
HDG	Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte, Freiburg i.Br. 1956–
Hennecke–Schneemelcher	E. Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung, edited by W. Schneemelcher, Berlin ^{4}1968–1971
Herzog	Handbuch der lateinischen Literatur der Antike, edited by R. Herzog and P. Lebrecht Schmidt, vol. IV, Munich 1989
Hfl–Lecl	C.J. v. Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. H. Leclercq, Paris 1907–1952
Histoire des Saints	Histoire des saints et de la sainteté chrétienne, ed. F. Chiovaro - J. Delumeau - A. Mandouze - B. Plongeron - P. Riché - C. Savart - A.Vauchez, 11 vols., Paris 1986–1988
Histoire littéraire de la France	P. Abraham - R. Desne, eds. Histoire littéraire de la France, 10 vols., Paris 1974–1980
HJ	Historisches Jahrbuch, Münich, 1880–
HLL	Handbuch der lateinischen Literatur der Antike
Honigmann	E. Honigmann, Évêques et Évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^{e} siècle, CSCO 127, Louvain 1951
HTR	Harvard Theological Review, Cambridge, MA
HWP	Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie. ed. Joachim Ritter et al, Basel - Darmstadt, 1971–2007
HWRhet	Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, ed. Gert Ueding et al., Tübingen - Darmstadt, 1992–
ICL	D. Schaller – D. Könsgen, Initia carminum latinorum saeculo undecimo antiquiorum, Göttingen 1997
ICR	G.B. de Rossi, Inscriptiones Christianae Urbis Romae, Rome 1857–1888; Suppl. fasc. I, ed. I. Gatti, 1915
ICUR	Inscriptiones Christianae Urbis Romae septimo saeculo antiquiores, new series, Vatican City 1922–

IER	Irish Ecclesiastical Record
IG	Inscriptiones Graecae, Belin 1902–
IGCVO	K. Wessel - A. Ferrua - C. Carletti, Inscriptiones graecae christianae veteres Occidentis, Bari 1989
IHS	Irish Historical Studies
IJCT	International Journal of the Classical Tradition, New Brunswick, NJ 1994–
ILS	M. Dessau, Inscriptiones Latinae selectae, 3 vols., Berlin 1892–1916 ([3]1962)
Impellizzeri	S. Impellizzeri, La letteratura bizantina, Florence 1975
Instr. Patr.	Instrumenta patristica, The Hague 1959–
IPA	Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, Rome
IstMitt	Istanbuler Mitteilungen, Istanbul 1933–
ITQ	Irish Theological Quarterly, Dublin
Jaffé	Ph. Jaffé, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, reprint, Graz 1956
James	M.R. James, The Apocryphal New Testament, Oxford 1924
JAW	Jahresbericht über die Fortschritte der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, Berlin
JbAC	Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum, Münster 1958–
JDAI	Jahrbuch des Deutschen archäologischen Instituts, Berlin
JEA	Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, London
JECS	Journal of Early Christian Studies, Baltimore 1993–
JEH	Journal of Ecclesiastical History, London 1950–
JHS	Journal of Hellenic Studies, London
JJP	Journal of Juristic Papyrology
JKPh	Jahrbucher für klassische Philologie
JLW	Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft, Münster 1921–
Joannou	P. Joannou, Discipline générale antique, Grottaferrata 1962–1963
JÖBG	Jahrbuch der österreichischen byzantinischen Gesellschaft, Vienna 1951–1968
JÖEAI	Jahreshefte des österreichischen archäologischen Instituts, Vienna 1898–
JÖEByz	Jahrbuch der österreichischen Byzantinistik, Vienna 1969–
Jonkers	E.J. Jonkers, Acta et symbola Conciliorum quae saeculo quarto habia sunt, Leiden 1954
JourEthSt	Journal of Ethiopian Studies, Addis Ababa, 1963–
JRH	Journal of Religious History, University of Sidney
JRS	Journal of Roman Studies, London
JRSAI	Journal of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland, Dublin
JS	Journal des Savants, Paris
JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament Supplement
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies, Oxford
KAV	Kommentar zu den apostolischen Vätern
Kenney	E.F. Kenney, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland, I, New York 1929

KfA	Kommentar zu frühchristlichen Apologeten
KLP	Der kleine Pauly, Stuttgart 1964–1976
Krumbacher	K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur von Justinian bis zum Ende des oströmischen Reiches (527–1453), Munich ^{2}1897
La MaisonD	La Maison–Dieu, Paris
Labourt	J. Labourt, Le christianisme dans l'Empire perse sous la dynastie Sassanide (224–632), Paris 1904
LACL	Lexikon der Antiken Christlichen Literatur, ed. S. Döpp – W. Geerlings, Freiburg ^{3}2002
Lampe	G.W.H. Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexikon, IV reprint with corrections and additions, Oxford 1976
Lapidge-Sharpe	M. Lapidge, R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature, 400-1200, Dublin 1985
Lauchert	F. Lauchert, Die Kanones der wichtigsten altkirchlichen Concilien, Freiburg i.Br. 1896 (reprint, Frankfurt 1961)
LCI	Lexikon der christlichen Ikonographie
LCL	Loeb Classical Library, London–Cambridge, MA 1912–
Le Blant, Sarc.	E. Le Blant, Les sarcophages chrétiens de la Gaule, Paris 1886
LFC	Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church, ed. G.B. Pusey – J. Keble – J.H. Newman, Oxford 1838–1888
Libyca	Libyca. Bulletin des services des antiquités, Algiers
LingBibl	Linguistica Biblica, Bonn-Röttgen, 1970–
Lipsius-Bonnet	R.A. Lipsius - M. Bonnet, eds., Acta apostolorum apocrypha, Leipzig 1891, reprint 1972
LM	Lutherische Monatshefte
LMA	Lexikon des Mittelalters, Munich–Zürich 1977–
LNPF	A Select Library of Nicene and Post–Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church, ed. Ph. Schaff – H. Wace (reprint Grand Rapids, MI 1951–)
LP	Liber pontificalis (see Duchesne LP)
LQF	Liturgiegeschichtliche Quellen und Forschungen, Münster i.W. 1902–1940; 1957–
LTK	Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, Freiburg i.Br. ^{2}1957–1965; ^{3}1993–2001
Maassen	F. Maassen, Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des canonischen Rechts im Abendlande, Graz 1870 (reprint Graz 1956)
MAE	Medium Aevum, Oxford
Magi	L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI–VII sec.), Rome–Louvain 1972
MAL	Memorie della Classe di Scienze morali e storiche dell'Accademia dei Lincei, Rome
MAMA	Monumenta Asiae minoris antiqua, London 1928–
Manitius	Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, Munich 1923
Mansi	J.D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (reprint Graz 1960–1962)

Mansilla, Geografía I/II	D. Mansilla Reozo, Geografía eclesiástica de España. Estudio histórico geográfico de las diócesis I y II, Iglesia nacional Española, Rome 1994
Marienlexicon	Marienlexicon, ed. on behalf of the Institutum Marianum Regensburg by R. Bäumer and L. Scheffczyk, St. Ottilien, 6 vols., 1988–1994
Martínez Díez, Hispana IV/V	G. Martínez Díez – F.F. Rodriguey, La colección canónica hispana, IV, Barcelona– Madrid 1984; V, Madrid 1992
Maspero	J. Maspero, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie depuis la mort de l'empereur Anastase jusqu'à la réconciliation des églises jacobites (518–616), Paris 1923
MD	Materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici, Pisa 1978–
MDAI(K)	Mitteilungen des deutschen archäologischen Instituts, Cairo
MDAI(R)	Mitteilungen des deutschen archäologischen Instituts, Rome
MEFR	Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire de l'École française de Rome
MEFRA	Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire de l'École française de Rome, Antiquité
MGH	Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Hannover–Berlin 1826–
MH	Museum Helveticum. Revue Suisse pour l'Etude de l'Antiquité classique, Bâle
MIL	Memorie dell'Istituto Lombardo, Accademia di scienze e lettere. Classe di lettere, scienze morali e storiche
MIOF	Mitteilungen des Instituts für Orientforschung, Berlin
Mirbt	C. Mirbt – K. Aland, Quellen zur Geschichte des Papsttums und des römischen Katholizismus, Tübingen [2]1967
MLatJb	Mittellateinishces Jahrbuch, Cologne
MM	Madrider Mitteilungen, Heidelberg
Monceaux	P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, Paris 1901–1923
Moraldi	L. Moraldi, Tutti gli apocrifi del NT, 1–3, Casale Monferrato 1999–2001
Mordek	H. Mordek, Kirchenrecht und Reform im Frankreich, Berlin 1975
Moricca	U. Moricca, Storia della letteratura latina cristiana, Turin 1928–1934
MSLC	Miscellanea di studi di letteratura cristiana antica, Cantania 1949–
MSR	Mélanges de Science Religieuse, Lille
MTZ	Münchener theologische Zeitschrift, Munich
MUB	Mélanges de l'Université Saint Joseph, Beirut
MusAfr	Museum Africum, Ibadan, Nigeria
Muséon	Le Muséon. Revue d'Études Orientales, Louvain
MySal	Mysterium salutis: Grundriss heilsgeschichtlicher Dogmatik
NAC	Ernesto Bernareggi, ed., Numismatica e Antichità Classiche, Lugano: Arti grafiche Gaggini-Bizzozero, 1974
NAWG	Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, Phil.–hist. Klasse, Göttingen (cf. NGWG)
NBA	Nuova Biblioteca Agostiniana. Opere di s. Agostino, Latin–Italian edition, ed. A. Trapè, Rome 1965–
NEAEHL	New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, 5 vols., New York 1993.
Nestori	A. Nestori, Repertorio topografico delle pitture delle catacombe romane, Vatican City 1993

NGWG	Nachrichten (1884–1893: von) der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften in (1884–1903: zu) Göttingen, Phil – hist. Klasse 1894–1933 (cf. NAWG)
NH	Nag Hammadi
NHC	The Facsimile Edition of the Nag Hammadi Codices, Leiden 1972–
NHS	Nag Hammadi Studies, Leiden 1971–
Niermeyer	Mediae Latinitatis Lexicon minus, ed. J.F. Niermeyer – C. van de Kieft, Leiden 1993–
NovT	Novum Testamentum. An International Quarterly for New Testament and Related Studies, Leiden
NovTSup	Supplements to Novum Testamentum
NP	Der Neue Pauly, Stuttgart–Weimar 1996–2003
NRTh	Nouvelle Revue Théologique, Louvain
NT	New Testament
NTS	New Testament Studies, Cambridge
OC	Oriens Christianus. Hefte für die Kunde des christlichen Orients, Wiesbaden
OCA	Orientalia Christiana Analecta, Rome
OCD	S. Hornblower – A. Spawforth, eds., The Oxford Classical Dictionary, Oxford ^{3}1996
OCP	Orientalia Christiana Periodica, Rome
ODB	Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, ed. A.P. Kazhdan et al., 3 vols., New York–Oxford 1991
ODC	The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, ed. F.L. Cross, London 1974
OEANE	Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East, ed. E.M. Meyers, New York 1997
OLP	Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica, Leuven
Opitz, A.W.	H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke, Berlin–Leipzig 1936–1941
OrChr	Oriens Christianus, Rome
Orlandis, Concilios	J. Orlandis – D. Ramos-Lissón, Historia de los concilios de la España romana y visigoda, Pamplona 1986
OrSyr	Orient Syrien, Paris
Ortiz de Urbina	I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia syriaca, Rome ^{2}1965
OS	Ostkirchliche Studien, Würzburg
OT	Old Testament
OxP	The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, London 1896–
PAA	Praktikà tes Akademías Athenon, Athens
PAAH	Praktikà tes en Athenais Archaiologikes Hetaireías, Athens
Palazzini	Dizionario dei Concili, ed. P. Palazzini, Rome 1963–1967
PAC	H.I. Marrou et al., Prosopographie chrétienne du Bas-Empire, 1982–
PAPhS	Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia
Patrologia	Patrologia. vol. III. I Padri latini (secoli IV–V), ed. A. Di Berardino, Turin 1978 (Sp. tr. BAC 422, Madrid 1981); vol. IV, Genoa 1996; vol. V, Genoa 2000

PbH	Patmabanasirakan Handes
PBSR	Papers of the British School at Rome, London
PCBE	Prosopographie Chrétienne du Bas–Empire, Rome 1982–
PCPhS	Proceedings of the Cambridge Philological Society, Cambridge
PdO	Parole de l'Orient, Kaslik
Perrone	L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche. Dal concilio di Efeso (431) al secondo concilio di Costantinopoli (553), Brescia 1980
PG	Patrologiae cursus completus. J.-P. Migne, Series Graeca, Paris 1857–1866; 1928–1936
PhW	Philologische Wochenschrift, Leipzig
PL	Patrologiae cursus completus. J.-P. Migne, Series Latina, Paris 1841–1864
PLRE	The Prosopography of the Later Roman Empire, Cambridge 1971–1980
PLS	Patrologiae Latinae Supplementum, ed. A. Hamman, Paris 1957–1971
PMS	Patristic Monograph Series
PO	Patrologia Orientalis, Paris 1903–, now published at Turnhout
POC	Proche-Orient chrétien, Jerusalem 1951–
Potthast	A. Potthast, Repertorium fontium historiae Medii Aevi, Rome 1962–
PP	Parola del Passato. Rivista di Studi antichi, Naples
PRIA	Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin
PS	Patrologia Syriaca, ed. R. Graffin, Paris 1894–1926
PSt	Patristic Studies, ed. R.J. Deferrari, Catholic University of America, Washington D.C. 1922–
PTA	Papyrologische Texte und Abhandlungen, Bonn 1968–
PTS	Patristische Texte und Studien, Berlin 1963–
PWK	Paulys Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. Wissowa – W. Kroll – K. Mittelhaus – K. Ziegler, Stuttgart 1893–
QC	Quaderni catanesi di studi classici e medievali, Catania 1979–1988.
QDipFLTCl	Quaderni del Dipartimento di Filologia, Linguistica e Tradizione Classica, Bologna 1995–
QLP	Questions Liturgiques et Paroissales
Quasten	J. Quasten, Patrologia, 2 vols., Turin 1967–1969; vol. III, ed. A. Di Berardino, Casale Monferrato 1978
RA	Revue Archéologique, Paris
RAAN	Rendiconti dell'Accademia di archeologia, lettere e belle arti di Napoli, Naples
RAC	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, Stuttgart 1950–
RAL	Rendiconti della Classe di Scienze morali, storiche e filologiche dell'Accademia dei Lincei, Rome
RAM	Revue d'ascétique et de mystique, Toulouse
RB	Reallexikon der Byzantinistik, Amsterdam 1968–
RBen	Revue Bénédictine, Abbaye de Maredsous
RBi	Revue Biblique, Paris

RBK	Reallexikon zur byzantinischen Kunst, Stuttgart 1966–
RBPh	Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire, Brussels
RCCM	Rivista di cultura classica e medievale, Rome
RCT	Revista Catalana de Teologia, Barcelona 1976–
RD	Revue Historique de Droit français et étranger, Paris
RDC	Revue de droit canonique, Strasbourg
RE	Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, Leipzig ^{1}1854–1866, ^{2}1863–1888, ^{3}1896–1913
REA	Revue des Études Anciennes, Valence
REArm	Revue des Études Arméniennes, Paris
REAug	Revue des Études augustiniennes et patristiques, Paris 1955–
REB	Revue des Études Byzantines, Paris
RecAug	Recherches augustiniennes (Supplément à REAug), Paris
RecSR	Recherches de Science Religieuse, Paris
RecTh	Recherches théologiques. Faculté de théologie protestante de l'Université de Strasbourg, Paris
REG	Revue des Études Grecques, Paris
REL	Revue des Études Latines, Paris
Rend. Acc. Lincei	Rendiconti della Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei, Rome
Rend. PARA	Atti della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia; s. III, Rendiconti, Rome
Rep.	G. Bovini – H. Brandenburg – F.W. Deichmann, Repertorium der christlichantiken Sarkophagen I: Rom und Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967
Repertorium	Repertorium Fontium Historiae Medii Aevi, Rome 1962–
RESE	Revue des Études sud-est-européennes, Bucharest
RET	Revista Española de Teología, Madrid
RevPhilol	Revue de philologie, de littérature et d'histoire anciennes
RFIC	Rivista di Filologia e di Istruzione Classica, Turin
RGG^{3}	Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Tübingen ^{3}1957–1965
RGG^{4}	Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Tübingen ^{4}1998–2005
RHCE	Repertorio de Historia de las Ciencias eclesiásticas en España, Salamanca 1967–1977
RHD	Revue d'histoire du droit, Groningen
RHE	Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, Louvain
RHEF	Revue d'histoire de l'Eglise de France, Paris
RHL	Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuses, Paris
RhM	Rheinisches Museum, Frankfurt
RHPhR	Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses, Paris
RHR	Revue de l'histoire des religions, Paris
RHT	Revue d'histoire des textes, Paris
RIA	Rivista dell'Istituto Nazionale di archeologia e storia dell'arte, Rome

RIL	Rendiconti dell'Istituto Lombardo. Classe di Lettere, Scienze morali e storiche, Milan
RIN	Rivista Italiana di Numismatica e Scienze Affini, Milan
Riv. lit.	Rivista liturgica, Turin–Leumann
Riv. St. Biz. Neoell.	Rivista di Studi bizantini e neoellenici, Rome
RivAC	Rivista di Archeologia cristiana
RivBib	Rivista biblica, Rome
Riv. Dioc. Mil.	Rivista Diocesana Milanese, Milan
RivStorItal	Rivista storica italiana, Naples 1884
RMAL	Revue du Moyen Âge Latin, Paris
ROC	Revue de l'Orient chrétien, Paris
ROE	Römisches Österreich. Jahresschrift der österreichischen Gesellschaft für Archäologie, Vienna
RomBarb	Romanobarbarica, Rome
RPAA	Rendiconti Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia, Rome 1921–
RPhL	Revue Philosophique de Louvain, Louvain
RQA	Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und Kirchengeschichte, Freiburg i.Br
RSBN	Rivista di Studi bizantini e neoellenici, Rome 1964–
RSC	Rivista di Studi Classici, Turin
RSCI	Rivista di Storia della Chiesa in Italia, Rome
RSLR	Rivista di Storia e Letteratura religiosa, Florence
RSO	Rivista degli studi orientali, Rome
RSPh	Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Théologiques, Paris
RSR	Revue de Sciences Religieuses, Strasbourg
RTAM	Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale, Louvain
RThom	Revue thomiste, Bruges
RThPh	Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie, Lausanne
RTL	Revue Théologique de Louvain, Louvain
SA	Studia Anselmiana, Rome 1933–
SAB	Sitzungsberichte der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Philos.–hist. Klasse, Berlin
Sacchi	P. Sacchi, Apocrifi dell'AT, 1–2, Turin 1981, 1989, 3–5, Brescia 1997, 1999, 2000
SAe	Scriptores aethiopici (CSCO)
SAW	Sitzungsberichte der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften in Vienna, Philos.–hist. Klasse, Vienna
SBA	Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-Historische Abteilung, Munich
SBF	Studii Biblici Franciscani Liber annuus, Jerusalem
SC	Sources Chrétiennes, Paris 1941–
ScEc	Sciences Ecclésiastiques, Montreal 1948–1967

SCH	Studies in Celtic History, Cambridge
Schanz	M. Schanz (C. Hosius – G. Kruger), Geschichte der römischen Literatur, Munich 1907–1920
Schneemelcher	W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 1–2, Tübingen [6]1990–1997
Schneemelcher ET	W. Schneemelcher, New Testament Apocrypha, 1–2, ed. R McL. Wilson, Cambridge 1991-1992
ScTh	Scripta Theologica, Navarra 1969–
SDHI	Studia et Documenta Historiae et Iuris, Rome
SE	Sacris Erudiri. Jaarboek voor Godsdienstwetenschappen, Steenbrugge, 1948– (from vol. 38 under the subtitle: A Journal on the Inheritance of Early and Medieval Christianity)
SEA	Studia Ephemeridis Augustinianum
Sharpe	R. Sharpe, A Handlist of the Latin Writers of Great Britain and Ireland Before 1540, Turnhout 1997
SHAW	Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften, Heidelberg
SHHA	Studia Historica. Historia Antigua, Salamanca 1983–
SHib	Studia Hibernica
SIFC	Studi italiani di filologia classica, Florence
SISR	Società Italiana di Storia delle Religioni
Simonetti	M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975
SLH	Scriptores Latini Hiberniae
SM	Studi Medievali, Spoleto
SMGBZ	Studien und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige Augsburg
SMSR	Studi e materiali di storia delle religioni, Rome
SNT	Supplements to Novum Testamentum, Leiden
SNTSMS	Soceity for New Testament Studies Monograph Series
SO	Symbolae Osloenses, auspiciis Societatis Graeco-Latinae, Oslo
SP	Studia Patristica (in TU), ed. K. Aland – F.L. Cross, Berlin 1957–, then Leuven
SPAW	Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Berlin.
SPFB	Sborník prací Filosofické fakulty brněnské univerzity
SPM	Stromata Patristica et Mediaevalia, ed. C. Mohrmann – J. Quasten, Utrecht–Brussels 1950–
SSR	Studi Storico-Religiosi, University of Rome
ST	Studi e Testi, Vatican City 1900–
STAC	Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum
Starowieyski	M. Starowieyski, ed. Apokryfy Nowego Testamentu, 1/1–2; 3, Kraków 2001, 2003
Stegmüller	F. Stegmüller et al., eds. Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 11 vols. (1950-80)
Storia del cristianesimo	Storia del cristianesimo, ed. J.M. Mayeur – Ch. and L. Pietri – A. Vauchez – M. Venard, vol. I. Il Nuovo popolo (Dalle origini al 250), Rome 2003, It. tr. (orig. Fr. 2000); vol. II. La nascita di una cristianità (250–430), Rome 2000,

	It. tr. (orig. Fr. 1995); vol. III. Le chiese d'Oriente e d'Occidente (432–610), Rome 2002, It. tr. (orig. Fr. 1998)
StudAns	Studia Anselmiana, Rome
StudBibLit	Studies in Biblical Literature
StudMon	Studia Monastica, Barcelona
StudPhilon	Studia Philonica Annual, Atlanta 1989–
StudRom	Studi Romani. Rivista bimestrale dell'Istituto di Studi Romani, Rome
SVF	Stoicorum veterum fragmenta, ed. Jo. von Armin, 4 vols., Stuttgart 1906
Synoden	J. Orlandis – D. Ramos-Lissón, Die Synoden auf der Iberischen Halbinsel bis zum Einbruch des Islam (711), Paderborn 1981
SVGB	Schriften des Vereins für Geschichte des Bodensees
SZG	Schweizerische Zeitschrift für Geschichte, Zürich
TAD	Türk Arkeoloji Dergisi, Ankara 1933–
TDNT	Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, Grand Rapids 1964–1976
Théol. Hist.	Théologie Historique, Paris 1953–
ThGl	Theologie und Glaube, Paderborn 1909–
Thiel	Thiel, Epistolae Romanorum Pontificum, Brunsbergae 1868
ThLL	Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, Leipzig 1900–
ThLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung, Berlin
ThQ	Theologische Quartalschrift, Tübingen
ThRev	Theologische Revue, Münster
ThRu	Theologische Rundschau, Tübingen
ThS	Theological Studies, Baltimore
Tillemont	S. Le Nain de Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles, 16 vols., Paris 1693–1712
TIP	Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, ed. and intro. by F. Bisconti, Vatican City 2000
Torsy	J. Torsy, Lexikon der Deutschen Heiligen, Cologne 1959
TPAPA	Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association
TRE	Theologische Realenzyklopädie, Berlin–New York 1976–
TSt	Texts and Studies, ed. J.A. Robinson, Cambridge 1891–
TTH	Translated Texts for Historians, Liverpool
TTZ	Trierer theologische Zeitrschrift, Trier
TU	Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, Leipzig–Berlin 1882–
Turner	cf. EOMIA
TWNT	Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, Stuttgart 1953–
TZ	Theologische Zeitschrift, Basel 1945–
VChr	Vigiliae Christianae. A Review of Early Christian Life and Language, Amsterdam
VChrS	Vigiliae Christianae Supplements, Leiden

Verzeichnis	H.J. Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller. Verzeichnis und Siegel, Freiburg i.Br 1995
VetChr	Vetera Christianorum, Bari
Vies des SS.	J. Baudot et Chaussin, Vies des Saints et des Bienheureux, Paris 1935–1959
Vives, Concilios	J. Vives, Los concilios visigodos e hispano–romanos, Barcelona–Madrid 1963
Volbach–Hirmer	W.F. Volbach – M. Hirmer, Arte paleocristiana, Florence 1958
WD	Wort und Dienst
WK	J. Wilpert, Die Malereien der Katakomben Roms, Freiburg i.Br. 1903
WMM	J. Wilpert, Die römischen Mosaiken und Malereien der kirchlichen Bauten vom IV bis XIII Jahrhundert, Freiburg i.Br. 1916
Wp	G. Wilpert, Le pitture delle catacombe romane, Rome 1903
Ws	G. Wilpert, I sarcofagi cristiani antichi, Vatican City 1929–1936
WS	Wiener Studien. Zeitschrift für klassische Philologie und Patristik, Vienna
WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament
Zahn	T. Zahn, Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanon, 2/1, Leipzig 1892 (Hildesheim 1975)
ZAC	Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum/Journal of Ancient Christianity, Berlin 1997–
ZDMG	Zeitschrift der deutschen mörgenländischen Gesellschaft
ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, Stuttgart
ZKTh	Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie, Vienna
ZKWL	Zeitschrift für kirchliche Wissenschaft und kirchliches Leben, Leipzig
ZNTW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der alteren Kirche, Berlin
ZPE	Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik, Bonn
ZRGG	Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte, Cologne 1948–
ZRG KA	Zeitschrift der Savigny–Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte (Kanonistische Abteilung), Weimar
ZRG RA	Zeitschrift der Savigny–Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte (Romanistische Abteilung), Weimar
ZThK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche, Tübingen

A

AARON (iconography). The oldest known representation—before 256—is in the *synagogue of *Dura Europos (Kraeling, pl. 60), where Aaron and the tabernacle are depicted (Ex 29).

In early Christian art, Aaron appears in the episodes of *Moses, e.g., on the Servanne *sarcophagus (late 4th c.; Ws 15) bearded, in tunic and pallium—like a sacred figure—among the crowd of men and women, while Moses receives the law (Ex 24:12-18). This basic formula is embellished in the mosaics found in the right aisle of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome (mid-5th c.) in the scenes of the murmuring of the Israelites (Ex 16:1-3), the fall of quails (Ex 16:11-13), the battle with the Amalekites (Ex 18:8-13) and the return of the explorers (Num 13:26-31). Also at Rome, on the 5th-c. door of S. *Sabina (Jeremias, pl. 27), Aaron changes the rods into serpents before Pharaoh (Ex 7:8-13). The image of Aaron is also on ivory objects (very probably, scroll in hand, next to Moses who strikes the rock, on an object dated 420–430, preserved in the British Museum: Volbach, n. 117), in miniatures (Evangelarium of Rabbula, 6th c. [by himself in priestly dress]: Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., pl. 3v; the 7th-c. Pentateuch of Ashburnham [in various scenes beside Moses]: von Gebhardt 1883; the 9th-c. codex of *Cosmas Indicopleustes, the prototype of which is from the 6th c. [alone in priestly dress]: Stornajolo, pl. 15). Lost evidence includes that of the meeting between Aaron and Moses present in the decorative cycle of S. Paolo fuori le Mura (see Cod. Barb. Lat. 4406), and that of Aaron and Moses before Pharaoh on the right wall of S. Peter's at the Vatican (see Cod. Barb. lat. 2733).

BS 2, 465ff.; LCI 1,2ff.; O. v. Gebhardt, The Miniatures of the Ashburnham-Pentateuch, London 1883; C. Stornajolo, Le miniature della Topografia cristiana di Cosma Indicopleuste (Vat. gr. 699), Milan 1908; C. Cecchelli, I mosaici di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956; C.H. Kraeling, The Synagogue: The Excavations at Dura Europos Final Report 8, New Haven 1956; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz [3]1976; G. Jeremias, Die Holztür der Basilika S. Sabina in Rom, Tübingen 1980; D.H. Verkek, Exodus and Easter Vigil in the Ashburnham Pentateuch: The Art Bulletin 77 (1995) 94-105; N. Cavallaro, Aronne (s.v.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, ed. F. Bisconti, Rome 2000, 127.

D. Calcagnini

ABA (mar) (4th c.). Poet and disciple of Ephrem of *Nisibis, Aba is known for biblical commentaries on the OT (Job; Ps 42:9) and the *gospels, and for metrical exhortations in 5-syllable verse. Only some fragments of his literary production remain.

F. Nau, ROC 17 (1912) 69-73; Duval 64; Baumstark 66; Chabot 32; Ortiz de Urbina 86.

J.-M. Sauget

ABA I (mar). *Catholicos of the church of Persia (540-552). The importance of Aba I for the history of Persian Christianity is twofold, acting as he did both at the level of the exegetical and theological culture of the ecclesiastical schools, which he helped to spread, and at the level of the institutional structure of a church long characterized by external tensions and internal divisions. The information we have on his life and the little that is known of his literary production clearly evidence these two aspects of his activity.

Born of a Zoroastrian family, an employee of the *Sassanid cadaster, he converted from Zoroastrianism to the Christian religion and was baptized. At first he attended the famous school of *Nisibis, then went to the *Byzantine lands to study Greek, visiting *Constantinople and other parts of the Mediterranean, including *Egypt. Mar Aba, like his disciple *Thomas of Edessa, was known to *Cosmas Indicopleustes, who left a significant testimony about him (Topografia Cristiana II, 2). He then returned to Nisibis as a teacher; it is uncertain whether he also founded a theological school in the capital of the Sassanid Empire, *Seleucia-Ctesiphon. Elected catholicos (540-552), he undertook the reorganization of the church of *Persia, torn by an internal schism at the time, and traveled with other bishops through the ecclesiastical provinces. The acts of this itinerant synod have reached us thanks to the Synodicon Orientale, which also contains the canons of the council organized by Aba in 544: among these, other than the repeated prohibition of consanguineous marriages, common among the Persian aristocratic class, there clearly emerge, on the one hand, the intention of a more stable centralization of power in the hands of the catholicos of Persia, whose explicit authorization was required for the ordination of bishops or *metropolitans; and on the other hand the attempt to bind bishops, *presbyters and deacons (see Diakonia - Diaconate) to their respective dioceses. The endemic state of tension with the Zoroastrian clergy and with important functionaries of the Sassanid court brought Aba I persecutions and exile in Azerbaijan, though he was not condemned to death. Even during a later period of imprisonment at the imperial court, he was able to receive visits from his collaborators and direct the life of his church.

His literary work, in large part lost, is thought to have included a Syriac version of the OT, biblical commentaries, ecclesiastical canons, synodal letters (some of which are preserved in the Synodicon Orientale), liturgical hymns and homilies ("Abdīšo," Catalogo di scrittori ecclesiastici, ch. 58, in BO III, I 74-81). Despite the extensive loss, his literary activity can be reconstructed from the work of his disciples. From their writings we know that he gave significant impetus to a literary genre typical of the Persian church, whose roots can be traced to *Narsai and *Jacob of Sarug: the "explanations" or "causes," treatises aimed at illustrating the rationale for liturgical celebrations, the *sacraments and the underlying theology of the latter—a theology that, being rooted in the liturgy, was more developed in its historical-salvific dimension than in a more technical *christological or *trinitarian dimension. These writings were fundamental for the formation of Persian Christian communities, as is well shown by the Explanations of the Nativity of Thomas of Edessa, which seems to rework some of his master's material. Aba's other significant initiative (539-540) was that of commissioning the translation of *Nestorius's Book of Heraclides to a group of translators, among whom was *Cyrus of Edessa; this work was Nestorius's apology in defense of his christological doctrine, written a day after reading the Tome of *Leo the Great. This text would become ever more decisive in a church like the Persian which, initially influenced by the exegetical and theological formulations of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, increasingly inclined to the more technical christological framework of Nestorius: indeed, the formulas that will eventually dominate in the most conservative—and the most powerful—circles of the Persian church during the following century were more Nestorian than Theodorian.

General presentations: Labourt 162-194; Duval 209-210, and also 53, 72, 165, 175; Baumstark 119-120, 137, 357; Chabot 53-54; Ortiz de Urbina 124-126; P. Bettiolo, Letteratura siriaca: Patrologia V, 473-475; W. Stewart McCullough, A Short History of Syriac Christianity to the Rise of Islam, Chico, CA 1982, 136-139.

On his life: see P. Bedjan, Histoire de Mar Jabalaha, de trois autres patriarches, d'un prêtre et de deux laïques nestoriens, Paris 1895; BHO 596; P. Peeters, Observations sur la Vie syriaque de Mar Aba, in Recherches d'histoire et de philologie orientales, Brussels 1951, 116-163; J.M. Fiey, Aba, Katholikòs, confessore, in Enciclopedia dei Santi. Le Chiese orientali, Rome 1998, I, 1-4.

On Aba and his world: H. Hainthaler, Die "nestorianische" Schulbewegung: Grillmeier, Band 2/3, 257-261; P. Bettiolo, Scuola ed economia divina nella catechesi della chiesa di Persia - Appunti su un testo di Tommaso di Edessa (d. ca. 542), in Esegesi e catechesi nei Padri (secs. IV-VII), S. Felici (ed.), Rome 1994, 147-157.

A. Camplani

ABADDON (Heb. ĂBADDŌN). (1) Fearsome lord of the earth, *angel of death, first called Muriêl whose feast is celebrated 13 Hathor; an image of perdition, synonymous with *death and Sheol (Job 26:6; 28:22; Ps 88:11 [87:12 LXX]; Rev 9:11); mentioned in the apocrypha (Joseph the Carpenter 24; Acts of Thomas 74; Book of the Resurrection of Christ of the Apostle Bartholomew 4,15; 7,1), present at the Lord's tomb at the moment of his resurrection, and will have a role in the universal* judgment.

(2) Title of a Coptic *apocrypha, composed of two parts: in the first, the patriarch *Timothy I of *Alexandria (380-385), preaching during the feast of Abaddon (where he was first called Muriêl) in Alexandria, tells how he found this text in Jerusalem. He describes its contents—the main part of the apocrypha—to the faithful: Jesus, asked by the apostles before ascending to heaven, tells them the story of the *creation of the man from the earth, which the earth did not want to allow, fearing the immensity of man's future sins. The angel Muriêl takes some of the earth against its will, and from it God forms the man—but gives him life only through Christ's intervention. After Adam's sin, God gives lordship over the earth to Muriêl, making him the terrible angel of death. Upon Abaddon's request, God assigns him his feast day—13 Hathor. After telling this story, Jesus commands the apostles to celebrate this feast, then ascends to heaven. The apocrypha, of a gnostic character, is important for an understanding of Coptic anthropology.

CANT 334; E.A. Wallis Budge, Coptic Martyrdoms . . . in the Dialect of the Upper Egypt, London 1914, 225-249, 474-493 (with Eng. tr.); Ital. tr. - Erbetta 3, 471-481; T. Orlandi, Coptic Encyclopaedia 1,2; C.D.G. Müller, Die Engellehre der koptischen Kirche, Wiesbaden 1959, 273-279.

M. Starowieyski

ABANDONED and EXPOSED CHILDREN. The term alumnus (alumna), among its other meanings, indicates an abandoned or exposed child that has been taken in and raised (foundling). Together with *abortion, abandonment and exposure were common more or less everywhere in antiquity—except in the Jewish world—esp. of deformed or illegitimate babies, or those whose birth was accompanied by unfavorable omens. The two actions were different—although both frequently led to a horrible death of the newborn—in that exposure took place in specific places and with certain precautions (e.g., a medal around the neck) so that the baby might be taken in and raised, whereas abandonment implied greater disinterest in the newborn's fate. Girls were more readily exposed than boys, and even more so the children of slaves. Despite a certain disapproval that slowly gained ground, such behavior was socially and ethically acceptable and was ignored by the law, except in particular cases such as claims of freedom on the part of exposed freeborn children (see *Pliny, Ep. 10,65-67). From the time of *Constantine exposure decreased, due in part to the influence of Christian morality, but it never completely ceased. At first Constantine made funds available for the support of needy children (CTh 11,27,1-2), then he authorized the sale of newborns (Fragmenta Vat. 34; CTh 5,10,1) and encouraged the taking in of exposed children (CTh 5,9,1 of 331). The sanctioning of the sale of babies, to us offensive, nevertheless often saved them from death. In 374 *Valentinian outlawed (CTh 8,51,2) exposure, but sale was still permitted, including the sale of only the child's labor for a period of years (*Augustine, Ep. 10: Divjak). In general, newborns were taken in not so much to be saved but to be raised and used as slaves, for prostitution or in spectacles, as the Christian *Justin Martyr writes: "We have learned that it is characteristic of evil persons to abandon their babies at birth; and especially because we see that nearly all of them end up in prostitution—not only girls, but also boys" (1 Apol. 27,1); and "because some of the abandoned would die if not taken in, and then we would become murderers" (ibid., 29,1). In some cases, however, they were taken in to be adopted by childless couples. The phenomenon was more widespread in cities than in the countryside. In periods when there were many slaves, people had no need to take in exposed children. Many pagan and Christian inscriptions mention the infancy of the deceased; pagan inscriptions usually limit themselves to the term alumnus (e.g., CIL VIII,410, 11576, 12778, 13238, 22993, 24687, 2394, 2396, 2773, 3002, 3288, 7078, 7754), while Christian inscriptions (DACL 1,1295-1296), in addition to that term, include names indicating the origin of the foundlings: Proiectus, Proiecta, Proiecticius, Stercorius (see Diehl 3,128 and 152-153), and also Copronimus (in Greek), though not always, as Pomeroy has shown for *Egypt. Some inscriptions manifest sentiments of love and intimacy between the alumnus(a) and the patron or patronness. The most famous of these foundlings was *Hermas, the Roman Christian writer of the Shepherd, who writes of "the one who fed me, who sold me to a certain Rhode, who lives at Rome" (Pastore, Visioni 1,1). Christians criticized this widespread practice: Justin, 1 Apol. 27,1; *Athenagoras, Supplica 35,5; *Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 3,3 and Strom. 2,18,92-93; *Tertullian, Ad nationes 1,15; Apologia 9; *Minucius Felix, Octavius 31,4; *Lactantius, Inst. divinae 6,20. *Augustine, perhaps referring to the practice of his community of Hippo, says that the babies were taken in by nuns: "Sometimes babies are exposed by merciless parents, to be raised by who cares what kind of person; then they are taken in and brought to baptism by holy virgins" (Ep. 98,6).

DACL 1,1288-1306; EC 1,646-648; 5,614-616; L. Annardi, Ricerche storiche sulla esposizione degli infanti presso gli antichi popoli e specialmente presso i Romani, Venice 1838; E. Eyben, Family Planning in Graeco-Roman Antiquity: Ancient Soc 11/12 (1980/81) 1-81; M. Bianchi Fossati, Vendita ed esposizione degli infanti da Costantino a Giustiniano: SDHI 49 (1983) 179-224; S.B. Pomeroy, Copronyms and the Exposure of infants in Egypt, in Studies . . . A.A. Schiller, ed. R.S. Bagnall, Leiden 1986, 147-162; J.E. Boswell, The Kindness of Strangers. The Abandonment of Children in Western Europe from Late Antiquity to the Renaissance, New York 1988 (It. tr., Milan 1991); A. Russi, I pastori e l'esposizione degli infanti nella tarda legislazione imperiale e nei documenti epigrafici: MEFRA 88 (1986) 855-898; J. Bellemore - B.M. Rawson, Alumni: the Italian evidence: ZPE 83 (1990) 1-19; M. Memmar, Ad servitutem aut ad lupanar. . . : ZRG KA 108 (1991) 21-93; W.V. Harris, Child Exposure in the Roman Empire: JRS 84 (1994) 1-22; G. Nathan, The Family in Late Antiquity: The Rise of Christianity and the Endurance of Tradition, London-New York 2000; B. Stawoska, Einige Bemerkungen zur Onomastik und Prosopographie christlicher Inschriften für Alumnen, in Prosopographica, L. Mrozewicz - K. Ilski (eds.), Poznan 1993, 247-258.

A. Di Berardino

ABBOT – ABBESS. The Aramaic abbâ, "father" (Gr. ἀββᾶς, Lat. abbas), is the name by which monks were called, especially the oldest and most venerable, in the first centuries of *monasticism in *Egypt and in the East. Later it came to designate the superior of the monastery sui iuris. In the East it remained alongside other terms, such as hegumen* (from Gk. ἡγεμών) or archimandrite;* in the West it prevailed over the term praepositus, which often continued to designate the second monk in the hierarchy of the *cenobium, immediately below the abbot. During the first centuries of monasticism, where written rules were not in place, the abbot was very often a charismatic personality who gathered the brothers around himself by the prestige of his actions and holiness; later his role became institutionalized and ever more clearly defined. The oldest of the European rules, the Rule of the Four Fathers, written probably after the middle of the 5th c., identifies the essence of cenobitism as obedience to the abbot (Reg. IV Patr. 1,10, Neufville: RBen 77 [1967] 74). The function of the abbot is the primary interest of the writer of the Rule of the Master; the Rule of St. *Benedict discusses at length the prerogatives and qualities of the abbot (ch. 2) and provides for his free election by the monks (ch. 64), which, in the earliest times, was followed by episcopal confirmation. Very soon abbots were participating in councils. In the Council of Constantinople in 448, 23 *archimandrites, along with the 30 participating *bishops, condemned the doctrine of *Eutyches.

Abbess is the superior in charge of a female monastery. The Latin name, abbatissa, developed in analogy with the masculine abbas, and is attested in 6th-c. burial inscriptions and in the writings of *Gregory of Tours.

J. Chapman, Abbot: Hastings, Encycl. of Religion and Ethics, I, 1,8-9; J.-M. Besse, Abbé. Abbesse: DACL I, 39-42; T.P. McLaughlin, Le très ancien droit monastique de l'Occident, Paris-Ligugé 1935; A. de Vogüé, La communauté et l'abbé dans la Règle de saint Benoît, Bruges 1961; S. Pricoco, Alle origini del latino monastico, in Il latino e i cristiani, E. Dal Covolo - M. Sodi (eds.), Rome 2002, 165-184.

S. Pricoco

ABDIAS of Babylon (late 6th c.). Presumed first bishop of Babylon, one of the 72 disciples of the Lord. He is the presumed author of a collection of *apocryphal *Acts of the Apostles (Peter, Paul, Andrew, James the Great, John, James the brother of the Lord, Philip, Thomas, Matthew, Simon and Jude). In the conclusion of the biography of Simon or Jude is written: "Abdias, bishop of Babylon, ordained by the apostles themselves (Simon and Jude); he wrote of their deeds in Hebrew. His disciple Eutropius then made a complete Greek version. It was then narrated in its entirety and arranged in 10 books by the African (*Julian)." In reality, the collection of Pseudo-Abdias was composed in Gaul in the 6th-7th c., as it depends on earlier authors (among them *Gregory of Tours), and was later revised.

R.A. Lipsius, M. Bonnet, Acta Apostolorum 2/1, Leipzig 1898, 128-216; AASS at the respective names; EC 1, 56; L. Duchesne, Les anciens recueils des légendes apostoliques: Compte-rendu du III Congrès sc. intern. des Catholiques, Brussels 1985, 69-79; L. Moraldi, Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, Turin 1971, II, 1431-1606; Erbetta 2,21-24 (on his character); E. Jounod and J.D. Kaestli: CCAp 2,750-834 (Virtutes Iohannis); K. Schäferdiek, Die "Passio Johannis" des Melito von Laodikeia und die "Virtutes Johannis": AB 103 (1985) 367-382; M. Brossard-Dandré, La passion de Jacques le Mineur selon le Pseudo-Abdias et ses sources. Actes apocryphes d'un apôtre apocryphe, in Apocryphité. Histoire d'un concept transversal aux religions du livre. En hommage à P. Geoltrain, S.C. Mimouni et al. (eds.), Turnhout 2002, 229-242.

S.J. Voicu

ABDON and SENNEN. *Roman martyrs buried at Rome in the catacomb of Pontianus on the Via Portuense. The Depositio Martyrum, in the *Roman Chronography of 354, commemorates the two martyrs on 30 July: Abdos et Semnes, in Pontiani, quod est ad Ursum Piliatum. In the Index coemeteriorum vetus (catalog, 7th c.), the *cemetery where Abdon and Sennen are buried, is called Cymiterium Pontiani ad Ursum Pileatum Abdon et Sennen via Portuensi. The itinerary Notitia ecclesiarum urbis Romae (7th c.) specifies that Abdon and Sennen lie above ground: Ascendis . . . Deinde intrabis in ecclesiam magnam. In the other two itineraries, the De locis sanctis martyrum qui sunt foris civitatis Romae (7th c.) and the Notitia portarum urbis Romae (12th c., from a source thought to be prior to 682), Abdon and Sennen are simply mentioned among the other martyrs of the Via Portuense. According to the Passio they were two Persian princes martyred during the persecution of *Decius. In the cemetery of Pontianus a fresco (5th-6th c.) presents the Lord holding out the crown of martyrdom to Abdon and Sennen, who are identified by their names written vertically (Wp 258). They are wearing mantles and *Phrygian caps. Abdon has a more mature appearance, with a short, rounded beard; Sennen is younger, with a pointed beard. Abdon has been identified with the person depicted on a terra cotta lamp, shown praying in sumptous Persian dress and having a short, rounded beard similar to the man depicted in the fresco at Pontianus.

DACL 1, 42ff.; EC 1, 58ff.; BS 1, 53ff.; LCI 5,4-5; P. Bruzza, D'una rarissima lucerna fittile sulla quale è effigiato un santo in vesti persiane: Studi e Documenti di Storia e di diritto 10 (1889) 416ff.; R. Valentini and G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma 2, Rome 1942; G. Matthiae, Pittura romana del medioevo. Secoli IV-X (with a biographical update by M. Andaloro), Rome 1987.

D. Calcagnini

ABDUCTION. Generally speaking, abduction is the kidnapping of a man or a woman. The specific term refers to a social phenomenon and is intended to indicate the snatching, often violently, of a woman for sexual purposes or for marriage. In ancient writings, it did not always have a negative connotation.

At *Rome from ancient times the practice was known (one should recall the abduction of the Sabine women). However, judging from the literature of the late Republic and of the early centuries of the empire (excluding rhetorical texts that probably referred to fictitious cases), in the Roman-Italian milieu, at least since the beginning of the Principate, the practice was not widespread. Few juridical considerations and few primary sources prior to the pre-*Constantinian age make any earlier assessment uncertain.

There is no unanimity among critical scholars in evaluating whether and in what way during the Republic abduction could be prosecuted as an iniuria, that is, as a private crime. The texts of the classical age seem rather to prosecute it in the generic sense as an offense. Later, but it is difficult to say exactly when, "to abduct a woman" (mulierem rapere) was prosecuted as a crime.

The *Justinian Digest reports only one passage, inserted under the rubric ad legem Iulia de vi publica ("according to the Julian Law on public force"), relating to this crime from a classical jurist (D. 48,6,5,2 = Marcian, Inst. 14). However, it is not certain that the crime referred to is abduction. As expected in the Digest, abduction—an accusation also applicable to foreigners, for which the death penalty was prescribed with no diminishing of the crime—does not necessarily refer to a specific law. The many opinions of scholars on how the law concerning abduction emerged are due to the paucity and uncertainty of the sources. The text seems to refer to the prosecution ex lege Iulia de adulteriis ("according to the Julian Law on the *adulterers"), and in practice, abduction was prosecuted at times with the accusation of stuprum (*rape).

Constantine (CTh 9,24,1, from 318 or 320 or 326) changed the understanding of abduction and furthered its suppression. No resolution following this crime (i.e., marriage and/or a young maiden's declaration of her own consent) exonerated the protagonists (including a woman and any other possible accomplices in the abduction) from very severe punishments. Not prosecuting the crime had as its primary objective that of protecting the family's will in marital choices. This objective was not opposed by the fact that the same family was to be punished if it did not demonstrate that it wanted to stop the crime but that it favored, however, some settlement; moreover, compensations for such a crime—in terms of freedom or Roman citizenship—was established for the slave or the citizen under Latin law who had denounced the crime.

In practice a restrictive interpretation of Constantine's law was affirmed, concerning the nullification of a marriage between an abductor and the one abducted. This posed, however, grave consequences, especially for children. To lower the possible risks in this regard, in 374, it was decreed that juridical actions against abduction or marriage resulting from it had to be taken within five years at most (CTh 9,24,3).

Before Constantine, the ordinances appear to make reference to a crime of which all women, liberae ("free") or even ingenuae honestae vitae ("those of a noble upright life"), could become victim. *Virgins or *widows were, therefore, included. Nevertheless, the imperial legislation from Constantine onward treated virgins and widows as a specific object of rights that it clarified or reformed. Constantine spoke explicitly only of virgines ("virgins") or puellae ("young girls"). In 354, *Constantius II further hardened the gravity of the crime and equated the abduction of widows who had chosen a life of chastity with that of consecrated virgins (CTh 9,25,1). Emperor *Julian was perhaps more lenient (*Ammianus 16,5,12 and *Sozomen 6,3); Emperor *Jovian returned to the heavy-handed approach (CTh 9,25,2) when he established the death penalty even for the attempt to convince virgins or widows who were consecrated to God to marriage. With regard for the given circumstances, the crime and the ways of applying punishments were specified also in CTh 11,36,7 (from 344), CTh 9,38,2 (from 353) and CTh 9,2,5 (from 409). Honorius, in 420, confirmed the earlier laws and added deportation and confiscation of goods for those who were responsible for a failed attempt to abduct a consecrated virgin. Codex Theodosianus collected the pertinent laws on abduction in the context of ordinances relating to a multiplicity of crimes.

Subsequently, in the West, Majorian's Nov. 6,4 (from 458), concerning the women who had chosen virginity, refers, in this group, to the preceding laws with some aggravating circumstances (he also punishes attempted abduction) and specifications (the patrimony of the guilty individual is not confiscated but is assigned to the accuser).

For the Eastern empire, however, there is nothing until Emperor *Justinian. With Justinian, notwithstanding the recovery of classical texts, jurists arranged abduction laws according to the forms given by Constantine, with some modifications: women were no longer subjected to punishment in any case whatsoever; protection for slave women and free women was expanded, within certain limits; and he sought to compensate the victim of abduction with patrimonial resources or the establishment of a dowry so that the woman could either live autonomously even without marrying or be helped in finding a husband.

It is difficult to reconstruct the procedures against abduction in the first edition of the Codex Justinianus,* probably framed according to the model provided by the CTh. The new law, which emanated from Justinian, to which the Institutiones made reference, is contained in the codex repetitae praelectionis (CI. 9,13,1). This codex completely reworked the entirety of the earlier material and substituted the ordinances, which were first cited both in the title de raptu virginum seu viduarum ("on the abduction of virgins or widows") and in the subsequent title de raptu sanctimonialium ("on the abduction of consecrated women"). In sum, it established that the crime remained punishable, with the exception of some cases of abduction of slave women or free women who were not widows and honestae ("upright women"). Abduction could also take place with regard to a fiancé if it occurred through force (per vim); abductors and accomplices caught red-handed must be tried and executed without the ability to appeal; the victim, if she was a free woman, would possess the abductor's goods and would not be able to marry him; deportatio was to be inflicted on the parents who did not wish to take action against the guilty individual. As in the case of Constantine's ordinances, the Justinian norms were not implemented in every instance, as shown by the novellae.

With respect to the ecclesiastical ordinances on abduction, the first were given by the Council of *Ancyra in 314 (can. 11), which decreed that women engaged to be married and abducted must be restored to their sponsi ("spouses"), even if they were violated. In 375, *Basil of Caesarea, in *Cappadocia, repeated the canon and perfected it with the ordinance on the basis of which, if not bound to anyone, she must be restored to her family, which must then decide to give her to her fiancé or at least to the abductor (can. 22, in Ep. 199, to *Amphilochius, bishop of *Iconium), and with specifications concerning the punishments (Ep. 270).

There are some ecclesiastical sources from the end of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th c. in favor of the marriage between the abductor and the abducted. Thus, can. 67 of the so-called Apostolic Canons* concluded that the abductor of a young woman to whom he was not engaged must keep her, and that he should be excluded from communion. This work also made several appeals to the OT (see Dt 22:28-29 but also Ex 22:16), texts to which *Ambrose also referred, Apol. Dav. 1,8,42 (ed. Hadot, SC 239, Paris 1977).

Other ecclesiastical canons punish the abductor and the consenting woman if she had made a promise of chastity: thus can. 26 (27) of the Concilium Arausicanum ("Council of *Orange") (CCL 148, 85, from the year 441); can. 46 of the so-called Concilium Arelatense II ("Second Council of *Arles") (ibid., 123, the years 442–506); can. 104 and some manuscripts of the so-called Statuta ecclesiae antiqua ("Ancient Statutes of the Church") (ibid., 185, from ca. 475), which imposed excommunication. Especially important was can. 27 of the Council of *Chalcedon (451): in abduction for the purpose of marriage, the guilty and the accomplices are to be punished with excommunication if it pertains to the laity; deposition if it pertains to ecclesiastical officials.

In canon law, abduction is the kidnapping of a woman, including the violent trapping of a woman, for purposes of marriage. It was understood both as a crime—with the purpose of marrying a woman, or having her carnally, with or without her consent—and as a nullifying impediment to marriage.

L. Desanti, Costantino, il ratto e il matrimonio riparatore: SDHI 52 (1986) 195ff.; L. Desanti, Giustiniano e il ratto: Annali Univ. Ferrara Giur. 1 (1987) 183-201; F. Goria, s.v. Ratto: Enciclopedia del diritto, 38, Milano 1987, 707-725; F. Botta, "Per vim inferre." Studi su "stuprum" violento e "raptus" nel diritto romano e bizantino, Cagliari 2004.

T. Sardella

ABEL

I. Abel - II. Abel and Cain (iconography).

I. Abel. The NT writings allude both explicitly and implicitly to the story of Abel (Gen 4:1-16); Jesus himself mentions the righteous Abel, whose innocent blood was shed (Mt 23:35). It is also likely that the parable of the murderous vineyard workers (Mt 21:35-39) contains an allusion to the death of Abel. The similarity between Abel's blood that "cries out" to God and the interceding blood of Christ can be noted in the relation between type and antitype in the letter to the Hebrews (Heb 11:4; 12:24).

The figure of Abel offering *sacrifice is as important as that of him as victim of his brother's envy. Abel the shepherd, who sacrifices the firstborn of the flock to God, was considered by the Fathers to be the prefigurement of Christ the *shepherd (De promiss. et praedic. Dei I, 6, PL 51, 738). *Ambrose sees the pure sacrifice of Abel as an image of the *eucharistic sacrifice; the *lamb offered to God as the firstfruits of creatures became the archetype of the sacrifice of Christ (Ambr., De inc. Dom. sacr. I, 4 PL 16, 819). *Augustine developed this *typology, basing it upon Heb 12:24 (Contr. Faustum 12,9-10). The parallelism between the blood that "cries out" and the interceding blood is found in other Fathers also (*Greg. Naz., Or. 25,16; *John Chrys., Adv. Iud. 8,8). *Paulinus of Nola sees in Abel the figure of the suffering righteous one, i.e., of the suffering Christ in believers (Ep. 38,3). For *Cyril of Alexandria, Abel the shepherd is the image of Emmanuel: Abel as the innocent victim signifies the pure sacrifice of Christ, superior to that of the old law (Glaphyra in Gen. I, 1,3). In the writings of the Fathers he is also the prototype of the *martyr, of the persecuted righteous one, of the virtue of patience (Cypr., Ep. 56; Exhort. mart. 5; De or. dom. 24; De bono pat. 10; Hom. Clem. II, 16; Ambr., Exhort. virg. 6,36). During the *Arian crisis (4th c.), *Athanasius considered the figure of Abel as the martyr for orthodox doctrine (De decr. Nyc. Syn.: PG 25, 432). The Fathers frequently saw Abel as the archetype of the Christian who witnesses to the truth (John Chrys., In Gen. hom. 19,6); the firstfruits of justice (Theodor., Quaest. in Gen. 45); the type of the righteous, uncircumcised man offering sacrifice (Just., Dial. 19,3), whose sacrifice surpasses that of the Pharisees (Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 18,3); the example of the righteous one put to death (ibid., IV, 34,4; Dem. 17: SC 62, 57). The further development of this typology is found in Ambrose and Augustine. For the former, Cain signifies the Jewish people, while Abel signifies the pagan people converted to Christianity (Cain et Abel I, 2,3). For Augustine, Abel represents the city of God, whereas Cain is the image of the city of the devil (Civ. Dei XV, 1); thus Abel also becomes the figure of the church in the world as persecuted pilgrim—persecuted, but also consoled by God (Civ. Dei XV, 18,2; XVIII, 51,2). The prayer Supra quae of the Roman canon mentions the sacrifice of Abel, along with *Abraham and *Melchizedek.

DTC I, 29-35; TWNT I, 6-7; LTK[3] 5, 1126-1127; L. Ruppert, Genesis, Forschung zur Bibel 70, Stuttgart- Würzburg 1992; A. Louth, Genesis 1–11, ACCS OT I, Downers Grove 2001 (ital. tr. M. Conti, La Bibbia Commentata dai Padri AT 1/1, Rome 2003).

L. Vanyó

II. Abel and Cain (iconography). As sons of *Adam and Eve, Abel personifies the righteous one of the OT and the sacrifice of Christ, whereas Cain is the first representative of the moral disorder deriving from their parents' *sin. Abel is the suffering "righteous one," innocently killed by his envious brother, and thus a type of the innocent Christ (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 4,18,3; Cyprian, De domin. orat. 24); his sacrifice is an image of the eucharistic sacrifice (Ambrose, De incar. 1,4). From the 4th c., they are normally represented on *sarcophagi offering their gifts to God (Gen 4:3-4): Abel, a shepherd and guardian of the flock, offers a lamb; Cain, an agricultural offering, the fruits of the earth: at least a sheaf of grain, occasionally a bunch of grapes (Rome, Museo Pio Crist. Vat., sarcophagus 149: middle third, 4th c.). In a sarcophagus at Fermo the sacrifice is offered to Christ-Logos, and on a fragment preserved in the garden of the Palazzo Colonna at Rome (first quarter, 4th c.), to the *Trinity. The only known example of *cemetery painting is that of cubicle B (second quarter, 4th c.) of the cemetery of Via D. Compagni, in which Abel and Cain are portrayed, with their characteristic attributes, alongside their sorrowful parents, who are seated on a rock. The two brothers also appear in the Pentateuch of Ashburnham (Paris, Bibl. Nat., fol. 6, 7th c.), in their usual attitude: Abel as guardian of the flock, Cain with a plow, intent on his work in the fields. The latter is also depicted in the same manuscript (Paris, Bibl. Nat., nouv. acqu. lat. 2334; 7th c.) in an attitude of despair: one of his seven sins, for which he will be condemned to the seventh generation. In a few scenes Cain is also depicted killing Abel, for example at St. Paul Outside the Walls at Rome, and in the miniatures of the Cotton Bible. Finally, Abel is portrayed by himself, in the act of sacrifice, in St. Vitale (middle 6th c.) and St. Apollinaris in Classe (7th c.) at Ravenna, beside the sacrifices of Melchizedek and Abraham, respectively.

L. De Bruyne - K. Rathe: EC 1, 65; F. Salvoni: EC 3, 302ff.; H. Aurenhammer: LCIK 1, 8-9; G. Henderson: LCI 1, 5-10; Id.: LCI 3, 471-474; Ws II, 229-230; P.H. Michel, L'iconographie de Caïn et Abel: CahCiv Médiévale 1 (1958) 194-199; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto la Via Latina, Florence 1990; TIP 91-92.

G. Santagata

ABELITES. *Augustine (De haer. 87) describes Abelites as a sect that he knew to be active in the countryside around Hippo but that became extinct in 428 with the conversion of its last followers to the Catholic Church. The distinguishing characteristic of the sect was the *virginity practiced by its members, who lived as couples, though with each couple adopting a boy and a girl who would in turn form another couple upon the death of their adoptive parents, so as then to adopt two more children. Their name, Abelonii, which Augustine believed to be of Punic origin, goes back to a Jewish and *gnostic tradition (with a *Manichean influence) according to which Abel lived as a virgin though he was married.

F. Cocchini

ABERCIUS (late 2nd c.), also Avircius. A late anonymous romaticized biography of Abercius, bishop of Hierapolis in *Phrygia during the reign of *Marcus Aurelius, was reported by Simeon Metaphrastes (AASS 22 Oct). Abercius was a great traveler, preaching the gospel and visiting the most illustrious churches of the time. After returning to the city, at age 72 he personally dictated a long inscription, coming to be identified with the person in the inscription discovered by W.M. Ramsay at Hieropolis, the city of Phrygia Salutaris (c. 170–200). It is, at least thus far, the most illustrious of the Christian epigraphs, which in 1888 John Baptist de Rossi called epigramma dignitate et pretio inter Christiana facile princeps. A marble sepulchral altar has the epigraph on the front face and two relief laurel crowns on the two sides. Two large fragments of the text are preserved, including the left side face, found by Ramsay in 1883 and given to Leo XIII in 1892 on the occasion of his priestly jubilee. First displayed in the Lateran Museum, they are today in the Vatican Museum. The text can be reconstructed almost entirely, thanks to another epigraph from the same place that partially reproduces it and to a series of manuscript codices in the Life of Abercius, which pass the famous inscription down to us in its entirety, though not without uncertainties. In the 19th and 20th c. its Christian character was at times unsuccessfully denied; today it is recognized by all. The epigraph consists of the epitaph of Abercius, bishop of Hierapolis, which he had engraved: 22 hexameters, written in a noble style and sprinkled with arcanely ambiguous expressions, according to the taste of the time. Its contents are in brief: vv. 1-2: Abercius thought of his own tomb while still living; 3-6: he is a disciple of Christ, the Good Shepherd; 7-9: he went to Rome at Christ's command; 10-11: he traveled through Syria and beyond the Euphrates; 12-16: everywhere he had the apostle Paul as a spiritual companion and was assisted by the faith and the nourishment of the Eucharist; 17-18: he himself, at 72 years of age, dictated his epitaph; 19: he invites his companions in faith to pray for him; 22-20: he threatens any violators of the tomb.

The importance of the text can easily be seen, including as it does, at such an early date, the main tenets of the Christian faith. Of particular interest are vv. 7-9: (". . . who [Christ] sent me to Rome to contemplate a kingdom and to see a queen in golden vestments and golden clothes. And he saw there a people with a splendid seal"). This is an arcane double-reference: the kingdom is that of Marcus Aurelius, but also that of Christ; the queen is Rome and, at the same time, the church; the seal is that of the empire, but also of faith. Essentially Abercius considers Rome the center of the universal church, an idea shared by many others in the *Asia Minor of that period. Also very important are vv. 12-16, which have preserved for us an example (perhaps the first known to us) of the acrostic Ἰχθύς, as well as a profession of faith: Christ, the mystical Fish (Ἰχθύς), concealed in the Eucharist under the species of bread and wine, is the son of God (πέγέ—"Fount") and of *Mary (Παρθένος ἁγνή—"chaste Virgin")—a strong allusion to the twofold nature, divine and human, of the Redeemer.

J.B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, pt. II, London 1891, I, 498-499 (see 2nd ed. revised by M. Holmes, Leicester 1990); Quasten, Patrologia, I, 154-155; RAC 1, 12-42; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, Rome 1978, IV, 337-386; Id., L'iscrizione di Abercio e Roma: AncSoc 2 (1971) 174-203; Id., L'iscrizione di Abercio: AncSoc 4 (1973) 271-279; B. McNeil, Avircius and the Song of Songs: VChr 31 (1977) 23-24; W. Wischmeyer, Die Aberkiosinchrift: JbAC 23 (1980) 22-47; G. Kretschmar, Erfahrung der Kirche. Beobachtungen zur Aberkios-Inschrift, in Communio sanctorum. Mélanges offerts à Jean-Jacques von Allmen, Geneva 1982, 73-85; M. Violante, Il casto pastore dell'iscrizione di Abercio e il Pastore di Erma: Orpheus 8 (1987) 355-365; D. Bundy, The Life of Abercius: Its Significance for Early Syriac Christianity: Second Century 7 (1989-1990); LACL 2; I. Ramelli, L'epitaffio di Abercio: Aevum 74 (2000) 191-206.

M. Guarducci

ABGAR. Initially reported by *Eusebius (HE I, 13-22; II, 6-7), the name Abgar indicates several kings of the *Osrhoene kingdom (northwestern Mesopotamia), whose capital was *Edessa (today Urfa in Turkey). One king ordinarily referred to is Abgar V, called Ukama (AD 9-46), to whom a legend attributes the evangelization of the city. Afflicted by a terrible illness, Abgar is said to have written the Lord Jesus a letter asking to be healed; Jesus then left orders to Thomas to send the disciple Addeo (Thaddaeus) after his ascension to heal the king and spread the faith in his city. The purpose of this legend was to trace the beginning of the faith in Edessa back to Jesus himself and to the apostolic era, thus attributing apostolic dignity to its church. The sources of the story, which comes to us through the Greek text of Eusebius (which provides a translation done by him from the original Syriac in the Edessan archives, included in the list of apocryphal texts of the Decretum Gelasianum), are (1) two letters between Jesus and Abgar and (2) the account of the arrival of the apostle in the city, the healing of the king and the evangelization of the country—events that Eusebius places in the years 27–28. The accounts are certainly apocryphal, probably from the early 3rd c., at the time of King Abgar IX the Great (179–216)—according to other sources Abgar VIII (Chronicle of Edessa*)—who, with significant reservation, is considered the first Christian king of Edessa. His conversion is to have taken place after meeting Pope Eleutherus. The accounts pertaining to Abgar V were clearly written after 174, given the citations of the gospel based on the Diatessaron of *Tatian, composed during these years. Another later trace has reached us from the pilgrimage of *Egeria (XIX, 2) who, having visited Edessa (381–384), recounts the stories told her by bishop Eulogius (379–387) about the Christianization of the city, namely, the above-mentioned letters between Abgar and the Lord, and miracles that protected the city from various Persian invasions.

There are thus two Abgars linked to Christian history, the difficulties in establishing their historicity notwithstanding. A third source, chronologically, for this obscure personality is the Doctrine of Addai (Thaddaeus), another apostolic *apocrypha, more extensive than the previous two (*Addai). Composed ca. 400 and also preserved in Syriac, it includes correspondence between Abgar and Jesus, and other items on the evangelization of Edessa. This source relates how Annanias, messenger of Abgar and hypothetical author of the letter dictated by the Lord, was not only supposed to have been the archivist of Edessa but also to have received a self-portrait from the Lord and taken it to Abgar—an image now venerated in the Byzantine tradition as "the holy face of Edessa." Another apocryphal writing bearing Abgar's name is also based on The Acts of Thaddaeus. Other texts and authors of the primitive church make reference to Abgar, among them: *Julius Africanus, *Evagrius of Pontus, *John of Damascus, *Origen and *Augustine. The last two, denying that Jesus would have left anything written, consider these traditions apocryphal.

Today the text of the letters is preserved in Syriac, Armenian, Greek, Latin, Georgian, Arabic, Palaeoslavonic, Coptic and Celtic. The correspondence between Jesus and Abgar, though considered apocryphal and legendary, remains a living tradition of the Syrian (during Lent), Armenian (Nestorian), Malabarese and *Coptic churches.

CANT 88-89, 229; BHG 1702-1704 (I, c, d, e); BHO 9, 24, 1141; Eusebius, HE 1,13-22; Egeria, Peregrinatio ad loca sancta XIX, 1-19; J.A. Fabricius, Codex apocryphus Novi Testamenti, Hamburg 1703; G. Philips, The Doctrine of Addai the Apostle, Now First Edited in a Complete Form in the Original Syriac with an English Translation and Notes, London 1876; R.A. Lipsius, Acta Apostolorum Apocryphorum, Leipzig 1891, I, 273-283; M. Erbetta, Gli Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, Casale Monferrato 1975, III, 77-78; J. Rhodes, The Apocryphal New Testament, Oxford 1980; J.W. Drijvers, Addaï und Mani. Christentum und Manichäismus im dritten Jahrhundert in Syrien: OCA 221, Rome 1983; J. Tixeront, Les origines de l'Église d'Édesse et la légende d'Abgar, Paris 1988; W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen II, Tübingen 1989, 436-437; L. Moraldi, Gli Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, Casale Monferrato 1994, II, 1657-1688; A. Luther, Die ersten Könige von Osrhoene: Klio (1991); A. Desreumaux, Histoire du roi Abgar et de Jésus, Turnhout 1993; J. González, La leyenda del Rey Abgar y Jesús, orígenes del Cristianismo en Edesa, Madrid 1995; I. Ramelli, Edessa e i romani fra Augusto e i Severi: aspetti del Regno di Abgar V e di Abgar IX: Aevum 73 (1999) 107-143; C. and F. Jullien, Les Actes de Mar Mari. L'apôtre de la Mésopotamie, Turnhout 2001; A. Markovic, Prelude to Constantine, Frankfurt 2004.

J.F. Rubio Navarro

ABIBUS DOLICHENUS (ABIBUS [HABIB] of DOLICHE) (d. after 435). Bishop of Doliche (Euphratean *Syria), suffragan of *Alexander of Hierapolis. Abibus was deposed from his episcopal see between 434 and 435 for remaining faithful to *Nestorius even after the peace accord between *John of Antioch and *Cyril of Alexandria (433). Signatory and addressee of many collective letters in the Collectio Casinensis, Abibus wrote to Alexander of Hierapolis and other bishops of Euphratean Syria about his removal, specifying that he had never sent "libels of refusal" to the *patriarch of *Antioch, and declaring himself ready to continue to fight for the true faith.

CPG 6388, 6408, 6418, 6438, 6445, 6460; Collectio Casinensis, ACO I, 4, 149, 157-159, 162-163; PG 84, 732-733, 743-746, 749-751; Patrologia V, 185.

P. Marone

ABITINA, Martyrs of. In the city of Abitina in 304, modern Chouhoud el-Bâtin (Beschaouch), a group of 50 Christians was arrested for continuing to meet regularly to celebrate the *liturgy in opposition to the orders of the first edict of *Diocletian. The future martyrs underwent a first interrogation in their city's forum; all having confessed their faith, they were then transferred in chains to *Carthage to be judged by the proconsul *Anulinus. Upon their arrival there they were interrogated again, individually or in small groups, and cruelly tortured, but none denied their first confession. The experiences of the martyrs of Abitina are narrated in a single text, the Passio Saturnini, Dativi, Felicis, Ampelii et sociorum (BHL 7492; ed. Franchi de' Cavalieri), which, though not easily interpreted or placed chronologically, is very important for the history of *Donatism and, more generally, of African Christianity. The narrative section recording the events of the arrest and trial (chs. 2-18) is framed between a prologue (ch. 1) and an epilogue (chs. 19-23), in which the behavior of traitors and those in communion with them is stigmatized. In the famous Appendix, a strict opposition is expressed between an association of reprobates, the conuenticula traditorum, infected by every kind of wickedness (the bishop *Mensurius and his deacon *Caecilian are, among other things, accused of having allowed the martyrs to starve to death in prison, keeping the usual food from being brought them), and a church of the pure who kept themselves free from any sort of defilement, thus earning for themselves (for the first and only time in the surviving Donatist literature) the honorific title of ecclesia martyrum (see Passio Dativi 22; ed. Franchi de' Cavalieri, 69).

Scholars have long investigated the composite character of this text, its evident polemical quality and the possibilities regarding its date. Monceaux (III, 144) hypothesized that a prologue and an appendix had been added to an original ancient document. These were composed by two different Donatist authors (the author of the Appendix being the more violent of the two), both active while *Caecilian, bishop of Carthage, was still alive, and probably during the so-called persecutio Cecilianensis (316–321). P. Franchi de' Cavalieri (3-46), however, considering the Passio to be a unitary whole, claimed it to be the work of a single author active in the 5th c. He based this conclusion primarily on the fact that in the Collatio of 411 (see Capitula III, 433, 445-447; Aug., Brev. cols. III, 17,32), a text concerning the martyrs of Abitina was presented and read that only with difficulty could have been the same as the one we have. The different positions of the two authors have been taken up again at times, and still today scholars seem equally divided among those who, sustaining a "high" chronology, see the document at the origin of Donatist polemical argumentation (Brisson, Tilley, Saxer, Scorza Barcellona) and those who place the document (at least in its present form) much later, seeing in it the final outcome of a centuries-old debate (Maier, Lazewsky, Zocca).

If it is true, as it seems, that Augustine preached on the occasion of their feast (Lambot), it seems that the martyrs whose experiences are narrated in the document were in any case celebrated equally by both *Catholics and Donatists.

Monceaux III, 140-147; DHGE I, 129-130; Delehaye OC 84-85; Id., Contributions récentes à l'hagiographie de Rome et d'Afrique: AB 54 (1936) 293-296; BS 11,682-4; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, La Passio dei martiri abitinesi, in Id., Note Agiografiche 8 (Studi e Testi, 65), Vatican City 1935, 3-71; C. Lambot: RB 50 (1938) 10-15; 67 (1949) 264-265; J.P. Brisson, Autonomisme et christianisme dans l'Afrique romaine de Septime Sévère à l'invasion arabe, Paris 1958, 127-129; D. Raynal, Culte des martyrs et propagande donatiste à Uppena: Cahiers de Tunisie 21 (1973) 33-72; A. Beschaouch, Sur la localisation d'Abitina, la cité des célèbres martyrs africains: CRAI (1976) 255-267; Maier I, 57-92; S. Lancel, Actes de la conférence de Carthage en 411, SC 194, Paris 1972, 95-96; C. Lepelley, Les Cités de l'Afrique Romaine au Bas-Empire, II: Notices d'histoire municipale, Paris 1981 (on Abitina 56-62); Y. Duval, Loca Sanctorum Africae. Le culte des martyrs en Afrique du IVᵉ au VIᵉ siècle, Rome 1982, II, 684-691; Saxer, Afrique latine, 60-64; Fontaine, Littérature narrative sur le martyre et l'ascèse, 584-585; W. Lazewsky, Il martirio come lotta spirituale con il diavolo nella letteratura agiografica donatista, Rome 1983, 14-19; M.A. Tilley, Donatist Martyr Stories: The Church in Conflict in Roman North Africa (Translated Texts for Historians 24), Liverpool 1996, 25-49; M.A. Tilley, The Bible in Christian North Africa: The Donatist World, Minneapolis 1997, 58; F. Scorza Barcellona, L'agiografia donatista, in M. Marin - C. Moreschini (eds.), L'Africa cristiana. Storia, religione, letteratura, Brescia 2002, 140-145; E. Zocca, Dai "santi" al "Santo": un percorso storico linguistico intorno all'idea di santità (Africa Romana secs. II-V), Rome 2003, 102-106, 185-187; F. Dolbeau, La "Passion" des martyrs d'Abitina: remarques sur l'établissement du texte: AB 121 (2003) 273-276.

E. Zocca

ABLABIUS (d. 338). Prefect of the Eastern praetorium. Originally from *Crete and of humble origins, he held high offices within the imperial administration and in 315 was probably in *Italy as the vicarius Africae. *Constantine sent him a law, charging him with its promulgation throughout Italy (CTh XI, 27,1). From 326 to 337 Ablabius fulfilled the position of prefect of the Eastern praetorium. In 331 he was consul together with Annius Bassus. In 333 Constantine directed an imperial rescript to him (C. Sirm. I) regarding the episcopale iudicium. Under *Constantius II he was deposed from the office of praetorian prefect and retired to his possessions in *Bithynia, where he was killed in 338. *Constantine chose Ablabius's daughter Olympia as the companion of his son *Constans; at the death of the latter, she was given in marriage to Arsaces, king of *Armenia.

PLRE, I, Ablabius 4, 3-4; DNP 1, Ablabius 1, 25; Storia del Cristianesimo 2, 217, 220, 267, 273.

G. Pilara

ABORTION. In the thought of the Fathers, the issue of abortion is set in the context of the proposal of a fundamental choice of civilization made by Yahweh to his people: "Today I call heaven and earth as witnesses against you: I have placed before you life and death, a blessing and a curse. Choose life, that you and your descendants may live, to love Yahweh your God, to listen to his voice and to adhere to him: so that he may be your life and your length of days in the land that Yahweh swore to your fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac and to Jacob" (Dt 30:19-20). The earliest writings, the Didache* and the *Letter of Barnabas, following the schema of the two ways, life and death, teaching that the one who walks in the way of life does not kill and, consequently, will not take the life of a fetus by abortion (phthora) (Didache, 15-17; Barn., Ep 19,5). The act of abortion, in addition to being a grave lack of love for one's neighbor, is above all an offense against the law of God, precisely because it destroys one of his creatures. The crime of abortion sets on the way of death not only the woman who has an abortion but also the one who performs it, leading both along the road to eternal punishment (Barn., Ep 20).

The *apologists constructed their arguments specifically on the absolute respect of Christians for the life of the unborn. "How can we kill a person," asks *Athenagoras, "we who judge women who use abortive measures to be murderers, and consider them accountable to God for their abortions?" (see Athenag., Legatio 35). *Minucius Felix contrasts *pagans and Christians even more sharply in matters of life and death: "There are even women who, drinking certain medications, destroy the beginning of the future person in their womb, committing murder before giving birth. . . . We, on the other hand, are not permitted to take part in murder or to hear it spoken of" (Minuc., Octavius 30,2). *Tertullian also, in his concise and at times violent style, accuses the gentiles of practicing abortion: "You have little appetite for human viscera, because you devour them, alive and full-grown; rarely do you lick human blood, because you pour out the blood of the future; rarely do you eat infants, because you sweep away the whole child in advance" (see Tertull., Ad nationes I, 15,8). Before the divine commandment—non occides—there is no difference between taking the life of one already born and destroying the life of one not yet born: one who will be a person later is already one now (see Tertull., Apologeticum 9,8; De exhort. cast. 12,5).

For all the Greek and Latin fathers, abortion is morally a sin and legally a crime, because it involves the unjust killing of a human life that is, from its beginning, under the protection of the providential love of God. In his comment on Ex 23:19: "Do not boil a kid in its mother's milk," *Clement of Alexandria concludes that abortion, the killing of a living fetus, turns the mother's womb into a tomb of death instead of a cradle of life as the Creator wills (see Clem. Alex., Strom. 2,18). *Basil of Caesarea leaves no doubt on the matter, considering the distinction between an ensouled and an unensouled fetus a subtlety of philosophers and learned pagans, unacceptable by Christians. As the violent killing of a human life-in-becoming, abortion is always homicide (see Basil., Ep. 188,2). Basil judges both those who provide abortive drugs and those who use them to be likewise murderers (ibid.). *Ambrose of Milan considers abortion such a horrendous crime that it must be revoked as soon as the mind becomes aware of it (see Ambr., Ep. 60,1). For *Augustine, the cruel lust of some women reaches the point of destroying the fetus in their own womb when drugs to induce sterility have failed; they choose to destroy their offspring before it is born (see Aug., De nuptiis et concupiscentia, I, 15,17). At the time of the Fathers the moral judgment on abortion was thus strongly negative, because it is homicide. On the juridical question of the crime in the case of abortion prior to animation, appeal to Augustine's judgment is certainly false (see Honings, 79-83).

J.H. Waszink: RAC I, 55-60; M. Roberti, "Nasciturus pro iam nato habetur" nelle fonti cristiane primitive, in Cristianesimo e Diritto Rom., Milan 1935, 65-84; E. Nardi, Procurato aborto nel mondo greco romano, Milan 1971; B. Sesboüé, Les chrétiens devant l'avortement d'après le témoignage des Pères de l'Église: Etudes 139 (1973) 262-283; B. Honings, Aborto e animazione umana, Rome 1973; P. Sardi, L'aborto ieri e oggi, Brescia 1975; E. Eyben, Family Planning in Graeco-Roman Antiquity: AnSoc 11/12 (1980/81) 1-81; D.A. Dombrowski, St. Augustine, Abortion, and libido crudelis: Journal of the History of Ideas 49 (1988) 151-156; M.J. Gorman, Abortion and the Early Church: Christian, Jewish and Pagan Attitudes in the Greco-Roman World, Downers Grove, IL 1982; J.M. Riddle, Contraception and Abortion from the Ancient World to the Renaissance, Cambridge, MA 1992; A. Lindemann, "Do not let a woman destroy the unborn babe in her belly." Abortion in Ancient Judaism and Christianity: Studia Theologica. Scandinavian Journal of Theology 49 (1995) 253-271.

B. Honings

ABRAHAM

I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. Recalled various times in the NT as among the most emiment personalities of the old covenant, Abraham becomes a typologically rich figure in the early Christian tradition, because of the many interpretations suggested by his whole story. He has in semetipsum quadruplicem figuram: of the OT, of the Jewish people, of Christ and of the pagans (Greg. of Elvira, Tract. 2). Because of Abraham's faith, *Irenaeus presents him as the "prophet of our faith" (Adv. haer. IV, 21,1, based on Gal 3:5-9), as well as calling him one who knows God through the Word, instructed in the prophetic vision of the coming of the Son of God (Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 7,1; V, 1,2). *Origen, along the lines of *Philo, interprets his person as a symbol of philosophical ethics (CCt. prol. 3,1-16) and his entire experience as an *allegory of spiritual progress (Comm. Jo. XX, 67-74); he is numbered among the prophets based on Gen 20:7 (Hom Hier. 1,5). The departure from Canaan for the Promised Land is read as an example of the way of *purification necessary for the faithful to reach God (Ambr., Abr. 1,2,4; Jerome, Ep. 71,2,2; 108,31,1-2; 125,20,5; Greg. Nyss., Eun. XII; Scala Parad. III); his obedience in following God's invitation (Gen 12:1) is an exemplar of the monastic vocation (Jerome, Ep. 31,1; Euch., De laude eremi 1); his abandonment of land, relations and his father's house is a sign of the three renunciations to which monks are called (Cassian, Conl. III, 6); being led out "of the land of the Chaldeans" (Gen 15:7) is an invitation to abandon astrological beliefs and horoscopes (Orig., Hom. Hier. lat. I, 4); the twofold symbolism of sand and stars, by which he is promised an inheritance (Gen 14:16; 15:5), is indicative of the Hebrew people and of Christians (Justin, Dial. 120,2); the three animals he sacrifices to celebrate the covenant (Gen 15:9) symbolize the three epochs into which human history is divided: before the law, under the law and under grace (Quodvultdeus, Liber de prom. et praed. 12,18); the three men who appear at Mamre (Gen 18:1ff.) are the Logos with two angels (Justin, Dial. 56; Origen, Hom. IV,1 in Gen.; Hilary, Trin. 4,25), or the Logos with Moses and Elijah (Greg. of Elvira, Tract. 2,11), or finally the Trinity (Aug., Trin. 2,11,20); the age of his body is interpreted as "mortification" (Orig., Com. Rom. IV, 7), thus the lack of offspring is due to the practice of continence (Did., Gen. 16,1-2); his obedience to God in sacrificing Isaac shows his faith (Clem. Rom., 1Clem. X, 1-6), which is faith in the resurrection (Orig., Hom. VIII in Gen.; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. V, 5; August., Civ. XVI, 32). In sacrificing Isaac, and on the basis of Rom 8:32, Abraham becomes a type of God the Father (Orig., Hom. VIII in Gen.; Aug., Civ. XVI, 32) and shows himself an example of patience (Cypr., De patient. X) and manifests his virtues: wisdom, in believing in God; justice, in rendering to God what he had received; fortitude, in obeying; temperance, in the way he carried out the command (Ambr., De offic. I, 119). His prayer of intercession (Gen 18:16-33) is an example of humility (Cypr., De paenit. II, 4); his smile when God promised him a son (Gen 17:17) is a sign of wonder, not unbelief (Ambr., De Abr. I, 4,32; II, 11,86; August., Civ. XVI, 26), as was that of Sarah, to whom he is compared (Prud., Dittochaeon IV); his wedding with Keturah shows his ceaseless zeal for doctrine (Orig., Hom. XI in Gen.), as well as constituting a proof for *heretics of the possibility of contracting a second marriage (Aug., Civ. XVI, 34). At Mamre, Abraham saw an image of the passion of Christ (Chrom., Serm. 15), while he himself is depicted in the royal official of Jn 4:46-53 (Orig., Com. Jo. XIII, 57-58). The sons that God will raise up to him from stones (Lk 3:8) are the pagans and all those who have a heart of stone (Orig., Hom Hier. 4,5). Finally, the expression "bosom of Abraham" (Lk 16:22) indicates the intermediate region between heaven and hell, where the righteous are consoled as they await resurrection (Tertull., Adv. Marc. IV, 34,10), or the "refuge of eternal peace" (Ambr., De Obitu Valent. 72), or the secretum where the rich receives the poor (August., Serm. 14,4-5), or the hand itself of the poor person for someone who gives him the fruits of his fast (Peter Chrys., Serm. 8); those who rest in it are the righteous who "participate in the things revealed to him" (Orig., Com Jo. XXXII, 266), believers like him, who was himself a believer (Orig., Fr. XIV in Jo).

DSp 1,110; RAC 1, 18-28; TRE 1, 372-382 (with ample bibl.); B. Botte, Abraham dans la liturgie, Cahiers Sion 5 (1951) 88-95; J. Daniélou, Abraham dans la tradition chrétienne: Cahiers Sion 5 (1951) 160-179; J.R. Lord, Abraham: A Study in Ancient Jewish and Christian Interpretation, Duke 1968; BS 1, 89-112; R. Tremblay, La signification d'Abraham dans l'œuvre d'Irénée de Lyon: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 435-457; F. Cocchini, Rom 4,19 nell'interpretazione origeniana: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 251-262; E. Norelli, La sabbia e le stelle. Gen 13,16; 15,5; 22,17 nell'esegesi cristiana dei primi tre secoli: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 285-312; M. Simonetti, La tipologia di Abramo in Gregorio di Elvira: Annali della Facoltà di Letters e Filosofia dell'Università di Cagliari VI (1987) 141-153; The Sacrifice of Isaac in the Three Monotheistic Religions, F. Manns (ed.), Studium Biblicum Franciscanum Analecta 41, Jerusalem 1995; F. Cocchini, Omelia VIII: la prova di Abramo, in Mosè ci viene letto nella Chiesa. Lettura delle Omelie di Origene sulla Genesi, E. dal Covolo - L. Perrone (eds.), Biblioteca di Scienze Religiose 153, Rome 1999, 81-108; M. Dulaey, Le sacrifice d'Abraham, in Id., Le berger divin, in "Des forêts de symboles." L'initation chrétienne et la Bible (Ier-VIe siècle), Paris 2001, 141-155.

F. Cocchini

II. Iconography. 1. With the exception of the fresco representation in the private hypogeum of Via D. Compagni (4th c.) (Ferrua, Le pitture, pl. 24,2) and the mosaic of the basilica of St. Maria Maggiore (5th c.), both of which illustrate the vision of Mamre (Gen 18:1-7), and the miniature Genesis cycle of Vienna (6th c.), early Christian art gives particular precedence in Abraham's story to the episode of the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen 22:1-19), even from the earliest times when the formulation of the scene was not yet fixed. This precedence is due to the fact that the biblical event fits perfectly—along with those of *Noah saved from the *flood, the three young Jews saved from the flames (see Fiery Furnace) and *Daniel among the lions—into those themes that are paradigmatic of the divine work of salvation (Testini, Tardoantico, 121).

2. The sacrifice was painted on a wall of the so-called chapel of the sacraments A3 (Wp 41,2) at St. Callistus (1st half 3rd c.), in a somewhat rare formulation, which depicts—beyond the almost fixed elements of the bundle of sticks, the ram and a tree—Abraham and Isaac in an attitude of prayer, expressing the moment of deliverance that has already occurred. This is repeated in an arcosolium of the anonymous cemetery of the Via Anapo (4th c.) (Wp 146,2). In a painting of the synagogue of *Dura Europos (ca. 244), only the upper part of the human figures is shown; a tent with a person in it is painted in the background, perhaps symbolizing the promise of God to Abraham to multiply his descendents. This peculiarity also appears in a different form, on glass, in the Vatican Library (Garrucci, Vetri ornati, 9), and on a funeral relief at Cagliari (Giordani, Di un singolare rilievo, 170-171). A painting of the so-called Greek Chapel in the Catacombs of Priscilla (middle 3rd c.; Nestori, 39, n. 27) depicts Abraham about to deliver the mortal blow; in the same cemetery, in the so-called cubicle of the velatio (late 3rd c.) (Wp 78,2), Isaac, with a bundle of sticks on his shoulders, approaches his father, who is already at the place of offering. In the course of the 4th c. the scene is enriched with other elements (such as the hand of God, the angel and the servant with the ass), though Abraham's dramatic gesture and Isaac's carrying the wood are given pride of place. A fresco in the church of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter (Wp 108,1) is among the 30 or so known examples, showing Abraham leading his son, who carries a bundle of sticks, to the altar.

3. Unlike cemetery painting, early Christian *sculpture represents the sacrifice according to a virtually fixed schema, showing Abraham as he is about to impart the mortal blow with a gladium to his son, who kneels with his hands tied behind his back; the action moves from left to right. While respecting the fixity and brevity of the schema, the scene is frequently enriched by the compositional elements already mentioned in frescoes, with a preference for the altar on which a fire has already been lit, the divine hand and the angel. The episode is sculpted according to the simplest iconographic plan on the oldest *sarcophagus bearing the scene, that of the late 3rd-c. Le Mas d'Aire (Landes) (Ws 65,5). During the tetrarchy, sculptors also introduced Isaac carrying the bundle of sticks—without arriving, however, at the "compromise" solution, typical of frescoes, that combines the two moments in a single scene; the two moments are sometimes depicted separately but juxtaposed in a single context, as often happens with *Jonah. Following this schema are the sarcophagi of St. Marcellus at *Capua (Ws 9,2) and St. Maria dell'Anima at *Rome (Ws 183,1), and a fragmentary one of St. Callistus (Ws 183,5). From the era of *Constantine the schema, by now definitively fixed, is repeated in more than 90 instances, only rarely changing a detail: sometimes Isaac is on the altar—as, for example, on sarcophagi in the Vatican (ca. 340) (Ws 180,2) and in Madrid (380–390) (Ws 11,1)—other times Abraham's clothing varies: either a long tunic and a pallium or a scanty exomis, emphasizing respectively the sacred aspect—see among others the sarcophagus of St. *Ambrose at Milan (late 4th c.) (Ws 189)—and the realistic aspect, e.g., on a sarcophagus in the Vatican (middle 4th c.) (Rep. 42).

4. Besides the painting in the synagogue of Dura Europos, frescoes and *mosaics of the scene decorated church buildings, known to us for the most part from the descriptions of the ancient auctores. An Ambrosian titulus, prepared for the painting of a church, reads as follows: Offert progeniem sanctis altaribus Habram / patris ei est pietas caro non parcere nato (Abraham offers his son on the holy altars / the piety of a father did not spare the flesh of the one born to him); Augustine recalls having seen the sacrifice of Abraham tot locis pictum (Contra Faust. XXII, 73), and *Paulinus of Nola, in describing the cycle of frescoes he had commissioned for the local martyr Felix, recalls among the others the episode of Isaac carrying the bundle of wood: Hostia viva deo, tamquam puer offerar Isac: / et mea ligna gerens sequar almum sub cruce patrem (May I be offered as a living sacrifice like the boy Isaac / and carrying my own wood follow my kindly Father beneath the cross) (Carm. XXVII, 616-617). The work attributed to *Elpidius Rusticus (1st half 6th c.) enumerates the stories of the OT and NT through tituli, mentioning this episode (PL 62, 543). The sacrifice also occurs in three frescoes of the necropolis of El Bagawât, in Upper Egypt (4th c.), in one at Saqqarah, and in a mosaic of the synagogue of Beth Alpha in Palestine (6th c.) (Speyart Van Woerden, The Iconography, 227ff.). So as not to ignore the so-called minor arts, mention should be made of five pyxes, some decorated glass, gems (ibid., 228) and lamps (Ramieri, Gruppo di lucerne, 312), on which the scene is depicted according to the traditional schema.

K. Wessel, RBK 1, 11-22; E. Lucchesi, LCI I, 20-35; R. Garrucci, Vetri ornati di figure in oro trovati nei cimiteri cristiani primitivi di Roma, raccolti e spiegati, Rome 1859, 9; J. Wilpert, Das Opfer Abrahams in der altchristlichen Kunst: RQA 1 (1887) 216ff.; W. Van Hartel - F. Wickoff, Die Wiener Genesis, Vienna 1895; A.M. Smith, The Iconography of the Sacrifice of Isaac in Early Christian Art: American Journal of Archaeology 26 (1922) 159ff.; C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Rome 1956; E. Marec, Deux interprétations du sacrifice d'Abraham: Libyca 7 (1959) 159ff.; A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba della via Latina, Vatican City 1960; I. Speyart Van Woerden, The Iconography of the Sacrifice of Abraham: VChr 15 (1961) 274ff.; H.J. Geischer, Heidnische Parallelen zum frühchristlichen Bild des Isaak Opfers: JbAC 10 (1967) 127ff.; P. Testini, Tardoantico e paleocristiano, in Atti del Conv. Tardoantico e Altomedioevo, Rome 1968, 121ff.; L. Pani Ermini, Frammenti di sarcofagi cristiani inediti: RivAC 51 (1975) 130-132; R. Giordani, Di un singolare rilievo funerario cristiano del Museo Archeologico Nazionale di Cagliari, RivAC 52 (1976) 161ff.; A.M. Ramieri, Gruppo di lucerne tardoantiche da S. Prisca, RivAC 54 (1978) 312ff.; B. Mazzei, TIP, 92-95.

F. Bisconti

ABRAHAM bar Dashandad (3rd c.). Nicknamed "the paralytic," monastic author of the second half of the 8th c., born in the region of Beth Sayyade. Abraham taught *exegesis, *liturgy and *Aristotelian *philosophy at the school of Bashosh in Adiabene, founded by *Babai of Gbilta. Among his disciples were the future patriarchs *Timothy I (to whom he taught Greek and Arabic, among other things) and Isho' bar Nun. He retired to the monastery of Mar Gabriel at Mossul, where he died. A letter of his is preserved, addressed to his younger brother John and followed by a brief collection of spiritual counsels, which show the influence of Simeon d-Taybutheh. A commentary on the works of Mark the Hermit, only partially preserved, is attributed to him; it could also be the work of *Babai the Great. Bar Bahlul (10th c.) mentions Abraham in the preface of his great Syriac lexicon, citing him six times; this would seem to indicate that he had done philological studies.

Baumstark, 214; BBKL 18,2-4; BO III/1, 194; DHGE 1, 164; Duval, 380; Patrologia V, 483; E.A.W. Budge, Thomas of Marga, Book of Governors, III, London 1893, 4; A. Mingana, Early Christian Mystics (Woodbrooke Studies VII), Cambridge 1934, 248-255 (tr. 186-197); H. Ludin Jansen, The Mysticism of Abraham bar Dashandad: Numen 4 (1957) 114-126; Krüger, Überlieferung und Verfasser der beiden Memre über das "geistige Gesetz" des Mönches Markus: OS 6 (1957) 297-299; Krüger, Zum theologischen Menschenbild Babais d. Gr. nach seinem noch unveröffentlichten Kommentar zu den beiden Sermones des Mönches Markus über das "geistige Gesetz": OC 44 (1960) 46-74.

K. den Biesen

ABRAHAM bar Lipeh (7th c.). Liturgical author, originally from Qatar, he wrote a brief commentary on the canonical office, which seems to be a summary of the commentary on the liturgy of Gabriele Qatraya. Abraham was an exegete at the School of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, where *Timothy the Great (780–823) was one of his disciples.

Baumstark, 201; BO III/1, 196-197; P. Bedjan, Liber Superiorum seu historia monastica auctore Thoma, episcopo Margensi, Paris-Leipzig 1901, 148; R.H. Connolly, Anonymi auctoris Expositio officiorum, Georgio Arbelensi vulgo adscripta, II. Accedit Abrahae bar Lipheh Interpretatio officiorum (CSCO 29 and 32), Paris 1915, 219-254; J. Mateos, Lelya-Sapra. Essai d'interprétation des matines chaldéennes (OCA 156), Rome 1959 (see index).

K. den Biesen

ABRAHAM of Albatanzi. *Armenian *catholicos from 607 to 610/615 (?). During his primacy the *schism between the Armenian and *Georgian churches took place; the latter, headed by catholicos Kyrion, was reconciled with the see of *Constantinople, accepting the *christological formula of the Council of *Chalcedon. The entire event is related by the Armenian historian Ukhtanes (10th c.) in his Tripartite History.

DHGE 1, 163; EC 1, 123; M. Brosset, Deux historiens arméniens, Kirakos de Gantzac, XIII[e] c., Histoire d'Arménie; Oukhtanès d'Ourha, X[e] c., Histoire en trois parties. II, St. Petersburg 1871; Z. Arzoumanian, Bishop Ukhtanes of Sebastia, History of Armenia, II: History of the Severance of the Georgians from the Armenians, Ft. Lauderdale 1988.

S.J. Voicu

ABRAHAM of Beth Rabban (6th c.). Third director of the *school of *Nisibis, Abraham directed various courses (which seem to have had nearly a thousand students) from ca. 520–540, when the school was closed because of external accusations. The Syro-*Nestorian Chronicle of Arbela, 78 and 80 K., remembers him as the master of the school of Nisibis, "a diligent man, zealous worker, learned in the knowledge of the fear of God and researcher of the divine writings, friend of mar Narsai," i.e., *Narsai the Great, master at *Edessa and later at Nisibis. Abraham was Narsai's nephew and succeeded him in the direction of the school of Nisibis: for this reason he was called "of Beth Rabban" ("of the house of our Master") and was influenced by Narsai's doctrines. Abraham "directed the school with great diligence," and under his direction "the lectors and masters of the school met, and in this meeting special canons were established for the prefect," the canons of the school of Nisibis. Abraham sent *Paul as a lector to Hnana, bishop of Arbela (510–544), to found a school for youths in *Adiabene to protect them from heretics and Euchites (*Messalians). The Nestorian *Barhadbshabba also speaks favorably of Abraham in the Cause of the Founding of the Schools. Abraham should not be confused with the bishop of Beth Rabban, nor is he connected with the homonymous monastery founded by Mshiha-zeka, author of an Ecclesiastical History from which the cited Chronicle is drawn. His works, mostly of OT exegesis, of which some are identified in his commentary by the single word "Rabban," have been lost. Seeking to preserve contacts with the West, Abraham sent Paul, later bishop of Nisibis, to *Constantinople for the talks of 533. These contacts, however, led to the closure of the school of Nisibis, due to the anti-Greek positions of the *Sassanid king *Chosroes. This closure closely followed that of the school of *Athens, decreed by *Justinian in 529; from that school some philosophers, among them *Damascius and Simplicius, left for Persia, invited by Chosroes. They soon returned (Agazia, Historiarum libri V, B 30-31), establishing themselves at Harran and founding the pagan "school of the Greeks" next to the Nisibis Nestorian Christian "school of the Persians." The activity of the school of Nisibis continued in part at *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, thanks to the most famous professor of the school, mar *Aba. One can get an idea of Abraham's teaching from *Junilius's work De partibus divinae legis libri duo (PL 68, 15-42), which translates a more extensive work of Paul, a student of the school of Nisibis, whose teaching appears to be dominated by Aristotle's categories, as Teixidor also showed. At the court of Chosroes, Paul wrote a treatise in Syriac on *Aristotelian logic, part of which he translated literally (British Museum, MS 14, 660, ed. Land: "The Text That Paul the Persian Composed on the Logical Treatise of the Philosopher Aristotle, for the King Chosroes"). Through Junilius, the school influenced *Cassiodorus and other late Western works.

J.P.N. Land, Anecdota Syriaca, IV, Paris 1875, 1-32, with Lat. tr.; Barhadbshabba, Patrologia Orientalis, IV, 1908, ed. A. Scher, 319-97; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis, Louvain 1965; CSCO 266, Subs, 26, 134-210; S.P. Brock, A Syriac Collection of Prophecies of the Pagan Philosophers, OCP 14 (1983) 203-246; Agathias, Historiarum libri V, ed. R. Keydel, Berlin 1967, 79-82; P. Kawerau, Die Chronik von Arbela, Lovanii 1985; CSCO Syri 468 t. 200, 2: 99 n. 8; 105 n. 2; M. Tardieu, Sabiens coraniques et Sabiens de Harran, JAs 274 (1986) 1-44: 27; Id., Les Paysages reliques, Louvain-Paris 1990, 131; J. Frishman, The Ways and Means of the Divine Economy: An Edition, Translation and Study of Six Biblical Homilies by Narsai, Leiden 1992; J. Teixidor, Bardesane d'Édesse: la première philosophie syriaque, Paris 1992, 126-131; T.J. Thumpeparampil, Mar Narsai and His Liturgical Homilies, ChrOr 13 (1992) 123-34; S.P. Brock, The Syriac Commentary Tradition, in Glosses and Commentaries on Aristotelian Logical Texts, ed. C. Burnett, Warburg 1993, 3-18; H.J.W. Drijvers, Nisibis, in TRE, XXIV, Berlin 1994, 573-576; M. Tamcke, Paulos von Nisibis, Bischof der Apostolischen Kirche des Osten, BBKL VII, 37-38; G. Reinink, Edessa Grew Dim and Nisibis Shone Forth: The School of Nisibis at the Transition of the Sixth-Seventh Century, in Centres of Learning, eds. H.J.W. Drijvers - A.A. Macdonald, Leiden 1995, 77-89; I. Arickappalil, The Pneumatological Vision of Mar Narsai, Harp 8-9 (1995-96) 195-208; T. Hägg - Ph. Rousseau, eds., Greek Biography and Panegyric in Late Antiquity, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 2000, ch. 11 (G. Bowersock, on Rabbula); J. Frishman, Narsai's Christology, 208-303; I. Ramelli, Il Chronicon di Arbela, Madrid 2002, 'Ilu Anejos VIII, 70-72.

I. RAMELLI

ABRAHAM of Beyt Qiduna (or Qidunaya) (4th c. ?). Some old *Syriac manuscripts, going back to the 5th-6th c., have transmitted the Acta of Abraham. A critical revision in Greek has been known for some time, inserted in the hagiographical work of Simeon Metaphrastes and attributed to *Ephrem the Syrian (whose authorship is no longer sustained, though he probably wrote some hymns in honor of Abraham). The location of the events narrated in the Acta has led to a wide range of interpretations. If Abraham is an actual historical figure and lived in the 4th c., the pages perpetuating his memory seem strongly influenced by a variety of topoi abundant in the literary genre of popular hagiography. Born of well-to-do parents, Abraham was promised in marriage as a child and forced to marry the woman chosen. Seven days after the wedding Abraham secretly left his wife, like *Alexius, and took refuge in an isolated cabin at a distance from the city, living there for over ten years in great austerity. At that time the local bishop, who despite everything knew Abraham, at least by reputation, after vain efforts to evangelize the suburb of Beyt Qiduna (near *Edessa; another link with one version of the story of Alexius), sent Abraham there and ordained him priest. The zealous apostle at first employed radical measures (the destruction of the idols of the *pagan *temple), then through patience and perseverance succeeded in gaining the trust of the people, who ultimately embraced the Christian faith. Having completed the religious education of the neophytes, Abraham returned to the hermit's life, only to leave it once again to rescue his niece Maria, who had wandered into a dissolute life (another frequent theme in stories about holy hermits). In a Catena Patrum (8th c.) Abraham's death is listed as 14 December; for this reason Rabban Sliba also commemorates Abraham on this date in his calendar. Abraham is commemorated on different dates in the calendars of the *Jacobite church. The Synaxarion of *Constantinople includes it on 29 October, the Roman Martyrology on 16 March.

DHGE 1, 175-177; BS 1, 113-115. On the hymns of Ephrem: J.P. Botha, Textual Strategy in a Fourth-Century Syriac Hymn on the Life of the Ascetic Abraham of Kidun: Acta Patristica et Byzantina 8 (1997) 42-52.

J.-M. Sauget

ABRAHAM of Clermont (d. ca. 477). Born beside the Euphrates during the persecution of Christians by the Persian kings, Abraham left his homeland for Egypt, where he was captured by bandits. Escaping to the West, he became a hermit in Alvernia. Put in charge of the monastery of Saint-Cirgues, near Clermont, he built the church there, which he dedicated to St. Cyrus, patron of Aboukir. He had the gift of miracles. *Sidonius Apollinaris wrote his epitaph; *Gregory of Tours, his biography. His feast is celebrated at Clermont on 15 June.

Sidonius Apoll., Ep. 7,17; Gregory of Tours, Vitae PP. 3; DHGE I, 161; BS I, 119-120.

V. Saxer

ABRAHAM of Ephesus (Abrahamios) (6th c.). *Archbishop of *Ephesus ca. second half of the 6th c. Probably identical with the *abbot of the same name mentioned by *John Moschus (PG 87, 2956), founder of two *monasteries, one at *Constantinople and another at *Jerusalem. Two of his homilies survive: In annuntiationem and In festivitatem occursus. The first contains a polemical allusion against *Origen (which dates it at 530–553) that is particularly important for the history of *liturgy, in that it constitutes the earliest evidence of moving the celebration of the Annunciation from before Christmas to March 25.

CPG II, § 7380-81; M. Jugie, Homélies Mariales Byzantines: PO 16, 3 (1921) 429-454 [5-30]; on the convent of the Abrahamites at Constantinople: DHGE 1, 189-190.

S.J. Voicu

ABRAHAM of Harran (Mesopotamia), bishop (4th-5th c.). Abraham is known mainly through the chapter on him by *Theodoret of Cyrrhus in his Historia Religiosa (History of Syrian monks). Abraham was born in the diocese of Cyrrhus ca. middle 4th c. Whether he was born into a Christian family or converted to Christianity on his own is unknown. He spent a significant portion of his life as a hermit in the Chalcidian *desert; at one point his austerities so reduced his health that his recovery was considered a miracle.

Afterward he went with some companions to the region of *Emesa (modern Homs) to preach the gospel. The pagans there, resistant at first, were ultimately won over by his charity and the austerity of his life. Since they wanted no one else besides him as priest, he was ordained. After three years Abraham tried to return to the desert but was quickly recalled, this time for good, and placed at the head of the diocese of Harran. His reputation for holiness was such that the emperor *Theodosius II called him to *Constantinople to meet him personally. Abraham died there ca. 422. His body was removed from Constantinople to Harran. The Synaxarion of Constantinople commemorates Abraham on 14 February; he is not mentioned in the Syrian calendars.

Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Historia religiosa 17, SC 257, 32-51; DHGE 1, 166-167; BS 1, 115.

J.-M. Sauget

ABRAHAM of Kashkar (al-Wasit), *hegumen (d. 586). After a period of studies at the *Nisibis *school and a trip in *Egypt in the desert of *Scete and on Mt. *Sinai, Abraham at first lived as an *anchorite, then founded, ca. 570, a famous *monastery on *Mt. Izla, near Nisibis, also known as "the Great Convent."

He was significant not only for the reform of Syro-Eastern monasticism but also for its spread: he was responsible for dozens of new foundations, founded by his disciples. In fact, after the activity of *Barsauma of Nisibis and the reforms of the *catholicos Aqaq, Persian *monasticism had regressed significantly both quantitatively and qualitatively, leaving an opening for *Messalian propaganda. Abraham brought a more structured monasticism, anti-Messalian and strongly anchored to both the institutions and theology of the Persian church. The rules he composed have survived, though they were later modified with a stronger doctrinal accent by his first successor, Dadisho'. The reform of the monastic eskima may be attributable to him, consisting in the introduction of the monastic crown (subbara) instead of the baldness typical of monophysite monks.

General presentations: Chabot 52-53; Duval 168, 169, 212; Baumstark 130; Ortiz de Urbina 135; J. Labourt, Christianisme perse, 315-318; J. Habbi, Abramo di Kaškar, riformatore e fondatore, in Enciclopedia dei Santi. Le Chiese orientali, Rome 1998, I, 26-28.

Editions and translations of the rule: J.B. Chabot, Regulae monasticae ab Abrahamo et Dadjesus conditae, Rome 1898; Abramo di Kaškar, Giovanni il solitario. Nell'umiltà e nella mitezza. Regole monastiche, St. Chialà (ed.), Lettera a Esichio, M. Nin (ed.) (Testi dei Padri della Chiesa, 45), Magnano 2000.

A. Camplani

ABRAHAM of Nathpar (d. 570/575). Probably born early 6th c., of Christian parents, in the village of Beth-Nathpar, *Adiabene. His ancestors were martyrs under Shapor II (309–379) by the work of the latter's brother, Ardashir II (379–383). While still young Abraham dedicated himself to the ascetical life, living in a cave not far from his village. According to the biographical tradition, three years later he went on pilgrimage to *Jerusalem and visited the *Egyptian monks. After this (presumed) journey, he returned to his cave, where he remained for about thirty years, during which time he formed some disciples in the *monastic life: Isaiah, Elisha and Job the Persian. A vision led him to leave both solitude and disciples, moving into the northern mountains, in the region of Beth-Dasen, for a mission of evangelization. His preaching encountered difficulties, but some miracles by him converted the local population, who accepted his God and were baptized. It is said his missionary zeal compelled him toward Azerbaijan, where he died, very probably between 570 and 575; his tomb became a place of healing. His body, being contested, was stolen by his countrymen during the night and solemnly carried into his village church, where it was buried. After some years Job the Persian, having turned the master's cave into a *monastery, moved the body there. The Assyrian Church of the East commemorates him on the fifth Friday after the feast of the Dedication as the founder of the *monasteries in the region of Adiabene. A breviary of the Syro-Western church celebrates him on 13 March.

The texts containing the more or less legendary information on Abraham's life associate the master with his disciple Job. The first biography known to us, now lost, was written ca. 660 by Sabrisho' (called Rostam) of Hrem, a village near Abraham's native village of Beth-Nethpra. The other significant sources on his relationship with *Nestorian monasticism merit close study: some of the information of Isho'dnah (Liber de castitate) on Abraham has been poorly interpreted by some scholars, making him a disciple of *Abraham of Kashkar (501–586); but the same early sources, such as the Liber Turris and the Storia Nestoriana, involve Abraham, in a forced way, in the monastic reform effected by Abraham of Kashkar.

Abraham's literary activity spread very rapidly through the monastic world: at the end of the 6th c. his disciple Job translated his discourses (mēmrē), together with the rules of Abraham of Kashkar, into *Pahlavi; that combination, as already noted at the biographical level, is an indication of the esteem given the two Abrahams on the part of renascent Nestorian monasticism. It acknowledged Abraham of Kashkar as the reformer of monastic discipline, and Abraham of Nethpra as the creator of a spirituality destined to be extraordinarily enriched a few decades after his death through its encounter with the Evagrian texts. In the decades following the mid-7th c., another of his countrymen, Henanisho, introduced at the end of the Book of Paradise—a highly successful work throughout the monasteries of the East—"questions," "examples" and "discourses " chosen from the writings of Abraham. The manuscript tradition of Abraham's work is somewhat problematic, containing spurious or doubtful texts; those that can be called authentic are often anonymous or attributed to some other author. In fact, while the Syro-Eastern manuscript tradition has no significant errors, the Syro-Western adopted the writings of Abraham, slightly changing the surname (Neptrāyā); by the end of the 8th c., a part was circulated under the name of *Evagrius.

The monastic writings of Abraham appear to be rather archaic, containing the most typical characteristics of the oldest Syrian ascetic literature, particularly *Aphraates and Liber Graduum. Marked by a certain moderation and reliance on the Bible, his texts are full of both explicit biblical citations and allusions.

R.-M. Tonneau, Abraham de Natpar: L'Orient Syrien 2 (1957) 337-350; Patrologia V, 482; A. Penna, Abramo di Nathpar: Rivista degli Studi Orientali 32 (1957) 415-431; F. del Rio Sanchez, Abrahám de Natpar: StudMon 42 (2000) 53-63; C.C. Chahine, Le témoignage de Thomas de Margâ sur les extraits d'Abraham Nethprâïâ dans le livre du Paradis de 'Nânîšo': Augustinianum 40 (2000) 439-460; C. Chahine, Abraham de Bēth-Nethprā, Tesi Augustinianum, Rome 2004.

C.C. Chahine

ABRAHAM of Pbou (d. ca. 580). Superior general of the *Pachomian *monasteries under *Justinian (in particular, resident in the principal convent of Pbou, now Faw al-Qibli, in the Thebaid). Abraham would not adhere to the confession of *Chalcedon. Summoned to *Constantinople ca. 560, he refused to submit to the emperor's will and was therefore forced to leave his *monastery. He went to the monastery of *Shenoute (region of Athrib) to copy the Shenoutian Rule, founding a new monastic community at Tberkjot (Ar. Farshut), not far from Pbou, according to that rule.

P. Van Cauwenbergh, Étude sur les moines d'Égypte, Paris 1914; A. Campagnano, Monaci egiziani fra V e VI secolo: VetChr 15 (1978) 223-246; Coptic Encyclopedia 1,11-12.

T. Orlandi

ABRAHAM the Confessor (d. after 463). *Armenian priest, participated in the Synod of Artashat (450–451), which rejected the order of the Persian king Yazdegerd II to the Armenians to embrace Zoroastrianism. He was imprisoned in *Persia and tortured, then exiled in *Mesopotamia with his companion, the priest Coren, who died there (461). Freed in 463, Abraham returned to Armenia. According to the continuator of *Elisaeus, he died in a hermitage; according to *Lazarus of Pharp he was consecrated bishop of Bznunik (northwest of the lake of Van). The date of his death is unknown. The Armenian church commemorates him with Coren on 20 December.

Elisaeus, La guerra armena e di Vardan, crit. ed. of E. Ter Minassian, Erevan 1957, 125-153, Fr. tr. by V. Langlois, in Coll. des hist. anc. et mod. de l'Arménie, II, Paris 1869, 225-247, Ital. tr. by G. Cappelletti, Eliseo, storico armeno del quinto secolo, Venice 1840; L. P'arpec'i, Storia dell'Armenia, Venice 1933, 45-56, Fr. tr. Langlois, ibid., 311-318; DHGE I, 167-168; BS I, 124. On the historical value of the account of Elisaeus, see DHGE XV, 232-235. On Abraham as a hagiographer, see L.A. Ter-Petrosian, "Les martyrs orientaux" d'Abraham le confesseur. Tradition textuelle (in Armenian), Erevan 1976; M. van Esbroeck, Abraham le Confesseur (Ve s.), traducteur des Passions des martyrs perses: AB (1977) 169-179.

D. Stiernon

ABRASAX (Ἀβρασάξ, transcribed by the Latin authors as Abraxas). Name of the "head of the heavens" or supreme deity in the *gnosticism of *Basilides. *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 24,3-7) shows that this name was considered to be equivalent, by the numerical value of its letters, to the combination of the 365 heavens that in Basilides's doctrine constitute the divine world formed by a process of emanation from the ungenerated Father. The name Abrasax appears in the formularies of the Greek Magic Papyri (GMP) and on many late gems and intaglios, often together with the name IAO, to characterize various types of figures, usually human with animal heads (rooster, lion, etc.). By extension, the name "Abrasax gems" is given to so-called gnostic gems bearing various symbols and inscriptions, to which magical purposes and meaning are attributed.

A. Dieterich, Abraxas. Studien zur Religionsgeschichte des spätern Altertums, Leipzig 1891; H. Leclercq, s.v. Abrasax: DACL I, 127-155. A useful bibliographical list of studies on magic, an object of renewed scientific attention in recent decades, P. Brillet - A. Moreau (eds.), La magie. Bibliographie générale, Montpellier 2000. The work is a complement, as Volume IV, of the publication of the Acts of an international Colloquium on the theme: A. Moreau - J.-C. Turpin (eds.), La magie. Actes du Colloque International de Montpellier 25-27 mars 1999: I, Du monde babylonien au monde hellénistique; II, La magie dans l'antiquité grecque tardive. Les mythes; III, Du monde latin au monde contemporain, Montpellier 2000. In particular, for the significance of magic gems, see A. Mastrocinque (ed.), Atti dell'Incontro di Studio Gemme gnostiche e cultura ellenistica, Verona, 22-23 October 1999, Bologna 2002.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

ABUNDIUS (or Abundantius) of Como (d. 489). Bishop of Como, elected certainly prior to 450. His biographer is not pre-Carolingian, but makes use of older sources (BHL 15), which believed him to be from *Thessalonica, though no contemporary document confirms this assertion; nor is it certain that he was well-versed in both Latin and Greek (see Mouterde 46), though Pope *Leo the Great did send him to *Constantinople as an ambassador to *Theodosius II and Marcian to deliver the Tomus ad Flavianum (Leo the Great, Ep. 69-71); he returned in 451. That same year he added his signature to his metropolitan's synodal letter to the pope. Abundius received another letter from *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (PG 83, 1492). His feast is 2 April; 489 is traditionally considered the year of his death, though there is no certain proof. He is buried in St. Abundius at Como, if the epitaph there is his (CIL 5, 5402). Another Abundius, a martyr under *Diocletian, was venerated at Rome (W. De Grüneisen, Sainte Marie Antique, Rome 1911, 503-504; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 16-17).

Verzeichnis 49; PCBE 2, 1, 5-7; BS 1, 23-32; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 978-979; P. Mouterde, Fragments d'actes d'un synode tenu à Constantinople en 450: Mélanges de l'Université St. Joseph Beyrouth 15 (1930) 35-50; J.-C. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques, Rome 1988, 280-283, 597-598.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

ACACIANS (οἱ περὶ Ἀκάκιον). Name given to those Eastern bishops who, in the events of 358–360, took a moderate position between the radical Arians and the *homoiousians in the *Arian controversy, taking their lead from *Acacius of Caesarea. They are today known as *homoians (from homoios).

Socrates, HE II, 39-40; Sozomen, HE IV, 22-23; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972, 143-254; Id., Eastern Attitudes to Rome During the Acacian Schism, in The Orthodox Churches and the West, D. Baker (ed.), Oxford 1976, 69-81.

M. Simonetti

ACACIUS. A number of *martyrs bore this name. The first was a confessor under *Decius, erroneously thought to be the bishop of Melitene who took part in the Council of *Ephesus (431) and later in the Council of *Antioch in Pisidia (BHG 2005-2006; Verzeichnis 49-50). The second belonged to the group of 10,000 Armenian martyrs crucified on Mt. Ararat, according to a 12th-13th-c. legend that came to be attributed to Anastasius the Librarian (BHL 20-24; LCI 5, 16-21). The third, according to Simeon Metaphrastes, was a centurion of the *Cappadocian army martyred and buried near *Byzantium (BHG 13; BHO 20-21). The fourth was one of the 60 martyrs of *Jerusalem killed by the Agareni or *Saracens under *Leo III the Isaurian (BHG 1217-1218). For the others, see BHG 1189, 1201-1208, 1432 and 2204.

BS 1, 131-146.

S. Heid

ACACIUS of Beroea (d. ca. 433). Born ca. 340, Acacius dedicated himself to the *monastic life and gained honor for his *ascetic virtues. He corresponded with *Basil of Caesarea and encouraged *Epiphanius to write the Panarion. As part of a systematic plan to increase his power in *Syria, *Meletius ordained Acacius bishop of Beroea (Aleppo) in 378. Acacius participated with his metropolitan in the Council of *Constantinople of 381, after which he was sent to *Rome to seek, unsuccessfully, a solution to the *schism of *Antioch. Some time after Meletius's death, Acacius ordained *Flavian bishop of Antioch, and for this he was excommunicated by Pope *Damasus; the condemnation, however, had no practical effects. At first a friend of *John Chrysostom, personal differences led to hostility; his tenacious opposition contributed to John's ruin. He was one of the four bishops rejected by Chrysostom as judges at the *Synod of the Oak (403). He was very old at the time of the clash between *Nestorius and *Cyril of Alexandria, and did not participate in the Council of *Ephesus. Due to the great prestige that attached to him, however, he played a decisive mediatory role between Cyril and *John of Antioch in the discussions that led to the pact of union of 433. He died shortly thereafter. Of what must have been a vast correspondence, we have only six letters regarding the Nestorian affair, some only in Latin translation.

CPG III, 6477-6482; PG 77, 100-101; 84, 647-648, 660, 851-854; ACO I, 1,1:7, etc. (see CPG); Quasten II, 485-486; DHGE 1, 241-242; G. Bardy, Acace de Bérée et son rôle dans la controverse nestorienne: RSR 18 (1938) 20-44; BBKL I, 15.

M. Simonetti

ACACIUS of Caesarea (d. 365). Successor to *Eusebius in 340 as bishop of Caesarea (Palestine) and heir of the anti-*Nicene and moderate tendencies of his predecessor, Acacius was among the principal representatives of the *Eusebians. We find him at *Serdica (343), and then in 357 at a small pro-*Arian council convened at *Antioch by *Eudoxius. Around 350 he favored the election of *Cyril as bishop of *Jerusalem, but later opposed him, more for reasons of ecclesiastical jurisdiction than doctrine, and had him deposed. In the crisis of 358–359, according to *Constantius's plan he supported the formation of a moderate party, hostile to both radical Arians and *homoiousians, which made its debut with the formula of *Sirmium of 22 May 359. At the Council of *Seleucia (359) he opposed the *homoiousian majority, proposing a compromise formula that defined the Son as like (homoios) the Father according to the Scriptures. Though defeated and in the minority, his political and doctrinal direction prevailed with Constantius, who imposed it on his opponents. This was the height of Acacius's influence; he obtained the election of *Meletius as bishop of Antioch in 360. At this time the controversy on the Holy Spirit began, the divine character of whom Acacius denied. The balance of power having changed after the death of Constantius, he was among those in 363 who, with Meletius, accepted the homoousios at Antioch; in 364, however, the pro-Arians, supported by the emperor *Valens, were back in power, and Acacius calmly adapted to the new direction. He died ca. 365. *Jerome (Vir. ill. 98), who mentions his work for the preservation of *Origen's library, attributes to him a Commentary on Ecclesiastes in 17 books, and 6 books of Various Questions, in addition to other works on various unspecified themes. A surviving fragment of an early work against *Marcellus of Ancyra emphasizes the theme of Christ as the image of God, drawing from it the distinction of the two divine *hypostases but also their close affinity and likeness. Of the great exegetical works cited by Jerome only fragments remain, which show a tendency to the literal interpretation of Sacred Scripture.

CPG II, 3510-3515; Quasten II, 348-349; K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, Münster 1933, 53-56; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque et des Rois (ST 201), Vatican City 1979, 107-122; J.M. Leroux, Acace évêque de Césarée de Palestine (341-365): SP VIII (TU 93), Berlin 1966, 82-85; J.T. Lienhard, Acacius of Caesarea 'Contra Marcellum': Historical and Theological Reconsiderations: Cristianesimo nella Storia 10 (1989) 1-22; BBKL I, 15-16.

M. Simonetti

ACACIUS of Constantinople (Acacian schism) (d. 489). *Patriarch of *Constantinople from 471 to 489, during the brief usurpation of *Basiliscus (475–476). Acacius did not approve of the emperor's pro-monophysite policy and confirmed his adherence to *Chalcedon and the Tome of *Leo. After *Zeno was restored to the throne, however, in the face of the spread and combatitiveness of the monophysites, Acacius advised a policy of compromise to the emperor, which found expression in the publication of the Henoticon (482). This document restated the basic positions of the theology of *Chalcedon, affirming Christ as consubstantial (*homoousios) with the Father according to his divinity and with us according to his humanity; by this, Acacius confirmed the integrity of Christ's humanity but was silent on the controversial term "nature." Also, while reaffirming the *Nicene faith (325) confirmed at *Constantinople (381) and *Ephesus (431), he remained silent on the *Council of Chalcedon. The formula, which did not contrast with the basic ideas of a moderate monophysitism, was accepted by many, among them the monophysite patriarchs *Peter Mongus of *Alexandria and *Peter the Fuller of *Antioch, and was imposed on the other bishops in the East, despite the opposition of both Chalcedonians and radical monophysites. At *Rome in 484, however, *Felix III, after a fruitless Roman mission to Constantinople, declared Acacius deposed and *excommunicated following a conciliar decision. Thus began the so-called Acacian *schism between Rome and Constantinople, which lasted until 518, as long as the Henoticon remained in force, with attempts at conciliation by the emperor *Anastasius with *Gelasius (ca. 495) and *Hormisdas (515) failing due to the intransigence of the Roman see. With *Justinian's accession (518) the Chalcedonians regained the upper hand, and this time the negotiations reinitiated with Hormisdas were successful (519). Among the conditions imposed in these negotiations was the confirmation of Acacius's condemnation, and his name was removed from the *diptychs.

CPG III, 5990-5994; DHGE 1, 244-248; E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma: ABAW, NF 10 (1934); W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972, 143-254; Grillmeier, 2/1 (1986) 279-358; BBKL I, 16; LTK 1, 285-286.

M. Simonetti

ACACIUS of Melitene (d. 438/449). Lector of the church of Melitene in Euphratesia, he was charged (ca. 384) with the education of St. *Euthymius the Great. Bishop of Melitene prior to 430, he actively participated in the *Council of Ephesus (431), where he met *Nestorius and preached a homily. He was part of the episcopal delegation charged with instructing *Theodosius II at *Chalcedon, and attended the ordination of *Maximian of *Constantinople. An ultra-Cyrillian to the point that some consider his doctrine as containing "the seed of *Eutychianism," and allergic to any reconciliation with *John of Antioch, from 433 to 436 he conducted a crusade against *Nestorius and against the works of *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *Diodore of Tarsus, in correspondence addressed to *Cyril of Alexandria (the first of three letters sent him by Cyril is very important for the history of Cyril's doctrinal position), to the Armenian *patriarch *Sahak (whose reply we possess) and to the Armenians. Died ca. 438, certainly before 449. Venerated 17 April.

BHG 648, 2008; Fr. version of A.-J. Festugière, Cyrille de Scythopolis. Vie de saint Euthyme, Paris 1962, 62-63, 87; ACO IV, III, 1, 89; CPG 5792-96 (see 5340, 5368-69); DHGE I, 242-243; BS I, 143-144; CGG I, 177, 224, 232-233, 369; II, 392, 947 n. 48; RGG[4], 1, 95-96; BBKL 1, 15; V. Inglisian, Die Beziehungen des Patriarchen Proclus von Konstantinopel und des Bischof Akakios von Melitene zu Armenien: OC 41 (1957) 35-50; G. Winkler, Die spätere Überlieferung der armenischen Quellen zu den Ereignissen des Jahre bis nach dem Ephesinum: OC 70 (1986) 143-80; Grillmeier 2/2, 415.

D. Stiernon

ACACIUS of Seleucia (d. 496/497). *Patriarch of Seleucia-Ctesiphon from 484/5–496/7, Acacius is known for the synod he held at Seleucia in 486, recorded by the Chronicle of Arbela, 71 K.: "In the second year of Walash, the king of kings, the *catholicos Aqaq invited all the bishops of the East, according to the usual custom, to a synod he convoked." From the acts—which remain intact, with the signatures of almost all of the bishops of the East—we see that the synod declared *Nestorianism as *orthodoxy for the East, condemned the other theological doctrines and reserved ecclesiastical *celibacy to monks. Included in the text are six letters exchanged betweeen Acacius and *Barsauma of *Nisibis—like Acacius, a disciple of *Ibas of *Edessa, successor to Bishop *Rabbula and promoter, in the school of Edessa, of the translation of *Theodore of Mopsuestia from the Greek into *Syriac—prior to the *schism in 475 of the Nestorian group of the school of Edessa, which migrated eastward. The sources, particularly Bar Hebraeus, seem to have exaggerated the antagonism between Acacius and Barsauma, creating unreliable caricatures of the two. The schism, Barsauma's invitation of *Narsai to Nisibis during the time of Acacius, and the foundation of the *school of Nisibis and its fervent exegetical activity are also recorded by the Nestorian Chronicle of Arbela, 69-70 K.: "Renowned at Edessa was the perfect man mar Ibas, the bishop, who caused orthodoxy to triumph by his labors. . . . After his death, the disciples of falsehood prevailed . . . and expelled from the city all of the Persian disciples. They returned to their lands and founded many schools there. Barsauma of Nisibis invited Narsai, the famous doctor, to visit him, and built a great school, with a large body of brothers; unceasingly he educated renowned sons and and doctors for the church. There he explained all of the divine books, not departing in a single question from the doctrine of the Exegete," i.e., of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who was deeply esteemed by the Nestorians. The Nestorian *Barhadbshabba, for example, in his Cause of the Foundation of the Schools, expresses enthusiasm for him, Acacius, Narsai and Barsauma.

O. Braun, Das Buch der Synhodos, Stuttgart 1900, 59-83; J. Labourt, Le christianisme dans l'empire perse, Paris 1904, 131-152; Barhadbshabba, PO IV, 1908, ed. A. Scher, 319-397; J.M. Fiey, L'Elam, Melto 5 (1969) 128; M. Simonetti, Note sull'esegesi veterotestamentaria di Teodoro di Mopsuestia: VetChr 14 (1977) 69-102; P. Kawerau, Die Chronik von Arbela, Lovanii 1985, CSCO Syri 468 t. 200, 2: 70-71; J. Frishman, The Ways and Means of the Divine Economy: Six Biblical Homilies by Narsai, Leiden 1992; T.J. Thumpeparampil, Mar Narsai and His Liturgical Homilies: ChrOr 13 (1992) 123-134; J. Teixidor, Bardesane d'Édesse: la première philosophie syriaque, Paris 1992, 126-131; I. Abramowski, Die Reste der syrischen Übersetzung von Theodor von Mopsuestia: ARAM 5 (1993) 23-32; A. de Halleux, Nestorius: histoire et doctrine: Irénikon 66 (1993) 38-52, 163-177: in Pro Oriente, Vienna 1994, 200-215; H.J.W. Drijvers, Nisibis, in TRE, XXIV, Berlin 1994, 573-576; for the identification: M. Tardieu, Barsauma de Qardu, in Dict. des Philosophes, ed. R. Goulet, II, Paris 1994, 84; H.J.W. Drijvers, The School of Edessa, in Id. - A.A. MacDonald, Centres of Learning, Leiden 1995, 49-59; P. Bruns, Theodor von Mopsuestia. Katechetische Homilien, Freiburg 1995; Id., Den Menschen mit dem Himmel verbinden, Louvain 1995, CSCO 549, Subs. 89; L. Van Rompay, La littérature exégétique syriaque: PdO 20 (1995) 221-235; I. Arickappalil, The Pneumatological Vision of Mar Narsai: Harp 8-9 (1995-96) 195-208; J. Frishman, Narsai's Christology Harp 8-9 (1995-96) 208-303; I. Ramelli, Il Chronicon di Arbela, Madrid 2002, 'Ilu Anejos VIII, 65-66.

I. Ramelli

ACATHISTUS. Hymn, acephalous poem, always called by this name because sung or recited while standing (that is, not sitting, acathistus, Gk. akathistos), in an act of veneration for the Virgin. Some think the name derives from the fact that it was first sung by priests and people who were standing all night. It belongs to the group of alphabetical songs (*Acrostics). The *Byzantine liturgy recites four strophes during compline of the first four Fridays of Lent; the entire song is sung on Friday evening or Saturday morning of the fifth week. It is also sung at the request of the faithful in public disasters. Composed of 24 strophes, rich in poetic figures and imagery, it develops themes related to Luke's account of the annunciation (Lk 1:26-36) and the Matthean episodes of the *magi and the flight into *Egypt (Mt 2). The first 12 strophes interpret the events recorded of Jesus' infancy, and the last 12 enumerate the benefits of the *incarnation and the work of salvation, in which Mary participates. The literary structure is uniform: after the first and all odd strophes, each treating a theme, follows a litany to the Virgin, meant by the anonymous author to be a more imaginative and poetical representation of the theme treated in the preceding strophe. Even strophes end with the acclamation "Alleluia," which all can sing except Herod (strophe 10). The Synaxarion (PG 92, 1348-1354) records that the hymn was sung by clergy and people to celebrate the liberation of *Constantinople in 626 from the Persian and Avar siege. It also records the extraordinary liberations of *Constantinople from Arab sieges under Constantine IV Pogonatos (677-678) and *Leo III the Isaurian (718). The mention in the Synaxarion is given as a historical reason for a liturgical feast celebrated at the time, but it notes neither the author nor the date of composition. The anonymous author very probably lived in the 5th c. and shows a dependence in strophes 1, 2 and 15 on the Homily on the Mother of God by *Basil of Seleucia (d. after 468). The current tendency to attribute it to *Romanus Melodus (late 5th c.–560) or one of his imitators has not gained a consensus. If it were reliable that it was composed and sung to celebrate the liberation of Constantinople in 626 from the siege of the combined Persian and Avar armies, all authors whose literary activity preceded that date would be excluded from consideration. In its present form it seems to allude to other sieges of Constantinople by the Arabs, those under Constantine IV (677) and Leo III (718); it should probably be dated between 677–718.

C. del Grande, L'inno acatisto, Florence 1948; Ital. tr. by G. Ferrari, Trani 1976; E. Wellesz, The Akathistos: A Study in Byz. Hymn.: DOP 9/10 (1956) 143-174; J.T. Tyciak - W. Lipphardt, Akathistos, in Lex. der Marienkunde, I, Regensburg 1967, 96-97; E. Toniolo, Akathistos. Saggi di critica e di teologia, Centro di Cultura Mariana "Madre della Chiesa," Rome 2000.

E. Peretto

ACCLAMATIONS, Liturgical. Liturgical acclamations are short formulas recited by the assembly in response to readings, admonitions or prayers said by the ministers. They may be responses to the priest's greeting (Et cum spiritu tuo) or to litanies (the Kyrie eleison in the *Gelasian invocations).

One of the most important liturgical acclamations is the "Amen," which passed into the Christian *liturgy from the *synagogue. According to *Justin Martyr, it expresses the assent of the assembly to the eucharistic *prayer recited in its name by the presider (I Apol. 65, 3-4). "Amen" is also a proclamation of the faith of the Christian who receives the *Eucharist; according to *Ambrose: Non otiose dicis tu Amen, iam in spiritu confitens quod accipies Corpus Christi. Cum ergo tu petieris, dicit tibi sacerdos Corpus Christi et tu dicis Amen, hoc est Verum. Quod confitetur lingua teneat affectus (You do not causally say Amen, since indeed you confess by the Spirit that you have received the body of Christ. When the priest says to you, "The body of Christ," you say, "Amen"; that is, "It is true." What one confesses with the tongue is held in the heart.—De Sacram. IV, 25: SC 25 bis, 116). *Augustine explains the significance of the Amen in various homilies (Serm. 272; 334; 362).

Another important acclamation is "Alleluia," described as a heavenly song in Rev 19:1-6, and used in the Roman liturgy as an acclamation at the gospel, except during *Lent. The Rule of St. Benedict (ch. 15) indicates that the omission of the Alleluia during Lent is an ancient Roman tradition that those in the East never entirely understood. It is possible that in the Roman context this acclamation was considered Paschal and thus to be omitted during Lent. *Sozomen (HE VII, 19: PG 67, 1475) mocked the Roman church for singing the Alleluia only on *Easter Sunday, while John the Deacon (Ep. ad Senarium 13: ST 59, 178) claims that it was sung throughout Eastertide. Augustine comments on the significance of the Alleluia in many homilies (Serm. 254; 256; 362).

Deo gratias and Laus tibi, Christe are the acclamations that follow the readings and the gospel, respectively. It seems that the Deo gratias owes its origin to the religious culture of the 4th-6th c. The Rule of St. Benedict (ch. 66) tells the *porter to reply Deo gratias to a guest who presents himself. As a response to the reader's declaration of the end of the reading, Deo gratias may be a statement of attention on the part of the assembly (Jungmann, Missarum Sollemnia, I, 537-538). Laus tibi, Christe, however, is of Gallican origin and inspired by Eastern liturgies. In the Roman *Mass, it was introduced as an acclamation of the assembly in the Ordo Missae of 1969: previously it was said only by the acolyte.

The Sanctus is essentially a *chant and can be considered an acclamation that concludes the preface and introduces the next part of the eucharistic prayer. *Tertullian (De Orat. 3) explains it as an anticipation of our future task of proclaiming the glory of God with the angels. The strictly acclamatory part of the Sanctus, however, is Hosanna in excelsis, which precedes and follows the versicle Benedictus qui venit, which was added to the Sanctus at the time of St. *Caesarius (Serm. 72,2: CCL 103, 307), though according to the Const. Apost. (VIII, 13) it is recited at the moment of *Communion.

The Vatican II reform introduced an acclamation after the account of the institution in the eucharistic prayer. The formulations vary but are inspired by Scripture (1 Cor 11:26) and focus on the Paschal mystery. This anamnetic acclamation is today one of the best-known liturgical acclamations.

Another important acclamation is the Kyrie eleison, seemingly of *pagan origin. *Egeria (Itiner. 24) speaks of it in connection with the litanies said after Vespers at *Jerusalem. The Const. Apost. VIII, 6 put this acclamation after the readings, as a response of the people to the litanies prior to the sending away of the catechumens. In the Syro-Western, Byzantine and Armenian liturgies, the Kyrie eleison is also used, in both the Mass and the office, as a response to the ektenia, the litany prayers that come after the readings and before the small entrance *procession in the Byzantine Mass. In the Roman liturgy the Kyrie eleison was used as a response to the deprecatio Gelasii, i.e., the litanies attributed to Pope *Gelasius (see Intercession). In the Rule of St. Benedict the litanies with the response Kyrie eleison are kept in the morning and evening office, while the Supplicatio litaniae, i.e., the Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison, Kyrie eleison separated by the litanies, is used in other offices (chs. 9, 12). The acclamation Christe eleison is of Western origin; *Gregory the Great himself admitted that it was unknown in the East (Registrum, IX, Ep. 26: MGH Ep. 2, 59: PL 77, 956).

Amen: F. Cabrol, DACL 1 (1907) 1554-1573.

Alleluia: L. Eizenhöfer, Der Allelujagesang vor dem Evangelium: EphLit 45 (1931) 374-382; A. Martimort, Origine et signification de l'Alleluia de la messe romaine, in Kyriakon, Festschrift J. Quasten, Münster 1970, 2, 811-834; Deo gratias and Laus tibi, Christe: J. Jungmann, Missarum Sollemnia, Vienna [5]1962, vol. I (Ital. tr. Turin 1963); P. Salmon, Les 'Amen' du Canon de la Messe: EphLit 42 (1966) 496-506.

Sanctus: J. Jungmann, op. cit., vol. II.

Kyrie eleison: P. De Clerck, La "prière universelle" dans les liturgies latines anciennes (LQF 62), Münster 1977; T. Klauser, Akklamationen: RAC 1 (1950) 216-233; T.E. Gregory, Vox Populi: Popular Opinion and Violence in the Religious Controversies of the 5th Century, Columbus 1979; J.H.W.G. Liebeschuetz, Antioch. City and Imperial Administration in Later Roman Empire, Oxford 1972, 208-219; C. Roueché, Acclamations in the Later Roman Empire: New Evidence from Aphrodisias: JRS 74 (1984) 181-199; B.D. Spinks, The Sanctus in the Eucharistic Prayer, New York 1991; G. Winkler, Das Sanctus: über den Ursprung und die Anfänge des Sanctus und sein Fortwirken, Rome 2002.

A. Chupungco

ACCUSATIONS against Christians. Christianity, little understood by a public often ill-informed and willing to believe any suspicion or accusation, was subject to calumny from the outset. The prejudices of the mob and those of the cultivated class may have differed, but for the most part they issued from a common ignorance, as is clear from both *pagan authors and Christian *apologists. The earliest pagans to write of the Christians were *Suetonius and *Tacitus. Suetonius, writing about *Nero (Vita Caesarum 16,3), refers to the punishments inflicted on Christians: "The Christians—people dedicated to a new and mischievous superstitio—are consigned to torture." Superstitio means a non-Roman, foreign religion, in latent conflict with the gods, which were an integral part of the city. Christianity's novelty became evident at the point when it was no longer confused with *Judaism. More serious for a Roman was its characterization as "mischievous," as Romans deeply feared witchcraft and the like. Tacitus speaks of flagitia atrocia et pudenda, a clear reference to Thyestean banquets and Oedipal unions (see Minucius Fel., Oct. 9) but does not dwell on these things. Rather, he reports the accusation of odium humani generis (Ann. XV, 44), the humanum genus being the Roman Empire and its citizens.

The apologists primarily relate the accusations that arose at the popular level, often due to the fact that Christians met for worship in private dwellings and not openly with the participation of all citizens, as in the old religions. Partially secret meetings were by definition suspect and viewed negatively. The pagan Cecilius accuses the Christians of latebrosa et lucifuga natio (Minucius Fel., Oct. 8,4). At the popular level, the *Eucharist was thought to be the sacrifice of a baby, a cannibalistic rite. Mixed meetings in which members called one another brother and sister were interpreted as licentious gatherings ending in rape (Just., Dial. 10; I Rev 1-13; Athenag., Leg. 3; Teof., Autol. 3,4). *Tertullian writes: "We are accused as the most wicked of criminals for a supposed rite of infanticide, for the meal that ensues, and for the *incest committed after the dreadful banquet" (Apol. 7,1). Among the accusations was that of onolatry. *Fronto writes: "It is said that they venerate the head of an ass, the vilest animal . . . rites dedicated to a man condemned to death in expiation for his crimes, and that on the lethal wood of the cross" (Oratio 9; on the graffito on the Palatine, C. Cecchelli, Mater Christi, Rome 1948, II, 155-163). Though rejecting these accusations, *Justin Martyr shows the irreducible incompatibility between the God of the Christians and the pagan divinities, which are based on *demons. "We are atheists with respect to these supposed gods" (I Ap. 6). The same position can be inferred from the Martyrdom of Polycarp (9, 12). The accusation of atheism—not worshiping the polyadic divinities—was the most serious, in that with this attitude Christians did not contribute to the pax deorum; thus, in the pagan mentality, they were considered the cause of public catastrophes and natural calamities (Tertullian, Apol. 40,1-2). By the fact that religion and politics were inseparable, nonparticipation in the sacra publica, the public rites financed by the city or the emperor, was considered refusal to honor the public gods. The accusation was both religious and political—"You denounce and persecute us as wizards of sacrilege and lese majesty" (Tertullian, Apol. 10,1)—and led to *persecution. Atheism as an essential reason for pagan accusation against Christians does not appear, however, until toward the end of the second century; before then, the hostility of pagans was due to a combination of characteristics of the Christians' lives, which both intrigued and annoyed them.

Christianity, moreover, seemed to be an atheist religion in that the Christians had no *temples, altars, images or *sacrifice (Tatian, Discourse to the Greeks 27,2; Athenagoras 13,1; Justin, I Apol. 6 and 13). The pagan philosopher *Celsus writes: "Why do you Christians have no altars, or statues, or temples? What prevents you from participating in the public festivals?" (Origen, Against Celsus 8,17). Linked to the accusation of atheism was that of antisocial behavior (accusations also made against the Jews) and of absenteeism from public life: if God is common to all, good, and without necessity, then nothing should prevent those devoted to him from also participating in public festivities; if *idols indeed represent nothing, what evil would there be in partaking in public banquets (ibid., 8,24)? The accusation of atheism was thus both a political and religious charge, indistinctly. *Eusebius of Caesarea writes: "[The Christians] were *apostate from the gods of the nation, which gave cohesion to every people and city" (Prep. ev. I,2,2: SC 206,105-106).

Celsus attacked Christian doctrine above all, which for him distorted the harmony of the universe. The mystery of the *incarnation and a salvation drawn from fallen humanity were for him inconceivable. Even more, Christianity appeared to him an uncultured doctrine, its Lord a teacher of the miserable, and not the God of superior natures. At the existential level, Celsus reproved the Christians for their civic indifference: they exclude themselves from the city, not participating in the worship that holds it together. By refusing to marry and procreate (an allusion to continence), they do not participate in the realities of life. They lack a civic sense, not taking oaths in the name of the emperor. This last accusation will be taken up again by the pagan aristocracy at the fall of *Rome at the start of the 5th c. *Augustine will respond to it in the City of God, when the Romans who had remained faithful to paganism also criticize, as does Rutilius Namatianus, the withdrawn life of monks: "souls tormented by hidden remorse" (De reditu 439-452; 515-526). From the fourth century the pagans showed indignation and disgust for the Christian cult of the *martyrs—which they considered mere cadavers—and especially for the transferral of their remains to locations within the city; in doing so, they broke the barrier between the worlds of the living and the dead. The emperor *Julian says that Christianity "filled the world with tombs and graves" (Contra Galilaeos, fr. 81 Masaracchia); he also issued some rules against Christian funerals—the edict of 12 February 363 (CTh 9,17,5)—prohibiting them from taking place during the day. Julian sought to purify Daphne, a suburb of *Antioch, of the presence of the martyr *Babylas, a cadaver that he claimed prevented the oracle of Apollo from speaking (Misopog. 33 [361bc]; Libanio, Discorso 98; see 99; John Chrys., Discourse on Babylas 89-91). *Eunapius writes that the Christians "gathered the bones and skulls of criminals executed for numerous crimes after being condemned in court, considering them to be gods, and wallow in their tombs" (Vitae soph. 6,11,8); Maximus of Madaura says, "The graves of [the martyrs], even if they are worth remembering, are mobbed by the insane who have abandoned the temples and ignored the spirits of their own fathers" (Augustine, Civ. Dei 16,1; see Theodoret, HE VIII, 34,69). The case of *Iamblichus is famous, who, returning to the city after having celebrated a sacrifice and conversing about the gods with some of his disciples, suddenly stopped short, cutting off his words, and stared at the sun, having seen from a distance that a funeral train was approaching (Eunapius, Vitae soph. 5, 1,13.14 = 12-13 Giangrande).

Even the Christian *forgiveness granted at *baptism or with *penitence incited pagan criticism from Celsus on, because it promises impunity to one who repents (Augustine, Sermo 20,4; 352,9; Enar. in Ps. 101,1,10; this accusation is taken up again in Magonza 44,6 and 9 [RBen 1993, 317 and 320]) and would thus cause the breakdown of discipline and the destruction of the habits of the human race (Augustine, Sermo 20,4). The emperor *Julian speaks of his uncle *Constantine as given over to vice, murder, etc., for which he could easily obtain penitence from the Christians (from Jesus). He writes: "Whoever corrupts, whoever murders, whoever is cursed and rejected by all, comes here confidently, and being washed in this water will be made pure in an instant. And then when he falls again into the same sin, beating his breast and striking his head will again make him pure" (Caesares 336AB).

H. Leclercq: DACL 1, 265-307; P. de Labriolle, La réaction païenne, Paris 1942; A. Hamman, Chrétiens et christianisme . . . , in Forma Futuri, Misc. Pellegrino, Turin 1975, 94-109; Id., I cristiani del II secolo, Milan 1973; L. Rougier, Celse contre les chrétiens. La réaction païenne sous l'empire romain. Le Discours vrai de C., Paris 1977; M. Chiabò, Premesse all'accusa di "odium generis humani" rivolta ai cristiani: Vichiana 9 (1980) 104-118; L. Alfonsi, L'accusa di ateismo ai cristiani in Atenagora e Giustino, in Sodalitas, . . . A. Guarino, III, Naples 1984, 1477-1481; R.L. Wilken, The Christian as the Romans Saw Them, New Haven 1984; S. Benko, Pagan Cristicism of Christianity During the First Two Centuries: ANRW II,23,2, 1055-1118; A. Barzan, I cristiani nell'Impero romano precostantiniano, Milan 1990; J.J. Walsh, On Christian Atheism: VChr 45 (1991) 255-277; R. L. Lane Fox, Pagans and Christians: In the Mediterranean World from the 2nd c. AD to the Conversion of Constantine, London 2006; P. Maraval, Les persécutions durant les quatre premiers siècles du christianisme, Paris 1992; F. Ruggiero, La follia dei cristiani. Su un aspetto della "reazione pagana" tra I e V secolo, Milan 1992; S. Bodelón, El discurso anticristiano de Cecilio en el "Octavio" de Minucio Felix: Memorias de Historia Antigua 13-14 (1992–1993) 247-294; M. Rizzi, Ideologia e retorica negli exordia apologetici. Il problema dell'altro, Milan 1993; J.M. Blásquez, La reacción pagana ante el cristianismo, in D. Ramos-Lissón - M. Merino - A. Viciano (eds.), El diálogo fé-cultura en la antigüedad cristiana, Pamplona 1996, 175-198; V. Lozito, Il corvo. Calunnie, accuse e lettere anonime nei primi secoli dell'era cristiana, Bari 1996; G. Rinaldi, La Bibbia dei pagani, 2 vols., Bologna 1997; F. Bulgarini, "*Scientia puniend*a." L'accusa di magia nel passaggio dal paganesimo al cristianesimo: Nuova rivista storica 85 (2001) 215-234; A.A. Nagy, La forme originale de l'accusation d'anthropophagie contre les chrétiens, son développement et les changements de sa représentation au IIe siècle: REAug 47 (2001) 223-249; Storia del cristianesimo, I [2003] 225-259, and II [2000] 156-183; F. Ruggiero, La follia dei cristiani. La reazione pagana al cristianesimo nei secoli I-V, Rome 2002.

A. Hamman - A. Di Berardino

ACEDIA. In the Vita Antonii 36, PG 26, 896, and in *Origen, the term ἀκηδία retains its classical meaning: negligence, indifference (see In Ps. 118,28; In Is. 61,3) but is accompanied by terms that point toward its Evagrian meaning: cowardice (δειλία), dejection (κατήφεια), sadness (λύπη), etc. *Evagrius of Pontus seems to have been the first to identify the *demon of acedia with the "midday demon" of Ps 90:6, painting a vivid picture of the monk who succumbs to acedia (Pract. 12, SC 171, 521ff.). In *Coptic the term is translated as pehloped [discouragement], in Syriac as qûtâʿ reʿ yânâ [dejection of spirit]. Later the Latin term taedium was used, but *Cassian keeps the Greek word akēdia (Inst. 10, I, CSEL 17, 173, 20-21). It is difficult to specify the difference between acedia and sadness (λύπη) in the list of the eight deadly sins. The Eastern monastic tradition distinguishes it by emphasizing a specific circumstance: according to Evagrius's definition, acedia is linked to the state of life of the *anchorite and is opposed to perseverance in the *cell and in the solitary life.

DSp I, 166-169, III, 99-104; A. Guillaumont, Introduction au Traité pratique d'Évagre, SC 170, 86ff.; L. Giordano, Moribus acediae. Da Giovanni Cassiano e Gregorio Magno alla elaborazione medievale: VetChr 26 (1989) 221-243; G. Bunge, Akédia. La dottrina spirituale di Evagrio Pontico sull'acedia, Praglia Abbey 1992; T. Špidlík, Spiritualità dell'Oriente cristiano, Cinisello Balsamo 1995, 238-239; J.-C. Larchet, Thérapeutique des maladies spirituelles, Paris 1997, 207-214; C. Casagrande, S. Vecchio, I sette vizi capitali, storia dei peccati nel Medioevo, Turin 2000; J.-C. Nault, Le saveur de Dieu. L'acédie dans le dynamisme de l'agir, Rome 2002.

T. Špidlík

ACEPHALI. *Monophysite heretics. In 482 the emperor *Zeno issued the Henoticon (Evagr., HE III 14) to end the controversies among Catholics and monophysites with a dogmatic formula which—by its lack of precision, recourse to the *christological formulas of *Nicaea and *Constantinople, and implicit condemnation of the Council of *Chalcedon—was intended to unite all of Christianity in a single profession of christological faith. The document, though a political masterpiece, rather than encouraging Christian unity increased division: the Eastern episcopate accepted the imperial decree under the threat of exile, while the *orthodox did not tolerate the implicit condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, nor the silence concerning the Tome of *Leo. The monophysites rebelled against *Peter Mongus himself—also a monophysite, whom Zeno and *Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, intended to install as bishop of *Alexandria after the death of the orthodox *Timothy Salofaciolus (June 482)—thus forming a separate party. These more rigid monophysites who, rejecting the acceptance of the Henoticon by Peter Mongus (patriarch of Alexandria, 482-490), were not in communion with any of the five *patriarchates, were called ἀκέφαλοι, "without a patriarch" (though not without bishops, as there were always bishops in their ranks), and originated the first notable break among the opponents to the Council of Chalcedon. The principal representative of the acephali was the monk *Severus, who was able to win the favor of *Anastasius (491-518), Zeno's successor, for his companions in *heresy, to the point where in 511 Timothy, a priest belonging to the acephali, was given the *cathedra of Constantinople after the deposition of *Macedonius, who had adhered to the Henoticon. In 512 Severus himself was elected patriarch of Antioch. Despite having won patriarchal cathedrae, the acephali continued to be called by this name. Their heresy united the autonomous monophysites of *Egypt, *Syria and *Palestine, where the great majority of monks and their *archimandrites were acephali. There was a multiplication of monophysite sects that remained in existence until the 9th c.: these are discussed by *Ephrem of Antioch (6th c.), *Eulogius of Alexandria (7th c.), *John of Damascus and Theodore the Studite (8th-9th c.).

Hfl–Lecl II, 857-870, 915-926, 1151; DIP 1, 82; DHGE 1, 282-288; LTK 1, 288; J. Lebon, Le monophysisme sévérien: étude historique, littéraire et théologique sur la résistance monophysite au Concile de Chalcédonie, Louvain 1909; P. van Cauwenbergh, Études sur les moines d'Égypte depuis le Concile de Chalcédonie jusqu'à l'invasion arabe (640), Paris 1914; J. Maspéro, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, Paris 1923; M. Jugie, Theologia dogmatica Christianorum orientalium dissidentium, V, Paris 1935, 420-437; J.J. Arry, Hérésies et factions dans l'Empire byzantin du IVe au VIIe siècle, Cairo 1968; A. Cameron, Heresies and Factions: Byzantion 44 (1974) 92-120; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, Bd. 2/1, Freiburg 1986, 293-294; Bd. 2/2, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1989, 193, 203, 209, 347, 354; Bd. 2/4, Freiburg- Basel-Vienna 1990, 81; E. Suttner, Ostkirchliche Studien 41 (1992) 3-21.

M.G. Bianco

ACESIUS (d. after 325). *Novatianist bishop of *Constantinople. A participant at the Council of *Nicaea (325), he subscribed to the council's decisions but did not want to be reconciled with the *Catholics. Reiterating his rigorist position on the sin of *apostasy to *Constantine, the emperor is said to have exclaimed ironically: "Acesius, get a ladder and go up to heaven by yourself!" (Socr., HE I,10; Soz., HE I,22).

E. Prinzivalli

ACHAIA. Roman and Byzantine administrative district, capital *Corinth, seat of a proconsul (Brandis, 193-194, Mommsen, 233-234, Vailhé, Leclercq, Bon, 2, Konidaris, 44-54). At the start of the 6th c. Achaia included the Peloponnese; eastern Greece as far as and including Thermopylae; Euboea; the islands of the Saronic and Argolic gulfs; Cythera, Zacinthus and Cephalonia among the Ionian islands; Scyros, Lemnos and Imbros in the north Aegean (Hierocles, Synekd. 648,6-649,2, Honigmann 16-19). Also known as Hellas (Konidaris, 54-72, Koder-Hild, 50-54), it was attached to the diocese of *Macedonia, capital *Thessalonica, seat of the Praefectus praetorio per Illyricum (Notit. dignit., Or. III Seeck, 9). With *Theodosius I the entire region was politically part of the Eastern empire. Achaia suffered *Goth incursions in the second half of the 4th c. (Zos. I, 37, 43, V, 5-6: CSHB 36, 40 and 249-254, Mendelssohn, 26,31 and 221-223, Herzberg, 23-27), resulting in a temporary depopulation (Koder-Hild, 51). 5th- and 6th-c. monuments nonetheless testify to a considerable density of population and economic prosperity; 79 towns are listed in the Synekdēmos of Hierocles. With the restructuring of Byzantine administration into themes (themata) at the end of the 7th c., the province of Achaia was split into the theme of Hellas, capital Thebes (first mentioned in 695: Theophan., Chronogr. a.M. 6187: CSHB 564, de Boor 368), and that of the Peloponnese, with Corinth still as its capital (first mentioned in 811–812: Costant. Porphyr., Peri themat.: CSHB 3,52). The region already in part entered a period of obscurity by the mid-6th c., becoming complete from the beginning of the 7th c. (including destruction from earthquakes, depopulation from epidemics, Arab incursions and Slavic occupation).

The first Christian communities date from the apostolic age (see Athens; Corinth). The foundation of the church of Aegina also dates to apostolic times (Const. Apost. VII, 46: PG 1, 1056; Funk I, 454). The existence of the church of Lacedemone (Sparta) is attested in 170 (Eus., HE IV, 23: PG 20, 384; GCS II, 324). According to the patristic tradition, the foundation of the churches of Patras and Thebes also dates to apostolic times. The claim that the mortal remains of the apostle Andrew are kept at Patras, and those of the apostle Luke at Thebes, dates to the early 5th c. (Filost., HE III, 2: PG 65, 431; GCS 21, 156 and 157. See Harnack, 788-790; Konidaris, 368-369 and 423-425). Also dating to apostolic times, according to a reliable tradition, is the constitution of the church of Marathon, which spread throughout the demes of Attica. Christianity spread rapidly in Achaia in the 4th c. (Konidaris, 418-430), also developing near the cities (*Athens; *Corinth). In Athens the ancients cults survived until the third decade of the 6th c. Because of the Gothic invasion the Olympic games were no longer celebrated at Olympia in the 4th c. Christianity made great strides in winning over the region in the mid-5th c., when it began to occupy and transform the ancient sanctuaries: Eleusis, Delphi, Epidaurus, Olympia and Delos. Christianity still had to compete with the eastern religions in Achaia, however, especially the Egyptian cults and *Judaism. The ecclesiastical center of Achaia was Corinth, the metropolitan see and meeting place for local synods (Max Herz. z. Sachsen, 15-42; Konidaris, 406ff., 422ff., 515-522). As a province of eastern Illyricum, Achaia was subject to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of *Rome. The Christian life of the first centuries was very active. *Gnostics were active in the area (see Carpocratians), and the cities were visited by *Origen; nevertheless in the controversy over *Easter, Achaia followed the church of Rome, with which it had established relations since the 1st c. Achaia was also immune to *Arianism. Ecclesiastical dependence on Rome lasted until 732 or 733 (on the bishops of Achaia, see Bon, 8-9; Konidaris, 515-522). After the 2nd c., Christianity came to be little known and very sparsely documented in the Greek lands; bishops participated infrequently at councils, with only five bishops from Achaia and *Thessaly present at *Nicaea.

Early Christian remains can be found in both towns and the countryside, especially in the cities mentioned by Hierocles and in all of the old Attic demes. One of the oldest Christian documents from Achaia seems to be the epitaph of Aurelia Zosima in Elis (Pallas, Investigations, 3-4, 14). At Methonis, a *cemetery dug into rock is divided into rooms with seats and "cathedrae" for meals for the dead, and its graves—arcosolia, tombs dug in the earth, one with a canopy attached to the rock on all sides—recall similar cemeteries in southern Italy and Sicily (Pallas, Mon., 191-192). The most important early church buildings were found at Corinth and Athens. The oldest known, from before the mid-5th c., is the basilica of Epidaurus, with five aisles and a transept (Sotiriou, βασιλικαί, 198-201). Another mid-6th-c. five-aisled basilica was located at Philiatra of Triphi-lia (Pallas, Ἀνασκαφή, 177-194). The basilicas normally had three aisles divided by colonnades (e.g., the basilica of Sicyon: Pallas, Mon. 172-175), very rarely by rows of pillars, as the basilicas of Cranaeum (see Corinth), Eleutheris (Stikas, Ἀνασκ. Ἐλευθ., 48-52) and Clausium (Pallas, Scoperte, 191-193; Mon., 25). Also rare are basilicas with transverse aisles: Epidaurus, Lechaeum and Cranaeum, Boios in present-day Mariolata (Pallas, Mon., 19), and Clausium. The transverse aisle, or transept, of the basilica of Clausium has an apse at each end (thus a three-apsed basilica); it seems to have been influenced by the architecture of *Epirus, like the basilica of Mariolata. Basilicas with wooden roofs and tripartite, three-apsed vaulted presbyteries begin to appear in the 6th c. (basilica of the acropolis of Sparta: Sotiriou, Ἀνασκαφαί, 107-118; for the dating: Vocotopoulos, Παρατηρήσεις, 273-282). Characteristic of the basilicas of Achaia—with the exception of Corinth—is the position of the ambo, placed north of the building's axis (Sodini, Note, 585-588).

C.G. Brandis, PWK I, 190-198, s.v. Achaia; Th. Mommsen, Röm. Gesch. V. Berlin [6]1909; S. Vailhé, DHGE I, 300-304, s.v. Achaïe; M. Herzog zu Sachsen, Das christliche Hellas, Leipzig 1918; H. Leclercq: DACL 2, 321-340, s.v. Achaïe; A. von Harnack, Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Leipzig [4]1924; GA. Sotiriou, Αἱ παλαιοχριστιανικαὶ βασιλικαὶ τῆς Ἑλλάδος: AE (1929) 150-248; Id., Ἀνασκαφαὶ ἐν τῇ ταλαιᾷ Σπαρτῇ: PAAH (1939) 107-118; E.G. Stikas, Ἀνασκαφὴ Ἐλευθερῶν: PAAH (1939) 44-52; A. Bon, Le Peloponnèse byzantin jusqu'en 1204, Paris 1951; G.I. Konidaris, Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ Ἱστορία τῆς Ἑλλάδος, I, Athenai 1954; D.I. Pallas, Scoperte archeologiche in Grecia negli anni 1956-1958: RivAC 25 (1959) 187-223; Id., PAAH (1960) 144-170; Id., Investigations sur les monuments chrétiens de Grèce avant Constantin: CArch 24 (1975) 1-19; J.P. Sodini, Note sur deux variantes régionales dans les basiliques de Grèce et des Balkans: le tribélon et l'emplacement de l'ambon: BCH 99 (1975) 581-588; P.L. Vocotopoulos, Παρατηρήσες στὴν λεγυμένη βασιλικὴ τοῦ Ἁγίου Νίκωρος, Πρακτικὰ Α' Διεθνοῦς Συνεδρίου Πελοποννησιακῶν Σπουδῶν, II, Athenai 1976, 273-282; D.I. Pallas, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Grèce découverts de 1959 à 1973, Vatican City 1977; T.E. Gregory, The Survival of Paganism in Christian Greece: AJPh 107 (1986) 229-242; G. Gounaris, L'archéologie chrétienne en Grèce del 1974 à 1985, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2687-2711; F.R. Trombley, Hellenic Religion and Christianization c. 370-529, 2 vols., Leiden 1993-1994; P. Castrén, Christianity in Athens and Vicinity during the Fourth to Sixth Century A.D., in The Idea and Ideal of the Town between Late Antiquity and Early Middle Ages, G.P. Bogliolo - B. Ward-Perkins (eds.), Leiden 1999, 211-223.

D.I. Pallas

ACHEIROPOIETA, from ἀχειροποίητος = "not made by human hands," synonym of ἀχειρόπλαστος, ἀχειρόγραφος, ἀχειροτευκτος. Plato defines ἀχειροποίητος (Phaed. 30,81c; Apol. 32,40c) as the world of the ideas, i.e., the true world, and ἀχειροποίητος came to signify true or eternal (see Cic., De nat. deor. 1,820). As a technical term, ἀχειροποίητος meant "prodigious, not made by human hand," and referred to images of Christ, Mary or the saints not composed by human beings. In ancient Greece it was believed that some simulacra, such as the Palladium of Troy and of Athena, Artemis of Tauris, Artemis of *Ephesus and Serapis of Alexandria, were sent down from heaven by Zeus (διοπετής: see Suidas, n. 1187). The most important Christian acheiropoieta are the image of Christ from Kamulia in *Cappadocia (moved to *Constantinople in 574) and that of *Edessa. The image of Kamulia was found by Hypatia, who had made seeing Christ a condition of her belief. The acheiropoietos of Edessa has a more obscure history: Christ is said to have sent a letter with his portrait to the king *Abgar Uchamâ (Eus., HE 1,13, attests that the letter is taken from a Syriac text at Edessa), containing a promise to send a disciple to cure him. *Ananias was thought to have been the painter, according to a later legend. The image is claimed to have miraculously turned back an attack of the Persians against Edessa (544). A legend that appeared in 944, when the acheiropoietos was taken to Constantinople, tells the history of the image in much detail. Christ is depicted as suffering, with a beard and long hair, which we know from copies now kept at Laon, Rome and Genoa that have come down to us from the Middle Ages. Among the other acheiropoieta are the Christ known to exist at Memphis in the 6th c.; the Christ of the Sancta Sanctorum at the Lateran; and the Veronica of St. Peter's, Rome, mentioned in the 9th c. (i.e., the veil with an effigy of the suffering Christ). An impression of Christ's whole body is on the Shroud of *Turin, venerated since the 7th c. Some acheiropoieta of the Madonna began to be venerated in the same century. The earliest references regard that of the church of Diospolis (Lydda) in *Palestine: one version said the image was produced by the Virgin touching a column, another that it was produced solely by her will.

EC 1, 220-222; RAC 1, 68.71; K. Wessel, s.v. Acheiropoietos: RBK 1, 22-28; LTK 1, 112; E. von Dobschütz, Christusbilder, TU 18, Leipzig 1899; C. Cecchelli, Le più antiche illustrazioni di N.S. Gesù Cristo: Illustrazione Vaticana 3 (1932, I) 283-287; G. de Jerphanion, L'image de Jésus Christ dans l'art chrétien: La voix des Monuments 2 (N.S.), Rome-Paris 1938, 1-26; M. Papi, Il volto di Gesù. Storia arte scienza, Florence 1967; C. Dufour Bozzo, Il "Sacro VoIto" di Genova, Rome 1974, with bibliographical appendix (143-153); C. Walter, Acheropita: Dizionario Enciclopedico del Medioevo 1, Rome 1998, 12; H. Belting, Il culto delle immagini. Storia dell'icona dall'età imperiale al tardo Medioevo, Rome 2001.

M.G. Bianco

ACHILLAS (d. 312). Bishop of *Alexandria, saint. Feast 7 Nov. Successor of *Peter from the end of 311 to June 312. Previously had directed the school of Alexandria (Eus., HE VII, 32,30). Consecrated *Arius to the priesthood, forgiving his sympathies for the *Melitians. Succeeded by Alexander.

E. Prinzivalli, Magister Ecclesiae. Il dibattito su Origene fra III e IV secolo, SEA 82, Rome 2002, 33-64.

E. Prinzivalli

ACHILLAS (d. after 324). Arian priest. A follower of *Arius, he appears in the documents of the first Arian controversy; in particular, he is named in the letter sent by *Alexander, bishop of *Alexandria, to the Catholic episcopate in 319 (Socrates, HE I, 6; Gelasius of Cyzicus, Hist. Conc. Nic. 2, 3), immediately after the Synod of *Alexandria of 318; in it, Alexander specified the charges against the heresiarch and his companions and told of the beginning of the Arian *heresy. Achillas signed the profession of faith addressed by Arius to Alexander of Alexandria in 320 (Opitz, AW, 13). In the latter's letter of 324 to Alexander, bishop of Byzantium or *Thessalonica (Theodoret, HE 1, 3 and 3, 9), Achillas is cited as one of the leaders of the heresy (Opitz, AW, 19-20).

H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke, III, Berlin-Leipzig 1936–1941.

G. Pilara

ACHILLEUS (first half 5th c.). In 419, following on the contest in the Roman church between Pope *Boniface I and his (ultimately unsuccessful) would-be usurper *Eulalius, Achilleus was delegated by the court at *Ravenna to perform the *Easter ceremonies at Rome (March 30), since the two contestants had been sent away from the city by the civil authorities. Achilleus built a church at Spoleto extra moenia, dedicated to St. Peter, east of the city on the Via Flaminia, depositing some relics of the apostle there. He composed songs for the church, four of which have been preserved; two are certainly his and exalt the primacy of Peter, who is arbiter on earth and janitor in heaven.

CPL 1484; G.B. De Rossi, ICUR II, 1, nn. 79-82, 113-114; DACL 15, 1639-1640; A.P. Frutaz, Spes e Achilleo vescovi di Spoleto. Atti del II Convegno Studi Umbri, Perugia 1964, 352-377; Patrologia III, 300-301; PCBE 2,10-11; M. Maccarrone, Il vescovo Achilleo e le iscrizioni metriche di S. Pietro a Spoleto, in Id., Romana Ecclesia. Cathedra Petri, Rome 1991, 287-327.

A. Di Berardino

ACHOLIUS (d. 383). Bishop of *Thessalonica. He baptized the emperor *Theodosius (380). In the *Arian controversy he followed a strictly orthodox and Western line and participated at the *Council of Constantinople (381). In two letters (Ep. 5-6) on that occasion *Damasus exhorts Acholius and the other *Macedonian bishops to choose a man who would favor peace in the election of the bishop of *Constantinople and to respect the Nicene canon forbidding bishops to change dioceses. Acholius was present at the synod of *Rome (382).

E. Prinzivalli

ACILIUS GLABRIO (ca. 40–ca. 95). *Suetonius reports that *Domitian had Acilius Glabrio, the consul in 91, put to death along with other senators and members of the high Roman aristocracy, quasi molitores rerum novarum (as inventors of new things—Dom. 10,2). Dio Cassius combines the accusation with that levied against *Flavius Clemens and his wife Flavia *Domitilla: atheism and Jewish customs, adding that of having fought victoriously against a lion, which raised suspicions of *magic (Hist. Rom. 67,14,3). Baronius and Ruinart think these accusations amount to a charge of being a Christian and that the death of the consul (in 95) was a *martyrdom. But the supposed sympathy toward the Jews (or the Christians) could have been merely a pretext, such that Acilius Glabrio should not be considered a martyr. In 1888 G.B. De Rossi tried to establish the consul's Christianity with the help of Acillian epigraphs in the so-called hypogeum of the Acilii in the catacomb of Priscilla, where in fact an Acilius Glabrio is buried. The first certainly Christian finds in this portion of the catacomb, however, date only to 3rd/4th c., not to the 1st, and the texts do not present Acilius Glabrio as a Christian. De Rossi's conclusion therefore remains a hypothesis.

PWK 1/1, 257; RAC 4, 106; P. Keretzes, The Jews, The Christians and Emperor Domitian: VChr 27 (1973) 1-28; P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten, Tübingen [2]1989, 172.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

ACILIUS SEVERUS (d. after 326). Of Spanish origin, Acilius was the praetorian prefect of *Gaul (12 Dec 322–23 Jan 324) and the ordinary consul together with Vettius Rufinus (323); the laws emanated under his consulate are preserved in the Theodosian Code (Codex Theodosianus*). He was prefect of Rome from 4 January 325 until 13 November 326. *Lactantius dedicated two books of his Letters to him.

PLRE 1, 834; PWK 2A/2, 2003.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

ACOEMETAE or Akoimetoi (sleepless ones). *Monastic community of *Constantinople, founded ca. 425 by St. *Alexander (the Acoemete), an itinerant *monk from the Greek archipelago with ties to *Messalian circles. Backed by the people, by monks (St. *Hypatius) and by the empress *Pulcheria, Alexander changed residence many times, dying ca. 430 at Gomon on the Asian coast of the Bosporus near the Black Sea. His successor, John, moved to the Eirenaion, nearer the city. The most famous *hegumen, St. Marcellus, provided the first monks of the Studite monastery in 463. The characteristic of the acoemetae was continual liturgical *prayer, alternating among three groups (Greek, Latin and *Syriac?). Their *liturgy, but especially their library and culture, had a great influence. They easily resisted their *archbishops and for a long time were allied with Rome in defense of *Chalcedon. They ultimately became suspect because of their defense of the *Three Chapters, diminishing in importance after 534.

G. Dagron, La vie ancienne de saint Marcel l'Acémète: AB 86 (1968) 271-286; R. Janin, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin. III. Les Églises et les monastères, Paris ²1969, 16-17; DHGE 1,272-282; TRE 2,148-153.

J. Gribomont

ACOLUTHIA. Has the same meaning in the *Byzantine *liturgy as the Latin term ordo, ritus, and indicates the totality of the rubrics that regulate the celebration of divine worship, the administration of the *sacraments, the recitation of canonical hours, the preparation of the bread and wine before Mass, assistance to the dying, *funeral rites, etc. In the term's interpretation, the profane Greek meaning of "to follow," "to go behind," quickly passed to that of "to follow" in a moral, spiritual and religious sense. The various meanings can be expressed as follows: to follow a discourse, to understand, to follow someone's opinion or judgment, to conform oneself (Plato, Phaedr., 107. 232a; Crat., 437; Rep., 332. 398. 400; Thucyd., Stor., III, 38, 6; Arist., A Nicom., II, 6; Diog. La., Stor., 9, 21). In the OT, when used negatively, it is a technical term indicating *apostasy and *paganism (Dt 4:3; 6:14; Jdg 2:12; 1 Kgs 21:26; Jer 11:10; Hos 1:2; 2:7, 15), identifying it with adultery: Israel follows after its lovers and forgets its spouse. In the contest over Baal, the word is said in reference to Yahweh, regarding the choice between following Baal and Yahweh (1 Kgs 18:21). Jer 2:2, idealizing the relationship between Israel and Yahweh during the forty years in the desert, recalls that Israel followed Yahweh with love and affection. The word is used with a certain reluctance in the OT because of its idolatrous resonance, evocative of the pagan processions behind their images. Outside the religious context, it maintains the descriptive profane meaning of the disciple who accompanies his master as a true and proper servant (see Jdg 9:4, 49; 1 Kgs 19:20-21). While *Philo favored the classical usage (De Migr. Abr. 128), rabbinism upheld its association with the imitation of Yahweh. In the NT it can mean an external following, like that of the crowd (Mt 8:10; Mk 3:7), but more frequently refers to the disciple who leaves all to follow the Master, intimately attached to him in a vital relationship (Mt 8:22; Mk 10:28; Lk 5:11; 9:61-62). This "following" puts the disciple in the footsteps of the Messiah, introducing him to the salvation offered by Jesus (Lk 9:61). From the frequent recurrence of the verbal form (90 times in the NT), especially in the Synoptics, the demands of following Christ emerge, along with the typology of one who follows him. Before Easter, Christ, accompanied by the group of disciples he has chosen (Mk 1:16-20 and par.; Mk 3:16 and par.), moves from village to village, preaching the news of the *kingdom of God. To this group is attached the 72 anonymous disciples, anonymous meant as a designation and not as a defining quality of their discipleship (Lk 10:1-12). The third group is the crowd along the way, but these do not follow in the proper sense (Mt 5:24; 11:9; Mk 2:15; 3:7). To embrace Jesus' style of life meant, even before Easter, the renunciation of one's possessions (Mk 10:17-22, 29-30; Lk 10:3; 14:26-27; Mt 10:27-38) and taking up one's cross (Mk 8:34; Lk 14:26-27). Following Jesus is radical; the term has a pregnancy when addressed to individuals and means a call to become his disciples (Mt 8:22; 9:9; 19:21); it also involves a break with Jewish habits and piety, with the law, and with family (Mt 8:18-22; Lk 9:57-62).

In the few references in John—17 in the entire gospel—fully 16 refer to the disciples (Jn 1:37, 38, 40, 43; 8:12; 10:4-5, 27; 12:26; 13:36-37; 18:15; 21:19-20, 22); Jn 6:2 refers to the crowd that followed him because of the works he performed. To the following described in the Synoptics is added the principle of listening (Jn 1:36-42), though *Philip is called to follow Jesus (Jn 1:43). In Jn 12:24-26, following is in view of the cross, and *Peter is told that in his time he will follow the same path as the Lord (Jn 13:36-38).

After Easter Jesus once again calls Peter, who had denied being his disciple (Jn 18:25-27), to follow (Jn 21:19), which will end in death; the disciple whom Jesus loved had already been introduced into post-Easter followership (Jn 21:20). In Johanine theology, union with Jesus and followership coincide: the one who follows him as the "light of the world" does not "walk in darkness" but will have "the light of life" and is saved (Jn 8:12). To accept Jesus and his word means to accept the one who sent him (Jn 13:44ff.). The acceptance of Jesus, the typical Johanine form of followership, effectively means the act of faith, listening to the word of Christ (Jn 10:27). The image of the Good *Shepherd displays this well: he knows his sheep, who listen to his voice and follow him (Jn 10:27). In the NT, with a few exceptions, followership does not have God for its object, but the earthly Jesus and the risen Christ.

The following of Christ in the *Fathers is an argument that had a surprising development from the very beginning. It is used in both the etymological sense of "to follow," with the noematic nuances already indicated, and in the spiritual sense and the sense of testimony to express the concept of the imitation and assimilation of Christ. Here we will give only an indication of the numerous instances of its use. *Clement of Rome establishes, at a distance, an ethical confrontation between the truth, a way to be followed (Cor. 35,5) and the precepts of the Lord (Cor. 40,4). Christians follow the local customs of the society in which they live, but their way of life is admirable and extraordinary (Ad Diog., 5,4). In the Testament of Asher 6,1, to follow the commandments of the Lord in truth is the same as to be coherent. For *Ignatius, what he suffers from the soldiers who guard him is a school for becoming more fully a disciple of Christ (Ad Rom., 5,1.3), imitating him by dying and rising with him (ibid., 6,1.3). To follow includes the concept of being ever more a disciple and imitator of Christ. In *Irenaeus of Lyons, what are followed are God or his Word and the *apostolic tradition. The human being has been taught to follow God without the constraint of the law (Ad. haer. 4,13,2.4). The Savior, the light that enlightens and the font of glory (ibid., 4,14,1), saves the one who follows him (ibid., 3,18,4). The Lord (Christ), having surpassed the propaedeutic precepts of Moses, manifested God as Father and taught humanity to follow his Word (ibid., 4,12,5; 16,5). Authentic following only has one true master, and his words are the rule of truth (ibid., 4,35,4; 5, prol.). The *Spirit of God gives salvation, based on faith in the one God and the following of his Word (ibid., 4,33,15; 28,2). Christ, present in the prophecies and symbols of the OT, prefigured and foretold the things to come, educating the people of the two covenants in obedience to God, to live as strangers in the world and to follow the Word of God (ibid., 4,21,3). The element of faith characterizes the life of Abraham, making him a model for the believer, who follows the Word; in the footsteps of the Word one becomes a foreigner on earth, so as to become his fellow citizen (ibid., 4,5,3-5; 25,19). Attending to the testimony of the apostles one encounters the truth (ibid., 3,4,1; 9,1; 15,1).

In *Clement of Alexandria the concept "to follow" is rendered both by the forms of the verb ἀκολυθεῶ and by the forms of the verb ἕπομαι; both are very frequent. Regarding the relationship that should be maintained with the Logos, he says that many have not asked themselves if they should "follow" someone, whom and in what way. As the Logos is, so must be the life of the faithful so as to be able to follow God, who from the beginning leads all things directly to their proper end (Strom. VII, 100,2.3). This concept is restated in another way: one who obeys the Lord and faithfully "follows" the prophecy given by him will become in the end an image of the master, a "god" going about in a body; obviously, those who do not follow God wherever he leads will not reach these heights (ibid., VII, 101,5). The knowledgeable Christian "follows God" with wisdom, holding fast to the truth (Protr. 122, 2; Paed. II, 36,2; III, 12,4); he accompanies him, observing his commandments (Strom. II, 39,5; 125,4-5), which are so many ways to salvation (ibid., I, 29,3). To follow Christ is "salvation" (Paed. I, 27,1; III, 43,1). Following God leads one to become like him (Strom. II,100,4). By the term road (Paed. III, 87,2), which goes toward heaven, Clement expresses the externalization of his vision that all of humanity is on its way to God. Associated with this idea is that of "accompanying" or "following the Lord" (Strom. II, 70,1). Sometimes the road is called one, that of faith and knowledge (ibid., I, 38,6; II, 4,2; V, 8,3; VI, 2,3; VII, 94,5; 103,6; Paed. III, 87,22; Quis dives 1,3), but it is also royal (Strom. I, 38,6; IV, 2,3; VII, 73,5; VI, 91,5; Quis dives 38,1). There are different roads, appropriate to the people and to individuals, on which we are led to God (Strom. I, 27,1; 29,4; 38,6; IV, 45,1; VII, 7,6) Protr. 85,1; Paed. III, 87,2).

In *Origen's lexicon the term "to follow" ranges from the most obvious and generic meaning of "to follow" to the fuller meaning of following the will of God, following Christ and listening to his word. In Ex. ad mart. 12, following is not just to follow the master but also to take up his cross to the point of martyrdom, which is the most perfect image of him who redeemed humanity with his blood. The cross (denial of self) and followership are the ways to gain eternal salvation, toward which Christ is the guide who walks ahead (Ex. 13; 36; 41-44). To follow Christ is a radical choice, requiring renunciation of self and the repudiation of one's past life to the point of being crucified with him (Com. in Mt. 12,24; see Hom. in Jdg. 9,1). The point of departure for such a drastic decision is the Father's revelation that Christ is justice, holiness, wisdom, peace, truth, the way that leads to him and the true life (Com. in Mt. 15, 21-22).

Besides the meanings of succession (C. Eun., 11, Hom. in Cant. 13, Serm. Cat. 16) and of the paths of life (C. Eun. 11: PG 45, 869), for *Gregory of Nyssa ἀκολουθία means, negatively, the consequences of original sin: humanity's banishment from paradise, the deterioration of the beauty of creation and ongoing sin. Positively, it means the way of return to the original beatitude (Verg. 12), the progressive salvation and deification of the person attentive to God's commandments (Hom. in Cant 5., Serm. Cat. 24; C. Eun. 2). *John Chrysostom repeatedly uses the image of Christ going before us to make the path easier and to show us that it is possible to observe the commandments (De fut. vitae ben.: PG 65, 351; see Augustine, Sermo 141, 4).

The following of Christ has a strong ascetical connotation in *Jerome, who sums up the ideal of detachment from possessions with the imperative: "Follow, naked, the naked Christ" (Ep. 125,20), and "Follow, naked, the Saving Lord" (Ep. 145).

GLNT 1, 567-582; LTK 7, 609-610; B. Reynders, Lexique compare . . . de l' "Adversus Haereses" de Saint Irénée, Louvain 1954, at the entry; X. Léon-Dufour, Seguire: Diz. Teol. Bibl., Turin 1965, 1050-1052; G.W.H. Lampe, 63; H. Cremer, Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek, Edinburgh [4]1954, 79-82; Diz. eseg. NT., I, Brescia 1995, 129-138.

E. Peretto

ACROSTICS. Poetry in which the first letter of each strophe, verse or word spells out a word or message. One simple form of acrostic is an abecedarian poem, whose verses and strophes begin with the letters of the alphabet, in order from a to z. In abecedarian poems, the letters of the alphabet are not necessarily the first letter of the strophe—at times they function to distinguish one strophe from another. Most common in ancient and medieval Latin Christian literature, abecedarian poems not only were easy to memorize, but also displayed the composer's ingenuity. Abecedarian poems differ from acrostics in which the first letter of each verse or strophe combines to form a name, a word or a verse. Acrostics are common in incantations, in the cult of the dead, in poetic oracles and in arcana. Well known among acrostics is the hymn to Dionysius (see Anthologia Palatina 9,524; ibid., 9,530, memorization essays). Sacred Hebrew literature contains important examples. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are composed as an abecedarian poem: in the first, second and fourth chapters of Lamentations, the alphabetical form is followed at the beginning of the individual strophes; in the third, the letter of the alphabet is repeated three times in each strophe. For others see Ps 9–10; 25; 34; 37; 111; 112; 119; 145; Pr 31:10-31. The LXX and Latin translations did not preserve the alphabetical form. This literary procedure in its captivating, parenetic, hymnal and memory-enhancing qualities is well established. It was used by *gnostics in investigating the correspondence between the letters of the Greek alphabet, beginning from the extremities of the human body and following its various members. In ancient and medieval Latin Christian literature they were used by (1) *Augustine in the Psalmus contra partem Donati and the Tract. in Joannem 10, 12, primarily to facilitate memorization; (2) *Commodian, Instructiones I, 35; De ligno vitae et mortis II, 15; (3) *Sedulius, in the hymn A solis ortus cardine; (4) *Hilary of Poitiers, in the hymns Ante saecula qui manes and Fefellit saevam; (5) *Fulgentius of Ruspe, in the hymn Domine Redemptor noster; (6) *Venantius Fortunatus, in the hymn dedicated to bishop *Leontius Agnoscat omne saeculum; (7) *Bede, in the hymn for the solemnity of the holy apostles Peter and Paul Apostolorum gloriam; (8) Paulinus of Aquileia, in the penitential hymn Ad caeli clara non sum dignus sidera. In the Middle Ages themes broadened to include: the eulogy of *Milan (ca. 740); the imprecations against Benevento for the treacherous capture of the emperor Ludwig II (ca. 871); a Venetian cleric inveighing against the pretentions of the *patriarchate of *Aquileia (845). The hymn *Acathistus also belongs to a group of abecedarian poems.

Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 1, 14,3: SC 264 (E. Bellini, Milan 1980); Augustine, Psalm. c. part. Don.: CPL 330; PL 43, 23-32; CSEL 51, 3-15; Commodian, Instr. I, 35; De ligno vit. II, 15: CPL 1470; PL 5, 227-228; CCL 128 (1960), 29-30.54-55; Sedulius: CPL 1449; PL 19, 763-777; CSEL 10 (1885) 163-168; Hilary of Poitiers: CPL 43; PLS 1,274-276; CSEL 65 (1916) 209-214; Fulgentius of Ruspe: CPL 827; CCL 91A (1968) 877-885; Venantius Fort.: CPL 1033; PL 88, 81-82; Bede Ven.: CPL 1372; PL 94, 628-630; CCL 122 (1955) 428-430; Paulinus of Aquileia, in C. Blume - G.M. Dreves, Analecta hymnica 50, Leipzig 1961 (rist.), 148-150; A. Kehl, Beiträge zum Verständnis einiger gnostischer und frühchristlicher Psalmen und Hymnen: JbAC 15 (1972/1973) 92-119; T. Piatti, I carmi alfabetici della Bibbia, chiave della metrica ebraica?: Biblica 31 (1950) 281-315, 427-458; S. Bartina, Acrostico: Enc. Bibl., I, Turin 1969, cols. 138-143.

E. Peretto

ACTISTETAE. Members of one of the most extreme sects into which Egyptian *monophysitism was divided in the first half of the 6th c. The actistetae considered the body of Christ not only incorruptible—as the *Aphthartodocetae claimed, following *Julian of Halicarnassus—but "uncreated" (Timothy of Constantinople, PG 86, 44), thus eliminating any distinction between the humanity and divinity of Christ. Their spokesman was a certain *Ammonius (Michael the Syrian, Chron. 9,31).

J. Maspéro, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, Paris 1923, 192-193; DTC 5,107; 6,1006; 10,2242; LTK[3] 1,803.

F. Cocchini

ACTS AND CANONS, CONCILIAR

I. Origins and propagation - II. Authority of canons.

The Latin term canon, borrowed from Greek, originally had many meanings, leading up to its later meaning of law, norm, rule of appraisal or behavior. From the 4th c. it was increasingly used to mean conciliar decisions. The term was also used for papal decretals and νόμοι, imperial edicts on church affairs.

I. Origins and propagation. The African councils—the most technically elaborate of Christian antiquity, esp. those called by *Aurelius of Carthage (391–428)—allow us to observe the formation and diffusion of canons. This process must have been more or less the same for the councils of the other provinces during the same period: (1) first, the president proposed, always in the first person, to the assembly for their approval the measures that seemed called for by the circumstances, his own as well as those suggested by the Fathers. In this way two fundamental principles of conciliar assemblies were respected: a hierarchy of participants and unanimity of decisions. With time, the rigorous protocol of these procedures seems to have gradually diminished, to the point where the president no longer considered the suggestions of the Fathers, after correcting and improving them, but directly solicited the council's approval; still later he set aside even the report and sometimes, assuming unanimous agreement, replied in the first person in the name of all. These minimal changes that occurred over time demonstrate the vitality and spontaneity of the conciliar assemblies, where pastoral care mattered more than legal formality, without, however, ever descending into anarchy. (2) The canonical norm thus voted had to be made known to those it concerned, specifically to all the bishops of the relevant regions, so that they could apply it in their respective churches. The African councils clearly say that the oral tradition played an important role in this (Breviarium Hipponense, ch. 2: Ut ordinatis episcopis vel clericis prius placita concilii conculcentur ab ordinatoribus eorum . . .[concerning the ordination of bishops or clerics, the agreement of the councils should be consulted first in connection with their ordinations . . .]). This was the practice in Africa until the 6th c., exemplified by the local custom of reading, at the start of each council, large extracts from the decisions of previous councils. Normally too, provincial delegates (legati per turmam) returning to their sees took with them a brief account of the conciliar acts, which the primate had to then make known to the local bishops. We do not have the acts of the earliest councils; from some councils we have this or that decision, from others, some canons. From the 5th c. we also have the record of the interventions of some councils. Conciliar records to a certain extent can be considered the work of individual editors, usually someone close to the president.

II. Authority of canons. Conciliar decisions, evidently, were binding on bishops taking part in or represented at the assembly. Their signature to the acts represented their pledge (see Council of Carthage of 345, in fine); from that moment any breaches were liable to punishment. The African councils threatened *excommunication to those who broke their laws; the *Arles synodal letter (314) directs everyone to observe its decisions; the councils of Gangra and Laodicea threaten with excommunication those who do not observe the canons. Despite the absence of a well-delineated theory of representation, the principle of ecclesiastical authority was well observed. From this period also dates a certain solution to the problem of canons disagreeing among themselves, in both doctrinal and disciplinary matters. St. *Augustine proposed to apply two criteria: (1) a hierarchy of councils—a general council takes precedence over a local one; and (2) time—a more recent decision can annul an earlier one (Bapt. 2, 4,5 and 2, 3,4). For its part, the papacy based the authority of a council on its communion with the see of Rome (Gelasius, Ep. 26, 2 and 6). In actual fact, the authority of canons depended on their reception on the part of the Christian communities themselves and their inclusion in canonical collections.

L. Wenger, Canon in den römischen Rechtsquellen und in den Papyri, Vienna-Leipzig 1942; J. Gaudemet, La formation du droit séculier et du droit de l'Église aux IVe-Ve s., Paris 1957, 135-

148; L'église dans l'Empire romain (IV^e-V^e s.), Paris 1958, 451-467; Ch. Munier, La tradition littéraire des canons africains: RecAug 10 (1975) 3-22; J.H. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979; H. Chadwick, Un concetto per la storia dei concili: La ricezione: CristSt 13 (1992) 475-492; E. Chrysos, The Synodical Acts as Literary Products, in D. Papandreu (ed.), L'icône dans la théologie de l'art, Chambéry-Geneva 1990, 85-93; V. Peri, L'ecumenicità di un concilio come processo storico nella vita della chiesa: AHC 20 (1988) 216-244; G. Routhier, La réception d'un concile, Paris 1993; H. Ohme, Kanon ekklesiasticos. Die Bedeutung des altkirchlichen Kanonbegriffes, Berlin 1997.

Ch. Munier

ACTS of the COUNCIL of CAESAREA. Four versions of the acts of this supposed Council of Caesarea, on the date of *Easter, are known: version A, published by Baluze (Nova Collectio conciliorum, Paris 1683, 13-15); version B, of Iohannes Noviomagensis, Bedae opera, II, Cologne 1537 (in appendix, see PL 90, 607-610; 94, 682-684; PG 5, 1367-1370); version C, published by Muratori (Anecdota Latinitatis III, 126-129 [PL 129, 1350-1353]); and version D, by A. Wilmart, Analecta Reginensia, Vatican City 1933, 19-27. The acts were supposed to have been composed ca. mid-6th c. (Cordiolani, Rev. Arch., Bibliot., Mus. 62, 1956, 694-695), or at the beginning of the 6th c. in Africa (Wilmart 20 n. 1), while the latest version was composed in Spain (Jones, 88). These Acts depend on the Tractatus de ratione Paschae, and are also cited by Bede (De tempum ratione 47).

CPL 2307; PL 90, 607; 94, 682; 129, 1350; CPPM III/A 722; B. Krusch, Studien zur christlichmittelalterlichen Chronologie, I, Leipzig 1880, 306-310; A. Cordiolani, Les traités de comput du haut moyen âge: Archivium Latinitatis Medii Aevi 17 (1943) 57-88, nos.. XXIX-XXXII (codices); C.W. Jones, Bedae opera de temporibus, Cambridge, MA 1943, 87-89; V. Loi, Il 25 marzo data pasquale e la cronologia giovannea della passione in età patristica: EphLit 75 (1971) 48-69, in particular 65-68.

A. Di Berardino

ADAM and EVE

I. Patristic exegesis - II. Iconography - III. Apocrypha.

I. Patristic Exegesis. Among OT apocrypha are the following: (1) A Life of Adam and Eve (in Latin), included also in the Apocalypse of Moses (Greek, Armenian and Slavic), where an account by Eve of the temptation and fall has been added. A Georgian Book of Adam and some Coptic fragments go back to this Life. (2) The Struggle of Adam and Eve against Satan (Ethiopian and Arabic): certainly a Christian writing, 2nd c., composed using Jewish material and centered on the burial of Adam on Golgotha. *Origen and a pseudo-Athanasius knew this source. (3) The Cave of Treasures (Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopian, part in Greek), with an account of the creation of Adam and Eve, as in the Struggle, a history of their descendants down to Melchizedek, and a summary of the history of the world from the death of Shem to that of Christ. This work, written in Syriac (4th c.) and clearly of Christian inspiration, like the Struggle, drew on common Jewish sources. (4) The Testament of Adam (Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopian). Some parts of this work, written before the 5th c., go back to the original late Jewish Book of Adam. (5) The eight Books of Adam (Armenian): Christian writings translated from some 4th-c. Greek originals. (6) The Book of the Sons of Adam, known only through the 5th-c. pseudo-Gelasian decree. (7) The Book of Adam or Ghinza (Treasure): sacred book of the Mandaeans. Some of its elements perhaps go back to the beginning of the Christian era, but the book is strongly anti-Christian and anti-ascetic; Adam and Eve do not have an important role in it. (8) The Apocalypse of Adam: *gnostic writing, 2nd or early 3rd c., inserted in the fifth position of codex V (NH V, 5, 64-65), composed along the lines of a Jewish *apocalypse, strongly syncretic, summarizing for novices or non-initiates the doctrine of a sect tracing itself back to Seth (*Sethians). *Epiphanius mentions the "gnostic" authors of an Apocalypse of A. (Pan. 26,8) but does not say whether he has seen this work himself.

The first Christian mentions of Adam and Eve, apart from the apocrypha and NT, are in *Clement of Rome (I Cor. 6,3; 29,2; 50,30 and Ep. Barn.* 6,9; 12,5). In the Dialogue with Trypho, *Justin Martyr writes that Adam was circumcised (19); that his body became the dwelling of a soul permeated by God (40); God's words "Let us make" (Gen 1:26) were addressed to his Word (62); Adam did not reach 1000 years of age (81); the virginal birth of Christ was foretold by Eve's coming from Adam's rib (84); Adam's descendants fell under the power of death (88,94); God did not ask Adam where he was because he did not know (99; also see 100, 103, 124, 132). *Melito of Sardis, following Barnabas, blames Adam alone for the Fall, and paraphrases Gen 1–3 (Pass. 46-71). On the salvation of Adam, see also the Odes of Solomon (14) and the Gospel of Nicodemus. *Tatian seems to be the only one to deny salvation to Adam (111, 17,4). The *Letter to Diognetus, in its conclusion, which is composed of enthusiastic images, says: "Eve is seduced no more but, remaining a virgin, proclaims her faith" (12,8), a confused approximation of Justin (Dial. 100,5), *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 2,32,1) and *Tertullian (Adv. Marc. 2,4; De carne Christi 17). *Theophilus of Antioch, ca. 180, in Ad Aut., presents Adam as an innocent youth in paradise (1,6; 2,24), neither wholly mortal nor wholly immortal (2,24), though he would have become so by his merits (2,27); he recounts in detail the story of the Fall, down to Seth (2,11-13.18-30). *Theodotus the Valentinian offers a well-systemized and structured conception of Adam (Exc. ex Theodoto). Irenaeus of Lyons addresses the gnostic challenge in Adv. haer. (books 3-5) and in his Demonstration of the Apostolic Faith: Adam and Eve are the work of a good God who sees from the beginning the final end of their descendants. Youths, endowed with freedom, seduced but not destroyed, retaught by God through their descendants, made perfect in Christ the new Adam—for Irenaeus, the progenitors signify the universality of the plan of salvation. Tertullian takes this up, explaining in his characteristic Christian Latin all that is taught about Adam and Eve in the Greek Bible, or that is inherited from the *apologists or from commentators on *Scripture such as Justin and Irenaeus. *Cyprian never names Eve; his few allusions to her are never favorable (Pat. 18; Un. 1); Adam, on the other hand, has a real importance for him (Vir. 4; Test. 1,8; Font. 13; Pat. 5 and 11; Ep. 64,5).

Taking up various suggestions from *Clement of Alexandria, Origen offers an extremely coherent interpretation on the subject: his Hom. Gen. 1,12-15 comments historically and allegorically on Gen 1:26 and 2:7 ("We say that the spirit is masculine, and the soul feminine"). In all his homilies on Genesis, Gen 2:7 is cited only in this passage, at 1,13, precisely to exclude that "in the image" could be applied to the "pattern of the body." In the Peri Archōn, Gen 1:26 is invoked to describe humanity's fate from the *eschatological perspective (I,2,6; II, 10,7; 11,3; III, 1,13; 6,1; IV, 4,10). The inbreathing of God in Gen 2:7b, distinguishes the participation of all human beings in the Father from the participation of the saints alone in the *Holy Spirit (I,3,6; see also II,8,1). Adam and Eve, "one flesh" (Gen 2:24), are an allegory of the unity of Christ, Word and flesh (II,6,3). The symbolic aspects of Adam and Eve's sin are well-emphasized (III,2,1; 6,5; IV, 3,1). In reference to Jn 1:1, 4; 4:26-27, 38, see Com. in Jo. In the 4th c., *Athanasius, *Apollinaris and *Hilary give great attention to Adam and Eve in their doctrine of salvation. *Ambrose (De sacram. 6,17 and Hex. Hom. IX) draws inspiration from *Basil. *Gregory of Nyssa, On the Creation of Man, transposes the entire commentary on Gen 1:26; 2:7, etc., into the philosophical language of his time. *Ephrem the Syrian offers a lyrical and mystical paraphrase of the story of Gen (Hymn of Paradise). *Gregory of Nazianzus dedicates a passage of Carm. (2,1,45) to original sin. He also returns to this theme elsewhere: the weak Eve drew Adam into the sin of greed; she aspired to *divinization with youthful haste (on Eve: Or. 18,8; 36,5; 38,12; Carm. 1,1,8, v. 113; 2,11,7, v. 347. On Adam: Or. 2,14, 28, 36, 38, 44; Carm. 1,1,8, v. 107; 2,1,11). *John Chrysostom stresses the mercy of God toward Adam, but looks at Eve only from the perspective of the Fall (Hom. Gen.). The catecheses of *Theodore of Mopsuestia gather many reflections on Adam and Eve. In the 5th c., the figures of Adam and Eve play a part in the many problems raised by the *Pelagian crisis (see bibliography).

DACL I,512-519; DTC 1,368-386; DBS I,86-101: Adam et la Bible; DTC V, 1640-55; EC I, 278-280; LTK³ 1,133-139; TRE 1,414-437. An excellent exposition of the thought of the Fathers, considered in itself, on Eve: DSp IV, 1772-78. Also excellent: Lampe 26-29. On Adam: Enc. Univ. I,218. On various patristic elements: s.v. "Adam": ODC, 1997, 15; EP, ¹⁴1937, Index theologicus: s.v. "Homo primigenius" 768 and the four final headings of "Homo."

Apocrypha: A. Böhlig - P. Labib (eds.), Koptisch-gnostische Apokalypsen aus Codex V von Nag Hammadi, Halle - Wittenberg 1963; G.W. McRae, The Apocalypse of Adam. Nag Hammadi Codices V, 2-5, and VI, with Papyrus Berolinensis 8502, I and 4 (NH St. XI), Leiden 1979; F. Morard, L'Apocalypse d'Adam de Nag Hammadi: un essai d'interprétation in Gnosis and Gnosticism, M. Krause (ed.) (NH St. VIII), Leiden 1977, 35-42; L'Apocalisse di Adamo, Fr. tr. and commentary: Bibl. copte de NH, Québec 1981; Sacchi 1,543-633; Charlesworth 2,249-295.

Origen: H. Crouzel, Bibliographie critique d'Origène, Instr. Patr. VIII, Steenbrugge 1971; reflecting J. Pépin 1954; H. Crouzel 1956; G. Teichtweier 1958; J. Gross - P. Nemeshegyi 1960; M. Rauer 1961; M. Simonetti 1962; M. Harl 1966; H. Rondet 1967.

Augustine: D. Lenfant, Concordantiae Augustinianae, Paris 1556, lists under the headings "Adam," "primus homo," "primi parentes," 153 propositions taken from the works of St. Augustine; T. van Bavel, Répertoire bibliographique de S. Augustin 1950–1960, Instr. Patr. III, Steenbrugge 1963: Composé humain, n. 3052-3066; Péché originel, Concupiscence, n. 3525-3588, 4414-4429; Eve-Marie-Église, n. 4397-4413.

Studies: J.A. de Aldama, Adam, typus futuri (S. Ireneo, Advers. haer. 3,22,3): SE 13 (1962) 266-280; A. Orbe, Cinco exégesis ireneanas de Gen 2,17b adv. haer. V, 23,1-2: Gregorianum 62 (1981) 75-113; G. Anderson, Celibacy or Consummation in the Garden? Reflections on Early Jewish and Christian Interpretations of the Garden of Eden: HTR 82 (1989) 121-148; M.E. Stone, A History of Literature of Adam and Eve, Atlanta 1992; A. Guindon, Pour une éthique du vêtement ou de la nudité?: Laval théologique et philosophique 50 (1994) 555-574; R.J. O'Connel, The "De Genesi contra Manichaeos" and the Origin of the Soul: REAug 39 (1993) 129-141; G.-H. Baudry, La responsabilité d'Ève dans la chute. Analyse d'une tradition: MSR 53 (1996) 293-319; M.E. Stone, Armenian Apocrypha Relating Adam and Eve, Leiden 1996; R.M. Jensen, The Economy of the Trinity at the Creation of Adam and Eve: JECS 7 (1999) 527-546; G. Bonner, La figura de Eva en la teología de Agustín: Augustinus 44 (1999) 51-64; M. Dulaey, Adam et Ève, Eadem, in "Des forêts de symboles." L'initation chrétienne et la Bible (I[er]-VI[e] siècle), Paris 2001, 213-227.

Ch. Kannengiesser

II. Iconography. The cycle of the first parents in early Christian iconography is usually depicted in four scenes: the creation, the Fall, the giving of the symbols of work and the expulsion from Eden. To these is added the episode of the hypogeum of Via Dino Compagni in *Rome (unicum), in which Adam and Eve are shown in an attitude of sorrow with Cain and *Abel, who seem to be moving toward them (Ferrua, pl. 95).

The Creation (Gen 2:7, 21-22). Only seven examples are known: six sculptures and a painting; the latter, from the hypogeum of the Aurelii in Rome, is the oldest (ca. 230–240) and is now destroyed; it is sometimes identified with the scene of the demiurge creating man (Bendinelli, fig. 13; Himmelmann). The most complete scene is that of the so-called dogmatic sarcophagus (Ws 96), ca. 340, which depicts the *Trinity, Eve shown as smaller at the moment of creation and Adam sleeping after the rib has been taken from him.

The Fall (Gen 3:1-13). Among the numerous examples, the oldest is probably that of the baptistery of *Dura Europos (pre-256). Adam and Eve are usually shown beside the tree, with the serpent twisted around the trunk—sometimes the reptile is not shown (e.g., Ws 177, 179, 204,3), probably because it was thought to be superfluous once the temptation had occurred; they cover their nakedness with leaves or with their hands. Though from the beginning the scene was elaborated in terms that would endure, in most cases substantially unchanged (e.g., Rome, Marcellinus and Peter, second half of the 3rd c.: Wp 101), the variety of attitudes of Adam and Eve seems to reflect the desire of authors or patrons, even in the earliest examples, to express the whole episode of the Fall in more detail. Consequently, depending on the act in which Adam and Eve are depicted, one notes, besides the moment after the sin (i.e., Adam and Eve covering themselves) the following: the temptation, the act in which the Fall consisted (Eve picking, holding or eating the fruit; Adam taking the fruit and putting it in his mouth; Adam and Eve seemingly picking the fruit, both with their right arms extended toward the tree), Adam accusing Eve, and Eve perhaps in turn accusing the serpent. Chronologically, in the context of the Fall understood as a completed transgression, Adam accusing Eve is depicted from the first decades of the 3rd c. (Cimitile—with the tree and the serpent: Chierici, fig. 7; Naples, catac. of St. Januarius: Fasola, fig. 15), the act of the Fall at the beginning of the 4th c. (e.g., Ws 190, 1; 19 1,3), Eve blaming the serpent in the first third of the 4th c. (Rome, catac. of Marcellinus and Peter: Kirsch, fig. 4) and the temptation from about the middle of the same century (Rome, hypogeum of Via D. Compagni: Ferrua, pl. 68,2). Other elements begin to appear in some 4th-c. examples, to enrich the basic formulation of the scene: the symbols of work, i.e., the lamb and thorns (Ws 177,2; 92,2; 190), the Logos or the Lord (Ws 186,2; 92,2). At times these elements appear together, as, e.g., in the Vat. collection. It should be noted that some monuments, due to Adam and Eve's attitude, fall outside of the categories of the Fall discussed thus far. On the sarcophagus of Velletri (Ws 4,3) from the early *Constantine period, Eve covers herself with her left hand; Adam is not covered, because his left arm is on Eve's shoulder while he holds her right hand in his (dextrarum iunctio?). In a mid-4th-c. fresco in a hypogeum in the Via Latina, Rome, the tree is shown with Adam and Eve beside it; both cover themselves with their left hands, their right arms "indifferently raised" toward heaven (Ferrua, Un nuovo cubicolo, fig. 9). On a Roman-Ostian table, ca. 400, Adam and Eve cover themselves with their right hands, their left arms raised with open hand. The scene of the Fall has obvious symbolic value: it contained the concept of the felix culpa that made the redemption necessary. This was obviously not understood in the sense of a return of humanity to the material situation of the earthly paradise but of a spiritual rebirth of human nature.

The giving of the symbols of work. This scene is exclusive to sculpture and follows a fixed schema: at the center is the Logos in tunic and pallium, consigning the ears of corn to Adam with his right hand and the sheep to Eve with his left (Ws 40; 218,2). Adam and Eve, having already sinned, cover their nakedness. The scene appears on approx. 30 Roman and provincial manufactured articles, all dated to the first half of the 4th c. In some cases, probably to underscore the significance of the episode, the symbols of work are sculpted at the feet of the Logos as well as in his hands (Ws 93,1). The depictions clearly show the consequences of sin: the sheep and the ears of corn clearly indicate the material condition of humanity after the Fall; the ears, i.e., working the fields, and the sheep, i.e., weaving (the principal occupations of ancient life) indicate the work that human beings are condemned to carry out for their survival on earth. The scene could be considered a visual representation of Gen 3:17.

The expulsion from Eden (Gen 3:23). Somewhat rare in early Christian art, it follows a schema very faithful to the biblical passage: the Lord in tunic and pallium turns toward Adam and Eve, who are about to pass through the gate of paradise. The scene is depicted ca. mid-4th c. at Rome in the hypogeum of Via D. Compagni (Ferrua, pl. 29), on the sarcophagus of Lot (Rep. 188) and, probably, in the so-called chapel of the Exodus at El-Bagawat (Stern, fig. 7). De Bruyne maintains that the episode was also sculpted on the so-called sarcophagus of Balaam (Rep. 176): if true, it would certainly be the oldest example. Adam and Eve also appear on objects in ivory (a late 4th-c. diptych at Florence where Adam appears naked in Eden: Volbach, n. 108), in glass (Fall of Adam and Eve: e.g., Morey, pl. 24,224; 8,47; 33,420), on 6th- and 7th-c. codices (Genesis of Vienna [Fall]: Hartel-Wickoff, pl. 1; Cotton Bible [God presents Eve to Adam, and the temptation]: Lethaby, pl. 69; Ashburnham Pentateuch [Adam and Eve after the expulsion from Eden]: Gebhardt, pl. 3).

Symbolically, the Fall cycle evokes the cause and origin of the redemption, reaffirms the immortality of the human soul and exhorts the faithful to observance of the divine law. This final consideration seems to be included in a particular way in the scene of the giving of the symbols of work and in that of the expulsion, in which the effects of sin are highlighted.

RBK 1,40 ff.; BS 1, 223ff.; LCI 1,41ff.; A. Breymann, Adam und Eva in der Kunst des christlichen Altertums, Wolfenbüttel 1893; L. Troje, ΑΔΑΜ und ΖΩΗ, eine Szene der altchristlichen Kunst in ihrem religionsgeschichtlichen Zusammenhänge: Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akad. der Wissen.: Phil. hist. Klasse 17 (1916) 5ff.; Ws 225ff.; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Basse und Märtyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 320ff.; D. Calcagnini-Carletti, Note su alcune raffigurazioni dei protoparenti a Roma, in Miscellanea S. Cipriani, Brescia 1981; W. Hartel-Wickhoff, Die Wiener Genesis, Prag-Vienna-Leipzig 1895; W.R. Lethaby, The Painted Book of Genesis in the British Museum: The Archaeological Journal (1912) 88ff.; G. Bendinelli, Il monumento sepolcrale degli Aureli al viale Manzoni in Roma, Rome 1923; P. Baur, Les peintures de la chapelle chrétienne de Doura: GAZ B.A. 75 (1933) 65ff.; G.P. Kirsch, Cubicoli dipinti nel cimitero dei Ss. Marcellino e Pietro sulla via Labicana: RivAC 9 (1932) 17ff.; L. De Bruyne, Sarcofago cristiano con nuovi temi iconografici scoperto a S. Sebastiano sulla via Appia: RivAC 16 (1939) 247ff.; G. Chierici, Cimitile, I: RivAC 33 (1957) 99ff.; C.R. Morey, The Gold-Glass Collection of the Vatican Library, with Additional Catalogues of Other Gold-Glass Collections, G. Ferrari (ed.), Vatican City 1959; H. Stern, Les peintures du Mausolée de l'Exode à El-Bagawat: Cahiers Archéol. 11 (1960) 3ff.; A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City 1960; Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage. Ersten Band: Rom und Ostia, ed. F.W. Deichmann, G. Bovini und H. Brandenburg, Wiesbaden 1967; R. Giordani, Considerazioni sul rilievo cristiano del Museo di Velletri: RivAC 48 (1972) 173ff.; A. Ferrua, Un nuovo cubicolo dipinto della via Latina: RPAA 45 (1972-73), 171ff.; N. Himmelmann, Das Hypogäum der Aurelier am viale Manzoni, Ikonographische Beobachtungen, Mainz 1973; U. Fasola, La catacomba di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975; W.F. Volbach, Elfen-beinarbeiten der Spätantike und frühen Mittelalters, Mainz ³1976; A. De Vita, L'ipogeo di Adamo e Eva a Gargaresc, in Atti IX Congr. Intern. Arch. Crist., Vatican City 1978, 199ff.; L. Pani Ermini, Una mensa paleocristiana con bordo istoriato: RIA 1 (1978) 70ff.; P. Testini, Cimitile: L'antichità cristiana, update of the work of E. Berteaux, L'art dans l'Italie Méridionale, Rome 1978, 163ff.; J.-P. Pettorelli, Péché originel ou amour conjugal? Note sur le sens des images d'Adam et d'Ève sur les sarcophages chrétiens de l'antiquité tardive: RechAug 30 (1997) 279-234; D. Calcagnini, Adamo ed Eva (s.v.), in Temi di iconografia Paleocristiana, F. Bisconti (ed.), Rome 2000, 96-101.

D. Calcagnini

III. Apocrypha. The persons and fate of the first parents aroused great interest on the part of both Jews and Christians (*orthodox or *heretics). There are many works on this theme, whose existence is confirmed by the *Talmud, by the OT and NT *apocrypha, by ecclesiastical writers—the *Ps.-Gelasian Decree a number of times cites writings attributed to Adam—and finally by *Byzantine writers (George Syncellus, Cedrenus). Writings on Adam and Eve and their descendants exist in Greek, Latin, Arabic, Armenian, *Coptic, Ethiopian, Georgian, Slavic and other languages. They are listed with an ample literature in the CAVT and are described by Denis (see bibliography). This immense production can be divided into three parts: (1) Life of Adam and Eve and its derivatives; (2) works of the Adam cycle; (3) works on the first descendants of Adam and Eve.

1. The Life of Adam and Eve (LAE), called by Tischendorf the Apocalypse of Moses, was probably written in Hebrew or Aramaic; of the two different existing versions—Greek and Latin—the Greek seems to be closer to the original; the LAE also exists completely in Armenian, Georgian, Rumanian and Slavic, and in fragments in Coptic and Arabic. The author was probably a Hellenic Jew; the work was written in the 1st-2nd c., or perhaps later, in the 2nd-4th c. Some fragments of the work seem to show Christian influence. Particularly helpful for reconstructing the original Life are the following versions of the LAE: Greek (ed. A.D. Bernardi, Paris 1987), Latin (ed. J.M. Mozley, JTS 30 [1929] 121-149), paleo-Slavic and Georgian; fragments of the Coptic version; and the Armenian Paenitentia Adae. The work recounts the life of Adam and Eve after their expulsion from paradise and includes an account of the original sin told by Eve. Both are buried near paradise. Some versions of the LAE include the story of the tree of the holy cross.

CAVT 1; A.M. Denis, Introduction à la littérature religieuse judéo-hellénistique, 1-2, Turnhout 2000, 3-28; the most important translations: French: A. Dupont-Somer - M. Philonenko, Ecrits intertestamentaires, Paris 1987, 1767-1796; Italian: Sacchi, 2, 379-475 (bibl.); Spanish: A. Díez Macho, Apócrifos del Antiguo Testamento, 2, Madrid 1983, 317-352; English: H.E.D. Sparks, The Apocryphal Old Testament, Oxford 1984, 141-167; M.D. Johnson, Charlesworth 2, 249-295 (Eng. tr. with commentary). Synopsis: M.E. Stone, Atlanta 1994.

2. Many whole and fragmentary texts belong to the Adam cycle. Among the most important of these is the Cave of Treasures, written in Syriac by a *Nestorian ca. 500, relying on *Julius Africanus's chronology. We have the Syriac and Arabic versions; there are also versions in Ethiopian, Georgian (Book of Nemrod) and Coptic (fragments). The Cave contains a summary of sacred history: the creation of the world, the sin and death of the first parents (1-6), the patriarchs before the flood (7-19), Abraham and Moses (20-34), the judges and kings (35-41), the return from exile (43-44), and the history of Jesus the Messiah (44-54). The Cave of Treasures profoundly influenced Christian literature and was often inserted into other works: e.g., Syrian chronicles, the Apocalypse of ps.-Methodius and the ps.-Clementine literature; it also influenced the Easterm legend of the three *magi, etc.

Other important fragmentary texts include the Testamentum Adae, fragments preserved in various languages and versions; the Struggle of Adam, in four books, a Christian work attributed to *Epiphanius of Salamis, written in the 5th-6th c. Like the Cave of Treasures, which influenced the work, it is a summary of sacred history until the appearance of the star to the magi. The title comes from the description of the temptations of Adam and Eve described in it. The Decretum* (ps.) Gelasianum mentions a Paenitentia Adae (5,6,2). The Vita Adae is mentioned in the Chronicle of George Syncellus. The Testamentum dei Protoplastarum is cited by *Anastasius the Sinaite. The Liber de filiabus Adae is cited by the Decretum Gelasianum (5,4,7). There are versions in various languages of the Apocalypses of Adam (e.g., of Nag Hammadi, codex V), which were used by the gnostics (e.g., the Sethians or Barbarians spoken of by Epiphanius): the Evangelium Evae (cited by Epiphanius and used by the Sethians) and a group of texts on Adam and Eve in Armenian, Georgian and Slavic, which include the De Adami compositione et nomine, the Historia Adae et nepotorum eius, the De chirographo Adae, the Mors Adae, the Historia paenitentiae Adae et Evae and many other writings on Adam and Eve, a list of which is in the CAVT.

Interesting legends on Adam can also be found in Christian apocrypha: in the Liber Bartholomaei de resurrectione or in the Responsiones Ioannis of Cathar origin. According to the Acts of Pilate (see part III: Descent into Hell), Adam and Eve were saved by Christ when he descended into hell—this scene is often depicted in icons.

CAVT 2-45; A.M. Denis, Introduction à la littérature religieuse judéo-hellénistique, 1-2, Turnhout 2000, 28-54; Caverna - CAVT 11; Syr. CSCO 486/Syr 207; Apocalypse of Adam in NH: in editions of the texts of NH; G.W. MacRae, Apocalypse of Adam: HeythrJourn 6 (1965) 27-35; C.W. Hedrick, The Apocalypse of Adam, Chicago 1980.

3. In books on the first descendants of Adam, the authors were especially interested in two figures, Abel and Seth. Extant are the Vita Abel, written by *Symmachus (Syriac); the Historia occissionis Abel (Fr. Copt.); the Historia Abel et Cain, filiorum Adae (Armenian and Georgian); and two Armenian works on Abel (CAVT 46-50). *Hippolytus (Refutatio 5,19-22) cites a Paraphrasis di Set used by the Sethians; writings about Seth are in the writings of Nag Hammadi (Secundus Tractatus Magni Seth and Tres columnae Seth [both in codex VII] and the Intelligentia Noreae uxoris Seth [codex IX]). Also the Prophetia Seth (Epiphanius, Haer. 26,8,1); the Liber Seth in Syriac, now lost; the Evangelium Seth in Armenian and Georgian, and a Liber Seth in Slavic; the Liber apocryphus nomine Seth, Mons Victorialis, a Latin abbreviation of which is in hom. 2 of Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum (5th c.); in Syriac the Tale of the Magi (4th c.), which among other things recounts the story of the magi, the appearance of the star over Victorious Mountain (in which was the Cave of Treasures) and the *baptism of the magi (CAVT 51-59). Legends about Adam were very popular in the various Christian cultures: Armenian, Irish, Slavic, Ethiopian (Miracles of G.), in Jewish culture and also in Islamic culture: the Qur'an frequently mentions Adam.

CAVT 1-59 (bibl.); J.B. Frey, DBS 1, 1928, 101-134; BS 1, 1961, 201-226; LCIK 1, 41-70; 5, 30-31; M.E. Stone, A History of Literature of Adam and Eve, Atlanta 1992; A.M. Denis, Introduction à la littérature religieuse judéohellénistique, 1-2, Turnhout 2000, 3-58; G.A. Anderson - M.E. Stone, Atlanta 1994 (synopsis LAE); Adam in the legends of the Jews: L. Ginsberg, Le leggende degli Ebrei, 1, Milan 1995, 61-108 (bibliography); in Irish legends: M. MacNamara, The Apocrypha in the Irish Church, Dublin 1975, 14-24; in Armenian legends: M.E. Stone, Armenian Apocrypha Relating Adam and Eve, Leiden 1996.

M. Starowieyski

ADAMANTIUS. Protagonist of the Greek work in 5 books Dialogue on the True Faith in God, beginning with the Philokalia considered to be *Origen's and translated from the Latin by *Rufinus with this attribution. The Dialogue has the character of a compilation, containing large borrowings from the works of *Methodius of Olympia. Rufinus's translation is somewhat different from the Greek text that has reached us and includes additions sounding like Origen in both tone and content. In the ongoing uncertainty on the nature and date of the original text, whether ca. 300 or after *Constantine, the only settled fact seems to be that the Dialogue is a living text, adapted to needs in the course of the 4th c. in both a pro- and anti-Origen sense. The question is further complicated by the fact that *Eusebius of Caesarea, in Preparation for the Gospel, cites a long passage from Methodius's On Free Will, which is reported with some variation in the Dialogue, attributing it however to a work On Matter by a mysterious Maximus who lived under *Septimius Severus, thus posing the problem of a possible source prior to Methodius himself. The Dialogue opposes the orthodox Adamantius to two *Marcionites, a follower of *Bardesanes and two *Valentinians. In the end the pagan Eutropius, arbiter of the dispute, gives the victory to Adamantius and converts to the Catholic faith. The Dialogue is an important source for the history of *gnosticism.

PG 11, 1713-1884; W.H. van de Sande Bakhuyzen: GCS 4 (1901); V. Buchheit, Tyranni Rufini librorum Adamantii Origenis adversus haereticos interpretatio, München 1966: R.A. Pretty, Dialogue on the True Faith in God. De recta in Deum fide, tr. with commentary by R.A. Pretty, ed. by G.W. Trompf, Leuven 1997.

E. Prinzivalli

ADAMITAE (Adamiani). *Heretical sect whose members claimed to be the true *Adam and Eve, and their church the true paradise. Likened to moles, they met naked in carefully heated rooms (Epiphanius, Haer. 52). A hypothesis has been advanced identifying them with a group of *Carpocratians mentioned by *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. III,2) that practiced community of goods and sexual promiscuity, but *Augustine says (Haer. 31) they renounced marriage, holding that it would not have existed if their progenitors had not sinned and that Adam did not unite with Eve either before or after the expulsion from paradise.

DTC 1,391; L. Ginzburg, Adamiti, nuovi adamiti nella morale del Seicento francese: ASE 13/2 (1996) 583-596.

F. Cocchini

ADAMNAN (or Adomnán) (d. 704). Saint (feast 23 Sept.); born Drumhone, Ireland, ca. 624, abbot of Iona in Scotland after 679. A relative of St. *Columbanus, the founder, whose biography he wrote, drawing on both his personal memories and those of others (PL 88; ed. A.O. Anderson - M.O. Anderson, London 1961). Imposed the Roman system of dating Easter on the community. Between 679–688 he also wrote three books De locis sanctis (CCL 175-234), based on the recollections of a pilgrim—the Gallic bishop Arculf, who had been in the East and in Rome—and other sources (*Jerome, *Sulpicius Severus, *Juvencus): the work was a source for *Bede, whose De locis sanctis is a compilation of Adamnan's. The canons published by L. Bieler (The Irish Penitentials, Dublin 1963) are of doubtful authenticity. Adamnan could be the author of the scholia to Virgil's Eclogues (ca. 700?). Adamnan enjoyed great prestige in Ireland and with king Alfrid of Northumbria. Besides supporting prisoners and women, he helped bring the *Celtic church closer to Roman usage, to which he was converted in 688 by Ceolfrith.

CPL 1134; 2332; P. Grosjean, Les noms d'Adomnán et de Bréndán: AB 78 (1960) 375-381; Id., Pour la date de fondation d'Iona et celle de la mort de S. Colum Cille: AB 78 (1960) 381-390; J.M. Picard, The Purpose of Adomnán's Vita Columbae: Peritia 1 (1982) 160-177; Id., Bede, Adomnán, and the Writing of History: Peritia 3 (1984) 50-70; Id., The Bible used by Adomnán, in Irland und die Christenheit. Bibelstudien und Mission, eds. P. Ní Chatháin - M. Richter, Stuttgart 1987, 246-257; J. MacQueen, The Saint as Seer: Adomnan's Account of Columba, in The Seer in Celtic and Other Traditions, ed. H.E. Davidson, Edinburgh 1989, 37-51; A.O. Anderson - M.O. Anderson, ed. and tr., Adomnan's Life of Columba, 2nd ed. rev. Oxford 1991; T. O'Loughlin, The Exegetical Purpose of Adomnán's De Locis Sanctis: CMCS 24 (1992) 37-53; T. O'Laughlin, Celtic Theology: Humanity, World and God in Early Irish Writings, London-New York 2000, ch. 4.

J. Gribomont

ADDAI (or Addaeus). Supposed to have been one of the 72 disciples of the Lord. According to a Syriac tradition, Addai was sent by *Jude Thaddaeus or *Thomas to evangelize the city of Edessa. Native of Paneas (Caesarea Philippi). For some scholars, following the Greek and Latin tradition, Addai (or Addaeus) could indicate the apostle Jude Thaddaeus himself, one of the Twelve, supposed to have been sent as a missionary to *Edessa at the request of Jesus, who had received a letter from king *Abgar V. The crux of the story, certainly apocryphal, is in the narration of *Eusebius (HE I, 13), who reports the correspondence between Jesus and king Abgar V; both the apocryphal Acts of Thaddaeus and the Doc- trine of Addai (or Addaeus) are drawn from Eusebius's account. The protagonist of the narration is Addai or Thaddaeus (according to Eusebius), often identified with the apostle Jude Thomas.

The Doctrine of Addai came to light thanks to the publication of a *Syriac manuscript (1864 Cureton and 1876 Philips) similar to the one described by Eusebius, whose author is supposed to have been Labubna, son of Sennak. Differences with the Eusebian narration, which includes only the correspondence and some of the apostle's deeds, are obvious: the Lord does not respond to the letter in writing but orally, and Annanias, Abgar's messenger, is considered the actual author of the text, and brings with him a self-portrait of Jesus. The missionary sent was not Thaddaeus but Addai. The second part of the Doctrine treats of Addai the missionary (or Addai, one of the 72) at Edessa: consecration of priests, baptisms, miracles, speeches, establishing Christian worship, building churches, etc. Also included is the story of the discovery of the true cross by Protonice, mother of the emperor *Claudius (a scene that we find in the history of St. *Helena), whose presence serves to chastise the Jews for putting Christ to death. The account ends with the death of Addai and his succession: his disciple Aggai is killed by the son of Abgar, who remained an unbeliever; succeeding him was *Palut, ordained by *Serapion of Antioch, noteworthy in that it connects the church of Edessa with that of Rome. The text also reports that Serapion was ordained by *Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome; the Doctrine in this way intends to underscore the legitimate succession of the church of Edessa. The document was certainly written after 384, i.e., after the *Pilgrimage of Egeria, which reports the existence of the letters but not of the icon of the Lord—thus late 4th to early 5th c. This notwithstanding, many scholars agree in affirming the antiquity of the tradition of the evangelization of Edessa, back even to apostolic times; others date it late 2nd c. The icon is important in the Byzantine tradition of the Doctrine: the transfer of the image of Edessa is still celebrated on 16 August. The Doctrine has reached us in Syriac, Armenian, Greek, Latin, Slavic, Coptic and Arabic.

The Acts of Thaddaeus (one of the Twelve), mentioned above, are a Greek elaboration of the Doctrine, with a different organization of the material. Addai is commemorated by the Syriac church, and even today Jude Thaddaeus is honored on 14 May and 18 October. The Armenians also preserve Addai's memory, claiming that he was martyred by Sanatruk, Abgar's nephew.

Another source in the Christian tradition referring to the name of Addai is the *eucharistic *anaphora of the apostles Addai and Mari. One of the three Syro-Eastern anaphorae of the Chaldean church, it is also used by *Nestorians and *Malabarese. Composed in Syriac, it stands out among this type of liturgical document because it lacks the account of the institution, unique among anaphorae; it is also the oldest eucharistic prayer in use among the Eastern churches. According to some scholars it can be dated to the 3rd c. and is closely related to the anaphora of St. Peter the Apostle III, also from this period; the original form is nonetheless difficult to determine because the Syriac manuscripts that have reached us are very late. It is also distingushed by the pronounced presence of traces of the Hebrew liturgy; it is in fact modeled on some easily identifiable Jewish blessings.

Doctrine of Addai: CANT, n. 89; BHO 9,24, 1141; W. Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents Relative to the Earliest Establishment of Christianity in Edessa and the Neighbouring Countries, from the Year After our Lord's Ascension to the Beginning of the Fourth Century, London 1864; G. Philips, The Doctrine of Addai the Apostle, Now First Edited in a Complete Form in the Original Syriac with an English Translation and Notes, London 1876; W. Bauer, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ält. Christentum, Tübingen 1934, 6-48; M. Erbetta, Gli Apocrifi del NT, Casale Monferrato 1975, 79-82; J. Tixeront, Les origines de l'Église d'Edesse et la légende d'Abgar, Paris 1988; A. Desreumaux, Histoire du roi Abgar et de Jésus, Turnhout 1993; A. Desreumaux, Les titres des oevres apocryphes chrètiennes et leurs corpus: le cas de la doctrine d'Addai syriaque, in La formation des canons scripturaires, Paris 1993; L. Moraldi, Gli Apocrifi del NT, Casale Monferrato 1994, 719-722; J. González, La leyenda del Rey Abgar y Jesús, orígenes del Cristianismo en Edesa, Madrid 1995; C. and F. Jullien, Les Actes de Mar Mari. L'apôtre de la Mésopotamie, Turnhout 2001.

The Acts of Thaddaeus: CANT, n. 229; BHG 1702-1703; C. Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Leipzig 1851, 261-265; R.A. Lipsius, Acta Apostolorum Apocryphorum I., Leipzig 1891 (Hildesheim) 273-283; M. Erbetta, Gli Apocrifi del NT, Casale Monferrato 1975, II, 575-578; W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen II, Tübingen 1989, 436-437.

Liturgy: (Syriac text and Latin version) Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Church (ed.), "Anaphora prima nimirum Anaphora beatorum Apostolorum Mar Addau et Mar Mari, Doctorum Orientis," in Liturgia Siro Malabarese, Rome 1955; W. Macomber, The Oldest Known Text of the Anaphora of the Apostles Addai and Mari: OCP 32 (1966) 335-371; Lat. tr. in B. Botte: OCP 15 (1949) 261-263; Fr. tr. in B. Botte: OrSyr 10 (1965) 91-93; A. Gelston, The Eucharistic Prayer of Addai and Mari, Oxford 1992, 48-63; Ital. tr. in Segno di Unità, Magnano 1996, 302-306.

J.F. Rubio Navarro

ADEODATUS (372-389/391). Natural son of *Augustine and his unnamed companion of 14 years. Born at *Carthage in 372 (Conf. 4,2,2), Adeodatus accompanied his parents to *Thagaste, Carthage,

*Rome and *Milan. When his mother returned to *Africa, he stayed with his father and his grandmother *Monica (Conf. 6,15,25). After his father's conversion, he went with him to Cassiciacum and, though very young, took part with him in philosophical disputes (De b. vita 6). He was baptized with his father by *Ambrose on 24-25 April 387 (Conf. 9,6,14) and was present at the death of Monica at Ostia Tiberina (Conf. 9,12,29.31). Returning to Africa, at Thagaste he joined with those who followed Augustine in the experience of common life (Possidio, Vita di S. Ag. 3,1-2). He was his father's interlocutor there in the dialogue De magistro; the thoughts expressed therein are his at age 16. He died between 389–391 (before his father became a priest). Gifted with great goodness and extraordinary intelligence, he was a source of admiration and even astonishment for Augustine, who had had even more extraordinary proofs of his gifts: horrori mihi erat illud ingenium (Conf. 9,6,14).

BA 6,9-40; 13,667-669; PCBE 1, 32-34; G. Madec, Adeodatus: AugL 1,87-90; W.H.C. Frend, The Family of Augustine: A Microcosm of Religious Change in North Africa, in Atti del Congresso internazionale su s. Agostino 1986, Rome 1987, 135-151.

A. Trapè

ADEODATUS I (or Deusdedit), pope (615-618). Succeeded *Boniface IV (608–615) on 19 October 615, five months after the death of his predecessor. The reason for the long vacancy was the usual one: the necessity, and at times the difficulty, of obtaining imperial approval. A native of Rome, Adeodatus guided the city and the church in still-difficult times, especially for Italy, which was dominated by the *Lombards and afflicted by famines. The LP gives only two items about him: he transferred some goods from monks to the secular clergy and authorized priests to celebrate two Masses in two different churches (or maybe two Masses per day in the same church: the text is not clear). Adeodatus was the first pope to allow embellishment of his own funeral. He died 8 November 618 and was buried in the basilica of St. Peter.

Jaffé I, Leipzig 1885, 222; LP I, 319-320; AASS, Novembris, III, Brussels 1910, 832-834; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, 1933, 517-518; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 300; BS I, 250-251 (I. Daniele); J.N.D. Kelly, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes, Oxford-New York 1986, 69; LTK[3] 3,115-116 (G. Jenal); EPapi I, (Deusdedit) 582-583 (G. Arnaldi).

M. Spinelli

ADEODATUS II, pope (672–676). Native of Rome, a monk in the monastery of St. Erasmus on the Caelian Hill. He succeeded *Vitalian I and was consecrated on 11 April 672. Little is known of his pontificate. The general political climate of those years was characterized by bloody internal fights at *Byzantium and a constant expansion of the Arabs in Asia and Africa. Adeodatus continued to combat *monothelitism. He also granted the privilege of exemption to the monasteries of St. *Martin of Tours and St. Peter at *Canterbury.

AASS, Iunii, Antwerp 1709, 155; Jaffé I, 237; LP I, 364-365; J. Harttung, Diplomatisch-historische Forschungen, Gotha 1879, 120-121; F. Camombreco, Il monastero di S. Erasmo sul Monte Celio: Archivio storico della R. Società di Storia Patria 28 (1905) 272-276; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 364-365; J.N.D. Kelly, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes, Oxford-New York 1986, 76-7; LTK[3] 1,156 (B. Kriegbaum); EPapi I, 609-610 (G. Arnaldi).

M. Spinelli

ADIABENE. Region between the upper and lower Zab, east of the Tigris River, conquered by *Trajan in 116, becoming a Roman province with the name Assyria, but soon reconquered by the Persians. In the 1st c. it was also made a Jewish kingdom under the rule of Queen Helena (d. 50), a convert to Judaism (Flavius Josephus, Ant. 20,2-5) whose sons Monobazus II and Izates II were buried at Jerusalem. There is no precise record of the introduction of Christianity into the region (a large part of which, according to the sources, had embraced Judaism), attributed to St. Mari, disciple of Addai. The latter, according to the *Chronicle of Arbela (a forgery written in 1907), was supposed to have been the first evangelizer: the document, however, has been shown to be unreliable (see P. Peeters, Les Passionaires d'Adiabène, 261-304, and I. Ortiz de Urbina, Cronaca di Arbela, 5-32). The Jewish presence facilitated the spread of Christianity. In any event, at the time of the persecutions of Shapur II (309–379) most of the inhabitants were Christian, as *Sozomen attests (HE 2,12,4: PG 67, 965). According to Assyrian tradition the first bishop was Pkidha (104–114), consecrated by Mari, and succeeded by Semsoun (120–123), Isaac (135–148) and others. In the 2nd c. *Tatian (d. ca. 180) came from Assyria and was a disciple of *Justin Martyr at Rome. The date of the first bishop at *Arbela (modern Irbil) is unknown, though at that time the bishop resided nearby at Hazza. With Bishop Papa (310–317), Arbela was made *metropolitan see of the country and obtained the fifth position after the principal see of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, capital of the *Sassanid kingdom. Bishop John ([Iohannon] d. 343) was martyred, as was his successor Abraham (d. 345): the region, theater of many battles—as late as 446 a great many Christians of the Adiabene were martyred—also had flourishing *Nestorian and *Jacobite communities, which built numerous convents. A certain Daniel participated at the synods of 410 and 424. An unnamed bishop of Adiabene participated at *Acacius's synod in 486, about the time when the region embraced monophysitism.

The arrival of the Arabs (mid-7th c.) marked the period of the greatest development of the region, especially artistically (the sources record the founding of many church buildings, especially convents, in the 7th and 8th c.), through the political shrewdness of the metropolitan *Iso'yahb III: at that time Adiabene enjoyed a relative tranquility, until the transfer of the metropolitan see to Mosul (826/827) under metropolitan *Isho'bar Nun (ca. 823–829). The diocese of Arbela had bishops until the 16th c., but citations of Adiabene's capital and of the region itself, from then on generally known as Assyria, would become increasingly rare: among the most important cities were Arbela (the capital), Hadita and Hazza, the latter two also episcopal sees. Of the numerous church buildings mentioned in the sources, especially monasteries, worth noting are the convents of Mar Yonan the Slave, Margana (diocese of Haditha, 8th c.) and Bet Qoqa (7th c.), whose site has probably been identified near the village of Mulla Omar.

P. Peeters, Les passionaires d'Adiabène: AB 43 (1925) 261-304; H. Charles, Le Christianisme des Arabes nomades sur le Limes, Paris 1936; I. Ortiz de Urbina, Intorno al valore storico della Cronaca di Arbela: OCP 12 (1936) 5-32; EC 1,305-306; J.M. Fiey, Assyrie Chrétienne, Beirut 1965, 37-218; Id., Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO, Subsidia 36, Louvain 1970; J. Neusner, The Conversion of Adiabene to Christianity: Numen 12 (1966) 144-150; M.-L. Chaumont, La christianisation de l'Empire iranien: des origines aux grandes persécutions du IV[e] siècle, Lovanii 1988; J.M. Fiey, Pour un Oriens Christianus Novus, Beirut 1993; N. Garsoïan, L'église armenienne et le grand schisme d'Orient, Lovanii 1999; S.H. Moffett, A History of Christianity in Asia, I, New York [2]2001, 70-80; R.L. Mullen, The Expansion of Christianity: A Gazetter of Its First Three Centuries, Leiden-Boston 2004, 60ff.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ADIMANTUS the Manichean (3rd c.). One of *Mani's three closest disciples. In Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum (II,xii,41) *Augustine of Hippo reports that he was also called Addas, the name of a disciple of Mani known to us from the *Acts of Archelaus, which identifies him as the apostle of *Manicheism to *Scythia. Both this and a Manichean writing in Middle Persian say that Addas (or Addai) was celebrated for his writings and that he was sent by Mani to carry out missionary work (in Egypt, according to the latter source). A Chinese text refers to him as Ato. According to original texts in Coptic and Iranian, he reached the Tigris (Al Madail) and the Nile (Alexandria). His book Against Moses and the Other Prophets spurred Augustine to write Contra Adimantum Manichaei discipulum (ca. 394), in which he defended the OT and criticized Manichean biblical interpretation. *Faustus of Milevis identifies Adimantus as the most important Manichean teacher after Mani himself: solo nobis post patrem nostrum Manichaeum studendo (the only teacher we have after our father Mani worthy of our attention—Augustine, Contra Faustum I,2); Faustus sic miratur Adimantum ut ei solum praeferat Manichaeum (Faustus paises Adimantus so much that only Mani is preferred to him—ibid., VI,6). This would indicate that Manichei discipulum is to be taken literally: Adimantus was one of Mani's twelve disciples.

CPL 319; PL 42, 129-172; CSEL 25/1, 115-190; BA 17, 196-375; P. Alfaric, Les écritures manichéennes, II, Paris 1919, 104-106, 165; F. Châtillon, Adimantus Manichaei discipulus, Revue du Moyen Age Latin 10 (1954) 191-203; F. Decret, Aspects du manichéisme dans l'Afrique romaine: Les controverses de Fortunatus, Faustus et Felix avec saint Augustin, Paris 1970, 13, 68-69, 97-98; Idem, L'Afrique manichéenne (IV[e]-V[e] siècles): Étude historique et doctrinale, Paris 1978, I, 93-105, II, 69-70; H.J.W. Drijvers, Addai und Mani: Christentum und Manichäismus im dritten Jahrhundert in Syrien, in R. Lavenant (ed.), III[o] Symposium Syriacum 1980, Orientalia Christiana Analecta, 221, Rome 1983, 171-185; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Addas-Adimantus unus ex discupulis Manichaei: For the History of Manichaeism in the West, in R.E. Emmerick - W. Sundermann - P. Zieme (eds.), Studia Manichaica, Berlin-Brandenburgische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Berichte und Abhandlungen, Sonderband 4, Berlin 2000, 546-559.

J. Kevin Coyle

ADOPTIONISTS. Modern scholars use this name to refer to the *monarchians, who considered Christ to be a mere man, adopted as the Son of God for his merits (the Lat. adoptiani is very late). *Theodotus of Byzantium ("the Tanner") taught this doctrine at Rome in the late 2nd c. He claimed that Jesus was a man born of the Virgin by the will of the Father and lived as other men, though more piously, such that at the baptism in the Jordan the dove descended on him to signify the divine spirit given him, called "the higher Christ." Only from this point did Jesus Christ begin to work miracles. Some adoptionists placed the deification of Jesus at this moment, others after the resurrection. They based their doctrine scripturally on gospel passages (and biblical passages generally) from which it could be concluded that Jesus was only a man: Dt 18:15; Mt 12:31; Jn 8:40. A student of Theodotus who was also named Theodotus and from Byzantium, called "the Banker," accentuated the merely human character of Jesus, asserting that *Melchizedek was a divine power greater than Christ, who was made in the former's image based on Heb 5:6. Adoptionism was taken up again at Rome between 230–250 by *Artemon, who seems not to have innovated with respect to Theodotus; rather, he emphasized the traditional character of his teaching, claiming that it went back to the apostles and was held at Rome until *Victor's pontificate but that *Zephyrinus, at the beginning of the 3rd c., corrupted the truth with innovations. More developed forms of adoptionism were proposed by *Paul of Samosata (ca. 260–270), to whom *Nestorius was linked, and by *Photinus of Sirmium (mid-4th c.). *Marcellus of Ancyra, who acted as trait d'union between Paul and Photinus, can also basically be considered an adoptionist. The ancients considered adoptionism to be a Jewish-type heresy and associated it with *Ebionitism, in that the adoptionists, like the Jews, did not recognize the divine character of Christ, reducing him to a mere man.

A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig 1884, 609-615; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London 1958, 115-119, 158-160; J.C. Cavadini, The Last Christology of the West: Adoptionism in Spain and Gaul 785-820, Philadelphia 1993; G. O'Collins, Christology: A Biblical, Historical and Systematic Study of Jesus Christ, Oxford 1995.

M. Simonetti

ADULTERY. With Jews, as with Greco-Romans, the concept of adultery was not reciprocal: a married man who had relations with an unmarried woman was not an "adulterer" (μοιχός), since his wife had no rights over him: from the point of view of Roman law, such acts were classified at most as stuprum (φθορά), if carried out with an honest woman, or as fornicatio (πορνεία), not punishable by law, if with a prostitute; any extramarital relations on the part of a married woman, however, was adultery, because the woman was the husband's property.

1 Cor 7:3-4, however, attributing to each spouse the same right over the body of the other, began a true and proper revolution, with the consequence of establishing equality with respect to adultery. The Fathers continually stress Paul's thought on this matter, insisting firmly that what is not permitted to the woman is not permitted to the man: they do not speak of this prohibition regarding women, because it was also valid outside of Christianity (i.e., in the culture generally). Two important testimonies, considered "exceptions" (*Basil the Great, Canonical Letters, and *Ambrosiaster, Comm. 1 Cor), nonetheless show the futility with which the Fathers opposed the inveterate prejudices of the day and with what little effect they diffused Christianity's revolutionary ideas: the discriminatory mentality on adultery changed only very slowly. This change is probably evident in the "modern" variant of Mt 19:9, as opposed to the more archaic conception expressed in Mt 5:32. It seems the Fathers used another term, the Latinized form of the Greek μοιχεία, when the act to be judged did not fall in the usual category of adulterium: the words moechia and moechus are thus used, which seemed less traditional and could therefore serve as comprehensive terms, capable of indicating the behavior of both spouses.

With respect to ecclesial punishments, it seems that some texts must be interpreted in the sense that ecclesial authorites would punish equally both husbands and wives who had sexual relations outside of marriage (Concilio di Elvira 7; Ambrose, De Abraham 1,4,25; 1,7,59; Augustine, Quaest. Hept. 2, Quaest. Ex. 71); other passages still show an unequal conception of adultery (Ambrosiaster; Basil, Letter 199,21; 199,46; 199,48 and 217,77). Punishment was exclusion from communion for a rather lengthy period (in Basil, Letter 217,58, for 15 years; in the Council of Elvira 69, for 5 years; at the Council of Ancyra 20, for 7 years), during which time one reentered the community gradually, until the end of the prescribed time. The reason for the penitence was kept hidden, to avoid the risk of retaliation (Basil, Letter 199,34), given that from the early 4th c. the ancient punishment for adultery—banishment—was elevated to capital punishment (see CTh 9,40,1). When the Fathers began to put other sexual crimes at the same level of adultery—such as *incest (Basil, Letter 217,68), bestiality (ibid., 217,63), homosexuality (ibid., 217,62) and the violation of a vow of *virginity (ibid., 217,60; see Council of the Veneto 4)—they in effect seemed to equate them with adultery.

H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce, Paris 1971; A. Arjava, Women and Law in Late Antiquity, Oxford 1996.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

AENEAS of Gaza (d. after 518). Born at *Gaza of a fairly high-ranking family (Procopius of Gaza, Ep. 82 in Hercher, Epistol. Graeci 564, 15-16). It is not possible to establish his exact date of birth, which is probably ca. 450, since he composed his main work, Theophrastus, shortly after 484, when he must have already reached full maturity (in Theophr. 66, 11-67,16 Colonna, PG 85, 1000 A2-1001 B3, the persecution of the orthodox by the Vandal king *Huneric in 484 is presented as a very recent event, see also M.E. Colonna, Teofrasto VIII); and in his Life of Severus, *Zacharias Scholasticus says that he bore a letter to Zenodorus from Aeneas, the "great and learned sophist" (PO II, 90), between 488–491. Aeneas studied at Alexandria, devoting himself especially to the study and practice of rhetoric. He also pursued philosophical studies extensively at the school of the *Neoplatonist *Hierocles (PG 85, 873 A5-8, 876 A4-5). Aeneas developed a friendship with Sopater—the famous rhetor whose school *Severus of Antioch and *Zacharias Scholasticus frequented (Ep. 9 and 16; Vita Sev. PO II, 12)—and with *Serapion, the deacon involved in the religious troubles which broke out following the publication of the emperor Zeno's Henoticon (see Zach. Schol. Hist. eccl. VI, 1, p. 86, 24; VI, 4 p. 91,1 Ahrens - Krüger). Back in Gaza, he dedicated himself to teaching (Ep. 13, p. 9,7-8; Ep. 16, p. 11,12-14); he continued to hold discourses in the public theater, according to the custom of the Gazan sophists (Ep. 16, p. 11,14-15). He was also an expert in law. *Procopius, in Ep. 82 (in Hercher, Epistol. Gr. 564-565), describes him as an upright jurist who, appointed superintendent of courts and superprefect by some cities, became an object of the governors' contempt because it was not his practice to lavish them with gifts; he would then lose his position. That Aeneas was in fact a high magistrate and a superprefect seems evident from two letters, Ep. 3, in which he enjoins the priest Alphius not to advance claims over a piece of land, and Ep. 24, in which he orders the magistrate Marcian to deal with the banditry that infested the city's surroundings.

Zacharias Scholasticus speaks of Aeneas with great respect and in the Life of Isaiah (CSCO Scriptores Syri 3.25, p. 8,21-29 of the Latin version of E.W. Brooks) says that Aeneas, "sophist of the city of Gaza, a very Christian man, extremely well educated and illustrious in every field of wisdom," would consult Isaiah on certain dubious phrases in *Plato, *Aristotle and *Plotinus; Isaiah would explain to him their thought, pointing out their errors and confirming the truth of Christian teaching. He was in contact with other famous sophists, e.g., Dionysius of Antioch and Zonaeus. But his most important friends were Procopius of Gaza and his brother Zacharias, better known as Zacharias Scholasticus or Zacharias of Mytilene. He died shortly after 518, the year in which the Life of Severus was written: in this work Zacharias Scholasticus does not speak of Aeneas in the customary way of speaking of persons already dead (on all this biographical information, see esp. Legier, 349-369).

A collection of 25 letters to students and acquaintances and the dialogue Theophrastus are his only surviving works. The Epistles are not only sources of precious information on Aeneas's person and activity but also an important testimony regarding Late Antique and Byzantine rhetoric. Richly interwoven with reminiscences of earlier authors (see the apparatus fontium of the edition ed. by M.E. Colonna) is his main work, Theophrastus, a dialogue that Aeneas imagines took place at Alexandria shortly after the persecution (484) of orthodox Christians ordered by the Vandal king Huneric (66,1-67, 16 Colonna, PG 85,1000 A2-1001 B3). The parties to the dialogue are Aegyptus, Theophrastus and Euxitheos. While Aegyptus is a dull and secondary figure who speaks only at the beginning and then disappears almost entirely, Euxitheos is the dialogue's true protagonist, Aeneas's faithful spokesman: to him are reserved the refutation of philosophical doctrines not consonant with the truth of the Christian faith and the exposition and defense of doctrines held to be perfectly "orthodox." To Theophrastus, however, presented at the beginning as a teacher to whom Euxitheos has turned under the guise of a student desirous to learn, is assigned the enunciation of certain philosophical doctrines and the formulation of objections regarding the content of the Christian faith. The procedure followed in Theophrastus thus closely follows that of *Gregory of Nyssa's De anima et resurrectione. The main themes are (1) refutation of the two Platonic doctrines of the preexistence of the soul and *metempsychosis; (2) apparent evils and true happiness, providence and the reasons for suffering; (3) reasons for the usefulness of the various stages in the death of human beings; (4) the immortality of human souls; (5) the limited, noninfinite number of the latter; (6) the creatio ex nihilo, closely connected with the creation of matter; (7) the origin of the world in time, its consummation and rebirth in a perfect state; (8) the soul's journey in only one human body, the only one destined to rise and enjoy immortality; (9) the denial of the resurrection of animals; (10) the existence of some cases of resurrection already in this life, proof of the future resurrection (see also M.E. Colonna, introd. XIV n. 1 and the pinax on p. 1 of his edition).

To S. Sikorski belongs the merit of having shown, in a careful investigation using precise textual comparisons (almost always synoptic), the ample utilization in the Theophrastus of philosophical and patristic authors, in particular Plato, Plotinus and Gregory of Nyssa. The most profound and exhaustive research, however, on the close relation between Aeneas and the Platonic tradition on basic questions such as the idea of God, the Trinity, the creation of the world ex nihilo, dependent on the free divine will and occurring at a specific moment, and the world's future preservation is that of M. Wacht, who also examines both Aeneas's position within the patristic tradition with regard to criticism of the Neoplatonic theory of creatio ab aeterno and his views on the rebirth of the world—in itself corruptible—after its dissolution. Wacht highlights not only the concordances but also the discrepancies between Neoplatonic theology and cosmology on the one hand and Aeneas's theories on the other; Wacht also brings out the most specifically Christian traits of Aeneas's conception of God (48-50, 55-62), specifying the extent of Aeneas's orthodoxy. Regarding the latter, Wacht's thesis seems unacceptable that Aeneas had not understood the clear *Nicene distinction between gennēma and poiēma, since he compares the origin of the Son and the *Holy Spirit to the creation of the intelligible essences and the subsequent creation of the sensible world, though affirming the full consubstantiality of the second and third persons (p. 96): in Theophrastus 44,10 Colonna (PG 85, 960 A10) Aeneas uses precisely the term gennēma.

Theophrastus: CPG 7450; PG 85, 872-1004; Jo. Fr. Boissonade, Aeneas Gazaeus et Zacharias Mitylenaeus. De immortalitate animae et De mundi consummatione. Ad codices recensuit Barthii Taurini Ducaei, notas addidit Jo. Fr. Boissonade, Paris 1836, 1-78 (with commentary, 155-316); M.E. Colonna, Enea di Gaza. Teofrasto, Naples 1958, 1-68 (with It. tr. and commentary, 69-114, 115-138; on pp. XXXIX-XL is a list of the oldest editions).

Epistles: CPG 7451; R. Hercher, Epistolographi Graeci, Paris 1873, 24-32; L. Massa Positano, Enea di Gaza. Epistole [Collana di Studi Greek diretta da V. De Falco XIX], Naples 1950, 2-17 (with tr. and comm., 29-80); [2]1962.

Studies: E. Legier, Essai de biographie d'Enée de Gaza: OrChr 7 (1907) 349-369; M. Freudenthal, PWK I.1, 1021-1022; V. Grumel, DHGE 15, 458-459; L. Massa Positano, Ancora sulle epistole di Enea di Gaza: GIF 5 (1952) 205-207; J.P. Sheldon-Williams, in Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge [3]1980, 483-486; G. Schalkhaußer, Aeneas von Gaza als Philosoph, Erlangen 1898; S. Sikorski, De Aenea Gazaeo, Vratislaviae 1909 [BPhA 9.5]; M.E. Colonna, Zaccaria scolastico. Il suo Ammonio e il Teofrasto di Enea di Gaza: AFLN 6 (1956) 107-118; R. Loenertz, Observations sur quelques lettres d'Enée de Gaza: HJ 77 (1958) 438-443; A.G. Downey, Gaza in the Early Sixth Century, Norman 1963, 111-112; H. Herter, Von Xanthos dem Lyder zu Aineias aus Gaza. Tylon und andere auferweckte: RhM 108 (1965) 189-212; M. Wacht, Aeneas von Gaza als Apologet. Seine Kosmologie im Verhältnis zum Neuplatonismus [Theophania 21] Bonn 1969 (recension of M. Baltes, Gnomon 4 [1970] 547-551); A. Garzya, Varia philologica VIII, in Studi classici in onore di Quintino Cataudella, Catania 1972, 253-257; M. Starowieyski, De vita et operibus Aenal Gazaei: Meander 28 (1973) 3-22; Id., Epistulae I-XXV: Meander 28 (1973) 93-108; E. Gallicet, Per una rilettura del Teofrasto di Enea di Gaza e dell'Ammonio di Zacaria scolastico: AOT Classe di sc. mor., stor. and filol. 112 (1978) 117-135, 137-167; Id., La risurrezione dei morti in Enea di Gaza e in Zacaria scolastico: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 273-278; Id., Problèmes de chronologie: Koinonia 10 (1986) 67-80; N. Aujoulat, Le De Providentia d'Hieroclès d'Alexandrie et le Théophraste d'Enée de Gaza: VChr 41 (1987) 55-85; A.M. Milazzo, La chiusa del Teofrasto di Enea di Gaza. Il meraviglioso come metafora: Sicul. Gymn. 40 (1987) 39-70; Id., Un tema declamatorio alla scuola di Enea: Sicul. Gymn. 42 (1989) 241-263; Id., Dimensione retorica e destinatari nel Teofrasto di Enea di Gaza, in var. aus., Retorica della comunicazione nelle letterature classiche, ed. A. Pennacini, Bologna 1990, 33-71; Id., I personaggi del dialogo di Enea di Gaza: storicità e tradizione letteraria, in Σύνδεσμος. Studi in onore di R. Anastasi I, Catania 1991, 1-19; S. Lilla, in Patrologia V, 265-274.

S. Lilla

AEON

I. In Greek philosophy - II. In the Bible and patristic literature - III. In gnosticism.

I. In Greek philosophy. *Plato (Timaeus 37d) considers αἰών ("eternity") an essential property of the "intelligible living being," i.e., the world of ideas used by the demiurge as a model in the formation of the sensible world (see 28a, 29a-b, 30c-31b); like the ideas, it is identical with itself, immobile and not subject to becoming (38a); and as the sensible world is an image of the intelligible living being formed by the ideas (29b), so time, which is in the sensible world, is the image and imitation of αἰών, which is in the intelligible world (37d, 38a). The same doctrine recurs in Timaeus of Locris, 97d (IV 412, 13-17 Hermann). *Aristotle identifies αἰών with the whole temporal duration, and with its infinity (De caelo I 279a 25-27) considers it an essential property of God (Met. Λ 1072b 29-30), and explains its etymology by connecting it with the idea of "perpetual existence," ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀεὶ εἶναι εἰληφὼς τὴν ἐπωνυμίαν (De caelo I 279a 27-28, see Plotinus, Enn. III 7, 4 vol. 374, 42-43 Henry-Schwyzer; *Proclus, In Tim. III 9, 32-33 Diehl and III 35,13). *Plotinus—who dedicates an entire treatise, the seventh of the third Ennead, to αἰών and time (studied in depth by W. Beierwaltes; see bibl.)—relates αἰών closely with the totality of intelligible beings that form the mind, the second hypostasis emanating from the One: αἰών is for him the immutable existence of all intelligible beings (III, 7,3 [I 372,34-36]); the full, uninterrupted and infinite life, which knows neither past, present nor future, of the totality of these beings (III, 7,3 [I 372,34-38], see III, 7,5 [I 375,25-28]); the radiation which comes from them and which expresses their absolute identity

(III, 7,3 [I 371,23-26]); the revelation and the expression itself of intelligence (III, 7,5 [(I 375,19-22]); and the nature that is near the One, that emanates from it and tends to return to it without departing from it (III, 7,6 [I 375,1-3]). Like Plotinus, the author of treatise XI of the Corpus Hermeticum considers αἰών as a product of God and the power that emanates from him (XI, 1, I 147, 10 Nock-Festugière; XI, 3, I 148,7; XI, 4, I 148,17); like Plato and Plotinus, he sees its essential properties as identity and stability (XI, 1, I 147, 12-13,15), but he differs from them in identifying it with the anima mundi that embraces the entire sensible universe (XI, 4, I 148,20; XI, 5, I 149,3). Αἰών is also the substance of all things (XI, 3, I 148,7), the wisdom of God (XI, 3, I 148,14) and his image (XI, 15, I 153,6). Proclus reserves to αἰών propositions 52-54 and 87-88 of the Elements of Theology, as well as some pages of the Commentary on the Timaeus (III, 8ff. Diehl) regarding Plato, Timaeus 37d. For him αἰών occupies an intermediate position between the νοητὸν ζῷον of the Timaeus—considered by him to be the direct emanation of intelligible life, the second member of the triad composed of absolute being or one-being, intelligible life and intelligible intelligence—and the absolute being: it is superior to νοητὸν ζῷον in that the latter participates in αἰών and not vice versa (III 10, 8-21; 13, 22-26); and it is below absolute being, or one-being (ἓν ὄν), being included in it (III 15,14-19) in that the concept of "existence" is more general than that of "eternal existence" and is therefore superior to it (III 15,22-27; El. teol. 87, p. 80, 22-24 Dodds; see the diagram in S. Lilla, La teologia negative . . . : Helikon 29-30 [1989-1990] 165 and the accompanying note 749). The αἰών that is hypostatized as an "intellligible God" (In Tim. III 13, 22) is such that the inferior intelligent beings contained in the νοητὸν ζῷον remain always identical with themselves (In Tim. III 13, 31-32; 15, 32-16,1). For Proclus the two concepts of being and αἰών must not be confused, as did Strato of Lampsacus (3rd c. BC) in his work on being (III 16,3-4).

II. In the Bible and patristic literature. In both the OT and NT, αἰών indicates either a very long temporal extension or eternity; in the NT, accompanied by the terms οὗτος and μέλλων, it indicates respectively the present age and the future age, understood as the *kingdom of God and contrasted with the present (see, e.g., Mt 12:32; Eph 1:21). Already in 4 Macc 18:24 the expression εἰς τοὺς αἰωνας τών αἰώνων appears in close union with the term δόξα; and the same combination—either in the longer form εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τών αἰώνων or in the shorter εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας reappears several times in St. Paul (see, e.g., Rom 11:36; 16:27; Gal 1:5; Eph 3:21; Phil 4:20; Heb 13:21); in patristic homiletic literature it becomes the basic formula of the *doxology that concludes the homily.

A "philosophical" revival of the term αἰών occurs in ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite: like Plato, Plotinus and Proclus he closely relates αἰών to the immutability of being (Nom. div. X, 3: PG 3, 937 C12-D1; 937 D 5-6); like Aristotle, he identifies it with the entire temporal extension (Nom. div. X, 3, 937 C11,12); and like Plotinus (Enn. III 7,6 vol. III 133, 1-3) and treatise XI of the Corpus Hermeticum he considers it the product of the first principle, which remains prior to and superior to it (Nom. div. X, 3: PG 3, 940 A 9-13).

III. In *gnosticism. Plotinus, Proclus, the Chaldaean oracles, the *magic papyri and implicitly the passage of the Corpus Herm. XI, 20 (I 155, 15) all call αἰών "god" (see E.R. Dodds, Proclus: The Elements of Theology Oxford [2]1963, 228; A.D. Nock - A.J. Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum I, Paris 1945, 157 n. 8), and αἰών is celebrated as a god at Alexandria and occupies a preeminent place in the cult of Mithras (see F.M.M. Sagnard, La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de Saint Irénée, Paris 1947, 269 n. 2 with relevant refs.). But esp. in gnosticism it was deified and multiplied into a multitude of divine beings, a process particularly evident in the *Valentinians and in the sects of the so-called *Barbelo-gnostics. In the Valentinian system the αἰῶνες, arranged in groups of two or four, are the 30 (or 28) divine beings that constitute the *pleroma emanating from the original τέλειος αἰών, formed by the couple βυθός-Ἔννοια (also called Σιγή-Χάρις): see Tertull., Adv. Valentin. 184,3; 185,15; 185,23; 187,8-9: Kroymann; Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I,1,1 (28,75: Rousseau- Doutreleau, SC 264); I, 1,2 (32,106); I, 1,3 (33,120; 34,129); I, 2,1 (37,145; 37,151); I,2,3 (42,186); I,2,5 (44, 207, 210, 212); I, 2,6 (46, 226; 47, 233, 236); Clement Alex., Exc. ex. Theod. 7,1 (III 108,1 Stählin); Hippolytus, Ref. omm. haer. VI 29,7 (156,18 Wendland), VI 29,8 (156,24), VI 30,2 (157,9), VI 30,4 (157,17), VI 30,6 (157, 23, 25, 26), VI 31,1 (158, 17), VI 32,1, (160, 1, 3). Even the elect, or the spirituales, once admitted into the pleroma together with their angels, become "intelligent aeons," αἰῶνες νοεροὶ γενόμενα (Clement Alex., Exc. ex Theod. 64 [III 128,18]). This last passage corresponds exactly with the expression αἰὼν γενοῦ of Corpus Herm. XI, 20 (I 155, 15). In the Apocryphon of John, the most important document of the Barbelo-gnostic sect (preserved in Nag Hammadi codex II), three aeons are contained in each of the four powers emanating from Christ (55,30-56,28), see Giversen, Ap. John, 59-61 and 142; and at the beginning (47,24-25 op. cit., 47) John asks himself about the nature of the aeon into which man is destined to go.

E. Bréhier, Plotin Ennéades III, Paris 1925 (Les belles Lettres) 123-126; A.D. Nock - A.J. Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum I, Paris 1945, 143, 146, 155 nn. 4-5; 157 n. 8; F.M.M. Sagnard, La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de Saint Irénée, Paris 1947, 296 n. 2; J. Guitton, Le temps et l'éternité chez Plotin et S. Augustin, Paris 1933; H. Weiss, An Interpretative Note on a Passage in Plotinus' On Eternity and Time (III 7,6), CPh (1941) 230-239; RAC I, 193-204; Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament I, Stuttgart 1953, 197-208; A.M.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismegiste IV, Paris 1954, 144-199; C. Colpe, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule, Göttingen 1961, 209-216; E.R. Dodds, Proclus, The Elements of Theology, Oxford ²1963, 227-229, 246; S. Giversen, Apocryphon Johannis [Acta Theologica Danica V] Copenhagen 1963, 142; KLP 1, 185-188; W. Beierwaltes, Plotin über Ewigkeit und Zeit, Frankfurt am Main 1967 (esp. pp. 35-49); Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie, 1, Basel-Stuttgart 1971, 118-119; S. Lilla, La teologia negativa dal pensiero classico a quello patristico e bizantino: Helikon 28 (1988) 223-224, 29-30 (1989-1990) 164-165. Addl. bibl. can be found in Nock - Festugière, pp. 143 and 157 n. 8, and in Dodds, 228.

S. LILLA

AERIUS (300–375). Presbyter and ascetic of *Pontus. Though a companion of *Eustathius, collaborating with him in the organization and spread of *monastic life and put in charge of the hospice of *Sebaste, Aerius quarreled with him after Eustathius was named bishop of Sebaste (ca. 357), perhaps in disappointment over not being chosen himself. *Epiphanius reports amply on his preaching (Haer. 75): he wanted equality between bishops and priests, since they were called to exercise the same functions and both were ordained with the imposition of hands; he also claimed, based on 1 Cor 5:7, that the celebration of Easter was nonsensical for Christians, and the practice of fasting a return to Judaism: whoever wished to fast could do so, but on days of his own choosing and not according to established days; finally, he did not recognize the value of prayers and offerings for the dead. *Augustine (Haer. 53) cites the opinion of some that the Aerians should be classed with *Encratites and *Apostolici, since they admitted to their communion only those who practiced continence and absolute poverty. According to *Filaster they abstained from meat (Haer. 72).

H. Hemmer, Aérius, aériens: DTC 1, 515-516; A. Lambert, Apotactites et Apotaxamènes: DACL 2604-2626; J. Gribomont, Saint Basile et le monachisme enthousiaste: Irénikon 53 (1980) 123-144.

F. COCCHINI

AETHICUS of Istria (6th c. ?). Otherwise known as "the philosopher of Istria," perhaps active in *Ireland, he is considered the author of the Cosmographia, a work originally written in Greek but reaching us in a 7th-8th-c. version summarized and translated in a rudimentary Latin. It presents, after the creation of the world, a description of the earth and an account of the author's travels, with many digressions on arguments typical of the quadrivium.

CPL 2348; T.A.M. Bishop, Aethici Istrici Cosmographia Vergilia Salisburgens: Rectius Adscripta. Codex Leidensis Scaligeranus 69 (Umbrae Codicum Occidentalium 10), Amsterdam 1966; V. Peri, La "Cosmographia" dell'Anonimo di Histria e il suo compendio dell'VIII secolo, in Vestigia, Studi in onore di Giuseppe Billanovitch, Rome 1984, 503-558; G. Princi Braccini, Tra folclore germanico e latinità insulare. Presenze del "Liber monstruorum" e della "Cosmographia" dello Pseudo-Etico nel "Beowulf" e nel cod. Nowell: StudMed 25 (1984) 681-720; W. Stelzer, Ein Alt-Salzburger Fragment der Kosmographie des Aethicus Ister aus dem 8. Jahrhundert: Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 100 (1992) 132-149; Patrologia IV, 456-457.

P. MARONE

AETHILWALD (d. after 705). Not to be confused with Aethelbald, king of Mercia, Aethilwald was a disciple of *Aldhelm. When Aethilwald was *abbot of Malmesbury, between 675–705, he sent Adelmo a letter (Ep. ad Aldhelmum) which included a small collection of five poetical compositions in eight syllables (Carmen Aldhelmo datum; Carmen de transmarini itineris peregrinatione ad Wihtfridum; Oratio ad Deum; Carmen in Aldhelmum; Ad Hovam comitem); these were later erroneously included among the works of *Boniface.

Adelmo, however, wrote Aethilwald (Ep. ad Aethilwaldum), encouraging him to reject the pleasures of secular culture and inviting him to dedicate himself solely to sacred reading and religious conversation.

CPL 1340-1341; R. Ehwald (ed.), MGH, AA 15, 495-497, 499-500, 523-537; F. Unterkircher, Sancti Bonifacii Epistolae. Codex Vindobonensis 751 der öster. Nationalbibliothek (Codices selecti phototypice impressi 24), Graz 1971, 35v-36v; W. Meyer, Die Verskunst des Angelsachsen Aethelwald (Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur mittellateinische Rhythmik), Berlin 1936, 3, 328-346; I. Schröbler, Zu den Carmina Rhythmica in der Wiener HS. der Bonifatius-Briefe: Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur Tübingen 79 (1957) 1-42.

P. MARONE

AETIUS Flavius (ca. 390–454). Born at Durostorum in *Moesia; a hostage first of *Alaric, then of the *Huns. In 425 he came with the latter to Italy, later persuading them to leave Italian territory. He was comes and magister militum in *Gaul (425–432), and consul for the West three times: 432, 437, 446. A powerful general in the court at *Ravenna, in 435 he became patricius and magister utriusque militiae, winning several victories over the barbarians; for a while he was the most powerful man in the pars occidentalis of the empire. The poet *Merobaudes wrote a *panegyric on him. Aetius was at least formally Catholic: his wife Pelagia was Catholic (Greg. of Tours, Hist. Franc. 2,7), and his son Gaudentius was baptized (Merobaudes, Carm. IV, 23-29).

PLRE II, 21-29, 865-866; G. Zecchini, La politica religiosa di Aezio, in Religione e politica nel mondo antico, Milan 1981, 250-277.

A. Di Berardino

AETIUS of Antioch (d. ca. 365). Syrian, humbly born but of considerable intellectual ability, versed in the liberal arts and theology, from 355–365 Aetius was the key exponent of radical *Arianism (*anomoianism). He was initially active at *Antioch, where the Eusebian bishop *Leontius ordained him deacon; and he was friendly with the Caesar Gallus. Forced to leave the city due to popular protest, he was recalled there in 357 when *Eudoxius succeeded Leontius. An able dialectician, he was said to have reduced *Basil of Ancyra and *Eustathius of Sebaste to silence in a public dispute; in the events of 358–360 he was repeatedly accused, however, and was solemnly condemned at the Council of *Constantinople (360), when *Constantius II wanted to strike at the leading radical Arians and *homoiousians, favoring a more centrist tendency. Recalled from exile at the time of *Julian (362), who was especially cordial to him in memory of his brother Gallus, with his disciple Eunomius he again took up his preaching of *anomoian doctrine, organizing a separate church in opposition to the moderate Arianism of Eudoxius and *Euzoius; he himself was consecrated bishop. *Socrates (HE II, 35) knew various letters of Aetius to Constantius and others; *Epiphanius (Panar. 76, 11) tells us that he wrote 300 doctrinal dissertations and transcribes one of them, the Syntagmation, on God generated and ungenerated. By the continual use of dialectical procedures, especially hypothetical syllogisms and dilemmas, Aetius maintains in this work that God, higher than any causality, is also above generation; and if "ungenerated" indicates his nature, a single divine nature could not be both ungenerated and generated. Thus the Son, since he is generated, cannot participate in the substance, and thus the divinity, of the Father.

An anomoian formula of faith is attributed to Aetius and to *Patricius of Nicaea, summarized in the Alexandrian Chronicon called Historia acephala 4,36-77: though its authenticity is uncertain, it reflects very well, both in terminology and contents, the essential characteristics of the anomoianism of Aetius and *Eunomius.

CPG II, 3445-3451. Fragments of letters can be found in F. Diekamp - B. Phanourgakis (eds.), Doctrina patrum de incarnatione verbi, ein griechisches Florilegium aus der wende des 7. und 8. Jahrhunderts, Münster [2]1981; A. Martin - M. Albert (eds.), Histoire "acéphale" et index syriaque des lettres festales d'Athanase d'Alexandrie, Paris 1985 (SC 317,154,8ff.); Athanasius, The Profession of Patricius and Aetius, R.P.C. Hanson (ed.), Dublin, 1989; Studi: BBLK I, 49-50; LTK 1, 187-188; TRE 3, 711-713; Quasten II 309; G. Bardy, L'héritage littéraire d'Aétius: RHE 24 (1928) 809-827; Simonetti 583; J. De Ghellink, Aristotelismus des Aetius: RHE 26 (1930) 5ff.; L.R. Wickham, The Syntagmation of Aetius the Anomean: JTS NS 19 (1968), 532-569; T.A. Kopecek, A History of Neo-Arianism, Cambridge, MA 1979, vol. I; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer, Tübingen 1988, passim; R.P. Vaggione, Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution, Oxford 2000, treats extensively of Aetius in the course of his study, analyzing in some detail the various periods in his life, as well as his relations with Luciano and Arius. He cites the Epistola ad Mazona, dubious fr. 2 (Diekamp 311.10,13-14) and claims that the statement attributed there to Aetius, according to which the Son would be the creator θέσει μόνον, is a falsification, and that the statement is rather a Nicene interpretation. At pp. 283-284 Vaggione treats of the mentioned formula of faith, the so-called Expositio Patricii et Aetii: what survives of the text is summarized in the Alexandrian Chronicon called Historia acephala 4,36-77 (SC 317,154,8).

M. Simonetti

AETIUS of Constantinople (5th c.). Presbyter of the church of Constantinople (5th c.), is probably the author of the Laudatio Iohannis Baptistae, a *panegyric on *John the Baptist that was proclaimed on the feast of the saint's birth.

CPG 7908; BHG 861; M. Sachot, Les homélies de Léonce, prêtre de Constantinople: RSR 51 (1977) 235; C. Datema - P. Allen, A Homily on John the Baptist Attributed to Aetius, Presbyter of Constantinople: AB 104 (1986) 383-402; Patrologia V, 134.

P. Marone

AFRICA

I. Administrative divisions - II. Christianity - III. Disappearance of ancient Christianity - IV. Archaeology - V. Recent archaeology.

I. Administrative divisions. Africa was the name given by the Romans to the territory under the control of *Carthage at the time of the *Punic Wars. From the 1st c. AD the civil administration was divided into three regions: (1) Proconsular Africa, which extended from the altar of the Phileni to Annaba/Constantine and was subject to the authority of a proconsul appointed by the Senate, with Carthage as its capital; (2) *Numidia, split off from Proconsular Africa in AD 37, roughly corresponding to the region of Constantine and governed by the legate of the 3rd Augusta Legion, capital Lambaesis; (3) *Mauretania, occupied AD 40, which extended to the Atlantic but was subdivided into two imperial provinces, Caesariensis, capital *Caesarea (Cherchel), and Tingitana, capital Tingis (Tangiers). Roman occupation in Mauretania seems to have been limited to the coastal strip, with local dynasties left intact until the *Vandal invasion. *Diocletian's reform (284–305) modified these administrative divisions. From that point the civil diocese of Africa was composed of the following provinces: (1) Tripolitania, from Cyrenaica to Lake Triton (Chott el Djérid); (2) Byzacena, from Lake Triton to Horrea (Hergla); (3) Proconsular Africa, from Horrea to Thabraca (Tabarka in Tunisia); (4) Numidia, divided into Cirtensis, capital Cirta (later Constantine), and Militaris, capital Lambaesis; (5) Mauretania Sitifensis, capital Sitifis (Sétif); (6) Mauretania Caesariensis, capital Cherchel. The civil government of each province was entrusted to a praeses dependent on the vicariate of Africa, the military government to a praepositus limitum under the Count of Africa Mauretania Tingitana was made part of the diocese of Spain.

II. Christianity. Into the above administrative framework, Christianity inserted itself.

1. Christian origins. There are two opposing theories: some think African Christianity came from the East through *Egypt and *Libya, others through Rome. The arguments do not seem decisive for either theory: it may well have been a combination of influences. Our earliest reliable information is from the late 2nd c. The African church was bilingual at the time: in the Passio Perpetuae, the martyr speaks Greek, and Saturus's visions seem to have first been written in Greek; a little earlier *Tertullian published his earliest treatises in Greek, the Latin versions being later. From 180, however, the *Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs were in Latin. A Latin version of the Letters of St. Paul is from roughly the same period, and a version of the Bible a little later. After ca. 250 *Cyprian of Carthage used an official version of the Bible in Latin, to which he remained faithful. Also noteworthy are the acts and the passions of the martyrdom of Cyprian (257–258), James and *Marianus (259), Lucius and *Montanus (259), Maximilian (295) (*Bonosus and Maximilian, martyrs), Marcellus (298), the martyrs of *Abitina, *Felix of Thibiuca, and *Crispina (304), which are among the best Latin texts of this genre. Africa was also the cradle of the great Latin Christian literature of Tertullian (2nd-3rd c.), Cyprian (d. 14 Sept. 258) and *Augustine (d. 28 Aug. 430).

2. Councils. Cyprian mentions two councils before his time: that of *Agrippinus (ca. 220) on the baptism of heretics (Cypr., Ep. 71,4; 73,3), and another which took place under Cyprian's predecessor *Donatus of Carthage and led to the deposition of *Privatus, bishop of *Lambaesis (Cypr., Ep. 56,4; 59,10). During Cyprian's time there were seven. The most important were that of May 251, which decided on the problem of the lapsi (*Lapsed, Problem of the) during the persecution of *Decius (Cypr., Ep. 45, 48, 49), and that of 1 September 256, which prescribed the rebaptism of heretics and schismatics, in opposition to the Roman usage; 87 bishops participated in this council, and the acts have been preserved (Sent. Ep.: CSEL 3,435ff.). The acts of councils after Cyprian have reached us through the medieval canonical collections (C. Munier, Concilia Africae, CCL 149). The particularly grave problem of *Donatism, a schism provoked by *Diocletian's persecution, was resolved in 411 in a conference debate, the acts of which are published (SC 194, 195, 224). These documents are an excellent reflection of the life of the church and the Christian people of Africa.

3. Spread of Christianity. In cases where conciliar acts are preserved with the signatures of the participating bishops, we can get an idea of the geographical and chronological diffusion of Christianity in the country. The Council of Agrippinus, in ca. 220, brought together 70 bishops; 87 were present at the Council of 1 September 256. Toward the mid-3rd c. there were more than 130 bishops, as Y. Duval has demonstrated; at the time of Christianity's maximum diffusion there were about 600. Episcopal sees were geographically divided in a very unequal manner: they were more numerous in the eastern provinces, becoming progressively less so toward the west and the highlands. Nevertheless, some dioceses were present south of Tunisia and Constantine: Capsa, Tamallula, Vescera (Biskra).

III. Disappearance of ancient Christianity. It has been said that Christianity disappeared completely under the blow of the Arab invasion, but this was not the case. Even after the complete occupation of the Ifriquiya (ca. 700), Christian centers survived: the famous Latin calendar of Sinai, a 10th-c. manuscript, is African; the last Latin Christian inscription at Kairouan dates to 1076; during the same century the popes maintained relations with five African bishops; and in 1192 Carthage still figures in the Liber Censuum of the Roman Church. These were the last flickers, however, of the original Christianity.

PWK 1, 713-715; DACL 1, 576-91; DHGE 1, 709-861; LTK³ 1, 210-211; RAC 1, 173-179; RAC Suppl 1, 134-238; AL 1, 180-219; F. Decret, L'Afrique manichéenne (IVe-Ve siècles). Étude historique et doctrinale, 2 vols., Paris 1978; C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique romaine au bas empire, 2 vols., Paris 1979-1981; D. Pringle, The Defence of Byzantine Africa from Justinian to the Arab Conquest, I-II, Oxford 1981; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae. Le culte des martyrs en Afrique du IVe au VIIe siècle, Rome 1982-1983; Id., Densité et répartition des évêchés dans les provinces africaines au temps de Cyprien: MEFRA 96 (1984) 493-521; J. Durliat, L'administration religieuse du diocèse byzantin d'Afrique (533-709): RSBS 4 (1984) 149-178; P.-A. Février, Aux origines du christianisme en Maurétanie Césarienne: MEFRA 98 (1986) 767-809; P.-A. Février, Approches du Maghreb romain. Pouvoirs, différences et conflits, 2 vols., Aix-en-Provence 1989-1990; S. Lancel, Évêchés et cités dans les provinces africaines (IIIe-Ve) siècles, in L'Afrique dans L'Occident Romain Ier siècle av. J.-C. - Ier siècle après J.-C., Rome 1990, 272-290; B.D. Shaw, Rulers, Nomads and Christians in Roman North Africa, Aldershot 1995; F. Decret, Le christianisme en Afrique du Nord ancienne, Paris 1996; Frontières et limites géographiques de l'Afrique du Nord antique: hommage à Pierre Salama: actes de la table ronde réunie à Paris les 2 et 3 mai 1997, C. Lepelley and X. Dupuis (eds.), Paris 1999; C. Lepelley, Aspects de l'Afrique romaine: les cités, la vie rurale, le christianisme, Bari 2001.

V. Saxer

IV. Archaeology. In the 4th c., present-day Maghreb was divided into a number of provinces: Tripolitania, Byzacena and Africa proper, derived from the old Proconsular Africa, Numidia (briefly divided in two at the start of the 4th c.), Mauretania Sitifiensis and Mauretania Caesariensis. Mauretania Tingitana was part of the civil diocese of *Spain. Ecclesiastical boundaries partially coincided with the provincial borders: ecclesiastical Numidia also included, besides the civil province, cities of the old proconsular province from Hippo Regius to Tebessa, passing through Calama, Madaura and Thubursicu Numidarum. Despite the early Christian presence—attested to by the Acts of the Martyrs of the unknown town of Scillium and by those of *Perpetua and Felicitas, and by the work of Tertullian and of Cyprian, and even with the number of bishops known from the middle of the 3rd c. in the eastern part of the country and in Numidia (ca. 70)—there is no certain archaeological evidence from before the 4th c. In particular, none of the simply formulated inscriptions at Carthage can be attributed with certainty to the 3rd c. The same is true at Hadrumetum (Sousse), where the catacombs were in use in the 4th (or 5th) c., as attested by funerary mosaics. A valuable document (Gesta apud Zenophilum), an account of a trial held in 320, gives the oldest mention of a church: the curator charged with the investigation at Cirta (Constantina) during the persecution of 303 went ad domum in qua christiani conveniebant, finding there the bishop and some of the clergy, a library, a triclinium with dolia and orcae; he then went to the houses of the readers. An inscription at Altava (309) mentions a basilica dominica, as well as a memoria in honor of persons otherwise unknown; the epigraph specifies that there existed there a mensa Ianuari martiris. Here we glimpse a link between a martyr's memorial and a church, and undoubtly a burial ground as well. The earliest surviving monument connected with the cult of the martyrs, however, is at Tipasa. An enclosure in the western necropolis, bounded on the east by a portico, was excavated, under which can be seen masonry beds placed over the tombs, one of which mentions the martyrs *Rogatus and *Vitalis. Nearby was found the epitaph of the martyr Victorinus (d. 315?). Also nearby are what appear to have been the graves of some of the city's bishops, who were later buried in sedem pulchram by Alexander, their successor. In this basilica where the bishop is buried a mensa for the *funeral banquet is preserved, giving an idea of the importance of these rites in African Christian society. A mosaic recently found in the western necropolis, but at a certain distance from the basilica, confirms the power of these traditions, which *Augustine of Hippo opposed in vain. The inscription there reads in (Christo Deo) pax et concordia sit convivio nostro.

Thanks to Augustine's sermons, some of the places at Carthage where Cyprian's memory is preserved are known; he died in the ager Sexti and was interred in the areae of Macrobio Candidiano. In each place there were mensae upon which the eucharistic synaxis was celebrated at the start of the 5th c.; *Victor of Vita refers to two basilicas in each of these places. A mosaic (second half 4th c.) found at Tebessa recorded the names of the martyrs—Heradius, Zebboc, Donatus, Secondianus, Victorianus, Publicia, Meggen—undoubtedly companions of St. *Crispina. Above these was built (late 4th or early 5th c.) a tribolate hall, attached to the great martyrial basilica restored in the 19th c. An old discovery tells us of the five-aisled basilica of El Asnam—castellum Tingitanum: in the western counterapse of the nave an inscription provides a date: the cornerstone was laid in the year 285 of the province, 324 of the Christian era. Not until the late 4th–early 5th c., however, are there sufficiently numerous and precise archaeological remains to give us an idea of the Christian architecture, which perhaps also explains the dearth of older documents. In any event, it explains the beginning of the African church—the vitality of which is attested to by the conflicts between "Catholics" and "Donatists"—and the urban development, of which archaeology has begun to show the effects, i.e., the remodeling of houses, embellished with mosaics.

The study of this late period in Africa is hampered by the fact that those working at Maghreb did not recognize the fundamental necessity of dating basilicas or houses; or, rather, the absence of stratigraphical excavations combined with other persistent prejudices have prevented precise dating. For example, only recent research by J. Christern at Tebessa has disproved the dating of the sanctuary to the *Byzantine era. Conversely, many buildings that are considered old may be later, even 5th c., thought to be a less-active period due to the Vandal presence; this would be to forget, however, that the Vandals were *Arians, and there is nothing that supports the notion of a regression prior to the Byzantine reconquest. On the contrary, capitals preserved in the mosques of Tunis and Kairouan—now studied by N. Harrazi—give the impression of a province open to exchange with the East during the entire 5th–6th c., both before and after the conquest. Similarly, what little can be glimpsed of the commerce in ceramics and merchandise shipped in amphorae leads to the hypothesis of a very complex web of exchange across the Mediterranean. Woven into this architectural history is that of the individual Christian communities, with their various components, along with a history of the city—since the greater part of the known monuments were in cities—an economic history and a history of technical development. In places where the topography of a city can be traced either completely or with sufficient breadth, we find a large number of churches, both in the inhabited areas and in the peripheral necropolises. In Thamugadi (Timgad) there are at least three basilicas, with their baptisteries: one in the center of *Trajan's colonia; another very near the original walls, to the northwest; and the third a bit more on the periphery, but still in the inhabited zone.

As for funerary basilicas, these were erected very far from the city to the west, on the Lambaesis road, and to the south. This separation between the place for the dead and that of the living was not always respected, however: from 378, in the northwest quarter at Sétif, during the same period when houses were being built, two basilicas accomodated burials dated to the provincial year. At Sufetula (Sbeitla) in the 5th c., burials were done in an area attached to the original cathedral; likewise at *Hippo Regius (Hippo, today Annaba), in the city not far from the forum, and at Haidra. The existence of numerous urban churches is attested to in other cities besides Carthage, where various basilicas have been found (some very near each another, as at Dermech) and where it is known that the city was divided into regions (at least 6); consequently, as at Rome, there was a regional clergy alongside the bishop, not at all surprising in the capital and principal city of Roman Africa. Even in apparently minor towns, such as Oued Rhezel (7), H. Seffan (4) or H. Bou Hadef (5), various churches have been identified. At Cuicul (Djemila) the main monument is clearly the episcopal complex with its two basilicas, but in the original colonia there is also a three-aisled basilica set in a block of houses. The discovery of a baptistery beside a basilica does not prove it to be a cathedral, though this is undoubtedly the case at Hippo Regius, where the basilica in the city was identified with Augustine's church. Only one of that city's basilicas has been excavated, with its clergy house—an older house, preserved with its peristyle—and baptistery. In the 5th c., therefore, people were buried in church buildings. Some baptisteries have also been found on the periphery of the urban zone, as in the martyrial basilica of Tebessa, or at a certain distance from the city, like at Hergla or near Kelibia.

In the absence of excavations, we really do not understand well how the Christian communities situated their urban churches. At Timgad one of the basilicas is built on two city blocks and the road separating them. At Hippo Regius a house was bought and demolished, with only the floor mosaics being reused for the new construction; an adjoining house was also bought at the same time. At Mactar, a portion of the baths to the west housed a basilica: its side walls preserve the raised frigidarium. Similarly, according to *Quodvultdeus's testimony, the temple of Caelestis was reused to build a Christian sanctuary at Carthage; the temple in use at Sbeitla was also reused, the baptistery placed in the cella and the three-aisled basilica occupying part of the porticoed courtyard. Something similar developed at Thuburgo Maius, in the courtyard of the temple at Tipasa, and at Jebel Oust: there the baptistery is again located in the cella of the temple, above the cave from which the hot spring fed the baths on the lower level.

An interesting detail of Christian urban topography appears during the Byzantine period. When forts were built, sometimes a small basilica was built within the walls as an oratory for the garrison. This occurred at Ammaedara (Haidra) and Timgad. In the latter, the area to the left of the apse contained a small baptistery.

The early episcopal complex at Sbeitla has a three-aisled basilica, oriented north to south, undoubtedly due to the plot of land acquired by the church. To the west was a baptistery, a rectangular space bordered by a portico, with a room with the font in the middle. In the mid-4th c. another five-aisled basilica was added to this building, against the wall of the baptistery itself. A new baptistery was then built, to the south of the main apse of this new building, toward the late-5th or early-6th c.

More spectacular is the episcopal complex at Tipassa: on a rocky cliff overlooking the sea, opposite the temple hill where the forum was and where the local martyr *Salsa was killed, is a seven-aisled hall, the main aisle being 14 meters wide. North of the apse is the baptistery, near the baths and perhaps also the bishop's house.

The episcopal complex at Cuicul is situated high in the abandoned part of the city, dominating one of the watercourses that borders the inhabited area and the road to Cirta. Two basilicas are juxtaposed, one three-aisled and facing north—the mosaics of which were donated by members of the city's most eminent families at the end of the 4th or early 5th c., the other five-aisled (and undoubtedly tribune), whose mosaics are stylistically more recent. To the east, beside the apses, the steep drop of the terrain allowed for the construction of a long corridor at a level lower than the aisles, off of which open a number of semicircular and square rooms. This crypt seems to be contemporaneous with the oldest mosaics; perhaps this is where the bodies of the iusti priores, of whom *Cresconius's inscription speaks, were to be buried. To the northwest of the three-aisled basilica is the circular baptistery, with a circular corridor surrounding the central room, the basin sheltered by a canopy. The floor of this central part is covered by mosaics in marine motifs, while the ambulatory displays many geometric decorations.

One of the buildings dated with greater certainty is the basilica of Tebessa, a place of pilgrimage undoubtedly built in honor of the city's martyrs, Crispina and companions. A rectangular enclosure sets off the group of monuments; a three-aisled basilica is set on an elevated podium, an unusual feature; a tribolate room is joined to it where the saint's cenotaph must have been. In front of the stairs leading to the sanctuary, ornamental pools reflected the porticoes that surrounded the basilica's façade. The monumental entry arches, the quality of the stonecutting, the decorations of the corbels that supported the height of the aisles, all combined to impress the pilgrim. In the corner of the enclosure was a caravansery for sheltering animals, with one for people on the terrace. It is certain that the building dates to the first years of the 5th c., as is indicated by the quality of the workmanship of both the stone and mosaics, as well as by the effort made to enhance a venerated sanctuary.

With the buildings that grew up near the cathedrals, such as martyrial buildings or most of the other church buildings, the usual plan was the basilica. As Augustine says, oblongam habeat quadraturam lateribus longioribus, brevioribus frontibus sicut pleraeque basilicae construuntur (Quaest. in Hept. 2,177). The buildings have one aisle (Thibilis) or three, sometimes five (Dermech at Carthage, Feriana, la Skhira); frequently the semicircular apse is set in the middle of the side aisles, according to a plan already known in Maghreb, in the civil basilicas of Tipassa and Leptis Magna. Sometimes the side aisles of the church have tribunes, inviting comparison with the civil basilicas of the same cities. Thus from the 4th and 5th c., plans and elevations very common in official architecture were used. From one city to another, or from one neighborhood to another, the dimensions vary: from 61 by 45 meters in the basilica maiorum of Carthage or 52 by 45 in that of Tipassa, the dimensions typically become smaller (46/22 at Theveste, 41/18 at Sétif, 37/18 at Hippo Regius). In these basilicas the apse is always raised, sometimes by several steps above the level of the nave, with the exception of some buildings like at Thibilis, or the fortress oratory at Timgad, where the back of the apse is occupied by seats for clergy. In the elevated portion, the side aisles are separated from the central aisle by columns, sometimes by double columns (which in some cases has suggested the existence of tribunes); in other cases pillars or columns backing onto pillars were needed to support the tribunes. The discovery of some fragments permits a reconstruction of the system of arches above the supports. Above them arises a wall with windows, as the funerary mosaic of Tabarka shows, or a tribune gallery (Tebessa, Tigzirt).

The apse, as far as we can judge, was covered by a half-dome, examples of which are perfectly preserved at Le Kef and at Dar el Kous, with beautiful regular masonry. Elsewhere fragments that had fallen to the ground allow us to suppose an apse with a barrel vault. More frequently the nave seems to have been roofed with tresses, as at Lemellef, where the description of *Optatus (De schisma don. 2,12) shows assailants removing the tiles to throw them on the faithful who had taken refuge there. This is also depicted in the Tabarka mosaic. Some evidence exists of collateral vaults, as for example in *Tripoli, in the nave. There are also buildings roofed in a more complex manner. In its final phase the basilica I of Bulla Regia certainly had a dome at each end of the nave: one over the baptistery, the other over the altar. The basilica VI at Sbeitla, dedicated to the martyrs *Silvanus and *Fortunatus, is Byzantine; its nave was covered in the middle by a dome. A third domed building, also Byzantine, is at Iunce (Macomades minores): in the vast basilica III a basilica and a cruciform plan are combined, clearly expressed on the outside by the three apses and perhaps by the counterapse.

The Byzantine reconquest seems therefore to have brought with it a renewal of African architecture, at least in some structures. In many basilicas, beginning in the 4th c., the altar is placed in the nave, in front of the apse (El Asnam) or in the center (Sétif, Timgad). The mosaics of the basilica at Tebessa suggest a presbytery toward the east in front of the apse, a counterchoir by the altar to the west, and a corridor joining them; this was from the beginning, since the corridor was later done away with. Noël Duval studied this *liturgical arrangement, as well as the counterapses and counterchoirs frequent in many basilicas. The majority are the result of rearrangements in the 5th (El Asnam) or 6th c. (Haidra I and II, La Skhira I). In some cases only the arrangements opposite the original apse lead to the supposition of an altar—or a secondary altar—used during the same period as the main altar (Mactar II and IV, Sbeitla II, Haidra I, La Skhira I). Sometimes *relics are deposed therein, but there are cases where the counterapse seems to have had only funerary use. From studies, in particular of Haidra and Sbeitla, it has become clear that liturgical arrangements changed over time; it is difficult to establish a coherent chronological evolution. In some cases the entire nave or the greater part of it was reserved to clergy, either because a corridor joined the choir with the part opposite (Tebessa, Iunce III), or because cancelli completely closed off the nave (Mactar IV, Thala II, Sbeitla II in its second phase). The faithful in this case were confined to the side aisles and the tribunes where they existed.

Many basilicas have an interesting liturgical arrangement: a crypt beneath the main apse, and sometimes beneath one of the side rooms. This seems to be the case with the room attached east of the basilica of Sétif prior to 389, as well as with the basilica in the old city of Cuicul, where the axial apse was very raised and windows allowed a view of the tomb in the axis of the crypt, which was approached through the side aisles. Other examples of crypts beneath the apse and its annexes are at Timgad and Tiddis. A crypt was also under the main apse of the basilica of El Asnam, but it is not known whether this belonged to a 4th-c. phase. A different arrangement has been noted at Henchir Seffan, where a crypt divided by three orders of pillars has been found in the nave before the apse.

Other solutions with unusual floor plans are worth noting, such as the side apse of the basilica of Sétif, facing east, opposite the site of the altar (before 389), or the analogous arrangement of the great western basilica of Timgad, or also the tribolate room beneath the raised nave at Tebessa, undoubtedly in honor of the martyrs. Many of these basilicas—urban and suburban—have baptisteries attached, whose position, however, varies widely: near the entrance or placed to one side; better still, in an annex of the apse; behind it, and on its axis (Mactar III, Sabratha I, La Skhira I), or on one side (Leptis Magna I). The shapes also vary widely: a simple rectangular room with no ornament but the pool, at times surmounted by a canopy; a room in the shape of an apsed basilica; a cruciform area as at Sabratha I (6th c.); a quadrilobate room at Tigzirt; circular as at Cuicul. At Dermech (Carthage) a small basilica with a reliquary was attached to the baptistery. The baptismal pool also differs in plan or height: it could be flush with the ground or encircled by a low wall as at Timgad (southwest basilica), where the stairs are covered with mosaics. A simple rectangle, hexagon or circle, they become polylobate in 6th-c. renovations or new constructions. Encircling steps—sometimes only on two sides—allow a descent into the pool. Baptisteries are often near baths, which seem to be contemporary.

We have today only a very limited idea of the decoration of these basilicas: what is known are basically floor mosaics and some decorative fragments sculpted in stone. Wall mosaics, painted decoration or stuccos have disappeared almost without a trace.

The basilica of Tebessa has a very homogeneous mosaic decoration, basically geometric in the side aisles and the nave. Some of the columnar capitals have been reused; others are undoubtedly cut by the same artists who made the decorations on the columns supporting the roof timbers (scrolls, rosettes, fish). Very often only the floor decoration is known. The oldest (?) could be that covering the five aisles of the basilica of El Asnam with geometric (esp. stellar) motifs. The site of the altar is marked by vine shoots and a bunch of grapes hanging between two columns. A maze was placed in a span of the left side aisle close to the dedication, dated 324. Also very homogeneous is the similar floor covering the three aisles of the north basilica of the episcopal complex of Cuicul: the names of donors were written in the center of each motif. In the basilica of Alexander of Tipassa, to geometric motifs—very similar to those of the cathedral—are added very beautiful inscriptions in capital letters recalling the work of the bishop or inviting the faithful to give *alms in memory of the martyrs, and a panel decorated by fish. In the basilica of Rusguniae in its earliest phase the floor of the nave was covered by mosaics of a sea, fish, a flock and a shepherd. These bucolic and marine images were accompanied by inscriptions. The floor of the basilica seems to have been progressively covered by mosaics: this has also been noted in buildings reserved for burials.

Through the years epitaphs have been added, filling in the space: in one of the basilicas at Sétif, the tombs range from 389 to 429, with an inscription added in 471. Inscriptions were also added in the basilica near Kelibia, or at Tabarka; similarly also at Hippo Regius, although things are more complex there, because on the one hand the mosaics of the earlier house were kept, and on the other hand the left side aisle was given a homogeneous decoration, in which tombs were later placed, some underneath the mosaics and others indicated by a marble gravestone. The floors of some basilicas were completely covered with flagstone, as in the church of Melleus at Haidra. Funerary inscriptions were cut in the flagstone, recording burials in the building. In the Byzantine era there was usually a mosaic decoration, either geometric or inspired by floral motifs (Sabratha); perhaps only a simpler ornamental taste and a more restrained color palette is displayed, as at Bulla Regia or at Dermech. In the basilica of Hergla are geometric panels and others with hunting scenes; animals are intercalated between the columns and on the doorsill of the five-aisled basilica at Cuicul.

Another decorative element is stonework, nearly always of local limestone. This decoration is often limited to capitals, which in some regions are very sober, in a form derived from Doric. Sometimes, as at Tipassa or in the mausoleum of Menynx, the capitals are scrolled; more often they are derived from Corinthian, as at Tebessa. A tradition of craftsmanship flourished at Tebessa in the late 4th and early 5th c., of which the capitals and dosserets of Henchir Faraoun are a good example. Similar stylistically were the workshops of Feriana (Thelpte) and Sbeitla. Less sensitive to classical forms are the pillars of Meskiana (Ksar el Kelb?), Zoui, Khenchela and Henchir Seffan. Marble capitals were also imported, particularly from the East, with acanthus leaves: prickly with fine indented leaves (sometimes with animals under the abacus, at other times swollen or blown about by the wind), capitals with medallions, etc. Marble trade throughout the Mediterranean was not new to Late Antiquity: it has been documented from the time of *Augustus at Cherchel and in other places along the coast, as with trade in *sarcophagi from the 2nd–3rd c. These latter seem to be less numerous at Maghreb, however, than in other regions of the West, and not only because of the existence of workshops near Carthage that worked the stone from Chemtou (at Tebessa). The use of mosaic decoration in geometric or figurative themes on tombs may explain the rarity of relief decoration. Examples preserved at Sétif, Tabarka and Kelibia, and at Tenes, Tipassa, Sertei and Hippo Regius in the region of the Enfida, give a very precise idea of funerary mosaics: the essential elements are the inscription, and beside it a decoration, geometric, of either birds or a plant motif. Sometimes the deceased is portrayed. More rarely there is an allusion to his trade (e.g., a boat at Tabarka), a hunting scene or an image borrowed from the OT: Daniel among the lions at Sfax; the three Jews in the furnace at Tipassa. There is very little data based on which such decoration (or the monuments themselves) can be dated to the post-Byzantine period. A few texts nevertheless suggest constructions like the funerary basilica built by the dux of Tigisis between 641–668 in the southern necropolis of Timgad, or of a castrum ("camp") in the region of Batna under Tiberius Constantine or Constantine IV, or a tower at Lemsa under the emperor Maurice.

We are less fortunate with church buildings, and only the numerous alterations of liturgical structures allow us to think of the long-term use of basilicas. This can also be assumed from the fact that the funerary inscriptions of En Ngila, Ain Zana or Kairouan attest to Christian communities until the start of the 11th c. Also, fragments of liturgical manuscripts preserved at Sinai or communities recognized at Jebel Nefusa discount a rapid disappearance of Christian traditions, all the more so because the Arab invasion did not touch the provinces where urban life had regressed. The disappearance of so many Roman towns certainly did not begin with the 7th-c. situation: a certain kind of archaeology is responsible for a negative interpretation of this transitional phase toward medieval Maghreb. In any event, much remains to be done for an understanding of the evolution that determined the transformation of the region.

Two older basic works: P. Gluckler, Basiliques chrétiennes de Tunisie, Paris 1913; St. Gsell, Monuments antiques de l'Algérie, II, Paris 1901.

For Tripolitania: J.B. Ward-Perkins - R.G. Goodschild, The Christian Antiquities of Tripolitania: Archeologia 95 (1953).

See also: N. Duval, Les églises africaines à deux absides, 2 vols., Paris 1971-1973. Besides the last work cited, for a recent bibliography and status quaestionis, see in particular the acts of the International Congresses of Christian Archaeology VI, VII and VIII (Ravenna 1962; Treviri 1965; Barcellona 1969), and the Corsi di Cultura sull'Arte Ravennate e Bizantina, Ravenna 1970 and 1972; D. Pringle, The Defence of Byzantine Africa from Justinian to the Arab Conquest, I-II, Oxford 1981; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae. Le culte des martyrs en Afrique du IVe au VIIe siècle, Rome 1982-1983; P.-A. Février, Approches du Maghreb romain. Pouvoirs, différences et conflits, 2 vols., Aix-en-Provence 1989-1990; C. Lepelley, Aspects de l'Afrique romaine: les cités, la vie rurale, le christianisme, Bari 2001.

P.-A. Février

V. Recent archaeology. Studies done in the last twenty years on the Christian antiquity of Africa, in particular those pertaining to Christian archaeology, have led—through the work of scholars such as Béjaoui, Ghalia, Kadra and others whose research is along the lines of Février and Duval—to the knowledge of a large number of Christian church buildings, clarifying the historical-religious framework of rural areas and giving a better knowledge of the structure of Christianity in the most remote areas of Africa. Attention has been focused, in fact, on the large number of African episcopal sees already known from the list of participants at the Carthage conference of 411—famous for the debate between Catholics and Donatists—which offered an initial framework for the evidence concerning dioceses based in the saltus, the fundi and the villae. This framework has been confirmed by new discoveries regarding rural churches especially, whose populations seem to be concentrated in the provinces of Proconsularis and Byzacena. These rural centers had a dynamic function at both the economic and the religious level, with a fundamental role in the propagation of the faith and local control of ecclesiastical authority in the doctrinal controversies.

These rural churches, stylistically little different from urban churches, were built in response to a real need for a cura animarum toward a population of peasants, farmers and landowners living in agricultural areas and in the still-inhabited areas of the old towns. Only epigraphical discoveries, however, give a more reliable reference to basilicas, baptisteries, martyrial shrines and cemeteries indentfied in rural areas, and to episcopal sees still without a permanent location. In this sense, there has been much interest in the archaeological discoveries in Tunisia: rural churches have been discovered by Ghalia at Saadat Mornissa, in the region of Mateur, ca. 60 km (37 mi) from Carthage, and near the old Rucuma (which sent a bishop to the Council of Carthage in 256), by Bejaoui at Ben Saâdane (with a baptistery), by Khanoussi at Henchir Bechouk and at Ain el Assila, with a vast cemetery. A church has been discovered at Segermes, about 1 km west of those already known. The floor of the three-aisled building is completely covered with mosaics in geometric and floral motifs. To the southwest, the building is attached to a baptistery with a cruciform baptismal basin, later made rectangular. In the region of Hammamet, north of the old Province of *Byzacena, new information has been gained from the excavations of the churches at Sidi Jedidi, identified by Beschaouch in ancient Asadi.

There were two worship areas, located at the north and south peripheries of the urban area, which underwent an entire restructuring during the Byzantine period, the result of a hiatus which chronological data attributes to the Vandal persecutions. The first church, to the north, is one of two belonging to the episcopal group; the contruction thus needed a large space, which was available only at the periphery of the city. The floor of the building and that of its baptistery, are entirely covered with mosaic panels. A system of additions, arranged near the façade and around the court preceding the entrance, completes the building. A sarcophagus placed against the south wall of the church, pertaining either to a martyrial cult or the memory of a bishop, indicates the funerary nature of the building. In the reconstruction at the time of the Byzantine reconquest, the first two trusses of the nave were conceived as an autonomous monument, with tombs perfectly organized on a central plan and indicated by flagstones or mosaics. The baptistery was built to a cruciform plan, with the south arm occupying the space generally reserved for one of the sacristies. It is possible that the funerary dedication of the first church led to the construction of the second in the episcopal group, for more general use. This rises 15 m. to the east; the community or an individual made use of an isolated house in its construction, which partially maintained its domestic, productive function. Domestic outbuildings were also built between the two structures, with an oven, an olive press and a mill for grain. Two phases of occupation have been identified for the church, perhaps devotional, on the south side of the urban area: on the one hand, the first, prior to the 5th c., in which the funerary function is only hinted at, as in the funerary mosaics of the priest Cyprianus and of the simple layman Felix. In the second phase, on the other hand, 6th c. or the beginning of the Byzantine period, the mosaics that cover the nave are of primary importance: the central corridor leading to the liturgical pole of the church was decorated by panels containing decorations of craters and vines, paradisal scenes with palms and birds facing each other. The first span, opposite the apse, had a particularly rich decoration, with a flagstone with an anonymous dedication expressing devotion, encircled by jeweled crosses. These churches seem to indicate a functional differentiation of the Christian churches in the city.

Similar to Sidi Jedidi is the recent discovery in Proconsular Africa at Ad Aquas, north of Hammam Lif, of a three-aisled church, with a choir and baptistery behind the apse, built in the 5th c. along the axis of a street which allowed access to a number of annexes whose arrangement suggests an identification with some horrea, like at Demna near Kélibia. A rural church with a baptistery has also been excavated at Chott Menzel Yahia, while on the site of ancient Pupput a number of new funerary mosaics have been discovered.

The city of Haidra (ancient Ammaedara) continues to be a priviliged place of research for a knowledge of the process of Christianization in the towns of the Maghreb. Here Franco-Tunisian excavations have reopened the study of basilica III, built within the citadel against the outer walls; another building east of the citadel has been investigated, perhaps a Christian basilica, though the only certain testimony to this is the funerary inscription of a certain Gemellinus from the Byzantine era. The most important discovery is of a Christian monument (1993) that has been intrepreted as a Byzantine-era sanctuary. With a rectangular plan divided into various areas, it could be a chapel, set to the south of the citadel on a stretch of the ancient road connecting Ammaedara to Thelepte. Many epitaphs have been found in every part of the monument, among them that of Fl. *Cresconius, dated the fourth year of the reign of *Justin II (568–569), and the record of the deposit of the relics of saints *Sebastian and Isidore. At Haidra, along the same road, at least five other churches have been discovered with associated baptisteries, at agricultural centers with olive presses: 'El Gousset, Henchir el Khima and Henchir el Khmira. New excavations have begun in two of the six churches of Thelepte. At Sbeitla (ancient Sufetula), work has been added to Duval's studies on the church built above a temple: new funerary mosaics with inscriptions have been uncovered. At least two phases of occupation have been identified for another five-aisled church along the southwest wall of the Capitolium; also interesting is the so-called church of Servus, with a dozen epitaphs. In the same area, west of Sbeitla in the place called Kasr el Guellal, a church has been investigated that was built at the center of an important site of the production of terra sigillata, with many olive presses. The floor of the apse is completely covered with geometric mosaics. The early Christian complex at Kasr el Baroud (a place that has been identified with the ancient statio of Thamaguta, and thus not rural), excavated by Bejaoui between 1988–1991, is composed of an episcopal complex with a cemeterial basilica and a cathedral church with a baptistery. More than 50 funerary mosaics have been uncovered, dating from the 4th–5th c. until the Byzantine period. Many are of members of the clergy, like the special one of Milicus, a bishop and signatory at the conference of Carthage of 411 as the representative of the bishop of Thagamuta, and those of some monachi, leading Bejaoui to hypoythesize the existence of a monastery. Duval doubts this, recalling that the title was also borne by clerics not organized in community.

At Henchir Errich, among ceramic, glass and metal shops, a church has been studied with a baptistery whose baptismal basin has the same form as those of Sbeitla and Thamaguta, suggesting that they are all the work of a single regional shop. This is also suggested by a votive formula on a mosaic in the baptistery mentioning an atelier of mosaicists, very rare in Africa: Ex officina magistri Bictoriana et Victorini / Nartalus et Gallus votum solv(erunt). Other churches have been discovered: at Henchir Snab, with a quadrilobate baptismal basin, at El Ouara, and at Henchir el Ounaissia, where a part of the nave has been excavated, perhaps a counterchoir, its floor decorated with Byzantine-period mosaics. A chronological indication, as a terminus post quem, is provided by the epigraph of the deacon Lucilianus, dated 491 and reused in a wall.

A frequently recurring *iconographic plan has the baptismal complex situated behind the apse. This plan is widespread until the Byzantine period, e.g., at Henchir Sokrine near Leptis Minus (Lemta), where two spaces are annexed to the sides of the apse, joined by a corridor behind the presbyterium; between them is the baptistery, accessible from the vestibule through an axial entrance behind the apse. In this case the absence (thus far) of episcopal graves renders doubtful the ecclesia cathedralis character of this three-aisled building, which is a site also distinguished for the richness of its mosaics. Greater interest, which Duval frequently expressed hope for, has also been given to annexed buildings and structures attached to cathedrals, or to simple churches, which reveal a well-organized ecclesiastical life with financial competence, organizations for assistance to the poor (matricula), places for housing pilgrims (xenodochia) and seminaries for the formation of clergy (so-called monasteri), a domus episcopalis, and the double-churches themselves, which for Duval are the result of an evolution of the episcopal group.

The discovery at Mahrine (region of Thuburbo Maius) of a rural church with an ring-shaped ambulatory, built on private land in the latter half of the 6th c., reopens the question of the origin and date of the introduction of the ambulatory plan in Africa, often in relation to the two symbolic poles of the church building, the baptistery and the martyrium, and in response to the need for the circulation of the faithful or of pilgrims to the venerated spaces. At present the hypothesis of a direct influence from northern Italy (the Adriatic region) seems accepted. Another architectonic element that seems to have been introduced late is the circular or hexagonal plan adopted for some annexes to the church: the function of these annexes is thought to have been baptismal or martyrial, or both, as Février thinks regarding the baptistery of the large church of La Skira, thought to have contained a reliquary related to a martyrial cult. Interesting developments followed Yvette Duval's study on the loca sanctorum in Africa: an inscription was discovered near Makthar by Ben Baaziz in the cella of a pagan temple probably reused as a Christian chapel: Hic memoria s(an)c(ti) Petri et Pauli, where the term memoria could refer to a reliquary, now lost, that would have been kept in the building. This must also be the interpretation of the discovery near basilica IV of Sbeitla of an epigraphical fragment mentioning the relics of the apostles Peter and Paul. Some anonymous reliquiaries were discovered in a chapel attached to the church of El Gousset; the date of the building is indicated by an inscription of 521, with mention of the 26th year of the reign of the Vandal king Trasamundo.

Archaeological research has not been limited to churches but has also included burial grounds, such as that investigated near Berrouaghia in 1982—partially sacked, with tombs covered by tiles supported by small blocks of stone bordering the graves. This is thought to be a Christian cemetery, though explicitly Christian inscriptions and symbols have not been found. Sarcophagi have been found in the neighborhood of Draa-er-Rahou at Tebessa, as well as graves of those buried in caskets or in a hooded robe. Such situations are often linked to the reuse of elements as mensae in decorated rectangular stone, revealing the endurance of the refrigerium* until a late period. Interesting studies have been done by Bonacasa Carra on the burial ground of Sabratha, in the early Christian complex north of the theater; the cemetery, L-shaped and completely paved with square flagstones of yellow marble, was connected to the atrium of the church by a narrow path to the north, while to the south a flight of stairs led to the Decumano Massimo. The scholar hypothesizes that an entire roadbed could have been incorporated into this portion of the early Christian complex and adapted to the new function of a cemetery. The burial of Theodorus, dated 6th c., attests the use of the area even after the Byzantine conquest. Critical review and careful further study have motivated the studies on urban sites already known. Duval has reinitiated study of some double basilicas of North Africa: Djemila, Sbeitla, Bulla Regia and of Sabratha itself, where, in the early-mentioned Christian complex north of the theater, the main church and the original baptistery used some of the walls of the baths. Bonacasa Carra rejects the hypothesis of Ward-Perkins and Goodchild, who attributed the restriction of the earlier baths area to a second phase of the church; she attributes it to the original phase, dating the complex to the end of the 4th c., and moreover thinks the complex was previously a cathedral. Duval does not reject the hypothesis that there may have been basilicas linked to the Donatists. The studies of the Italo-Tunisian team at Uchi Maius have also been renewed, with an inventory of the inscriptions and architectonic elements attributed to a church in the area of some modern buildings.

Ennabli's archaeological mission has led to the detailed study of a basilica in the area of a "supermarket" at Carthage, near the hill of Byrsa. The final phase of the building, with two apses, five aisles and a baptistery, is perhaps early 6th c. Also, a monastery complex has been excavated in the Bigua zone east of the Odeon hill.

A. Mandouze (ed.), Prosopographie chrétienne du Bas-Empire, 1, L'Afrique chrétienne, Paris 1982; N. Duval, L'éveque et la cathédrale en Afrique du Nord, in Actes du XI Congrés International d'Archéologie chrétienne, Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève, Aoste (September 21-28, 1986), I-III, Vatican City 1989, 345-403; P.A. Février, Approches du Maghreb romain, Aix-en-Provence 1990; N. Duval, Vingt ans de recherches archéologiques sur l'antiquité tardive en Afrique du Nord: REA 96 (1994) 583-640; P.G. Spanu - R. Zucca, Le diocesi rurali della Proconsularis e della Byzacena. Aspetti storici e archeologici, in L'Africa Romana, Atti del XII Convegno di studio, Olbia, December 12-15, 1994, M. Khanoussi - P. Ruggeri - C. Vismara (eds.), Sassari 1998, 401-410; G. Lepelley, Aspects de l'Afrique Romaine: les cités, la vie rurale, le christianisme, Bari 2001; P.A. Février, L'abeille et la seiche: à propos du décor de Kélibia: RivAC 60 (1983) 277-292; F. Bejaoui, Témoignages chrétiens dans la région de Segermes, in Africa Proconsularis: Regional Studies in the Segermes Valley of Northern Tunisia, II, S. Dietz - L. Ladjimi Sebai - H. Ben Hassen (eds.), København 1995, 760-767; A. Ben Abed - M. Bonifay - M. Fixot - S. Roucole, Les basiliques chrétiennes de Sidi Jedidi: RivAC 76 (2000) 555-587; F. Baratte - F. Bejaoui - Z. Ben Abdallah (eds.), Recherches archéologiques à Haidra, Miscellanea 2 (Colléction de l'École Française de Rome, 17/2), Rome 1999; F. Bejaoui, Nouvelles données archéologiques à Sbeitla: Africa 14 (1996) 37-53; F. Bejaoui, Une nouvelle église d'époque bizantine à Sbeitla, in L'Africa Romana, XII, 1998, 1173-1183; F. Bejaoui, Une église de la région de Sbeitla: Kasr el Guelal: Africa 16 (1998) 1-14; N. Duval, Les églises doubles d'Afrique du Nord: Antiquité Tardive 4 (1996) 179-188; F. Bejaoui, Découvertes d'archéologie chrétienne en Tunisie, in Actes XI CIAC (Lyon 1986), Rome 1989, 1927-1960; F. Bejaoui, Etat des découvertes d'époque chrétienne des dix dernières années en Tunisie: Antiquité Tardive 10 (2002) 197-211 with bibliography; F. Bejaoui, A propos des mosaiques funéraires d'Henchir Sokrine (environ de Leptis Minus, en Byzacène), in Africa Romana 9, Atti del IX Convegno di studio, Nuoro, December 13-15, 1991, A. Mastino (ed.), Sassari 1992, 329-336; N. Duval, Problématique d'une architecture chrétienne au IV^e siècle: REAug 35 (1989) 308-313; N. Duval, s.v. Basilique chrétienne africane, in Encyclopédie Berbère, Aix en Provence 1991, 1377; P.A. Février, Baptistéres, martyrs et reliques: RivAC 62 (1986) 109-138; T. Ghalia, L'architecture religieuse en Tunisie aux V^e et VI^e siècles: Antiquité Tardive 10 (2002) 213-222; K.F. Kadra, Rapport sur les recentes decouvertes en Algerie, in XI CIAC (Lyon 1986), Vatican City 1989, 1961-1973; N. Duval, L'inhumation privilégiée en Tunisie et en Tripolitanie, Actes de la Table ronde L'inhumation privilégiée du IV^e au VIII^e siècles en Occident. Créteil 1984, Paris 1986, 25-42; P.A. Février, Tombes privilégiées en Mauretanie et Numidie, Actes de la Table ronde L'inhumation priviligièe du IV^e au VIII siècles en Occident. Créteil 1984, Paris 1986, 13-23; R.M. Bonacasa Carra, Il complesso paleocristiano a nord del teatro di Sabratha: una revisione critica, in Actes du XI Congrés International d'Archéologie chrétienne, Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève, Aoste (September 21-28, 1986), II, 1986 Vatican City 1989, 1909-1926; N. Duval, Les églises doubles d'Afrique du Nord: Antiquité Tardive 4 (1996) 179-188; M. Khanoussi - A. Mastino (ed.), Uchi Maius, Sassari 1997; L. Ennabli, Carthage, 1997; L. Ennabli, La basilique de Carthage et le locus des sept moines de Gafsa. Nouveaux édifices chrétiens de Carthage, Paris 2000.

A. Appella

AGAPE. Neologism from the classical Greek (ἀγαπάω), initially appeared in the first translations of the OT from the Hebrew: indicated the notions of love and charity (Eccl 9:1). Also used later by *Philo (Deus 9), and particularly in the NT (64 times) to indicate the love of God for the Son, and that of the Son for human beings (the church), as well as the fraternal love among believers (1 Cor 1:13). Contrasted with eros, which generally designated merely human and natural love (Lk 11:42) and, in the classical tradition, its physical component. Also adopted to indicate the meetings and assemblies of the first Christian communities (2 Pet 2:13; 1 Cor 11:17; Jude 12). Later used by Christians to indicate concrete expressions of fraternal love within Christian communities, e.g., almsgiving and especially the sacred meals.

In light of the NT testimony, the question arises of reference to the Eucharist, which we find increasingly in the Fathers beginning with the subapostolic age until the time when the Eucharist was established as a ritual meal entirely separate from the community's common banquet. The use in the letter of Jude (12) clearly refers to a fraternal meal, whereas the sense of agape in Paul (1 Cor 11:17) is much discussed; there the meal and the Eucharist seem to correspond. Immediately afterward, the text contains the eucharistic account, which is the oldest non-Jewish *anaphoric testimony. Beginning in the 2nd c., the two moments of the Christian community appear separately in various sources, on the one hand the Lord's supper, and on the other the agape, which becomes the fraternal meal par excellence according to a ritual or semiliturgical type. In the first centuries these two practices were frequently so intertwined that they were not easily distinguishable; the agape was always a sort of secondary assembly in which a meal was shared, not just the bread, wine and water. Its close relation with the Eucharist in the 1st-2nd c. notwithstanding, the agape was also linked to the very common custom of meals in pagan religiosity, as well as Jewish. It is thought, therefore, to have been an autonomous custom that evolved with the Christian faith. From the 2nd c. on the practice began of a semiliturgical meeting to share the meal, especially with the most needy, and particularly among the most well-off Christian families, who in this way shared their goods. The specific purpose of the agape was to imitate the love of Christ for human beings in the attainment of fraternal love. In the 4th c. this meal took place at the tombs of the martyrs to honor their memory, without, however, losing the principal, social purpose of helping the most needy and thereby becoming a different practice (see Refrigerium). After the 5th c. the agape became rare, with expressions of fraternal help taking different forms, such as almsgiving. The patristic sources attest with little clarity to the practice of the agape, and always as a practice of only some local churches, highly variable with time and place. In Africa, for example, the practice was very widespread (Tert., Apo. 29) and was prohibited once abuses were reported; in Egypt the agape remained strictly joined to the Eucharist (Clem. Alex., Strom 3,2,10); *John Chrysostom (Hom. 54), however, speaks of a fraternal meeting after the Eucharist, where the faithful met to eat. In the Armenian and Georgian churches, the custom remained of a liturgical meal that took place in the presence of the minister, following the rituals of Jewish meals. With the onset of abuses in the 4th c., the agape was prohibited in various local churches and prohibited by some conciliar canons, even under penalty of excommunication. The first condemnation was issued by the Council of *Gangra (353) (can. 9.11), then reiterated by the Council of *Laodicea (363?) (can. 27.28). Later the prohibition was confirmed at *Carthage in 397, Orléans (535), *Tours (567) and *Trullo (692), preventing its spread; it thus had to assume other expresssions, always maintaining its purpose of charity within the Christian communities. The agape as a practice toward the most needy has never disappeared from the Christian life, though there have been significant changes. The Eastern liturgy preserves it in the form of the antirodon at the end of the liturgical functions, and there are various remnants of it in modern liturgies.

Sources. The following passages constitute some of the principal patristic sources: Ignatius (Smyrn.), Justin (Apol. 65-67), Irenaeus (Ad. haer. 29-31), Tertullian (Apol. 39; De ieiu. adv. 17), Hippolytus (Trad. Apost. 26-32), Clement of Alexandria (Paed. 2,2,19;2,10,96; Miscell. 1,19,96; Strom. 6,4,13), Origen (Adv. Cel. 8,33), Cyprian (Ep. 63, Ad Don. 16). In legislative writings: Didache 9,10; Didasc. Apostol. 11,26,28; Epistol. Apostol. 15,25; Const. Apostol. 31. Other authors from the 4th c. onward: John Chrys. (Hom. 22,27,54,57), Greg. of Naz. (Ep. 1,14), Augustine (Conf. 6,2; Ep. 22,2; Mor. eccl. 74).

Studies. J.F. Keating, The Agape and the Eucharist, London 1901; E. Baumgartner, Eucharistie und Agape, Solothurn 1909; K. Völker, Mysterium and Agape, Gotha 1927; J. M. Hanssens, L'agape et l'eucharistie: Ephem Liturg 41 (1927) 525-548; 42 (1928) 545-574; 43 (1929) 177-198, 520-529; B. Reicke, Diakonie, Festfreude und Zelos, Uppsala 1935; A. Hamman, Vie liturgique et vie sociale, Paris 1968; Id., Agape et repas de charité, Paris 1968; Id., La vie quotidienne en Afrique du Nord au temps de Saint Augustin, Paris 1979; E. Mazza, All'origine dell'eucaristia cristiana, in Segno di Unità, le più antiche eucaristie delle chiese, Community of Bose 1996; A. McGowan, Ascetic Eucharistics: Food and Drink in Early Christian Ritual Meals, Oxford 1999.

J.F. Rubio Navarro

AGAPE, CHIONIA and IRENE (d. 304). *Martyrs of *Thessalonica. The Greek passion of Agape, Chionia and Irene, already known through a Latin translation, was published by P. Franchi de' Cavalieri (ST 9, Rome 1902). Victims of *Diocletian's edicts of persecution (304), and the only Christians of their family, Agape, Chionia and Irene withdrew to a mountain near their city of *Thessalonica, taking with them all the Christian writings they owned to keep them from being destroyed. Returning to the city a few days later and found out as Christians, they were brought before the governor of the city, Dulcitius. The principal accusation was their obstinate refusal to eat the food consecrated to the gods (idolothytes). Remaining firm in the faith, they were condemned to be burned alive, Agape and Chionia first, then Irene. Their martyrdom took place on 1 April, which is why on or near that date their memory has customarily been included in the Synaxaria and martyrologies of East and West. The Greek passion names three other women with the first three—Cassia, Philippa and Eutychia—and a man, Agatho, but gives no details of their fate. A Latin passion relates the martyrdom of the three sisters to that of *Anastasia and *Chrysogonus, consequently placing it in *Aquileia. A document of this recension inspired the Benedictine nun Rosvita (10th c.) to write her play Dulcitius (PL 137, 993-1002).

P. Franchi de' Cavalieri: ST 9, Rome 1902, 3-19; DHGE 1, 876 n. 2; BS 1, 303-304; BHL IV Nov. Supp. 118-119; PG 117, 222-224; LCI 5, 42; Atti dei martiri, G. Caldarelli (ed.), Cinisello Balsamo 1985, 664-6764.

J.-M. Sauget

AGAPETI - AGAPETAE. In *Christology, the Greek term agapētos indicates the Son on whom God's favor rests. This was extended to *ascetics of both sexes who imitated the Master. It is mostly known, however, for its pejorative use by 4th-c. authors, designating virgins who lived with an ascetic or a celibate cleric: a practice already opposed by *Cyprian of Carthage, by the opponents of *Paul of Samosata (who called them syneisaktoi), by the synods of *Ancyra and *Nicaea, by *Aphraates and *Ephrem the Syrian, *Epiphanius (Panarion 63,2), Pseudo-Athanasius (Syntagma, PG 28, 837), *Jerome (Ep. 22,14), *Gregory of Nazianzus, *John Chrysostom, etc.

A. Guillaumont, Le nom des "agapètes": VChr 23 (1969) 30-37.

J. Gribomont

AGAPETUS, deacon (ca. 6th c.). Deacon of the Church of St. Sophia in *Constantinople, he is thought to have been the teacher of the emperor *Justinian I (527–565). Shortly after the latter's ascension to the throne, Agapetus dedicated to him an Ekthesis kephalaion parainetikon, also called Schede basilikè, i.e., an exposition of the obligations of a Christian prince in 72 mostly brief chapters, ordered *acrostically. In the composition of these capitula admonitoria, Agapetus displays a great knowledge of the *Hellenistic rhetorical tradition, drawing on Isocratean and *Platonic models and combining them with elements of the Christian tradition. Among the moral counsels are the following: respect laws, reprove the sinner, avoid bad company, do not employ dishonest persons in the administration of the state, resist anger toward enemies, don't be swayed by the praise of friends and be of fixed purpose in every action (27-35). Agapetus also offers typically Christian counsels: the emperor has received the scepter from God, needs only God and is the friend and servant of God; he must bear well in mind the passing nature of this world and persevere in the ascent to the good, so as to enjoy the eternal kingdom (61-72). Because of its simplicity, Agapetus's work had a great influence; it was used in scholastic teaching and translated into *Armenian and Old Church Slavonic. It was diffused in the West as an expression of the political pedagogy of humanism.

CPG III, 6900; PG 86, 1, 1153-1186; P. Henry, A Mirror for Justinian: The Ekthesis of Agapetus Diaconus: GRBS 8 (1967) 281-308; I. Sevcenko, Agapetus, East and West: The Fate of a Byzantine "Mirror of Princes": RESE 16 (1978) 3-44; J. Irmscher, Das Bild des Untertanen im Fürstenspiegel des Agapetos: Klio 60 (1978) 507-509; W. Blum, Byzantinische Fürstenspiegel. Agapetos, Theophylakt von Ochrid, Thomas Magister, Stuttgart 1981; R. Frohne, Agapetus Diaconus: Untersuchungen zu den Quellen und zur Wirkungsgeschichte der ersten byzantinischen Fürstenspiegels, Diff. Tübingen, 1985; R. Romano, Retorica e cultura a Bisanzio. Due Fuerstenspiegel a confronto: Vichiana 14 (1985) 299-316; S. Rocca, Un trattatista di età giustinianea: Agapeto Diacono: Civiltà Classica e Cristiana 10 (1989) 303-328; F. Iadevala (ed.), Scheda regia, introduction, critical text, Italian version, notes and indexes, Messina 1995; R. Riendiger (ed.), Der Fürstenspiegel für Kaiser Iustinianus, first critical edition, Athens 1995.

C. Dell'Osso

AGAPETUS I, pope (535–536). Son of Gordianus, presbyter of the Church of Sts. John and Paul on the Caelian hill, Agapetus was elected in 535, in part due to the support of the *Byzantine party. This perhaps explains his efforts for the rehabilitation of the antipope *Dioscorus (who was elected and died two years earlier). By this and other initiatives Agapetus contributed to the opposition to the popes' designation of their own successors. In 535 Sicily was controlled by Byzantium. For this reason the Italian king Theodahad, fearing *Justinian's designs for the peninsula, sent Agapetus to *Constantinople as a delegate. The move was ineffective, however, and the Byzantine troops remained in Italy. At Constantinople, despite the opposition of the court, Agapetus deposed the patriarch *Anthimus, a *monophysite, replacing him with the monk-priest Menas. Agapetus also intervened on various doctrinal questions at a synod desired by many monastic superiors who were appealing to the bishop of Rome. Agapetus fell sick while still at Constantinople and died there in 536. His remains were immediately transferred to Rome and buried in St. Peter's. He left seven letters.

CPL 1693; PL 66, 35-80; LP I, 287; DHGE I, 887-890; H.-I. Marrou, Autour de la bibliothèque du pape Agapit, Mél. d'Arch. et d'Hist. 1931, 124-169; G.B. Picotti, I sinodi romani nello scisma laurenziano, in Studi storici in onore di Gioacchino Volpe, II, Florence 1958, 770-771; BS I, 316-319 (I. Daniele - M.C. Celletti); J. Hofmann, Der hl. Agapet I und die Kirche von Bysanz, Ostkirchliche Studien 40 (1991) 113-132; LTK[3] 1,223 (J. Speigl); EPapi I, 504-508 (O. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

AGATHA (d. 250). Agatha's name is inserted on 5 February in the Mart. hier., the Calendar of *Carthage, the Gregorian *Sacramentary, the Mozarabic calendars and the Synaxarion of *Constantinople. Various churches were dedicated to her: at Rome, St. Agatha of the *Goths; on the Via Aurelia, in fundum Lardarium, the church built by Pope *Symmachus (498–514); *Gregory the Great founded a monastery dedicated to Sts. Maximus and Agatha at *Palermo, and had relics of the saint deposited in St. Stephen at Capri. The acts of her *martyrdom (BHL 133) have no historical value.

Mart. hier., 73; DHGE I, 909-910; BS I, 320-325; G. Consoli, S. Agata: Vergine e martire catanese, 2 vols., Catania 1951; L. Brusa, Gli atti del martirio di S. Agata: RCCM 1 (1959) 342-367; S. D'Arrigo, Il martirio di S. Agata nel quadro storico del suo tempo, 2 vols., Catania 1988; C. Morini, La Heilagra meyja drápa, 26-28 e il motivo della lapidazione di S. Agata: Siculorum Gymnasium 42 (1989) 275-286; L. Goosen, Dizionario dei santi. Storia, letteratura, arte e musica, Ital. tr. Milan 2000, 3-6; C. Morini, Una redazione sconosciuta della Passio S. Agatae: AB 109 (1991) 305-330; La passione di S. Agata di Aelfric di Eynsham, C. Morini (ed.), Corsi universitari 13, Alexandria 1993; O. Limone, Italia meridionale (950-1220), in Hagiographies II (1996), 43-44; M. Stelladoro, Ricerche sulla tradizione manoscritta degli atti greci del martirio di S. Agata: Bollettino della Badia greca di Grottaferrata n.s. 49-50 (1995-1996) 63-89; Il grande libro dei santi. Dizionario enciclopedico, C. Leonardi, A. Riccardi, G. Zarri (eds.), 3 vols., Milan 1998, I, 29-30; C. Morini, La Passio S. Agathae. La tradizione latina tardoantica e medievale: Cultura e scuola 137 (1996) 94-105; LTK[3] 1, 225; L. Dufour (ed.), Sant'Agata, Rome 1996; Id., La Passio S. Agathae. La tradizione medievale inglese: RCCM 42 (2000) 49-60.

V. Saxer

AGATHANGELOS (Agatʻangełos) (6th c.). Pseudonym of the author of a chronicle (Patmowtʻiwn Hayocʻ) of the conversion of the *Armenians by St. *Gregory the Illuminator. The author claims to be the secretary of King Tiridates (ca. 320) and an eyewitness of the events. The text is later, however (ca. 490?), as its anachronisms and contradictions show. A rather old (6th c.?) Greek translation was made from the original Armenian, on which depend various reworkings and shorter versions in Greek and the Eastern languages.

Patrologia V, 601-602; G. Ter-Mkrtčʻean - St. Kanayeancʻ, Agatʻangelos, Tʻipʻlis 1909 [crit. ed.]; A. Meillet, Remarques sur le texte de l'historien arménien Agathange: JA 16 (1910) 457-481; G. Garitte, Documents pour l'étude du livre d'Agathange (= ST 127), Vatican City 1946; P. Peeters, S. Grégoire l'Illuminateur dans le calendrier lapidaire de Naples: AB 60 (1942) 91-130; R.W. Thomson, The Teaching of Saint Gregory: An Early Armenian Catechism (Harvard Armenian Texts and Studies 3), Cambridge, MA 1970; G. Lafontaine, La version grecque ancienne du livre arménien d'Agathange. Édition critique (Publications de l'Institut Orientaliste de Louvain 7), Louvain 1973; R. Thomson, Agathangelos: History of the Armenians. Translation and Commentary, New York 1976; Id., The Teaching of Saint Gregory: Revised Edition. Translation, Commentary and Introduction (AVANT: Treasures of the Armenian Christian Tradition 1), New Rochelle 2001; G. Winkler, Our Present Knowledge of the History of Agat'angełos and Its Oriental Versions: REArm 14 (1980) 125-141; N.G. Garsoïan, The Iranian Substratum of the "Agat'angełos" Cycle: N.G. Garsoïan et al. (eds.), East of Byzantium: Syria and Armenia in the Formative Period, Washington 1982, 151-174; A. Hultgård, Change and Continuity in the Religion of Ancient Armenia with Particular Reference to the Vision of St. Gregory (Agathangelos §731-755), in T.J. Samuelian (ed.), Classical Armenian Culture: Influences and Creativity (Armenian Texts and Studies 4), Chico, CA 1982, 8-26; M.-L. Chaumont, Sur l'origine de saint Grégoire d'Arménie: Muséon 102 (1989) 115-130; M. van Esbroeck, Saint Grégoire d'Arménie et sa didascalie: Muséon 102 (1989) 131-145.

S.J. Voicu

AGATHO, pope (678–681). Born in Sicily, succeeded *Donus (676–678) and consecrated 27 June 678. Shortly after his election the autonomy of the church of *Ravenna came to an end, which was begun in 666 by the bishop *Maurus (instigated by Emperor *Constans II) and continued by his successor *Theodore. In 679 Agatho convoked a Roman council to reconfirm *Wilfrid as the bishop of York, who had been expelled by the king of Northumbria (Mansi 11, 179). He also sent the archcantor John (abbot of St. Martin near St. Peter's) to England to promote the spread of Gregorian chant and the Roman liturgical order. Agatho granted the request of emperor Constantine IV Pogonatos (sent to his predecessor Donus in 678) to send plenipotentiaries to *Byzantium to resolve the monothelite question with the patriarchs of *Constantinople and *Antioch. The pope convened a second council at Rome in 680 for that purpose, reaffirming the condemnation of monothelitism and nominating delegates to the conference of Constantinople. With the presence of 150 fathers, papal delegates and the emperor (who presided at the sessions), the conference was a true and proper ecumenical council—the sixth, Constantinople III, also known as *Trullo I—which registered the definitive rejection of monothelitism, the reconciliation between Rome and the East, and a broad recognition of papal authority (Mansi 11, 666). Agatho died before the end of the council, 10 January 681. We have two letters of his to the emperor on dyothelism forcefully reaffirmed by Rome and destined to be imposed on the universal church. His three letters to the English church are lost; another four are spurious.

CPL 1737; PL 87, 1161-1248; Mansi 11, 179, 234-315, 666 and 747; MGH, Ep. III, 92; LP I, 350-358; Jaffé I, 238-240; Hfl-Lecl 3, 238-40; H. Quentin, Les originaux latins des lettres des papes Honorius, S. Agathon et Léon II relatives au monothélisme, Misc. Amelli, Montecassino 1920, 71-76; DTC I, 559-563; DHGE I, 96-98; M. Gibbs, The Decrees of Agatho and the Gregorian Plan for York: Speculum 48 (1973) 213-246; S. Kutter, Implied Reference to the Digest in Pope Agatho's Synod of 679: ZSR Rom. Abt (1990) 382-384; M. Maccarone, Romana Ecclesiastica Cathedra Petri (P. Zerbi - R. Volpini - A. Galluzzi), Rome 1991, 78-95; S. Kutter, "Auctor noster beatus Petrus Apostolus": Pope Agatho on the Papal Office, Studia in hon. Eminent. Card. A.M. Stickler, Rome 1992; LTK³ 1,227 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 612-616.

M. Spinelli

AGATHONICE and companions (d. 161/180). Bishop Carpus, the deacon Papylus and the voluntary martyr Agathonice died at Pergamum on 15 April of an unknown year—during the reign of *Marcus Aurelius (161–180) according to some who base their views on *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE IV, 15,48), and under *Decius (250) according to those who rely on the Latin Acts of the Martyrs. The martyrologies frequently get their names wrong: the Latin Acts always call Papylus "Pamphylus." The essence of the original Acts of the Martyrs can possibly be recovered from the text common to the Greek and Latin redactions. Late revisions cite Agathodorus as Agathonice's companion.

Mart. hier., 188; Delehaye PM, 99-102, 293-299; M. Simonetti, Studi agiografici, Rome 1955, 97-107; G. Lazzati, Gli sviluppi della letteratura sui martiri nei primi quattro secoli, Turin 1956, 131-137; G. Lanata, Gli atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 109-116; BS 3, cols. 878-880; Atti e passioni dei martiri, introduction by A.A.R. Bastiaensen, critical text and commentary by A.A.R. Bastiaensen et al. (eds.), Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, Milan 1987, 33-45; LTK³ 5, 1264-1265; V. Saxer, Atti dei martiri dei primi tre secoli, Padova ²1989, 135-145; F. Scorza Barcellona, Agli inizi dell'agiografia occidentale, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, G. Philippart (dir.) (CC. Hagiographies III), Turnhout 2001, 72-74.

V. Saxer

AGATHONICUS of Tarsus (5th c.). Fictitious author of a corpus of brief texts originally written in Greek but surviving only in *Coptic in one complete manuscript and some fragmentary manuscripts. The original version was written in *Evagrian circles in the early 5th c. and was revised and expanded in the course of its trasmission in Coptic. The corpus included (1) a treatise against the anthropomorphytes (a Coptic version from the White Monastery has been altered in favor of *anthropomorphism); (2) a dispute with "Justin the Samaritan" on the resurrection of the body; (3) a dispute with "Stratonicus of Cilicia" on various arguments, especially providence; (4) an "apology" on unbelief. These works are interesting mainly as documentation of the large and small problems that were debated in 5th-c. Egyptian monastic circles, which can be found in *Palladius or *John Cassian, but only with difficulty in texts produced directly by the monks.

W.E. Crum, Der Papyroscodex Saec. VI-VII . . ., Strassburg 1915; T. Orlandi, Il Dossier copto di Agatonico di Tarso, Fest. Polotsky, Beacon Hill 1981; T. Orlandi, Agathonicus of Tarsus, in Copt. Enc. I, 68-70; T. Orlandi, Letteratura Copta e Cristianesimo Nazionale Egiziano, in A. Camplani (ed.), L'Egitto Cristiano - Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica: SEA 56, Rome 1997, 52-54.

T. Orlandi

AGDE, Council of. Some 30 bishops from the six ecclesiastical provinces of the kingdom of *Alaric, the *Arian king of the *Visigoths, met on 10 September 506, in the basilica of St. Andrew in Agde, under the presidency of *Caesarius of *Arles. This assembly signaled a clear change in the religious policy of the king toward peace and tolerance; the promulgation some months earlier (winter 505–506) of the Breviary of Alaric had the same significance. The fathers of Agde opened the session with a declaration of gratitude to the prince, who had restored their freedom, and with a fervent prayer to God for the king and the kingdom. The importance of the council is clear from various perspectives: it not only marks the transition from the councils of the Roman period to those of the *Merovingian period, from the Gallo-Roman to the Gallo-Frankish church, but it also assured a wide diffusion of the canonical discipline of Arles. Caesarius of Arles, president of the assembly, wanted the fathers to draw on the canons and laws of the ancient Fathers (can. 1); in fact, many decisions of the Council of Agde refer back to those of early provincial councils (cans. 1-5; 24; 29), to the collection known as "The Council of Arles" (cans. 11, 31, 35) or to the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua (cans. 20, 43-45), while others repeat canons of the Council of *Vannes (461–491), thus representing the legislation of the province of *Tours (cans. 37-42). The council addressed many disciplinary and liturgical problems, especially the conditions required for ordination (cans. 1, 16, 17, 43) and the duties of clerics (cans.. 2, 9-11, 20, 36, 39, 41, 42), insisting on the obligation of continence and good morals. Many of its provisions concerned ecclesiastical goods: it is a sacred duty to give legacies and donations to the church (can. 4); to steal the church's goods is to kill the poor (necator pauperum) (can. 4; see cans. 5-7). Generally speaking, ecclesiastical goods are inalienable (can. 22; see cans. 7 and 45); bishops must be convinced that they are not owners but only trustees of their diocese's property (can. 7). Clerics are urged to respect ecclesiastical courts (cans. 8 and 32), and laypeople to respect the law of the indissolubility of marriage (can. 25). Various norms regulated liturgical practices: the blessing of altars (can. 14); the celebration of the divine service (can. 30); Sunday Mass attendance (can. 47); the obligation of Communion at Christmas, Easter and Pentecost (can. 18); fasting (can. 12); and the imparting of the creed (can. 13). Can. 21 recorded that celebrations in chapels had to be regulated in the past so as not to interfere with services in the parishes. At the same council, rigorous norms were also promulgated regarding penitents (cans. 15 and 37), nuns (cans. 19 and 28), monks (cans. 27-28) and Jews (cans. 34 and 40). Finally, noteworthy was the council fathers' interest in protecting miserabiles personae: abandoned babies (can. 24) and freed and runaway slaves (cans. 29 and 46). A number of manuscripts attribute 23 canons to the Council of Agde, beyond the 49 authentic ones. These are in fact a private compilation borrowed from various Gallic sources, especially from the Council of Epaon of 517.

CCL 148, 189-228; Hfl-Lecl 2, 973-1002; M. Garnier, Le concile d'Agde, Montpellier 1906; Palazzini 1,7-8; LTK 1, 228.

Ch. Munier

AGELIUS of Constantinople (d. after 384). Bishop of the *Novatianist community of *Constantinople, exiled by *Valens ca. 365 for being anti-*Arian. After returning, he collaborated in 383 with the Catholic bishop *Nectarius to obtain *Theodosius's definitive approval of the Catholic faith and the condemnation of radical and moderate Arians and *Macedonians with the antiheretical provisions of 25 July and 3 December 383, and 21 January 384. Theodosius, recognizing the anti-Arian faith of the Novatianists, exempted them from the antiheretical provisions, leaving them undisturbed and allowing them to keep their churches.

DHGE 1, 931.

M. Simonetti

AGILULF (d. 616). *Longobard (Lombard) king. Having been the duke of *Turin, he was elevated in 590 to the throne of the Longobards after marrying *Theodelinda, *Authari's widow (Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. II, 35). Agilulf further strengthened royal authority against rebel dukes and vigorously pursued the struggle with the *Byzantines, especially against Romanus, exarch of *Ravenna, who had invaded several towns of Tuscia Romana. Agilulf besieged *Rome in 593; only the intervention of *Gregory the Great and the mediation of Theodelinda ended the siege. The energy and ability of the pope finally led to a truce (603) between Agilulf and the emperor Phocas. Admiration for the work of Gregory and the influence of Theodelinda favorably inclined Agilulf toward Catholicism and the church; it is probable that Agilulf converted to the Catholic religion and at Easter 603 had his son Adaloald baptized. At that point royal energy was directed toward the renovation and building of churches: at Theodelinda's wish, a church was built in honor of *John the Baptist at Monza, and in 612 a Catholic *monastery was founded at Bobbio, entrusted to the leadership of *Columbanus. Upon Agilulf's death in 616, royal power passed to his 13-year-old son Adaloald.

O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Istituto Nazionale di Studi Romani, Storia di Roma IX, Bologna 1941, 242-261; S. Gasparri, I duchi Longobardi, Studi Storici 109, Rome 1978, 17-21, 45-46; P. Delogu, Il regno Longobardo, in Storia d'Italia, I, Turin 1980, 34-45, 55, 60, 87-88, 352-354; S. Rota, La Chiesa di Roma di fronte ai barbari (V-VIII secolo), in L. Pani Ermini - P. Siniscalco (eds.), La Comunità Cristiana di Roma. La sua vita e la sua cultura dalle origini all'alto Medio Evo, Vatican City 2000, 159-166.

G. Pilara

AGNELLUS (ca. 486–569). *Archbishop of *Ravenna. Of noble birth, upon the death of his wife he abandoned a military career and was ordained, becoming deacon and praefectus of the Church of St. Agatha at Ravenna. On 24 June 557 he was elected archbishop of the city. He initiated major works of restoration and embellishment of churches in his diocese; his marble ambo and silver cross remain in the cathedral of Ravenna. Doctrinally, he firmly opposed the *Arian *heresy, writing an Epistola de natione fidei ad Armenium, in which he defended the *trinitarian doctrine of the church against the heresy (PL 68, 381-386). He is credited with reconciling to the Catholic Church the ecclesial communities influenced by the Arianism of the *Goths.

CPL 949; DBI 1, 428; PCBE II, Italie 2, Agnellus 3, 59-63; Agnello, arcivescovo di Ravenna. Studi per il XIV centenario della morte (570-1970), A. Torre (ed.), Società di Studi Romagnoli. Saggi e repertori XIV, Faenza 1971.

G. Pilara

AGNES (d. 250). The Depositio martyrum is the first document to mention the cult of S. Agnes at *Rome, on the Via Nomentana, 21 January. In 337–351 a basilica was built near the tomb, next to the so-called mausoleum of St. *Constantia, actually that of the founder of the basilica, Constantina. *Ambrose (De virg.. I, 2), *Damasus (Ferrua, Epigr. damas. n. 71) and *Prudentius (Perist. 14) give conflicting versions of her *martyrdom, agreeing only on her age (she had just reached puberty) and on the double merit of the young saint, virgin and martyr. With Peter, Paul and Lawrence, Agnes is a patron of Rome. The passions in Latin (BHL 156) and Greek (BHG 145-6) are romanticized. A cemetery developed around the tomb; many glass works in gold depict her. Her cult traveled to *Africa (Aug., Serm. 53; 273, 6; 286, 2; 354-5; Cal. Carth.), *Ravenna (St. Apollinare Nuovo), *Gaul and *Germany (liturgical books).

P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, S. Agnese nella tradizione e nella leggenda: RQA, Suppl. 10, Rome 1899; A. P. Frutaz, Il complesso monumentale di S. Agnese, Rome 1960; BS 1, 382-407; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 78-80; BHL Novum Supplementum (1986), 22-24; Histoire des saints, II, 62-70; F.E. Consolino, Modelli di santità femminili nelle più antiche passioni romane: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 84-113; L. Goosen, Dizionario dei santi. Storia, letteratura, arte e musica, Ital. tr., Milan 2000, 6-10; U. Nersinger, Die Lämmerweihe am Fest der heiligen Agnes. Von der Wolle der Lämmer zum Pallium, dem Würdezeichen des Papstes, der Patriarchen un der Metropoliten, Klosterneuburg-Vienna 1995; Il grande libro dei santi. Dizionario enciclopedico, C. Leonardi, A. Riccardi, G. Zarri (eds.), 3 vols., Milan 1998, I, 38-40; LTK[3] 1, 237-238; LCI 1,69; 5, 58-63.

V. Saxer

AGNOETAE. Followers of a *heresy begun in *Egypt by the deacon *Themistius of *Alexandria (first half 6th c.) as a consequence of the divisions and *schisms of the *monophysites. They are described in the quaest. 30 of ps.-*Caesarius. The agnoetae carried the doctrine of *Severus of Antioch to its ultimate consequences, preaching on the basis of Mk 13:32, Jn 11:34 and Lk 2:52 that Christ did not have perfect knowledge but, like all human beings, was subject to ignorance (*Leontius Scholasticus—who likens them to the Theodosians, Sect. V,6; X,3: PG 86, 1232.1261-1264). *Timothy of Constantinople lists them among the *Diacrinomeni as the fifth group, similar to the Severites (PG 86, 53.57). From *Photius we learn that they were refuted by one *Theodore, a monk of Alexandria (Bibl. cod. 108), and by *Eulogius of Alexandria (Bibl. cod. 230).

DCB I,62-63; K.-U. Uthemann, Kaiser Justinian als Kirchenpolitiker und Theologe. 2.5. Eine Zwischenbemerkung: Justinians Edikt gegen die Agnoeten: Augustinianum 39 (1999) 44-46 (with bibliography).

F. Cocchini

AGNUS DEI. According to the Liber pontificalis* (ed. Perovsky, II, 256), Pope *Sergius I, a Syrian, introduced the singing of the Agnus Dei into the Roman *Mass. In Eastern *liturgies, from the 6th c., the fractio of the bread was considered a symbol of the passion and death of Christ. The liturgy of Western *Syria preserves texts that were used during the fractio and which speak of the Lamb of God (Brightman, Liturgies, I, 99), alluding to Rev 5:6 and Jn 1:29-36. The singing of the Agnus Dei serves as a confractorium, i.e., as a song that accompanies the fractio. The Ordo Romanus I prescribes that the schola sing it while the bread is being broken (Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani, 101); thus the Agnus Dei, with its subdued sacrificial tone, gave an Eastern dimension to the fractio. This probably led to an understanding of the commixtio, which follows the fractio, as a symbol of the resurrection (Amalarius, Liber officialis, I, III, c. 33,2: ST 139, 365). In any case the Syrians, who practiced the commixtio from the 4th c., saw in it the symbol of the resurrection of Christ, and *Theodore of Mopsuestia explains it as the union of the body and blood of Christ (Hom. Cat. 16: ST 145, 533, 557-563). Thus the fractio and the commixtio of the fermentum [lit. leaven—a fragment of the consecrated host sent to the titular churchs for use in their celebration of the Eucharist at the point of the commixtio] in the Roman Mass, which originally had a different symbolism, assume a unified symbolism thanks to the Agnus Dei: the fractio indicates the death, the commixtio the resurrection.

F. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Oxford 1896; B. Capelle, Le rite de la fraction dans la messe romaine: RBen 53 (1941) 5-40; M. Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani du haut moyenâge. 2. Les textes, Louvain 1948 (Spicil. Sacrum Lovan., 23); J.P. De Jong, Le rite de la commixtion dans ses rapports avec les liturgies syriennes: Archiv f. katholisches Kirchenrecht 4 (1956) 245-278; 5 (1957) 33-79; U. Perovsky (ed.), Liber Pontificalis, Rome 1978 (Studia Gratiana, 22); N. Paxton, Breaking the Bread, in The Clergy Review 9 (1982) 327-332; G. Di Nola, Monumenta Eucharistica: La testimonianza dei Padri della Chiesa, vol. 2, Rome 1997, 53-55, 59-60; M. Metzger, The History of the Eucharistic Liturgy in Rome, in Handbook for Liturgical Studies, vol. 3, Collegeville 1999, 122-125.

A. Chupungco

AGRAECIUS (d. ca. 487). The name is variously written: Agraecius, Agroecius, Agritius. Bishop of Sens, second half 5th c. *Sidonius Apollinaris sent him a letter (Ep. VII,5), inviting Agraecius to accompany him to Bourges to reestablish order. He wrote an Ars de orthographia. At his death ca. 487 he was buried in the Church of Saint-Léon, a.k.a. Saint-Gervais-et-Protais. Toward the end of the 9th c. his successor bishop Antegisius transferred his relics to the monastery of St. Pierre-le-Vif. Feast 15 June. To be distinguished from the Spanish bishop *Agrestius.

Editions: Ed. of the Ars de orthographia, ed. H. Keil, in Grammatici latini, VII, Leipzig 1880, 113-125, repr. Hildesheim 1961; another edition: ed. M. Pugliarello in Collana di grammatici latini, Milan 1978.

Studies: AAS (1698) Junii, II, 687; DHGE 1 (1912) 1017; DBF 1 (1923) 802-803 (with bibl.); BS 1 (1961) 616 (with bibl.); Histoire littéraire de la France, II, Paris 1974, 564; M. Irvine, The Making of Textual Culture: "Grammatica" and Literary Theory, 350-1100 (Cambridge Studies in Medieval Literature 19), Cambridge 1994; E. Pérez Rodríguez, La cristianización de la Gramática latina (ss. V-IX), in A. Alberte González, C. Macías Villalobos (eds.), Actas del Congreso Internacional "Cristianismo y tradición latina." Málaga, 25 a 28 de abril de 2000, Malaga 2001, available also in electronic AnMal n. 6 at: http://www.anmal.uma.es/anmal/numero6/Estrella.htm.

M. Maritano

AGRAPHON. Greek term meaning "unwritten word," used to indicate a saying of Christ (but not a discourse) not contained in the canonical gospels. Agrapha of Jesus, i.e., words attributed to him, are found in other books of the NT (see Acts 20:35, quoted in 1 Clem. II; Rom 14:14; 1 Th 4:16-17); in variants of gospel MSS (see that quoted by D in Lk 6:5); in apocryphal texts (Evan. Aegypt., Praed. Petr., Evan. Hebr., etc.); in apocryphal passages quoted by the Fathers (see Clem., Exc. ex Theodot. 2,2; Jerome, In Ephes, 5,3-4; Adv. Pelag. 3,2); and in numerous patristic texts (see Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 24,158; Tert., Bapt. 20; De orat. 26; Just., Dial. 35; 47). Research on agrapha has been particularly enriched by the discovery of the *Oxyrhyncus papyri (nos. 1 and 654, published 1897 and 1904 respectively, which contain maxims of Jesus introduced by the expression λέγει Ἰησοῦς, and are thus also called logia; others have been added to these: nos. 655; 840; 1224, etc.) and some *Coptic MSS, among these the Gospel of Thomas, a genuine collection of sayings of Jesus, which are still being evaluated critically. The most recent studies of the whole body of material seem to lead to the conclusion that agrapha were present in the earliest days of Christianity and point to a multiform tradition regarding Jesus that is not included in the canonical gospels, though it circulated throughout the wider church. The difficulty in determining which of these "sayings" are certainly authentic does not rule out the possibility that some may be. Moreover, the works containing agrapha do not intend to alter what is offered by an examination of Christ's words in the canonical gospels. The largest collection of agrapha, in the broad sense of the term—i.e., passages cited as scriptural by some ecclesiastical authors but not found in Scripture—is that of S. Resch, Agrapha Aussercanonische Schriftfragmente, Leipzig 1906 TU n.s. XV 3/4, a point of departure for further study (see Vaganay, s.v. agrapha, DBS I, 159-198).

J. Ruwet, Les "agrapha" dans les œuvres de Clément d'Alexandrie: Biblica 30 (1949) 133-160; J. Jeremias, Gli agrapha di Gesù, Brescia [2]1975; W.D. Stroker, Extracanonical Saying of Jesus, Atlanta 1989; L. Moraldi, Detti segreti di Gesù, Milan [2]1989; Erbetta 1/1, 83-110; H. Koester - F. Bovon, Une production de la communauté chretienne: les paroles du Seigneur, in Genèse de l'Ecriture chrétienne, Turnhout 1991, 23-58; L. Moraldi, Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento. Vangeli, Casale Monferrato 1994, 529-572.

M.G. Mara

AGRESTIUS (5th c.). Bishop of Lugo (*Gallaecia). The only thing known of his life is his attempt in 433 to oppose the episcopal election of *Pastor and *Syagrius (Idatius, Chron., ed. Tranoy, SCh 218, Paris 1974, n. 102), adversaries of *Priscillianism. It is not known whether Priscillian sympathies motivated Agrestius's opposition; in any case he probably attracted suspicion in this regard. A short, fragmented poem has recently been attributed to Agrestius, titled Versus Agresti Ep. de fide ad Avitum Ep. The content of the work, a didactic letter with a profession of faith regarding esp. the creation ex nihilo fits Agrestius's situation well and could be his response to accusations of *heresy.

CPL 1463a; PLS 5, 400-401; A.C. Vega: Boletín de la Real Academia de la historia 159 (1966) 203-206; K. Smolak: SAW (Phil. Hist. Klasse) 284/2 (1973); A. Di Berardino, Agrestio, Patrologia III, 310-311; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina ispano-cristiana, T. II: siglos IV-V, Madrid 1997, 70-71.

E. Prinzivalli

AGRICIUS (d. ca. 332). Bishop of *Trier early 4th c., when the city was an imperial capital. As perhaps the successor of St. *Paternus, he would have been sent to Trier by Pope *Sylvester. He took part in the Council of *Arles (314) and signed the conciliar acts after the diocesan bishop who presided at the council, a sign of the importance of his episcopal see. His successor, also, was the second signer of the Council of Serdica (343). *Athanasius, present at Trier in 335/336, mentions the numerous Christian communities and the churches under construction. *Lactantius resided at Trier during Agricius's episcopate as the tutor of Crispus. Feast 19 January (previously 13).

AASS, 1 Jan 773-781 (legendary biography); J. Marx, Der Biograph des Bischofs Agricius: Wetd. Zeitschr. für Geschichte und Kunst 12 (1982) 37-50; L. Duchesne, Fastes épisc. III, 35; DHGE 2,1014; N. Gauthier, L'évangelisation des pays de la Moselle, Paris 1980, 35-47.

A. Di Berardino

AGRIPPA I, or Herod Agrippa (10/9 BC–AD 44). Son of Aristobulus and Berenice, nephew of Herod the Great. Educated at *Rome, where he gained the favor of the emperor *Caligula, who in 37 conferred on him the tetrarchies of Philip (the territories of Batanaea, Ituraea and Trachonitus) and Lysanias (Abilene), and in 40 the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas (Galilee, Perea). Agrippa remained at Rome, however, intervening in favor of the Jewish cause in *Jerusalem and especially opposing the emperor's design to place a statue of himself in the temple. After Caligula's death, he aligned himself with *Claudius, favoring his ascent to the imperial throne. As recompense, Claudius gave him Judea and Samaria (41), thus reuniting the territory of his grandfather Herod. Only then did Agrippa leave the imperial city for Jerusalem to take possession of his territories. After his death in 44 Judea was again reduced to a Roman province. Agrippa was directly responsible for the persecution of Christians (Acts 12:1-3). He died suddenly at *Caesarea in Palestine in 44 (Acts 12:21-23; Flavius Josephus, Jew. Ant. XIX, 8,2).

U. Holzmeister, Storia dei tempi del NT, Turin 1950, 90-100; E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), I, A new english version revised and edited by G. Vermes - F. Millar, Edinburgh 1973, 442-454; E.M. Smallwood, The Jews under Roman Rule, Leiden 1976, 194; S. Freyne, Galilee, From Alexander the Great to Hadrian 323 BCE to 135 CE, Edinburgh 1998; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'Impero romano, Naples 1991, [2]2000, 33-35; G. Filoramo - D. Menozzi (eds.), Storia del cristianesimo. L'antichità, Rome-Bari 2001, 26-28.

G. Pilara

AGRIPPA II (ca. 28–ca. 92). Marcus Julius Agrippa, son of *Agrippa I; educated at *Rome. *Claudius did not want to give him the reign of *Judea inherited from his father, Agrippa, considering him too young. At the death of Herod of *Chalcis, Agrippa inherited both his reign and his wife, Berenice, Agrippa's natural sister. He remained for a long time at the imperial court at Rome to secure favors; Claudius took Chalcis from him but gave him the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias in exchange (53). From the new emperor, *Nero, Agrippa obtained control of some cities of Galilee and Perea (55), concessions that were the fruit of Agrippa's absolute fidelity to the Roman Empire: this was esp. manifest during the Jewish revolt of 66, during which Agrippa collaborated with the Romans, who repaid him by enlarging his realm. He was again at Rome on the occasion of *Titus's Jewish victory (70). With his sister Berenice he wanted to hear Paul, who was prisoner at *Caesarea, becoming convinced of his innocence (Acts 25:13; 26:1ff.).

U. Holzmeister, Storia dei tempi del NT, Turin 1950, 100-103; E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), I, A new english version revised and edited by G. Vermes - F. Millar, Edinburgh 1973, 417-483; S. Freyne, Galilee, From Alexander The Great to Hadrian 323 BCE to 135 CE, Edinburgh 1998; G. Filoramo - D. Menozzi (eds.), Storia del cristianesimo. L'antichità, Rome-Bari 2001, 28-29, 70-71.

G. Pilara

AGRIPPA CASTOR (2nd c.). Antignostic author who wrote, probably during the reign of *Hadrian (117–138), a "most effective refutation" of the exegetical works of the *gnostic *Basilides; according to *Theodoret he also refuted *Isidore (Haer. 1,4), another gnostic. His work is lost, but *Eusebius of Caesarea offers a brief summary (Hist. eccl. 4,7,6-8). *Jerome eulogizes him as a "very cultured and strong" person (Vir. ill. 21).

H. Leisegang, Gnosis, Stuttgart [5]1985, 198-202; W.A. Löhr, Basilides, Tübingen 1996, 5-14.

S. Samulowitz

AGRIPPINUS of Carthage (d. after 220). *Cyprian twice mentions this bishop as his predecessor bonae memoriae (Ep. 71, 4; 73, 3), and three times mentions the council held by him at *Carthage (ibid.; Ep. 70,1) "some years ago" (Ep. 73,3). The council is thought to have met ca. 220 and was the first known *African council; it already indicates, with the convocation of the bishops of Proconsular *Africa and *Numidia (Aug., Ep. 71,4), the primacy of the bishop of Carthage, due to the antiquity and importance of the city and the prestige of the church. The council may have been linked to the question of the penitence accorded adulterers by pope *Callistus. It also decided that only *baptism conferred by Catholics should be considered legitimate. *Augustine (Ep. 3,13,14) says that 70 bishops participated (Bapt. 3,13,14 and Ep. 70,1; 71,4; 73,3; 93,10,35).

DTC 1, 637-8; L. Duchesne, Histoire ancienne de l'Église, I Paris 1906, 422; Hfl-Lecl 1, 154-5; Monceaux 1, 19ff.; Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa (ed. it.), vol. II, Turin 1972, 133, n. 135; J.-L. Maier, L'épiscopat de l'Afrique romaine vandale et byzantine, Bibliotheca Helvetica Romana 11, Rome 1973, 253 and passim; F. Decret, Le christianisme en Afrique du Nord Ancienne, Paris 1996, 45, 64, 84, 113; J.A. Fischer - A. Lumpe, Die Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, in W. Brandmüller (ed.), Konziliengeschichte, Paderborn-Munich- Vienna-Zürich 1997, 50-52; 153-157; 159-161; 235; 240ff.; 247; 280ff.

T. Sardella

AGRIUSTIA the African (4th-5th c.). A defender of the calculation of Easter inaugurated by *Augustalis. In the sixteenth year of *Genseric's reign, he wrote Computus Carthaginensis a. 455 (PL 59, 545ff.). The author presents himself as an anonymous African mathematician; he also opposes Augustalis's critics, among whom was Agriustia, himself the author somewhat earlier of the work De ratione Paschali, dedicated to a certain Hilarianus. It is known that Agriustia was born at Municipium Thimidensium Regiorum, i.e., Thimida Regia in Mauretania Caesariensis in Tunisia, modern Sidi Ali el Sedfini. The date of the floruit is perhaps also known—late 4th c. (397)—if the Hilarianus to whom the work is dedicated is Quintus Julius *Hilarianus.

Baluze: PL 59, 521C-D; B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie. Der 84 jährige Ostercyclus und seine Quellen, Leipzig 1880, 23ff.; PCBE 1,49-50.

V. Loi - B. Amata

AIDAN of Lindisfarne (d. 651). In his account of the life of bishop Aidan of *Lindisfarne, *Bede recounts that Aidan died twenty years before Bede himself was born. King Oswald of Northumbria, wanting to spread faith in God within his kingdom, appealed to the *monastery at Iona (Lat. Hii)—where he himself was baptized some years earlier, while in exile—for a missionary who would evangelize his subjects (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. III, 5). The rigid preaching of Corman, the apostle sent by the Scots, was nevertheless unable to penetrate the hearts of the Northumbrian people or to overcome the vigorous pagan resistence of the Angles. Aidan, present at a meeting upon Corman's return from Northumbria, rejected the failed missionary's accusations against the Northumbrians of barbarities, invoking instead a celebrated passage from St. Paul (see 1 Cor 3:2), that they needed to be treated with greater gentleness and persuasion. These words, which displayed Aidan's profound gifts before the entire assembly of the elders, pointed to him as the new missionary. Immediately consecrated bishop (635), he was sent to King Oswald, who accepted him with much goodwill, giving him a small island in the North Sea as a residence, opposite the royal residence of Bamborough, Lindisfarne (later known as the Holy Island); it immediately became a monastery and episcopal see, the primacy of which for ecclesiastical activity in England was recognized by the Synod of Whitby in 664.

In 642, upon King Oswald's death in the battle of Maserfelth at the hands of Penda, pagan king of Mercia, Northumbria was divided into two separate kingdoms: Bernicia, ruled by Oswiu, Oswald's brother, and Deira, ruled by Oswine, son of Osric, king of Deira. Just as Oswald had supported Aidan's difficult missionary work in every way, the bishop also found a faithful ally in Oswine, whose cruel death at the hands of Oswiu—according to Bede (III, 14)—Aidan had predicted and deeply mourned. Only 12 days after that tragic event and after 17 years as a bishop, Aidan died (31 August 651), his place being taken for 10 years by Finan.

Nothing is known of Aidan's birthplace (though it is reasonably proposed that he was Irish), and very little of his youth. Attributed to him, though not without strong dissent, are the Commentarii in Scripturam and the Homiliae et conciones; in reality, we only know a few of Aidan's sayings, passed down to us by Bede. Apostolic zeal, honesty, abstinence, continence, charity, and love of prayer and the study of Scripture are only a few of the many good points attributed to him, though Bede himself reproved him harshly for not conforming to Roman usage and for remaining attached to *Celtic usage for the celebration of Easter (III, 17). Many miracles were attributed to him, including the instantaneous calming of a storm at his preaching (III, 15), the sudden extinguishing of a huge fire set by Penda at Bamborough (III, 16) through his prayer, and the sudden sacredness of the place where he died, which quickly became a place of pilgrimage. He was buried in the monastic cemetery of Lindisfarne, but his relics were soon transferred to the church dedicated to St. Peter at Lindisfarne; later (664) bishop Colman, successor of Finan, took some of his mortal remains to the monastery of Iona (III, 26).

His feast is 31 August, the annivesary of his death; the Church of Bamborough is consecrated in his name. He is frequently depicted iconographically with a deer at his feet.

Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. III, 3, 5, 14-17; DCB 1, 65-67; DHGE 1, 1106-1107; BS 1, 625-627; LTK 1, 272.

M. Ghilardi

AILERAN the Wise (d. 665). Monk at Clonard (Meath, in Ireland), wrote Interpretatio mystica progenitorum Christi and Rythmus in Eusebii Canones. The first work, based on *Jerome and other sources, gives the etymology of the names of Jesus' ancestors, which it then relates to Jesus and to ourselves: for example, Abraham means "sublime father": such is Christ (Is 9:6), whereas we must become fathers, i.e., doers, of virtue. The Rythmus, in 36 catalectic trochaic senarii, deals with the symbolism of the four beasts of the Apocalypse, traditionally identified with the four evangelists.

CPL 1120-1121; PL 80, 327-342; 101, 729; DHGE 1,1146; W. Meyer, Gildae oratio rythmica, NGWG 1912, 63-67; E. Coccia, La cultura irlandese precarolingia. Miracolo o mito?: StudMed 8 (1967) 332-334; N. Netzer, Willibrord's Scriptorium at Echternach and Its Relationship to Ireland and Lindisfarne, in St. Cuthbert, His Cult and His Community to AD 1200, eds. G. Bonner - D. Rollason - C. Stancliffe, Woodbridge 1989, 206-207; Patrologia IV, 451-452.

M. Simonetti

AITHALLA of Edessa (d. 345/348). Aeithalas in Greek, Aithalaha or Ithalaha in *Syriac, Atheghahay in *Armenian, bishop of Edessa 324–345/348. According to the 6th-c. Chronicle of Edessa, he became famous for the construction of a cemetery east of the Mesopotamian metropolis. He subscribed to the Council of Nicaea. A letter has been attributed to him, preserved in Armenian and published by P.I. Thorossian in 1942, which is considered authentic by A. Vööbus, who employs it to show the use of the Diatessaron at Edessa before *Rabbula; this "Letter of Aithalla, Bishop of Edessa" has been examined by M.G. de Durand from a dogmatic perspective. The existence of a synodal letter from the Council of Nicaea would indeed be of extraordinary interest. Its *trinitarian doctrine is highly evolved, whereas its *Christology predates Ephesus. It seems to have in mind esp. the errors of the *Audiani, a sect which began at Edessa ca. 340. The letter could be only late 4th c., or perhaps its trinitarian doctrine was altered. The letter was recently restudied by Bruns, who considers it an important source of the earliest Syriac theology. Regarding the Diatessaron, in fact, the most recent studies seem to acknowledge a use at Edessa before Rabbula. After the Council of *Ephesus (431) it was burned together with the works of *Theodore of Mopsuestia and *Nestorius. Some fragments of this work, cited—I believe—by the Doctrina Addai, are known to us, not only through *Ephrem the Syrian, who commented on them, but also by *Aphraates (3rd-4th c.) and by a scrap of parchment from *Dura Europos (3rd c.) with a Greek translation of the Syriac text, according to Welles.

P.I. Thorossian, Aithallae episcopi edesseni epistula ad Christianos in Persarum regione de fide, Venice 1942, 75; M.G. Durand, Un document sur le concile di Nicée? RSPh 50 (1966) 615-627; A. Vööbus, Studies in the History of the Gospel Text in Syriac, CSCO 128, Subs. 3, Louvain 1951, 40; J.M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 370, Subs. 38, Louvain 1970, 125, note 60; C.B. Welles et al., The Excavations at Dura-Europos, V/1, New Haven 1959, 73-74; M.E. Boismard, Le Diatessaron: de Tatien à Justin, Études Bibliques n.s. 15, 1992; P. Bruns, Aithallahas Brief über den Glauben. Dokument frühsyrischen Theologie, OC 76 (1992) 46-73; W. Petersen, Diatessaron, in Anchor Dict. of the Bible, II (1992) 189-190; J. Teixidor, Bardesane d'Édesse: la première philosophie syriaque, Paris 1992, 21, 23 and 123; P. Bruns, Brief Aithallahas, des Bischof von Edessa (Urhai) an die Christen des Perserlandes über den Glauben, OC 77 (1993) 120-136; C. McCarthy, Saint Ephrem's Commentary on Tatian's Diatessaron, Manchester-Oxford 1993, JSS Suppl. 2; T. Baarda, Essays on the Diatessaron, Kampen 1994; J.P. Lyon, Syriac Gospel Translations, Louvain 1994, CSCO 548, Subs. 88; W. Petersen, Diatessaron: Its Creation, Dissemination, Significance, and History in Scholarship, Leiden 1994, VC Suppl. 25; Id., The Diatessaron of Tatian, in The Text of the New Testament, eds. B.D. Ehrman - M.W. Holmes, Grand Rapids 1995, 777-796; I. Ramelli, Alcune osservazioni sulle origini del Cristianesimo nelle regioni ad est dell'Eufrate, in La diffusione dell'eredità classica nell'età tardoantica e medioevale, eds. R.B. Finazzi - A. Valvo, Alexandria 1998, 209-225.

M. van Esbroeck - I. Ramelli

AKSUM (Axum). Town in N *Ethiopia, capital of the first Ethiopian kingdom, founded mid-2nd c. AD or shortly before. From numismatic and epigraphic evidence we can reconstruct the approximate chronology of the Aksumite dynasty—which seems to have ended toward the beginning of the 8th c.—and with it also the chronology of the penetration of Christianity in Ethiopia. The Aksumite period included the first phase of Ethiopian literature (4th-6th c.) in which many works were translated from the Greek.

J.T.B. Bent, The Sacred City of the Ethiopians, London 1896; Deutsche Aksum-Expedition (4 vols.), Berlin 1913; R. Pankhurst, The Greek Coins of Aksum: Abba Salama 6 (1975) 70-83; S.C.H. Munro-Hay, The Munro-Hay Collection of Aksumite Coins (Supplement . . . to the Annals 48), Naples 1986; S.C.H. Munro-Hay et al., Excavations at Aksum: An Account of Research at the Ancient Ethiopian Capital Directed in 1972-4 by the Late Dr Neville Chittick (Memoirs of the British Institute in Eastern Africa 10), London 1989; S.C.H. Munro-Hay, Aksum: An African Civilisation of Late Antiquity, Edinburgh 1991; E. Bernand - A.J. Drewes - R. Schneider, Recueil des inscriptions de l'Éthiopie des périodes pré-axoumite et axoumite. Introduction de Fr. Anfray. I: Les documents; II: Les planches; III: Traductions et commentaires. A. Les inscriptions grecques, Paris 1991-2000; D.W. Phillipson, Ancient Ethiopia: Aksum: Its Antecedents and Successors, London 1998; R. Fattovich et al., The Aksum Archaeological Area: A Preliminary Assessment (Oriental University Institute. Department of studies and research on Africa and the Arab countries. Archaeological Laboratory. Working paper 1), Naples 2000; Archaeology at Aksum, Ethiopia, 1993-7, by D.W. Phillipson et al. (Memoirs of the British Institute in Eastern Africa 17; Research Committee of the Society of Antiquaries of London 65), London 2000.

S.J. Voicu

ALARIC I (ca. 370–410). King of the *Visigoths. After commanding the *Goths who lived as foederati in *Moesia and *Pannonia, on the death of *Theodosius (395), as king of the Visigoths, he invaded *Macedonia and Greece. The emperor *Arcadius allowed him to live in Illyricum, naming him magister militum. A few years later, Alaric tried to invade *Italy but was severely defeated by the supreme commander of the imperial troops, *Stilicho, at Pollentia in Piedmont (402) and at *Verona (403). On the death of Stilicho in 408, Alaric returned to Italy, advancing as far as the gates of *Rome, which he sacked on 24 August 410 (Orosius, Hist. Adv. Pag., 39,1; 40,1). The event made a great impression on his contemporaries, esp. St. *Augustine, who was inspired to conceive the great design of the City of God (Retract. 2, 43, 1). Alaric then proceeded toward S Italy, intending to go to *Africa, but died shortly thereafter, on the Busento River near the city of Cosenza.

P. Courcelle, Histoire littéraire des grandes invasions germaniques, Paris [2]1964, 31-77; E. Demougeot, La formation de l'Europe et les invasions barbares, 2, De l'avènement de Dioclétien (284) à l'occupaton germanique de l'Empire romain d'Occident (debut du VI^e^ siècle), II, Paris 1979, 451-464; G. Albert, Goten in Kostantinopel, Untersuchungen zur oströmischen Geschichte um das Jahr 400 n. Chr, Paderborn 1984; B. Luiselli, Storia culturale dei rapporti tra mondo romano e mondo germanico, Rome 1992, 384, 419-421, 556-557; L. Gatto, Storia di Roma nel Medioevo, Rome 2000, 56-64.

G. Pilara

ALBAN of Verulamium (d. 303). The first testimony of Christianity in *Britain, with high probability, may be the tradition surrounding the martyrdom of Alban at Verulamium. Alban, protomartyr Angliae according to *Bede's account (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. I, 7) which certainly draws on earlier writers, in particular *Constantius of Lyons and *Gildas, is thought to have been born at Verulamium—modern St. Albans in Hertfordshire—of a well-to-do pagan Roman family. With the outbreak of the persecution of *Diocletian and *Maximian, he is said to have given refuge to a Christian priest in his house; impressed by his doctrine and piety, Alban was *baptized by him. The Roman governor, meanwhile, informed of the presence and preaching of a Christian priest at Verulamium (from the 12th c. considered to have been the cleric Amphibalus), had him sought out. Discovering that he was at Alban's house, he sent soldiers to arrest him; fooled by a disguise, they brought Alban instead. His true identity then discovered, and refusing to offer sacrifice to the pagan gods, he was beaten, imprisoned and decapitated.

Miraculous episodes before the *martyrdom showed Alban's holiness: needing to cross a bridge packed with people who had come to view the supreme sacrifice to reach the place of execution, and so as not to unduly delay his ascent to heaven, he prayed for the waters of the river to part, leaving a dry passage for him and the crowd. The executioner was converted by this miracle and was himself martyred along with Alban. Arriving at the hill designated as the place of martyrdom, recorded in the account as Holmhurst Hill (perhaps identifiable with the modern town of Holywell Hill), and extremely thirsty, he prayed to the Lord for a gush of water to quench his thirst, which happened immediately. Finally, as Alban's severed head lay on the ground, the new executioner's eyes fell out, according to a topos common to many other passiones.

Bede's date of 303 for the martyrdom is unlikely, since Diocletian's persecution did not extend to Britain, and thus some modern scholars have considered the account to be the fruit of the imagination of ancient *hagiographers, even to the point of denying the saint's existence; many others have tried to place the martyrdom in the 3rd c. In any event, Alban can be considered to have fallen victim to an unknown local persecution of the same time, given that his cult must have existed very early; indeed, there are various attestations long before Bede. In 429, e.g., according to the Chronicon Integrum of *Prosper of Aquitaine (PL 51, 595), in a climate of frequent contact between the island and the continental *Gallic world, St. *Germanus bishop of Auxerre and St. *Lupus bishop of Troyes were called to Britain by their brothers to combat the *Pelagian *heresy widespread on the island. After successfully opposing the heretics and before returning to their country, they visited Alban's tomb to give thanks; the visit to the holy place, already the destination of many pilgrimages, was certainly propitious for the two Gallic bishops, who, thanks to the martyr, faced the return trip to *Gaul with absolute tranquility. A few years later Gildas recounts the martyrdom (De excidio et conquestu Britanniae 10-11); *Venantius Fortunatus, bishop of *Poitiers, in describing the celestial court mentions Alban as a glorious representative of Britain (Carmina, VIII, 3, v. 155); and a passio in his honor had already been composed in Gaul in the first half of the 6th c. Well into the Middle Ages, thanks in particular to the writings of Matthew of *Paris, monachus ecclesiae Sancti Albani as he called himself, the story of Alban spread widely and his cult reached beyond the British Isles.

A further confirmation of the antiquity of the cult, and a testament to the truth of the martyr's existence, is the fact that Germanus's biography tells us absolutely nothing about him, leaving us to understand that he must have been well known to his readers and required no clarifying information. According to a late medieval tradition considered doubtful by many modern critics, Offa, king of Mercia (d. 796), after the discovery of Alban's relics (forgotten following a supposed destruction of the site by Saxon invaders), founded beside the martyr's church (which already existed at the time of Bede's account, and according to whom was the place of many conversions and miracles of every kind) an excellent *Benedictine *monastery that later developed into the great abbey of St. Albans. Below the present-day cathedral of St. Albans, therefore, are presumed to be the Roman structures of the old martyrial memoria of Alban, i.e., the church visited by Germanus in 429 and later recorded by Bede. Archaeological excavations, while not yet having directly documented the existence of the primitive church—probably completely obliterated by the construction of the Norman cathedral—have in fact unearthed a vast late-Roman necropolis which could testify to the presence of the old martyrial memoria outside the walls of Verulamium, dedicated to Alban and quickly transformed, at first into a cemetery, according to a well-known custom in the ancient world of the desire of the faithful to be near the venerated saint, and later into a genetic center, from which the medieval city got its origins.

It should also be noted that the saint, depicted iconographically as a Roman soldier armed with sword and cross, or more often as one carrying his own head, is often confused with Albin, a Roman martyr venerated in *Germany; also, the title conferred on him of protomartyr Anglorum must be simply accepted as an anachronism, since, as is known, the Angles invaded the territory of ancient Britain only much later.

Analyses of the literary sources and recent bibl. in M. Ghilardi, Egregium Albanum fecunda Britannia profert. Albano e i primi santi della Britannia romana: RomBarb 17 (2002) 1-18.

M. Ghilardi

ALBANIA of Caucasus. A territory corresponding to present-day N Azerbaijan and S Dagestan. Strabo and Latin authors speak of a kingdom of Albania, conquered by Pompey in 67/66 BC, but from the 3rd c. under the influence of the *Sassanid kingdom. According to the tradition, Albania knew the Christian religion early: Moses of Outi (ed. C.J.F. Dowsett) specifies that Elisaeus, a disciple of *Thaddaeus, was the region's first bishop, ordained at *Jerusalem, though in fact we have no precise data earlier than the 4th c. Notable among the first catholicoi was Gregory, nephew of St. *Gregory the Illuminator (see *Faustus of Byzantium, in Langlois, Collection, I, 213). A later bishop of the region was present at the Council of *Seleucia in 421, and still later the Albanians participated at the Council of *Vagharshapat, where they officially embraced *monophysitism. From the time of the conversion of the *Huns to Christianity, due to the work of bishop Israel (late 7th c.), the Albanian church shared the fortunes of the *Armenian church. The sources (Moses of Outi) record, if only with sparse notes, the first church buildings established in the region, including the Church of Amaraz, the *metropolitan see, built by the *catholicos Gregory. Surviving *archaeological evidence, like the sources, is scant: it includes the complex at Supagvlane, with an older, small single-aisled basilica datable to the 5th–6th c., and a similar later building (8th–9th c.); and the basilica of Kum (6th c.), with three aisles divided by pillars and cross-transepts: this building, related to Armenian churches like Tekon and Ereruk (see K.V. Trever, Osservazioni, 297ff.), also has specific points of contact with a type of building created in neighboring *Georgia, the so-called three-church basilica (see in particular Zegani, 7th c.). The most important building from the perspective of art history, however, is the church near the village of Lekit in N Azerbaijan, a tetraconch with ambulatory closely resembling Zvant'noc; like Zvant'noc, it also forms part of a vast complex, of which there are considerable remains. It is built of stones from the riverbed, laid in regular courses, a technique used in that region; the outer wall is modulated with blind arcades, similar to Zvartnots and Bana. Unlike Zvartnots, Lekit has two apsed rooms projecting from the NE and SE corners, which is similar to Bana, except that in the latter the (four) rooms are within the perimeter of the building. The complete absence of literary and epigraphic sources is a serious obstacle to a more profound understanding of the building, esp. regarding the date of its foundation and its precise *liturgical functions: the attribution of this building to the time of Juansher, prince of Albania (637–638/680–681), is entirely hypothetical, even if, according to Kleinbauer (Zvart'noc, 253-54), there is a clear dependence on Zvartnots, the date of which (641–661) could constitute a terminus post quem. For the period in question, the architectural evidence of Albania is truly scant; nevertheless, the surviving documents allow us to specify, with due reserve, the many points of contact with the contemporary artistic cultures of Armenia and Georgia, which bordered and had close relations with Albania, and esp. Armenia, to which the Albanian church was linked for a long time. A particular aspect of Albanian culture is its remarkable silverwork, esp. dishes and amphorae, many of which are dated to the 6th and 7th c. and whose workmanship and decorative repertoire show a solid assimilation of *Sassanid and Bactrian traditions.

V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie, Paris 1867 (2 vols.); DTC 1,1888-1968; K.V. Trever, Osservazioni sulla storia e la cultura dell'Albania del Caucaso (in Russian), Moscow 1959; C.J. Dowsett, The History of the Caucasian Albanians by Moyses Dasxuranci, London 1961; V. Ousseinov, Storia dell'architettura dell'Azerbaigian, Moscow 1963 (in Russian); E.W. Kleinbauer, Zvart'nots and the Origins of Christian Architecture in Armenia: Art Bulletin 26 (1972) 245-262, in particular 253-254; C. Toumanoff, Manuel de généalogie et de chronologie pour l'histoire del Caucasie chrétienne (Arménie - Géorgie - Albanie), Rome 1974; The Albanians and Their Territories, ed. by the Academy of Sciences of the P.S.R. of Albania 1985; LTK[3] 1,321; ODB 1,53; N. Garsoïan, L'église armenienne et le grand schisme d'Orient, Lovanii 1999; Dizionario Enc. dell'Oriente cristiano, Rome 2000, 24; M. Van Esbroeck, Albanien (in Kaukasien): RAC Suppl. 1/2 (2001) 257-266.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ALBINA (4th c.). Current prosopographical studies distinguish two 4th-c. personages with the name of Albina. The first (d. 393) is, according to *Jerome, a widow originally from an illustrious family of consuls and prefects who dedicated herself to perpetual chastity and the *ascetic life, refusing a second marriage after the death of her husband (Ep. 127, 1-4). She is the mother of *Marcella and came to know Jerome at *Rome in 382, quickly winning his confidence, so much so that he thought her worthy of becoming his spiritual mother (Ep. 32, 5). She frequented the circle of women of the high aristocracy who had been converted to Christianity and accompanied Jerome to the Orient in 385. Told of her death, probably at Rome in 393, Jerome wrote a eulogy to her before finishing his Commentary on Galatians.

The other Albina (b. before 385, d. 431), whom *Augustine calls famula Dei (Ep. 124), is the sister of Rufius Antonius Agrypnius *Volusianus and daughter of Ceionius Rufius Albinus (prefect of Rome, 389-391), a pagan. She married a Christian senator, Publicola, son of *Melania the elder; to them was born *Melania the younger. In 400 Albina was convinced by her mother-in-law, who had come to *Italy from *Jerusalem, to live a more radical Christianity. From that moment she began an ascetic life with her daughter, distributing her goods to the poor, especially after the death of her husband in 407. During that year she went to Nola for the celebration of the feast of St. *Felix, where she met *Paulinus, who praised her virtue. With the arrival of *Alaric (410), she went to *Africa with her daughter Melania and son-in-law *Pinianus and had contact with some African bishops such as Augustine of *Hippo, *Aurelius of Carthage and *Alypius of *Thagaste. She used the proceeds of the sale of her property in Africa to benefit the founding of *monasteries, especially the two monasteries of Thagaste. The difficulties that arose during the oath of Pinianus at the basilica of Hippo in spring 411 notwithstanding, Augustine considered her always worthy of respect and affection, writing: "It is right fo me to console rather than to increase the sorrows of your soul (which, as you have written, you are unable to express), in order to cure you of your suspicions—if it is possible for me to do so—instead of further disturbing your holy heart, consecrated to God, by voicing indignation over what I have suffered in this matter" (Ep. 126, 1). In 417 she left for *Palestine, making a stop at *Alexandria, where she was received by the bishop *Cyril and listened to the teaching of the abbot Nestoro. She arrived at Jerusalem, from where she informed Augustine on the events regarding *Pelagius; Augustine responded by dedicating to her, Melania and Pinianus the De gratia Christi. She distributed what remained of her goods to the poor, dedicating her life to works of charity until her death in 431; she was buried on the Mount of Olives. Albina was part of the generation of the first women of the Roman aristocracy converted to Christianity. One sees in her, as in many other women of the period, how the worldly life was supplanted by the religious life.

PCBE 2, 74-77; T. Špidlík, Albina, BS 1 (1961) 719; L. Mirri, La dolcezza nella lotta: donne e ascesi secondo Girolamo, Magnano (BI) 1996; P. Laurence, Jérôme et le nouveau modèle féminin. La conversion à la "vie parfaite," Paris 1997; Id., Albine. La conversion d'une aristocrate romaine au "sanctum propositum": CrS 20 (1999) 257-274.

M.W. Libambu

ALDHELM (639–709). The first Anglo-Saxon literary personality. Born ca. 640 into the royal family of Wessex, he studied first with the Irish Maeldubh, then with *Hadrian of Canterbury, then again with Maeldubh. He was a monk, then priest, of the abbey of Mahmesbury, where he became abbot in 676. He was bishop of Sherborne in 705, though retaining direction of the abbey, and died 25 May 709. His writings show his principal interests to have been literary, something exceptional in that age. They include five carmina ecclesiastica in hexameters, proposed as inscriptions for the dedication of churches, and De virginitate, a topical eulogy of the celibate life written first in verse and then again in prose, and esp. De metris et aenigmatibus ac pedum regulis, written ca. 695 and dedicated to King Aldfrid of Northumbria. More than just a work on metric, its complicated and bizarre course is carefully worked out in alternating prose and verse, with alternating subjects. Noteworthy is an ample treatment of the symbolic value of the number 7, an explanation of the prosody of the hexameter, a block of 100 riddles in hexameters of various length, and finally more treatment of metric and prosody. This work is entirely typical of Aldhelm: literary ambition, Irish-derived whimsy, mastery of the written word which becomes a real game of skill and obscure complexity, the prevalent interest in grammar and metric, the considerable cultural and scholarly base, and the desire to display all this knowledge in the most conspicuous way possible. Some of his letters remain, in whose formal complication one sees the ingenium of the author and the norm of the genre. One letter defends *Roman customs regarding *Easter and the *tonsure, while the others are literary: in Ep. 5 Aldhelm says that *Britain can now produce teachers no less capable than the Irish.

CPL 1331-1339; PL 89, 63-314; MGH, AA, 15; H. Mayr-Harting, The Coming of Christianity to Anglo-Saxon England, London [3]1991, 192-204; A. Orchard, After Aldhelm: The Teaching and Transmission of the Anglo-Latin Hexameter: Journal of Medieval Latin 2 (1992) 96-133; Id., The Poetic Art of Aldhelm (Cambridge Studies in Anglo-Saxon England 8), Cambridge 1994.

M. Simonetti

ALEATORIBUS, De. This short work is a sermon against playing dice, considered an idolatrous practice and immoral because of its consequences. The author says that, as a pastor, he is obligated to address the faithful severely: the sacerdotalis dignitas includes pastoral responsibility. He justifies the condemnation of the game with biblical and extrabiblical citations; he also rebukes pastors who too easily forgive the faults of sinners. In 1888 Harnack (p. 387) attributed it to Pope *Victor (189–199); later, in 1900, he ascribed it (pp. 112-116) to a *Novatian antipope at *Rome. Koch (pp. 58-67) refers it to an *African bishop ca. 300; Daniélou (pp. 11, 14-15, 59, 93-96, 98) to a bishop of Rome, late 2nd c.; Miodoński to Pope *Miltiades (310–314), etc. The author of De aleat. cites the Shepherd of *Hermas as Scripture: this is not a certain indication that it precedes the Muratorian *Canon, which excludes the Shepherd from the NT canon; it could indicate that in the author's milieu it was considered canonical. Noteworthy is the reference in De aleat. 4 to a Latin translation of the Didache* (15, 3-4): et in doctrinis apostolorum. The conflict of the *baptized Christian with the devil is the dominant theme. Other themes include the indwelling of the *Holy Spirit (De aleat. 3) and the scandal of returning to a sinful life by a baptized Christian ("We have received the Holy Spirit as a guest in our hearts. Do not sadden the one who dwells in you" [hospitium]; De aleat. 3). Both this sermon and the De centesima cite 1 Cor 3:16: "You are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God lives in you." It is a scandal that a Christian would return to a sinful life (De aleat. 5). Related to the discussion of authorship are the questions of time and place. For Daniélou the sermon is one of the first witnesses of the earliest phase of Roman Christian culture in that it provides proofs of old Latin translations or of original texts (p. 94); for other recent scholars (e.g. Marin), the notable convergence with *Cyprian, though occasional, leads to the conclusion that the anonymous author is an *African that lived after Cyprian. The date is usually held to be ca. 300 (see CPPM 2,3228).

CPL 60; CPPM 2,3228 (1,4560); PL 4, 827-836; PLS I, 49; CSEL 3,3 (1871) 92-104; A. von Harnack, Der pseudocyprianische Traktat De aleatoribus, die älteste lateinische christliche Schrift, ein Werk des römischen Bischofs Viktor I (saec. II), TU 5,1, Leipzig 1888; Id., Zu Pseudocyprian, Adv. Aleat. 1 (p. 93, 1f., ed. Hartel), in TU 20, 3, Leipzig 1900, 112-116; H. Koch, Zur Schrift Adversus aleatores, Festgabe K. Müller, Tübingen 1922, 58-67; M. Pellegrino, De aleatoribus: EC 4 (1950) 1250; J. Quasten, Patrologia, I, Turin 1971 (repr. 1980), 599; J. Daniélou, The Origins of Latin Christianity, London - Philadelphia 1977, 93-98 et passim; The Oxford Dict. of Christian Church, Oxford [3]1997, 458; M. Marin, Problemi di ecdotica ciprianea. Per un'edizione critica dello speudociprianeo de aleatoribus: VetChr 20 (1983) 141-239; Id., Citazioni bibliche e parabibliche nel "De aleatoribus " pseudo-ciprianeo: AnSE 5 (1988) 169-184; T. Carrol Scott, An Early Church Sermon Against Gambling: (CPL 60): Second Cent 8 (1991) 83-95 (with Eng. tr.).

R.J. De Simone

ALEPPO (Beroea). Caravan city of N *Syria, situated in the province of Syria on the road from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean. With *Damascus, Aleppo is one of the oldest cities known to us. It is mentioned in the Ebla texts. From the archives of Mari and Alalakh we learn that already in the 18th c. BC it was the capital of the kingdom of Jamchad, which included almost all of N Syria. Called Khalbou in hieroglyphic texts, in cuneiform inscriptions it is recorded as Halboun. The Arabic name of the city, Halab, derives from this earliest name. Coming under the *Macedonian rule of Seleucus Nicator (312–281 BC), the city was enlarged and assumed the new name of Beroea, like the Macedonian city. With the arrival of the Arabs, however, it reverted to the original name. The name Beroea appears in 2 Macc 13:4-8 with regard to Menelaus, who had usurped the supreme pontificate and was condemned to death by Antiochus Eupator. In the *Roman period, Beroea became part of the province of Syria (Coele-Syria). Repeatedly conquered by the *Persians (540 and 608–609), it came permanently under Arab rule in 637.

Regarding the Christian presence in Aleppo, the sources go back as far as the 4th c., but there is no doubt that Christianity was established there very early, perhaps even 1st c., following the Christian dispersion after the siege of *Jerusalem. Supporting this possibility is a fact reported to us by *Jerome, in which he mentions the existence of a gospel of Matthew in Hebrew which Jerome himself attests to be in the possession of the *Nazoreans living at Aleppo, from whom he was able to obtain it so as to make a copy (De vir. ill. III).

The church of Aleppo is given a clear profile through its first bishop known to us: Eustathius of Side, who governed the community of Aleppo until 323–324, when he was transferred to the patriarchal see of *Antioch. *Monarchian in tendency, he had a central role at the Council of *Nicaea as an intransigent opponent of the *Arians. Caught up in the anti-Nicene reaction, he was exiled. Also notable among the city's ecclesiastical personalities was *Acacius. Born ca. 340, while still young he chose the *monastic life. A correspondent of *Basil of Caesarea and *Epiphanius of Salamis, who wrote the Panarion at his request, Acacius at first entertained friendly relations with *John Chrysostom, though for personal reasons later became his bitter enemy. Ordained bishop by *Meletius in 378, who sent him to Rome to Pope *Damasus to seek a resolution to the schism of Antioch, he participated at the Council of *Constantinople (381). Though very old, he had an essential role in the mediation between *Cyril of Alexandria and *John of Antioch, resulting in the 433 "formula of union."

Succeeding Acacius as bishop was Theoctistus, to whom *Theodoret of Cyrrhus wrote inviting him to receive at Beroea the Christians fleeing the *Vandal invasion of *Africa (Letter 32 and 135). Theodoret also tells us in the History of the Monks that two noblewomen he knew at Beroea were dedicated to a heroic *ascetical life of enclosure and *penance. According to *Anastasius I (6th c.), Beroea assumed the title of *metropolitan church; it figures in the Council of Constantinople of 536 under this title. Installed at Aleppo during the following centuries were bishops of various confessions and rites which are still present there: *Jacobites, *Melkites, *Armenians, *Maronites, Latins. Bishops known to us are Eustathius, Cyrrhus, Anatolius (363), Theodotus (ca. 374), Acacius (378), Theoctistus (438) and Peter (511).

DHGE 1, 101-116; 8,887-888; R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945, 179-181; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale Monferrato 1994, 110-116; Fedalto 2, 693-699.

L. Padovese

ALEXANDER I, pope (105–115). Succeeded *Evaristus, perhaps in 105 (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 3,3; Eus., HE IV, 1; V, 6,4). The LP presents him as natione romanus, of the V Augustea region, saying he was *martyred by decapitation (115?) and buried on the Via Nomentana, near the place of his death. The writings attributed to Alexander, among which are some additions to the canon of the *Mass, are apocryphal (Jaffé, 24-30; see DTC I, 709).

LP I, XCI-XCII, 54-55, 127; O. Marucchi, Il cimitero e la basilica di S. A. al VII miglio della via Nomentana, Rome 1922; DHGE 2, 708-709 (A. Dufourcq); BS I, 792-801 (E. Josi - G. Lucchesi); LTK³ 1, 367 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 213-15 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

ALEXANDER of Alexandria (d. 17 April 328). Bishop of *Alexandria (312–328), from the outset fought against the schism of the *Melitians of Lycopolis, which broke out at the time of persecution that claimed the life of his predecessor, *Peter I of Alexandria (d. 311). By the time of the first ecumenical council, the Council of *Nicaea (325), this *schism involved almost half of the episcopal sees juridically dependent on Alexander, and priests and deacons of Alexandria itself. Canon 6 of Nicaea reaffirmed the prerogatives of the Alexandrian see over *Egypt proper, the *Thebaid, *Libya and *Pentapolis. It does not seem that the situation changed much by the time of Alexander's death, 17 April 328. It was in this context, moreover, that the *Arian crisis began. Around 318, Alexander was opposed by an ideological party formed in his own church through the work of one of his most influential priests, Arius, to whom he had entrusted the parish of Baucalis. After a period of discussion and debates, the bishop gathered a synod of 100 bishops (319) that excommunicated Arius and five other priests, six deacons and two bishops. The encyclical letter Henos sômatos, sent by Alexander after the synod "to the dear and most venerated fellow-ministers of the Catholic church everywhere," reacted against the interference of *Eusebius of Nicomedia and other Eastern bishops in the Arian affair; these had offered support to those excommunicated at Alexandria. Arius himself makes reference to the reason for the conflict in a letter to Eusebius, saying of Alexander: "He has thrown us out of the city . . . because we do not speak as he does in the public declaration where he says: Always God, always Son. Together Father, together Son" (Opitz, Urkunde 1). It is difficult to ascertain the exact reason for Arius's outrage. Alexander clearly insisted on the eternity of the divine generation and on the substantial unity of the Son, as another dogmatic letter of his shows, sent to *Alexander of *Thessalonica in 324. It is also certain that Arius reacted by fully confirming his *christological theses, known esp. through extracts of his Thalia, a small treatise written at Alexandria prior to his exile that marked a literal and doctrinal innovation in the debate between the parties of Alexandrian theologians, in which Alexander intervened by formulating his doctrine of the Son of God. The excessive originality of Arius's theses gained them no credit with the Eastern bishops, who nonetheless protected him. Alexander's ideas prevailed in the Synod of Antioch (324), however, and later at Nicaea (325). Anti-Arian details of the Nicene formula of faith were not beyond debate; they are properly understood according to Alexander's theology, though he had never used the word homoousios. During this doctrinal debate, which took up the last 10 years of his episcopate, Alexander found a faithful and intelligent ally in his future successor, the young deacon *Athanasius. In the latter's Against the Arians, Alexander's essential teaching can be found, without, however, reversing the roles and attributing to the deacon an active part in writing Alexander's dogmatic letters, as has sometimes been done. Some MS texts attribute to Alexander a sermon, On the Soul and Body and on the Passion of the Lord, in *Syriac and *Coptic translation. Its authenticity is strongly contested, or at least it appears dubious; it contains traces of a homily by *Melito of Sardis.

CPG II, 2000-2017; PG 18, 571-582; H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke III, I, 6 (Urkunde 4a); 6-11 (Urk. 4b); 19-29 (Urk. 14); 29-31 (Urk. 15); 31 (Urk. 16); A. Harnack, Geschichte d. alt. Literatur, I, Leipzig 1893 (²1958) 449-451; E. Schwartz, Die Quellen über den melitianischen Streits, NGWG, 1905, 164-187 = Gesam. Schr. III (1959) 87-116; Id., Die Dokumente des arianischen Streits bis 325, NGWG, 1905, 257-299 = Gesam. Schr.III (1959) 117-168; Das antiochenische Synodal Schreiben von 325, NGWG, 1908, 305-374 = partim Gesam. Schr.III (1959) 169-187; P.H. Kettler, Den melitianische Streit in Aegypten: ZNTW 35 (1936-37) 155-193; A. Aranda Lomena, El Espíritu Santo en los Símbolos de Cirilo di Jerusalém y Alejandro di Alejandría: ScTh 5 (1973) 223-273; W. Schreemelcher, Der Sermo "De anima et corpore" ein Werk Alexanders von Alexandrien, Festschrift f. G. Dehn (1957) 119-143; A. Martin, Athanase et les Mélitiens (325-335), in Ch. Kannengiesser (ed.), Politique et Théologie chez Athanase d'Alexandrie (1974) 31-61; E. Bellini, Alessandro e Ario. Un esempio di conflitto tra fedi e ideologia. Documenti della prima controversia ariana, Milan 1974; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; BBKL 1,108-109; N.H. Baynes, Sozomen "Ecclesiastica Historia," I. 15: JTS 49 (1948) 165-168; O. Skarsaune, A Neglected Detail in the Creed of Nicaea (325): VChr 41 (1987) 34-54; G.C. Stead, Athanasius' Earliest Written Work: JTS 39 (1988) 76-91; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie e l'Église d'Égypte au IVᵉ siècle (328-373), Paris 1996; M. Vinzent, Die Entstehung des "Römischen Glaubensbekentniss," in Tauffragen und Bekenntnis, ed. W. Kinzig et al., Berlin 1999, 185-409; Storia del christianesimo. 2, see Index p. 933.

Ch. Kannengiesser

ALEXANDER of Antioch. Bishop of *Antioch (413–421). Prior to his election he led an *ascetic life. Essentially he ended the long *schism of Antioch by persuading the old partisans of *Eustathius and *Paulinus, who until then had refused any proposal of union, to rejoin the Catholic community; only a small group refused. In a spirit of unity, he also reintroduced *John Chrysostom's name in the distichs. Alexander's election was for this reason also recognized by Innocent of Rome, whom Alexander had asked to intervene against the Cypriots, who wanted to terminate their juridical dependence on Antioch; pope Innocent wrote to the Cypriots on this matter (PL 22, 427).

EC 1, 782; DCB 1, 82; F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antiochie (IVᵉ-Vᵉ siècle), Paris 1905, 292ff.; DTC 2,2432-2433.

M. Simonetti

ALEXANDER of Apamea (d. after 434). Suffragan of *John, *patriarch of *Antioch. He participated at the Council of *Ephesus (431) and with *Alexander of Hierapolis sought to delay its opening until the arrival of John of Antioch, against the contrary decision of *Cyril of Alexandria. He was among the signers of the statement against the deposition of *Nestorius and of Cyril's *excommunication. He himself was excommunicated in the fifth session of the council; when representatives of the various parties were sent to *Constantinople, he delegated his powers to Apringius of Chalcis. A brief letter of his of 434 to Alexander of Hierapolis survives in *Latin translation; in it he indicates a desire to meet, perhaps to convince him to enter into communion with John of Antioch and Cyril of Alexandria.

CPG 6390; PG 84, 746; ACO I, 4 (1922-1923), 89-90; DCB 1, 82-83; Hfl-Lecl II,1 (1908) 296.313-314; DHGE 2, 191.

F. Scorza Barcellona

ALEXANDER of Aphrodisias (2nd-3rd c.). *Aristotelian commentator and Peripatetic philosopher. That he lived between the late 2nd and early 3rd c. AD is evident from the fact that at the beginning of his writing De fato (p. 164,3, Bruns) he directly addresses the emperors Severus and Antoninus (i.e., *Septimius Severus and *Caracalla). A disciple of Aristocles and Sosigenes, he was not only Aristotle's most erudite commentator, whom later commentators—esp. Simplicius—referred to and drew on, but also the philosopher who, by developing certain points of Aristotle's thought, also influenced some exponents of *Neoplatonism, such as *Plotinus and Syrianus. (Porphyry, Vita Plot. 14,1: 15,13 Bréhier, mentions him as one of the authors read in Plotinus's courses.) His most distinctive original doctrine, to which some modern scholars such as Praechter, Wilpert and Walzer have drawn attention and on which Plotinus's conception of the second *hypostasis in part depends, is that of the active intelligence (νοῦς ποιητικός): combining the Aristotelian doctrines of book Δ of the Metaphysics, De anima III ch. 5, and De gen. anim. B, c. 3, 736b 27-28, Alexander identifies the νοῦς ποιητικός present in man—which Aristotle (De an. III c. 5,430 a 10-25) had defined as χωριστός ("separate"), ἀπαθής ("impassible"), ἀμιγής ("uncontaminated"), ἀθάνατος καὶ ἀΐδιον ("immortal and eternal") and in De gen. anim. B 736b 27-28 had considered divine and originating from outside—with the first principle, also called νοῦς in book Λ of the Metaphysics; only to the first principle are the attributes χωριστός, ἀπαθής, ἀμιγής, ἀθάνατος, ἀΐδιον appropriate, used by Aristotle in De an. III c. 5 regarding human intelligence (see Alexander, De anima pp. 88,17–89,22 Bruns). This νοῦς ποιητικός is productive intelligence par excellence, since it is the cause of the existence of all beings (De an. 89,9-11). We are thus, on the one hand, very close to the Plotinian concept of νοῦς defined as "cause" (Enn. V, 1, 8: vol. V 25,4-26,1 Bréhier; V, 9, 3, vol. V 163, 25-26), and on the other to the Platonic doctrine of νοῦς-αἰτία, present in Philebus 30 c-d, and to the Platonic doctrine of the summum bonum, cause of the existence of the ideas (Rep. VI 509b).

As H. Armstrong has shown (Les sources de Plotin, Genève 1960, 408), two other doctrines which Alexander stressed and which also influenced the Plotinian concept of νοῦς are that of the complete identity between the divine thinking mind and the intelligible (see Aristotle, Met. Λ 1072b 21; Alexander, De an. 87,29-88,2 Bruns; Mantissa 108,7-8) and that of the divine mind which thinks itself (see Aristotle, Met. Λ 1072b 19-20, Alexander, Mantissa 109,4-7). Alexander's influence can also be discerned on a point of the Plotinian doctrine of ideas: both Plotinus and Alexander say that each intelligible being is endowed with mind (see Enn. V, 9, 8, vol. V 168,2-4 and Alexander, Mantissa 108,16-18). Alexander's surviving writings in the Greek text that have been edited are (1) commentary on the Metaphysics; only the commentary on books I-IV is authentic, while that on books E-Λ is spurious and later, perhaps attributable to the 11th-c. Byzantine commentator Michael of Ephesus, who appears in the title of the commentary on book E, present in the Paris codex. gr. 1876 (see Gercke, PWK I, 2, 1454-1455; Hayduck, CAG I, Berolini 1891, V-VII; Praechter in Überweg, Grundriss der Gesch. der Philos. I, Berlin 1926, 564; the authentic and spurious parts have been edited together by M. Hayduck, CAG I, Berolini 1891); (2) commentary on book I of the Prior Analytics (ed. M. Wallies, CAG II, I, Berolini 1883); (3) commentary on Topics (ed. M. Wallies, CAG II, II, Berolini 1891; the last four books seem to be a compendium, however, and contain interpolations [see Gercke PWK 1455]); (4) commentary on De sensu (ed. P. Wendland, CAG III, I, Berolini 1901); (5) commentary on Meteorologica (ed. M. Hayduck CAG III, II, Berolini 1899); (6) De anima, also preserved in a 14th-c. Hebrew version, which is in turn based on an Arabic version (see I. Bruns, Suppl. Aristotel. II, I, Berolini 1887, XIV-XV; ed. Bruns, op. cit., 1-100); (7) Mantissa (ed. I. Bruns, Suppl. Aristotel. II, I, Berolini 1887, pp. 181-186); (8) Dubitationes et solutiones in three books (ed. I. Bruns, Suppl. Aristotel. II, II, Berolini 1892, 1-116); (9) Problemata ethica in one book (ed. I. Bruns, Suppl. Aristotel. II, II Berolini 1892, 117-163; II Praechter, op. cit., 564, who doubts its authenticity); (10) De fato, against the rigid determinism of the Stoics (ed. I. Bruns, Suppl. Aristotel. II, II, Berolini 1892, 164-212); (11) De mixtione (ed. I. Bruns, Suppl. Aristotel. II, II, Berolini 1892, pp. 213-238).

Besides the commentary on books E-Λ of the Metaphysics mentioned above, the following are considered spurious: (1) commentary on Sophistici elenchi (ed. M. Wallies, CAG II, III, Berolini 1898), which in some codices (e.g. Paris. gr. 1972f. 761r, Vat. gr. 241f. 6r, see Wallies p. V) is attributed to Michael of Ephesus; (2) Problemata physica in four books (the first two were edited by I.L. Ideler, Physici et medici Graeci minores, I, Berolini 1841, pp. 3-80; the third and fourth by Usener, Al. Aphrodis. quae feruntur problematorum liber III et IIII . . . recensuit H. Usener, Diss. inaug. u. Progr. d. Joachimsth. Gymn. 4, Berlin 1859); (3) De febribus (ed. I.L. Ideler, Physici et medici Graeci minores, I, Berolini 1841, pp. 81-106). On the spurious origin of these three writings see Gercke, PWK I, 2, 1455 and Praechter, op. cit., 564.

On the oldest bibl., see JAW 96 (1899) 72-73 and P. Moraux, Alexandre d'Aphrodise Exégète de la Noétique d'Aristote, Liège-Paris 1942, 226-227.

Modern bibl.: C.A. Brandis, Über die Reihenfolge der Bücher des aristotelischen Organons und ihre griechische Ausleger, AAWB hist. phil. Kl. 1833, Berlin 1835, 278, 297-299; A. Gercke: PWK I, 2, 1453-1455; E. Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, III, 1, Leipzig [5]1923, 817-831; K. Praechter in Überweg, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie I, Berlin 1926, 564-565; C. Prantl, Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande I: Berlin 1927, 620-626; P. Wilpert, Die Ausgestaltung der aristotelischen Lehre vom Intellectus agens bei den griech. Kommentatoren und in der Scholastik des 13 Jahrhunderts: BGPhM, Suppl. 3 (1935) 447-462; P. Moraux, Alexandre d'Aphrodise Exégète de la Noétique d'Aristote, Liège-Paris 1942; E. Montanari, Per un'edizione del περὶ κράσεως di Alessandro di Afrodisia: AATC 36 (1971) 17-58; B.C. Bazan, L'authenticité du De Intellectu attribué à Alexandre d'Aphrodisie: RPhL 71 (1973) 468-487; R. Walzer, Aristotle's Active Intellect νοῦς ποιητικός in Greek and Early Islamic Philosophy, in Plotino e il Neoplatonismo in Oriente e in Occidente, Rome 1974, 428-430; B. Todd, Alexander of Aphrodisias on Stoic Physics: A Study of the De mixtione, Leiden 1976 (Philosophia antiqua . . . 28); R.W. Sharples, Alexander of Aphrodisia: Scholasticism and Innovation: ANRW II 36/2 (1987) 1176-1243; G. Movia (ed.), Alessandro di Afrodisia e la "Metafisica" di Aristotele, Milan 2003.

On the Arabic versions and their editions see esp. J. Freudenthal, Die durch Averroes erhaltenen Fragmente Alexanden zur Metaphysik des Aristoteles, AAWB hist. phil. Kl. 1884, Berlin 1885; A. Badawi, Aristote chez les Arabes, Le Caire 1947, 253-308; Id. La transmission de la philosophie grecque au monde arabe, Paris 1968, 121-165; Id. Commentaires sur Aristote perdus en et autres épîtres, Beirut 1971; J. Finnegan, Texte arabe du περὶ νοῦ d'Alexandre d'Aphrodise, dû à Jshaq ibr Honein IX^e^ siècle: MUB 33 (1955) 157-202; Al-Farabi et le περὶ νοῦ d'Alexandre d'Aphrodise, Mélanges L. Massignon, Damas 1956-1957; H. Gätje: Zur arabischen Überlieferung des Alexander von Aphrodisia, ZDMG 116 (1966) 255-278; Id. Die arabische Übersetzung der Schrift des Alexander von Aphrodisias über die Farbe, NAWG philol. hist. Kl. 1967, 10.

On the Latin medieval versions and their editions see esp. C. Thurot, Alexandre d'Aphrodisias. Commentaire sur le traité d'Aristote De sensu et sensibili édité avec la vieille traduction latine. Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque nationale . . . 25, Paris 1875; L. Labowsky, William of Mombike's Manuscript of Alexander of Aphrodisias: MRS 5 (1961) 155-162; P. Thillet, Alexandre d'Aphrodise De fato ad imperatores. Version de Guillaume de Moerbeke [Etudes de philosophie médiévale 51], Paris 1963; A.J. Smet, Alexandre d'Aphrodisias. Commentaire sun les météores d'Aristote. Traduction de Guillaume de Moerbeke, Louvain-Paris 1968.

On the Greek, besides the above-cited editions of the works of Alexander, see also A. Wartelle, Inventaire des manuscrits grecs d'Aristote et de ses commentateurs, Paris 1963, 183.

S. Lilla

ALEXANDER of Constantinople (d. 337). Probably of peasant origin, bishop of *Byzantium for 23 years, succeeding Metrophanes (306–314). After his victory over *Licinius in 324, *Constantine promoted an oratorical contest between Bishop Alexander and the "Hellenes" of Byzantium, but a miracle silenced the latter (Teofane, Chronography, ed. C. de Boor 23,7). Alexander, at that time 86, was not a signatory of the Council of *Nicaea (325). A *Syriac copy exists, however, of the letter he sent at the beginning of that year to the Synod of *Antioch, confirming the canonical sanctions inflicted by Bishop *Alexander of Alexandria on *Arius and his followers (Opitz, Urkunde 18); it is known that Alexander of Byzantium remained a faithful follower of Nicaea. Alexander took the title of bishop of *Constantinople in 330 when Constantine inaugurated the new capital. In 335 he refused to readmit Arius to communion, locking himself in the Church of Peace (St. Irene) rather than yield. Arius died suddenly on the eve of his rehabilitation (Athanasius of Alexandria, Letter on the Death of Arius). After 330, Constantine enlarged the church of St. Irene and built the Church of the Apostles. Constantine died 22 May 337; Alexander, later the same year. He had designated Paul as his successor, but Paul's rivalry with *Macedonius, then a deacon, had the effect of favoring *Eusebius of Nicomedia, who was elected by a local synod celebrated at the initiative of *Constantius II, Constantine's successor in the Eastern part of the empire. In the Life of the Fathers Metrophanes and Alexander (Photius, Bibl., cod. 256), Alexander is presented, with Alexander of Alexandria, as a hero of Nicaea; after the council, it shows him crossing *Thrace, Illyricum, Greece and the islands to preach the orthodox faith. According to *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Alexander of Constantinople was long considered to be the recipient of Alexander of Alexandria's dogmatic letter of 324 (Opitz, Urkunde 14); the letter was actually addressed to Bishop *Alexander of Thessalonica.

Socrates HE II, 7; Sozomen, HE III, 3; F. Fischer, De patriarcharum constantinopolitanorum catalogo et de chronologia octo primorum patriarcharum, Comm. philol. Ienenses 3, Leipzig 1894, 313ff.; W. Telfer, Paul of Constantinople: HTR43 (1950) 31-92; F. Winkelmann, Die Bischöfe Metrophanes und Alexandros von Byzanz: ByzZ 59 (1966) 47-71; G. Dragon, Naissance d'une capitale. Constantinople et ses institutions de 330 à 451, Paris 1974; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; Storia del cristianesimo. 2, see Index, 933.

Ch. Kannengiesser

ALEXANDER of Cyprus (6th c.) Monk of *Cyprus, active probably second half 6th c. under *Justinian (527–565), author of a homily De inventione crucis (BHG 410-410 b,c) and of a Laudatio Barnabae apostoli (BHG 226). His dates have been disputed in the past: according to Baronius he lived late 5th c. (disputed by Tillemont); Combefis puts him under *Zeno (475–491) or shortly thereafter, while Fabricius, based on the erroneous attribution to him of the life of the *patriarch Nicephorus (806–815), considers him to be not before the 9th c.; others (see Ceillier) incline even to the 12th c. In the discourse De inventione crucis, composed for the feast of the exaltation of the cross (14 September), Alexander first expounds on religious events from the creation of the world to *Constantine the Great, interweaving history, legend and theology. An ἐνκώμιον follows on the finding of the true cross, handled according to the pattern of *Byzantine rhetoric. A *Georgian version of the homily is also preserved, as well as an old Russian version and an epitome (BHG 411; BHGn 411 b: PG 87, 3, 4077-4088). The Laudatio Barnabae apostoli (PG 87, 4087-4106, gives only the *Latin translation) was probably delivered at Salamis, where relics of the saint had been discovered; its purpose was to uphold the claims of the church of Cyprus to autocephaly. Alexander clearly knew the περίοδοι, a 5th-c. history of the saint's wanderings, and other sources close to the *martyr's own time.

CPG 7398-7400; PG 87, 3, 4015-4076, 4087-4106; AASS Iun. II (1698) 430-452; 3rd ed. 431-447; Krumbacher, Geschichte, 164; H. Delehaye, Saints de Chypre: AB 26 (1907) 236-237; P.C. Pennachini, Discorso storico dell'invenzione della Croce del monaco Alessandro, Grottaferrata 1913; S. Salaville, Le moine Alexandre de Chypre (VI^e^ siècle): EO 15 (1912) 134-137; Id.,

Alexandre: DHGE 2,191-193; Beck, Kirche, 399; see P. Allen, The Sixth-Century Greek Homily: Problems and Approaches, in The Preacher and the Audience: Studies in Christian and Early Byzantine Homiletics, ed. M.B. Cunningham - P. Allen, Leiden 1998; Hagiographica Cypria: Sancti Barnabae laudatio auctore Alexandro monacho et Sanctorum Bartholomaei et Barnabae Vita e menologio imperiali deprompta, editae curante P. Van Deun, [. . .] Turnhout 1993; Patrologia V, 243-244.

A. Labate

ALEXANDER of Hierapolis (d. ca. 434). Partisan of *Nestorius, took part in the Council of *Ephesus in 431, where he sided with *John of Antioch and the Eastern bishops. He did not accept the subsequent union of 433 between the those in the East and *Cyril and was exiled to *Egypt, where he died (ca. 434). 23 of his letters relating to the controversy survive.

CPG 6392-6419; PG 84, 659-798; DCB 1,83-85; Hfl-Lecl II 295ff.; BBKL I, 110.

M. Simonetti

ALEXANDER of Jerusalem (d. 250). Bishop of *Cappadocia. During a pilgrimage to *Jerusalem, he was induced by the people to stay as coadjutor and then successor to *Narcissus; it was unusual at that time for there to be two bishops in the same see. A confessor of the faith under *Septimius Severus (202), he died in prison at *Caesarea (Palestine) under *Decius (250). *Eusebius of Caesarea cites some letters to the Antinoïtes, to the Antiochenes (mentioning *Clement of Alexandria) and to *Origen, in which he alludes to his relations with *Pantaenus and Clement. He was friend and protector to Origen, whom he and *Theoctistius of Caesarea invited to preach while still a layman, drawing protest from *Demetrius of Alexandria; again with Theoctistus, he ordained Origen priest ca. 230, arousing a storm of protest against Origen in *Egypt. He established a Christian library at Jerusalem, then called Aelia. Clement dedicated a work to him. Origen, who preached in his presence the homily on the birth of Samuel, says of him: “He excels all of us in grace and kindness.” Feast 18 March in the West, 22 March among the Greeks.

CPG 1698-1701; Eusebius, HE VI, passim. Texts in A. Harnack, Die Überlieferung . . . , Leipzig 1892, 505-507; A. Ehrhard, Die griech. Patriarchal-Bibliothek von Jerusalem: RQA 5 (1891) 217ff., 329ff., 383-384; 6 (1892) 339ff.; L. Duchesne, L'Histoire ancienne de l'Église I, Paris [3]1923, 438-439, 449, 458ff.; Bardenhewer II, 271ff.; DTC 1, 763ff.; LTK[3] 1,363-364; P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens des II[e] et III[e] siècles, Paris 1961, 85ff., 105-137; Id., Origène: sa vie et son œuvre, Paris 1977.

H. Crouzel

ALEXANDER of Lycopolis (3rd-4th c.). According to *Photius (Contra Manichaeos 1,11), Alexander was bishop of *Lycopolis ([Assiut] Thebaid, *Egypt). In fact he was a *Neoplatonist, sympathetic to Christianity, who wrote ca. 300 an opusculus in 26 chapters titled Contra Manichei opiniones, an important source for knowledge of the spread of *Manicheism in Egypt and its methods of propaganda. Nothing in fact is known of Alexander, including whether he was a Christian. From his knowledge of Genesis and the gospels, and not of other texts, it has been conjectured that he was a Christian apostate (Edwards). The author of the work begins by affirming the simplicity of Christianity which, losing touch with its original experience, became embroiled in speculations which gave birth to rival sects and schools, with no possibility of arriving at truth (ch. 1). One of these was founded at the time of the emperor *Valerian by *Mani the Persian, who proposed two principles: God, the good, and matter, evil. Alexander thus considers Manicheism a deviation from Christianity, a *heresy. The two principles of the Manichean system are studied in light of the importance of the sun, the lunar phases and the stars. The Manicheans created an absurd myth: a subsistent matter engaged in a fight against the good, and a good God that, emanating its powers, fought in return; the world will be destroyed by *eschatological fire. Christ is Mind and suffered only in appearance. Alexander shows a good, though incomplete, knowledge of Manicheism. He appreciates Christian *ethics and its influence on simple people.

CPG 2,2510; PG 18, 409-448; A. Brinkmann, Alexandri Lycopolitani, Contra Manichei opiniones, Leipzig 1895, Stuttgart 1989; P.W. van der Horst - J. Mansfeld, An Alexandrian Platonist Against Dualism: Alexander of Lycopolis' Treatise “Critique of the Doctrines of Manichaeus,” tr. with intro. and notes, Leiden 1974 (with Eng. tr.); A. Villey, Alexandre de Lycopolis: Contre la doctrine de Mani, ed., trans., Paris 1985 (with Fr. tr.); C. Riggi, Una testimonianza del “kérygma” cristiano in Alessandro di Licopoli: Salesianum 31 (1969) 561-568; M.J. Edwards, A Christian Addition to Alexander of Lycopolis: Mnemosyne 42 (1989) 483-487; A. Villey, Controverses philosophiques à Assiout à la fin du III[e] siècle, in Deuxième journée d'études coptes, Strasbourg 25 May 1984, Paris 1986, 23-28; G. Stroumsa, Titus of Bostra and Alexander of Lycopolis: A Christian and a Platonic Refutation of Manichaean Dualism, in Neoplatonism and Gnosticism, ed. R.T. Wallis & Jay Bregman, Albany, NY 1992, 337-349; P.W. Van der Horst, “A Simple Philosophy”: Alexander of Lycopolis on Christianity, in Polyhistor: Fest. J. Mansfeld, ed. K.A. Algra et al., Leiden 1996, 313-329; M.V. Cerruti, Il mito manicheo tra universalismo e particolarismi regionali. La testimonianza di Alessandro di Licopodi: Annali di Sc. Religiose 7 (2002) 225-258.

A. Di Berardino

ALEXANDER of Thessalonica (d. after 335). Bishop of *Thessalonica, first half 4th c. As a basically neutral prelate in the *Arian controversies, he was sent to take part in the Council of *Tyre of 335 (Eusebius, De vita Constantini IV,42, PG 20, 1193). During his episcopate he wrote to *Athanasius (Ep. ad Athanasium) regarding the case of a certain Arsenius, and to the imperial functionary Dionysius (Ep. ad Dionysium) to denounce the conspiracy against the *patriarch of *Alexandria by the Eusebian bishops present at the Council of Tyre of 335.

CPG 2123.18.30; Alexander of Thessalonica, in Athanasius, Apologia contra arianos 66 and 80, PG 25, 368 and 393; H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke III,I, Berlin-Leipzig 1934, 145, 160-161.

P. Marone

ALEXANDER SEVERUS (208–235). Son of Julia Mammaea, associated in power with his cousin *Heliogabalus, and left as sole emperor in 222 at approx. 14 years of age. He governed at first under the tutelage of his mother and with the help of a council of senators, including the jurist Ulpian. He gave precendence to civil power over the military, earning him the increasing hostility of the troops: in 235 he was assassinated by soldiers during a campaign defending the Rhine-Danube frontier. Alexander treated Christians benevolently: he even had several in his court and was a friend of Sextus *Julius Africanus, who dedicated his Intarsi (κεστοί) to him. The Historia Augusta* (SHA, Vita Alex., passim) tells us that he venerated a number of divinities, including Christ, in his lararium.

M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 239-246; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, Rome-Bari 1976; E. dal Covolo, I Severi e il cristianesimo, Rome 1989, 74ff.; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; M. Christol, L'empire romain du III[e] siècle. Histoire politique (192-325 après J.-C.), Paris 1997; A. Ziolkowski, Storia di Roma, It. tr., Milan 2000.

L. Navarra

ALEXANDER the Acoemete (d. ca. 430). Alexander's wanderings are known in some detail, though in some cases precise dates and places are difficult to establish, thanks to the biography written probably by one of his disciples, who has remained anonymous (PO VI, 658-701, ed. De Stoop); his last years are known to us from the lives of *Hypatius and Marcellus the Acoemete. Alexander was born mid-4th c. on an island in the Aegean Sea between Tenedos and Rhodes. After his literary formation at *Constantinople and experience at court during a military career, he left for *Syria (ca. 380) and stayed 7 years in a *monastery directed by an *archimandrite named Elias. Seeking a life even more in conformity with evangelical precepts, Alexander traveled throughout *Mesopotamia, and after various adventures provoked by his apostolic zeal (among them the destruction of pagan idols and a long discussion with Rabbula, the local precept, who in the end converted: this episode is recognized as an interpolation from the life of *Rabbula, bishop of *Edessa), he founded a monastery in an unidentified location on the right bank of the Euphrates, which quickly developed and very soon had 400 monks of various origins and languages (*Syrian, Greek, *Egyptian, *Roman). Again driven by his zeal for evangelization, he left with his most zealous disciples to Christianize Mesopotamia. He then went to *Palmyra and from there to *Antioch (where, according to the Life, he had previously been ca. 403 to incite the Christians to rebellion against the intruder Porphyrius). His extreme opinions angered the *patriarch *Theodotus and some civil authorities, and he was quickly expelled from the city. It seems he first took refuge at *Chalcis, then, leaving Syria, stopped at the monastery of Krithénion, where he found some of his old disciples who had remained faithful to the practice of continual *prayer. From there he departed with 24 companions, whom he led to *Constantinople. There, near the church of St. Mennas, he laid the foundations of a monastery where he could finally implement his ideas on the integral practice of evangelical precepts: absolute poverty, rejection of all manual labor, constant charity, the preaching apostolate and above all uninterrupted prayer or perpetual doxology. This last characteristic earned him and his disciples the name of acoemetae (meaning "sleepless ones"; not because the monks went entirely without sleep but because they were divided into several choirs, who alternated so as to celebrate the Laus Perennis without interruption). The attractiveness of this new movement, as distinct from more traditional monastic practice, was quick to provoke jealousy, rancor and animosity toward Alexander, who, for his part, spared no criticism against those who did not share his point of view, be they religious or civil authorities. In 426 or 427 the same Theodotus of Antioch and other bishops, meeting at Constantinople, condemned the errors of the Euchites, or *Messalians, in a letter to the church of Pamphylia. Tillemont has related this fact to the trial which ended with Alexander being obliged to return to Syria and his monks to their monasteries of origin. Alexander had just passed the Bosporus and reached the town of Rufiananes when he was ambushed by order of Bishop

*Eulalius. He was taken in and cared for by Hypatius, the *hegumen of the monastery at Rufiananes, and after his recovery protected by the empress, he was able to found a new monastery at Gomon in *Asia, where the Bosporus meets the Black Sea. He died shortly later ca. 430. Alexander's biographer is realistic and objective, clearly articulating his spiritual ideals, his qualities and his virtues without overlooking the defects and excesses which led him to narrow and intransigent conceptions of the practice of the gospel: his biographer thus gives a strong impression of veracity. His document is moreover of great interest and fundamental importance for the information it offers on monastic traditions in Syria and Constantinople, both in the late 4th and the first half of the 5th c., esp. regarding the Acoemete movement.

BHG 47; DHGE 1, 274-282; PO 6, 645-657; BS 1, 766-768. DIP 1, 479-480; A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, Louvain 1960, vol. II, 185-192.

J.-M. Sauget

ALEXANDRIA

I. City - II. School - III. Councils - IV. Archaeology.

I. City. The importance of Alexandria for the Christianity of the first centuries can be understood only in relation to the place of the metropolis in *Hellenistic culture and in the social and political life of the *Roman Empire. With *Athens and *Antioch, it was one of the three hubs of Greek-speaking culture and thus a primary center of philological, *philosophical and theological study. Greek-speaking Hebrew culture also arose and developed in Alexandria, producing the Septuagint and the work of *Philo. Socially and politically, Alexandria was a perfectly Greek island, deliberately created within the territory of the old *Egyptian Empire for the purpose (among others) of controlling the exploitation of the latter's agricultural and commercial riches in the best way possible. It was inherited by the Roman government as such, and it also sheltered a strong Jewish colony. Its relations with the Egyptian population of the Nile valley were consequently varied and complex, changing with different historical periods. Clearly Alexandria must have been an early target of Christian propaganda. The tradition (accepted even by Eusebius, HE II, 15, 1) ascribes the earliest preaching to *Mark the evangelist, Peter's disciple, but this cannot be confirmed (though, see Oden); in fact, the development of the Christian church is totally obscure until the end of the 2nd c. Beginning with *Demetrius (bishop 188–231), documentation actually becomes abundant (esp. *Eusebius of Caesarea), and we find a well-formed ecclesiastical organization (which must therefore have been in place for some time), and a very important theological (catechetical) school. The silence surrounding origins is conjectured by some as being due to the fact that the Alexandrian church was of a *gnostic character. Not a few gnostic texts in fact must be traced to Alexandria, some of which survive in *Coptic translations of 4th-5th-c. MSS (see Nag Hammadi). Other factors tend to exclude this hypothesis (C.H. Roberts, Manuscripts, Society and Belief in Early Christian Egypt, Oxford 1979). The Alexandrian theological school moved in the world of Late Antique *Platonism (its main exponents being *Clement, *Origen and *Didymus the Blind) and thus of international Greek culture, but recent contributions also identify an influence on some of the *monastic movements that developed beginning late 3rd c., esp. the group of Scete and Kellia, whose principal figures were *Macarius of Alexandria and *Evagrius of Pontus, but also *Anthony himself (see S. Rubenson, The Letters of St. Anthony: Origenist Theology, Monastic Tradition and the Making of a Saint, Lund 1990) and the group of the Pachomians (see J. Goehring, Ascetics, Society and the Desert, Harrisburg, PA 1999, 137-186). Organizational relations within the Nile valley were rather tortured. Although the bishop of Alexandria was always recognized as the undisputed head of the whole Egyptian church, his behavior also aroused movements of criticism and rejection. The first of these known to us developed during the last great persecution, that of *Diocletian and *Maximian, during which Peter went into hiding and *Melitius, bishop of *Lycopolis (and perhaps his official representative for S Egypt), for a while acted as Peter's substitute without his authorization. Peter condemned Melitius, and a schism began that caused many troubles even for *Athanasius, continuing until the 7th c. The great Alexandrian patriarchs of the 4th and 5th c., Athanasius, *Theophilus and *Cyril, conducted an active ecclesiastical policy toward the other imperial metropolises, dominating the ecumenical councils of *Nicaea (Athanasius took part as *Alexander's secretary), *Constantinople and *Ephesus. They were actively supported by the monks, who both within and without the country acted as something of an assault force for them. The Council of *Chalcedon (451), however, saw the defeat of the Alexandrian bishop *Dioscorus, signaling the decline of Alexandria's dominance. The Egyptian church had to submit to the sending of "Chalcedonian" bishops named by the emperor of Constantinople and backed by the army; whenever possible they opposed these with their own bishops until, with the Arab invasion (641), the autochthonous (Coptic Orthodox) Egyptian church became the church officially recognized by the state.

T. Orlandi

II. School. Regarding culture as well, the Christian origins of Alexandria are wrapped in obscurity. Apollos, collaborator and rival of *Paul, is for us little more than a name, and there is no serious basis for placing at Alexandria works of unknown origin such as the letter to the Hebrews; attribution of the Epistle of (ps.-)Barnabas* to Alexandria is also hypothetical. A Jewish Christian influence over this nascent culture can easily be hypothesized, but it certainly must have been less than in *Asia. The sparse evidence we have does allow us to hypothesize a virtually absolute cultural dominance of the gnostics for a good part of the 2nd c., especially of those who professed more philosophically elaborate doctrines and were also the most Christianized (*Basilides, *Valentinus and disciples); this is not surprising if we consider how the culturally syncretistic tendencies of the gnostics harmonized with the intellectual vivacity of cultured Alexandria and the different influences at work there (Greek philosophical doctrines, Hellenized *Judaism, Eastern religions, apocalyptic literature). Gnosticism presented itself as a kind of superior knowledge with respect to that of the ordinary Christian and thus took hold, esp. among the more cultured and intellectually ambitious of Christian society, who were also those of higher social status. Contact between orthodox and heterodox (gnostic) Christians was a daily reality in such circles, as is shown by the episode of the young Origen, the rich matron and the gnostic Paul in Eusebius (HE VI, 2, 13-14).

Only toward the end of the 2nd c. did people emerge from the orthodox community capable of challenging the cultural dominance of the gnostics: Pantaenus, Clement, Origen. Precisely at this time it is customary to place the foundation of the Christian Didaskaleion of Alexandria, intended as a center of higher studies, *exegesis and theology, sponsored and controlled by the local bishop. Little credit is given to *Philip of Side's assertion (PG 39, 329), inferred from Eusebius (HE V, 10.1.4; VI,6), that *Athenagoras was the first scholarch, succeeded by Pantaenus, Clement and Origen. It is preferable, rather, to consider Pantaenus and Clement as private teachers (like *Justin Martyr at *Rome), with the true Didaskaleion beginning only when Origen, charged with directing the church of Alexandria's catechetical school, divided the teaching into two grades, reserving for himself the higher, to which non-Christians could also be admitted. The primary task of Clement and Origen's teaching (of Pantaenus we know nothing specific) was to oppose the cultural dominance of the gnostics among educated Christians; to achieve this they began to elaborate and examine the data offered by *Scripture and the *tradition by means of systematic recourse to the instruments provided by profane Greek culture: *rhetoric, philology and philosophy.

Though still viewed with suspicion, Greek philosophy was considered an important propaedeutic instrument for approaching the study of Sacred Scripture, and the contribution of the basic concepts and hermeneutical and demonstrative procedures deduced from them was fundamental for the development of Christian *exegesis and theology. Platonistic spiritualism was preferred, assimilated with greater rigor than by certain representatives of Asiatic Christianity. Origen in particular adopted the Platonic distinction of the two levels of reality—one sensible and the other intelligible, the former a faint copy or image of the latter—as an interpretive criteria for every aspect of Christian reality: he took from Clement, and more distantly from the gnostics, the division of Christians into two categories, the simple and the perfect (the latter also called gnostics by Clement: they were not distinguished by nature, however, as with heterodox gnostics, but only by degree of education and application). According to Origen, the simple or beginner adheres to the lower, sensible level of reality, while the perfect tends to the superior, intelligible and spiritual, according to the correlation: simple/perfect = Christ man/Christ God = literal/spiritual, which led to the *allegorical interpretation of Scripture. On this basis, though without achieving an organic doctrinal system, he developed and explored a collection of ideas and principles which long constituted the foundation of Alexandria's Christian culture. Here it suffices to mention (1) an organically allegorical interpretation of Sacred Scripture, (2) the theology of the Logos and the trinitarian doctrine of the three *hypostases, (3) a depreciation of Christ's humanity vis-à-vis his divinity, (4) a dualistic Platonic anthropology, (5) the spiritualization of *eschatology.

The activities of Clement and Origen were decisive in diminishing the gnostic threat and contributed in large part to the penetration of Christianity among educated pagans, which until then had been minimal. The intellectual commitment and openness to Greek culture provoked negative reactions particularly within the local church, however, which were felt in the crisis that led to Origen's condemnation and expulsion to *Caesarea in Palestine (ca. 232). Nevertheless, while Origen's transfer to Caesarea favored the spread of the new Alexandrian culture in *Syria, *Palestine and *Arabia, the school of Alexandria (directed in the second half of the 3rd c. by *Heraclas, *Dionysius, *Theognostus, *Pierius, *Achillas, Serapion and Peter) does not seem to have modified the orientation established by Origen; only the doctrinal discussions of the preexistence of the soul and spiritual resurrection were abandoned. And given the close relations between school and episcopate (Heraclas, Dionysius, Achillas and Peter became bishops of Alexandria), the cultural approach of the school became the official policy of the church of Alexandria and from there gradually spread throughout Egypt, despite significant resistance (on Dionysius's polemic against *Sabellianism and *millenarism, see Dionysius of Alexandria).

Alexandrian culture met an even stronger reaction in its expansion outside of Egypt in regions of Asian culture: the alternating fortunes of this conflict are attested at *Antioch in the second half of the 3rd c. by the events of *Paul of Samosata and *Lucian of Samosata, while the Apologia of *Pamphilus (praef.) shows the bitterness of the debate in Syria and Palestine at the beginning of the 4th c., by then polarized around the figure of Origen. The *Arian crisis provoked an important modification in the by-then-traditional Alexandrian *trinitarian doctrine, in that Athanasius, in deference to the *monarchian approach of the Nicene Creed (325), abandoned the doctrine of the three hypostases for a more unitarian and egalitarian conception of the Trinity. The prestige of *Didymus, however, scholarch in the second half of the 4th c. after the fleeting Macarius, testifies to the continuing vitality of the Origenian exegetical tradition. Anti-Origenist polemic, revived in the late 4th c. by *Epiphanius of Salamis and encouraged for purely political ends by *Theophilus of Alexandria, marked the effective end of the school (*Rhodo having succeeded Didymus as director). At the same time Antiochene exegetes, who tended toward literalism, thoroughly criticized the systematic Alexandrian allegorism; Cyril of Alexandria (1st half 5th c.) submitted to their influence, falling back on a mixture of literalism and allegorism that distorted the organic unity of Origen's and Didymus's exegesis.

In the field of *Christology, however, the Alexandrian tradition continued to make its influence felt: the subordination of Christ's humanity to his divinity assured the unity of the theandric composition much better than the man/God bipolarity of Antiochene Christology and better met the needs of popular piety. This assured Cyril's success against *Nestorius, but *monophysitism immediately radicalized the characteristic aspects of that Christology still further, and the polemic degenerated into brawling and logomachy. On the one hand, monophysitism, heir to Alexandrian Christology in its extreme radicalization, interpreted the religious sense of vast regions of the East, such as Egypt and Syria, much better than the Christology of Chalcedon; but the revival of native *Syriac and Coptic culture against the hegemony of Hellenistic culture contributed decisively to its success. On the other hand, openness to Hellenism was the most characteristic component of the Alexandrian school's cultural policy, so the triumph of monophysitism, despite its descendence from the traditional Alexandrian Christology, meant the definitive liquidation of the legacy of that policy, which had marked an important moment in the Christianization of the ancient world.

TRE 2, 251-261; LTK 1, 374-375; 377-379; W. Bousset, Jüdisch-christlicher Schulbetrieb in Alexandria und Rom, Göttingen 1915; Ch. Diehl, L'Égypte chrétienne et byzantine, in G. Hanotaux (ed.), Histoire de la Nation Égyptienne, Paris, III, 1933, 399-557; G. Bardy, Aux origines de l'Ecole d'Alexandrie: RecSR 27 (1937) 65-90; Id., Pour l'histoire de l'École d'Alexandrie: Vivre et Penser 2 (1942) 80-109; P. Brezzi, La gnosi cristiana di Alessandria e le antiche scuole cristiane, Rome 1950; A. Knauber, Katechetenschule oder Schulkatecumenat?: TTZ 60 (1951) 243-266; M. Hornschuh, Das Leben des Origenes und die Entstehung der alexandrinischen Schule: ZKG 71 (1960) 1-25 and 193-214; F. Pericoli-Ridolfini, Le origini della Chiesa di Alessandria d'Egitto e la cronologia dei vescovi alessandrini dei secoli I e II, 1962 (RAL 17); A. Méhat, Etude sur les Stromates de Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1966, 62-70; G. Ruhbach, Bildung in der Altenkirche: Kirchengeschichte als Missiongeschichte 1 (1974) 293-310; P.L. Donini, Le scuole l'anima l'impero: la filosofia antica da Antioco a Plotino, Turin 1982; A. Tuilier, Les évangélistes et les docteurs de la primitive église et les origines de l'école (didaskaleion) d'Alexandrie: SP 17/2, Oxford 1982, 738-749; R.L. Wilken, Alexandria: A School for Training in Virtue, in P. Henry (ed.), Schools of Thought in the Christian Tradition, Philadelphia 1984, 15-18; J.A. McGuckin, Christian Ascetism and the Early School of Alexandria: Studies in Church History 22 (1985) 25-39; A. Le Boulluec, L'école d'Alexandrie. De quelques adventures d'un concept historiographique: Alexandrina. Mél. à C. Mondesert, Paris 1987, 403-417; U. Neymeyr, Die christliche Lehrer im 2. Jh. (VChr Suppl. 4), Leiden 1989; R. van den Broeck, The Christian School of Alexandria in the Second and Third Century, in J.W. Drijvers – A.A. McDonald (eds.), Centers of Learning and Locations in Premodern Europe and the Near East, Leiden 1995, 39-47; M. Rizzi, La scuola alessandrina. Da Clemente a Origene, in E. dal Covolo (ed.), Storia della teologia I, Rome-Bologna 1995, 81-120; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'église d'Egypte au IV^e siècle (328-373), Rome 1996; G. Bendinelli, Il Commentario a Matteo di Origene.

L'ambito della metodologia scolastica dell'antichità, Rome 1997; A. van den Hoeck, The "Catechetical" School of Early Christian Alexandria and Its Philonic Heritage: HTR 90 (1997) 59-87; B. Pouderon, D'Athènes à Alexandrie. Études sur Athénagore et les origines de la philosophie chrétienne, Louvain-Paris 1997; M. Simonetti, Teologia e cristologia dell'Egitto cristiano, in A. Camplani (ed.), L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo antica, Rome 1997, 11-38; Ch. Haas, Alexandria in Late Antiquity: Topography and Social Conflict, London 1997; A. Jakab, Chrétiens d'Alexandrie. Richesse et pauvreté aux premiers temps du christianisme (1er-3e siècles). Essai d'histoire sociale, Paris 1998; G. Dorival, Les débuts du Christianisme à Alexandrie: Colloque Alexandrie: Une mégapole cosmopolite, Actes, Paris 1999, 157-174; A. Le Boulluec, Aux origines encore de l'"école" d'Alexandrie: Adamantius 5 (1999) 8-36; M. Rizzi, *Il didaskaleion nella tradizione alessandrina. Da Clemente all'*Oratio panegyrica in Origenem, in G. Firpo - G. Zecchini (eds.), "Magister": aspetti culturali ed istituzionali, Alexandria 1999, 177-199; T. Camelot, Les chrétiens à Alexandrie: foyer de culture chrétienne, in P. Geoltrain (ed.) Aux origines du christianisme, Paris 2000, 495-504; A. Jakab, L'organisation de la communauté chrétienne d'Alexandrie d'après Clément, in M.A. Vannier, O. Wermelinger and G. Wurst (eds.), in Anthropos laïkos. Mèlanges Alexandre Faivre, Fribourg (Switz.), 2000, 131-139; A. Le Boulluec, Dialogue interreligieux dans l'Alexandrie antique in Anthropos laïkos, 140-151; M. Rizzi, Scuola di Alessandria, in A. Monaci Castagno (ed.), Origene. Dizionario. La cultura, il pensiero, le opere, Rome 2000, 437-440; J.-Y. Empereur, Alexandria, in D.B. Redford (ed.), The Oxford Encyclopaedia of Ancient Egypt, Oxford 2001, I, 54-56; A. Jakab, Ecclesia alexandrina. Evolution sociale et institutionelle du christianisme alexandrin (IIe et IIIe siècles), Berlin-Bern 2001; E. Prinzivalli, Magister ecclesiae. Il dibattito su Origene fra III e IV secolo, Rome 2002; T. Oden, The African Memory of Mark, Downers Grove, IL 2011.

M. Simonetti

III. Councils.

231/232. Bishop *Demetrius convened a council of Egyptian bishops and some priests to judge Origen, accused of having been ordained priest by *Theoctistus of Caesarea without Demetrius's knowledge, on whom Origen was legally dependent. Origen's cultural policy of openness to the contribution of Greek culture was also causing dissension, and some of his doctrines appeared questionable; his very fame aroused Demetrius's suspicion. The council forbade Origen from residing or teaching at Alexandria. Not content with his expulsion from Alexandria, Demetrius, supported by some Egyptian bishops, invalidated his priestly ordination. The condemnation was approved by the bishop of Rome and others, but not in Palestine, Syria, Greece and Arabia.

ca. 305. Athanasius (Apol. sec. 59) tells us of a council called by Peter of Alexandria to condemn Melitius of Lycopolis, accused of sacrificing to idols and other crimes. In fact, Melitius was condemned for having gone ahead with irregular episcopal ordinations during the persecution of Diocletian and because he did not approve of Peter's moderate measures toward the lapsi of that persecution.

ca. 322. Bishop *Alexander condemned the Alexandrian priest *Arius for spreading a doctrine which held the radical inferiority and heterogeneity of the Son with respect to the Father. Arius continued to spread his ideas, however, so Alexander gathered a council of about 100 bishops of Egypt and Libya that reexamined the case and confirmed the condemnation against Arius and his followers. Some time later Alexander wrote an encyclical letter about this council, signed by him, his priests and his deacons.

ca. 324. Athanasius (Apol. sec. 74.75) tells us that *Ossius of Cordoba, charged by *Constantine with settling the dispute between Alexander and Arius, took part in a council at Alexandria that restored Colluthus, who had claimed episcopal rank, to his priestly condition; the ordinations he had performed were declared null.

338. Athanasius, back from the exile (ca. 335-337) to which Constantine had condemned him after the Council of *Tyre, called a council of the bishops of Egypt, *Thebaid, Libya and *Pentapolis to obtain approval and support against the accusations made by the Eusebians. An encyclical to this effect was sent to all the bishops of Christendom.

346. Back in Alexandria from his second exile (ca. 339-346), Athanasius called a council of Egyptian bishops that ratified the deliberations of the Council of *Serdica (343) and took note of the synodal decree of the Council of *Jerusalem, issued sometime earlier, which had welcomed him as he passed through on his way home. The council is mentioned by *Socrates (HE 2, 26) and *Sozomen (HE 4, 1) but not by the Historia acephala*, which gives the exact date of Athanasius's return (21 Oct. 346) and contains an excellent record of his movements.

362. Back in Alexandria after his third exile (ca. 356-362) at the death of Constantius, Athanasius called a Council of Egyptian bishops, attended also by some Nicene bishops that *Constantius had exiled in Egypt, among them *Eusebius of Vercelli. The council dealt with all the undecided questions directly or indirectly connected with the Arian controversy, publishing their decisions in a synodal letter (Tomus ad Antiochenos): (1) moderate measures against the bishops who had subscribed the pro-Arian formula of *Rimini; (2) invitation to the Antiochenes to end their *schism by reuniting with the Nicene group led by Paulinus; (3) condemnation of those who considered the Holy Spirit a creature; (4) acceptance of formulas which affirmed either only one or three hypostases of the Trinity, as long as they were duly clarified; and (5) minimization of the rising *Apollinarist question by means of a generic compromise formula.

363. In this year Athanasius delivered to the emperor *Jovian at Antioch a synodal letter (this designation, testified to only by the historian *Theodoret, is in fact erroneous, as the document does not have the characteristic element of synodal letters, i.e., the subscriptions) in his own name and in those of the bishops of Egypt, Thebaid and Libya, reaffirming the validity of the Nicene Creed. It was widely held that the letter was published by a council called at Alexandria immediately upon Athanasius's return there after the brief exile he suffered under *Julian (ca. 362-363). The Hist. aceph. 12, however, speaks only of a rapid visit to the city, almost incognito, before embarking. We may think of a small council held by Athanasius before returning to Alexandria, or a meeting at Antioch between Athanasius and some bishops who had followed him there. The idea of a council held at Alexandria shortly before or after Athanasius's departure for the East now seems to have been abandoned: on the one hand, it seems to clearly contradict the chronology proposed by the Historia acephala, and on the other, it seems pointless given that the principal doctrinal questions had been defined at the Alexandrian council the year before (A. Martin 1996, 577).

ca. 370. A council of ca. 90 bishops of Egypt and Libya, called by Athanasius, wrote a synodal letter to the *African bishops (ad Afros) inviting them to beware of those holding the pro-Arian formula of *Rimini and clarifying the anti-Arian doctrine. The council also informs the Africans that the council had written to Pope *Damasus congratulating him on the condemnation of *Valens and *Ursacius, leaders of the pro-Arian party, though expressing surprise that *Auxentius, one of the most important, remained unpunished at *Milan.

399. Theophilus held a council of Egyptian bishops to condemn the errors of Origen. The council's synodal letter, sent to the bishops of Palestine and *Cyprus, has reached us in *Jerome's translation (Ep. 92).

430. In the context of the incipient *Nestorian controversy, after Pope *Celestine's condemnation of Nestorius at Rome, Cyril gathered a council of Egyptian bishops in November 430 in the presence of the Roman delegates. The synodal letter, Cyril's third letter to Nestorius, refutes the patriarch of Constantinople's doctrine and orders him to subscribe the 12 anathemata.

452. *Proterius, imposed on Alexandria as successor to the deposed *Dioscorus, called a council of Egyptian bishops to have them approve the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon (451). The council also deposed the priest Timothy Ailuros, head of the Egyptian *monophysites, and some of his supporters.

589. *Eulogius, *Melkite patriarch of Alexandria, called a council to examine a controversy regarding Dt 18:15: "The Lord will raise up a prophet from his people" etc. Against the interpretation of the Jews and the *Samaritans, the traditional christological interpretation of the passage was reconfirmed.

LTK 1, 376; 231/232. Hfl-Lecl 1,156-159; P. Nautin, Origène, Paris 1977, 428-431; C.B. Armstrong - B. Drewery, The Condemnation of Origen: Should It Be Reversed?: Origeniana Tertia (eds. R. Hanson - H. Crouzel), 1985, 271-277; H. Crouzel, Origene e l'origenismo: le condanne di Origene: Augustinianum 26 (1986) 295-303.

ca. 305. Hfl-Lecl 1,211-212,488-503; H. Idris Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, Milan 1924, 38-99; A. Martin, Athanase et les Mélitiens: Politique et Théologie chez Athanase d'Alexandrie (ed. Ch. Kannengiesser), Paris 1974, 31-61; F. Hernández, El cisma meleciano en la iglesia egipcia, Gerion (Madrid), 2, 1984, 155-180; A. Martin, La reconciliation des Lapsi en Égypte. De Denis à Pierre d'Alexandrie: une querelle de clercs: RSLR 22 (1986) 263-266; J.A. Fischer, Die Synode zu Alexandrien im Jahr 306: Archivium Historiae Conciliorum 18 (1987) 62-70; R. Williams, Arius, London [2]2001, 32-41.

ca. 322. Hfl-Lecl 1,349-363; Simonetti 30; F. Hernández, El impacto del sínodo alejandrino de ca. 320 en el Didaskaleion de Alejandría: Erytheia. Revista de estudios bizantinos y neogriegos 17 (Madrid 1996) 7-9; G. Fernandez Hernandez, El Sinodo de Alejandría (ca. 320) y sus consecuencias: Carthaginensia 14 (1998) 403-405; R. Williams, Arius: Heresy and Tradition, London 1987, 48-66.

ca. 324: Mansi 2,554-559ff.; DHGE 4,212-213; H. Georg Opitz, Die Zeitfolge des arianischen Streites von den Anfängen bis zum Jahr 328: ZNTW 33, 131-159; R. Williams, op cit., 48-66.

338. Hfl-Lecl 1,692; Simonetti 141; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV[e] siècle (328-373), Rome 1996, 400-403; Athanasius of Alexandria, Lettere Festali; Anonymous, Indice delle Lettere, intro., tr. and notes ed. A. Camplani, Milan 2003, 343-344.

346. Hfl-Lecl 1,836; A. Martin, Athanase, 451-453; A. Camplani, Lettere Festali, 412-414.

362. Hfl-Lecl 1,2,963ff.; Simonetti 359-370; Id., Il concilio di Alessandria del 362 e l'origine della formula trinitaria: Augustinianum 30 (1990) 353-360; A. Martin, Athanase, 541-565; Id., Athanase, 541-565; A. Camplani, Atanasio e Eusebio tra Alessandria e Antiochia (362-363): osservazioni sul Tomus ad Antiochenos, *l'*Epistula catholica e due fogli copti (edizione di Pap. Berol. 11948), in E. Dal Covolo - R. Uglione - G.M. Vian (eds.), Eusebio di Vercelli e il suo tempo, Biblioteca di scienze religiose 133 (Rome 1997) 191-246, esp. 197-219; X. Morales, La théologie trinitaire d'Athanase d'Alexandrie, Thèse presentée pour l'obtention du doctorat, Paris 2000, 304-305; A. Camplani, Lettere Festali, 482-483.

363. Hfl-Lecl 1,2,971-972; Simonetti 373-374; A. Martin, Athanase, 565-589; A. Camplani, Atanasio e Eusebio; A. Camplani, Lettere Festali, 483-487; 488 note 3.

ca. 370. Mansi 3,451-454; Simonetti 388; C. Kannengiesser, (Ps.-) Athanasius, Ad Afros Examined: Festschrift für L. Abramowski, Tübingen 1993, 264-280; A. Martin, Athanase, 619-635.

399: Hfl-Lecl 2,122; Hier., Ep. 92 (CSEL 55); Epistula synodica prima, ed. J. Declerck, Byzantion 54 (1984) 495-507; A. Guillaumont, Les "Képhalaia Gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et chez les Syriens, Paris 1962, 55ff.; P. Lardet, Introduzione a Saint Jérôme, Apologie contre Rufin (SC 303, 1983), 56-59; B. Studer, Origenismo (in Occidente, secs. IV-VI), Rome 2000, 304.

430. Mansi 4,551-553, 1067-1084; L. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974, 177-180; J.A. McGuckin, St. Cyril of Alexandria: The Christological Controversy. Its History, Theology, and Texts, Leiden 1994, 44-46; 282-293.

452. Hfl-Lecl 2,881-882; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972, 148ff., 154ff., 160ff.; Le Chiese d'Oriente e d'Occidente (432-610), ed. L. Pietri, ed. it. ed. E. Prinzivalli, Rome 2002, 120; 161-163; 498.

589: Hfl-Lecl 3,232; P. Goubert, Patriarches d'Antioche et d'Alexandrie contemporains de saint Grégoire le Grand: REB 25 (1967) 71-76.

M. Simonetti

IV. Archaeology. Parallel to the growing importance of the episcopal see we find intense activity in the field of religious building, including the oldest examples of the transformation of temples into Christian churches, even before the Edict of *Theodosius. Information on the church buildings of Alexandria comes to us from eccelesiastical historians such as *Socrates and *Sozomen, or *Theodoret of Cyrrhus; in addition to these, local chronicles also contain a mass of information on the Christian monuments of the city, such as the Chronicle of *John of Nikiu for the period up to the Arab invasion, and the annals of Eutychus, patriarch of Alexandria in the 10th c., for the following period.

Under the patriarch Alexander (312–328)—on the bishops of Alexandria, see J. Maspéro, Histoire—the temple of Saturn was converted into a church dedicated to St. Michael (see John of Nikiu, Chron., 49). He also restored the church of *Theonas, at that time the episcopal church, dedicated to the Virgin; its function was later transferred to the Great Church that arose on the Caesareum or Sebasteum in the 4th c., and it was destroyed several times. (On this see the similar example of *Oxyrhynchus, where the Caesareum was converted into an episcopal church, late 4th c.) This building was rebuilt ca. 368 and from then was used as a cathedral until at least 641, when it was given over to the *Jacobites: in 912 it was destroyed by fire. A Mithraeum was converted into a church at the time of the emperor *Constantius II (see Socr., HE, II, PG 67, 763): this phenomenon intensified esp. after the *Edicts of *Milan and *Aquileia against *paganism in 391, when the *Serapeion was converted into a church under *Arcadius (see W.F. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Kirchen, 105-136). Newly founded churches included the Church of Athanasius, consecrated by the patriarch in 370, where he established his residence; that of Sts. *Cosmas and Damian (see John of Nikiu, Chron., 88); and the Church of Dionysius. The dedications of the churches of Alexandria are those handed down by the sources, which date to the 5th c. at the earliest: it is therefore not possible to ascertain whether they refer to the original dedications or rededications of older Christian buildings. Later the patriarch *Theophilus (395–412) built two churches, one dedicated to the emperor Theodosius and mentioned later by *John Moschus (Prato Spirituale, PG 87, 30, 2975), the other to his son *Arcadius (see the similar, contemporary example at *Gaza, where the Marneion was converted into a church [late 4th c.], known as the Eudoxiana since the empress herself sent the plans for it from Constantinople [see H. Grégoire - M.A. Kügener, Vie de Porphyre]).

Within the city wall among martyria that should be mentioned is that of St. Mark, built in the area of the port and destroyed by the Arabs in 640 and rebuilt under the patriarch John III (681–689): later (828) Venetian merchants stole the saint's body. These were the urban churches. Among foundations outside the walls, a separate chapter would be needed to treat of the many monasteries that arose, esp. on the outskirts of the city, as the sources attest (e.g. John Moschus and *Sophronius), and the martyrial churches that became venerated sanctuaries, such as those of St. *Mennas and Sts. *Cyrus and John, the latter built at bishop Cyril's expense (412–444). A detailed 7th-c. description of the site, handed down by reliable MSS, shows precise points of contact between the layout of the two sanctuaries: the second was composed of a number of buildings, including, as at St. Mennas, a baptistery.

The principal Christian foundations were built mainly in the 4th and 5th c., the acme of the Alexandrian church—see esp. the periods of Theophilus (395–412), Cyril (412–444) and *Dioscorus (444–451). After the Council of *Chalcedon, primacy over the East passed to the church of Constantinople; the Egyptian church, which had rejected the dogma of Chalcedon, officially embraced *monophysitism, and the *Coptic and *Melkite churches were established. This situation had a particular effect on Alexandria where, in the Arab invasion of 638, the resistance of the Greek element and the troops was concentrated; it thus suffered worse destruction than any other city (many buildings were turned into mosques, and some rebuilt, as the sources attest), whereas the Copts were able to find a modus vivendi with the invaders. It is therefore difficult, given the situation of the Christian buildings—of which nothing remains except references in the sources and in an occasional rare epigraph—to trace the evolution of Alexandrian religious buildings into the proto-Byzantine period: even the location of most of these buildings is unknown (on this, see the topographical plan of Alexandria published by Krause, RBK, s.v. Alexandria, 101-102, fig. 1). The same observation can be made regarding architectural decoration of which, at least for Alexandria, little evidence remains.

The case is different with sculpture—esp. due to the presence at Alexandria, as in the major centers of the empire—of some works in porphyry, a material mined in Egyptian quarries reserved for the emperor and his family. The location of the porphyry quarry on Mons Porphyreticus (Djebel Dukhan) between the Nile and the Red Sea and the hardness of that material suggest that it was worked in loco: thus the main center of the production of porphyry articles (at least until the 5th c., after which it seems that the quarries were no longer exploited) may have been Alexandria; this thesis, though quite plausible, needs further confirmation. Because of its limited use, however, works in porphyry are not much help in dating the region's contemporary sculpture, often improperly called Coptic.

In painting, too, the situation is fragmentary, with significant problems in dating surviving works. Frescoes are preserved in some catacombs, in particular those of Karmoutz near the Serapeion (two apsed rooms with an ambulatory), where the main apse is ornamented with a continual frieze with three scenes difficult to interpret: in the center, Christ enthroned between the apostles Peter and Andrew; on the left the wedding at Cana; on the right the multiplication of the loaves with the people feeding on Christ's eulogia. Figures of apostles and saints are distributed on the other walls. The poor state of preservation of the fresco and its isolated position in the tradition of Egyptian painting, as well as the need for a more accurate dating (which oscillates between the 3rd and 7th c.), do not facilitate understanding. In any case, at least regarding this complex, we have a thematically coherent program that must have taken into account the *exegesis of the Alexandrian fathers.

In the so-called minor arts, much of the production of articles in ivory seems to converge on Alexandria, as in some cases the sources themselves testify. Particularly important in this regard is the list of gifts sent by Bishop Cyril to the court of Constantinople, including 14 ivory cathedrae, numerous vela and ivory objects (see Batiffol, Présents, 247-64): these encourage the attribution to Egypt, and esp. to Alexandria, of some of the most notable ivory works extant (e.g. the cathedra preserved at Ravenna, see Batiffol, s.v.). The recent attribution of the so-called Ambrosian Iliade to an Alexandrian workshop—based on paleographic data (see G. Cavallo, Considerazioni, 70-85) and reinforced by stylistic analysis of the miniatures (see R. Bianchi-Bandinelli, Conclusioni, 86-96), probably produced well into the 5th c. by pagan cultural circles still active at Alexandria during this period—helps clarify the city's artistic and cultural position in the Late Antique period which, at least regarding pagan commissions, is shown to still be linked (and this consciously) to Hellenistic models. In conclusion, history and the sources testify to the importance of the metropolis of Alexandria in the Late Antique period, even despite the fact that there is practically no surviving architectural evidence: this void is only partially filled by the historical, literary, hagiographical and epigraphical sources. New lines of study, based primarily on historical considerations and on the reexamination of old problems, are trying to restore to the city the prominent place it must have occupied at this significant time, esp. in the 3rd-5th c.

Eutyches, Annales, PG 111, 907-1155; DACL 1, 1098-1210; DHGE 2, 289-374; EAA 1, 204-235 Suppl. 27-32; RAC 1, 271-283; M. Krause, voce Alexandria: RBK I, Stuttgart 1966; Neroutsos Bey, L'ancienne Alexandrie. Étude archéologique et topographique, Paris 1888; P. Batiffol, Les présents de St. Cyrille à la cour di Constantinople: BALAC 1 (1911) 247-264; R.H. Charles, The Chronicle of John Bishop of Nikiu, Oxford 1916; J. Maspéro, Les patriarches d'Alexandrie, Paris 1913; H. Grégoire - M.A. Kügener, Marc le Diacre. Vie de Porphyre, Paris 1930; F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Kirchen in antiken Heiligtümern: JDAI 39 (1939) 105-36; A.A. Vasiliev, Imperial Porphyry Sarcophagi: DOP 4 (1948) 3-26; R. Rémondon, L'Egypte et la suprème résistance au Christianisme (V-VII s.): BIAO 51 (1952) 63-78; G.R. Monks, The Church of Alexandria and the City's Economic Life in the Sixth Century: Speculum 28 (1953) 348-362; R. Rémondon, L'Eglise dans la société égyptienne à l'époque byzantine: Chronique d'Egypte 47 (1972) 254-277; G. Cavallo, Considerazioni di un paleografo per la data e l'origine dell' "Iliade Ambrosiana": Dialoghi di Archeologia 7,1 (1973) 70-85; R. Bianchi Bandinelli, Conclusioni di uno storico dell'arte antica sull'origine e la composizione dell'Iliade Ambrosiana: ibid., 86-96; var. aus., Age of Spirituality, Princeton, NJ 1979 (esp. the chart on pieces either from or attributed to Alexandria). CCAB 1981; Alessandria e il mondo ellenistico romano. Studi in onore di Achille Adriani, 3 vols., Rome 1983-1984; A. Martin, Les premiers siècles du christianisme à Alexandrie. Essai de topographie religieuse (III^e^-IV^e^ siècles): REAug 30 (1984) 211-225; A. Baldini, Problemi della tradizione sulla "distruzione" del Serapeo di Alessandria: Rivista Storica dell'Antichità 15 (1985) 97-152; H. Brakmann, "Synaxis catholike," in Alexandria. Zur Verbreitung des christlichen Stationsgottesdienstes: JbAC 30 (1987) 74-89; A. Martin, Topographie et liturgie: le problème des "paroisses" d'Alexandrie, in Actes du XI^e^ Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, II, Rome 1989, 1133-1144; Id., Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Eglise d'Egypte au IV^e^ siècle (328-373), Rome 1996; Z. Kiss, Les ampoulles des Saint Ménas decouvertes à Kom el-Dikka (1961-1981) (Alexandrie, 5), Warsaw 1989; W.A. Daszewski, An Unknown Christian Complex in Alexandria, in Coptic Studies: Acts of the Third Intern. Congress of Coptic Studies, Warsaw 1990, 87-105; B. Tkaczow, The Topography of Ancient Alexandria (An Archaeological Map), Warsaw 1993; C. Haas, Alexandria in Late Antiquity: Topography and Social Conflict, Baltimore 1997; EAM 1,352-354.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ALEXANDRIANS, Letter to the. Apocryphal letter of St. *Paul, mentioned in the Muratorian *Canon as a work of the *Marcionites. Neither the Latin nor the Greek text is still extant, though T. Zahn supposes that it is in a lectionary of Bobbio (7th c.) under the title Ad Colos., but there is no element of Marcionite doctrine in the text. Discussion on this text's authenticity remains open.

Zahn 2, 566-592; Elliott 553-554; Erbetta 2,69-70; Moraldi 2, 81, 97, 90 (bibl.); Starowieyski, 3, 54-55, 356 (bibl.); M. MacNamara, The Apocrypha in the Irish Church, Dublin 1975, 104.

M. Starowieyski

ALEXIUS (4th c.). Uncertainty surrounds the events related to this confessor, perhaps 4th c., whose legend originated late-5th c. in *Syria (450–475). The protagonist of the story, a member of a noble *Roman family, fled to *Edessa on his wedding night to lead a life begging in front of churches, preaching and teaching virtue. For his *ascesis and wisdom he is called man of God, Mar Riscia. Shortly before his death he reveals his story to the sacristan of the church where he had lived in poverty. Bishop *Rabbula, hearing of his death, went to the cemetery where he was buried and did not find the body, but only the rags that covered him (BHO, 10-11 n. 36-42). The nucleus of this legend, the first testimony of which is a late-5th/early-6th c. MS, spread widely among the Greeks, the story growing as it spread. The youth's parents, Euphamianus and Aglara, enter the story; he is given the name Alexius; on his wedding night, in a detailed dialogue, he convinces his wife to live in continence, then leaves Rome and disappears. He returns there 17 years later and is received as a beggar by his parents, who do not recognize him, in the very house he had left. His life is exemplary: he accepts every kind of mortification, living beneath a stairwell from where he edifies all, completely unrecognized. The pope himself eventually recognizes him from a document clutched in the saint's rigid hand after his death. In the Greek legend (BHG I, 15-19, nn. 51-56) the pope is Marcianus, who never existed; in the Latin version (BHL I, 48, nn. 286-291; p. 49, nn. 293-295), *Innocent (401–417).

Spreading at *Constantinople and among the *Byzantines from the 6th-9th c., Alexius's story inspired a hymn by *Romanus Melodus; a second version of the text developed in *Syriac regions. Criticism has shown the dependence of some basic elements of the story, such as the flight after the wedding from his father's house and the return, on the model of the Life of John Calibytus (Poncelet, 1890); the fact is emphasized that the conversation on the wedding night in which the husband convinces the wife regarding chastity is a topos of ancient *hagiography (De Gaiffier); finally, the reason for the intactam sponsam relinquens has been set in a larger context, typical of the 4th and 5th c., regarding the superiority of ascesis to marriage and the transformation of the nuptial bond into a relationship of spiritual friendship, "imposed" either by the husband on his wife or vice versa, with varying success, as well as a further development in the limits of the medieval romance (Giannarelli 1980) and the symmetrical hagiographical uses of characters in the story (see the analogous situation from the woman's perspective in the Life of Saint Cecilia).

The Byzantine legend centers on St. Peter's basilica in Rome, where both wedding and funeral are to have occurred (see the Menologia of Basil and the *Arab legends documented by *Vatican and Parisian MSS); in the Greek version the marriage takes place at St. Boniface, the burial in St. Peter's; sometimes both Greek and Latin legends concur in locating everything at St. Peter's, obviously to give more value and interest to the saint's life, and esp. to the funeral, which took place 17 March for the Greeks, 17 July for the Latins, the dates of his feast.

In the West the legend seems to have been attested for the first time in *Spain in the first half of the 10th c., and in the region of Burgos (L. Vasquez de Parga; BHL I, 48 n. 289 and De Gaiffier 1944), with some significant additions (the inclusion of an announcement to the Romans about the saint's death in domum sanctae Mariae) and some geographic changes (e.g., Laodicea of Syria rather than Edessa).

At Rome the cult and the "history" spread thanks to Sergius, metropolitan of *Damascus, an exile in the Urbe (977) who received from the pope the *monastery of St. Boniface on the Aventine, where the monks began to venerate the saint. Because of the presence there of Alexius's relics, the church added Alexius's name to that of the original patron (986). It was from here that a Latin version developed, making the beggar a Roman saint in that he was born, died and buried in the city, and giving the pope a central role in events. In acknowledging Alexius's greatness, the pope ratified the asceticism of the laity as superior to marriage, in accordance with a model of life following the church's directives.

In the Middle Ages Alexius became an authoritative saint (Peter Damian preached a sermon on him), loved by the popes (Leo IX dedicated a hymn to him). His Life spread in France in the 11th and 12th c. in relation to the reform of Cluny, thanks to the papal legate Leo; it was reelaborated in poetry and in prose, as shown in Italian and French poems and the Legenda aurea of Jacobus da Varagine.

Alexius is widely present in literature: English, Flemish, German, Polish, Serbian, Russian and even Norwegian. In addition to Rome, his relics are at Montecassino, Prague, Bologna, Bergamo, *Paris and *Cologne. Even at St. Albans in England a chapel was dedicated to him.

*Iconographic depictions show him mainly in pilgrim/mendicant dress (he is their patron), with a staff, a staircase (referring to the stairwell in which he lived) and the letter in his hand by which he was recognized. Besides the pictorial cycle in St. *Clement at Rome, there are the *mosaic of the Cathedral of Monreale, the 12th-c. Stuttgart passionary, the relief of the cathedral of Strasbourg by Hans Himmerer (15th c.), and the painting of A. Carracci at Bologna in the Church of the Mendicants (17th c.). A statue by Caccini adorns the façade of Holy Trinity at Florence, evidence of the saint's extraordinary popularity, enhanced by what his legend suggested to a popular imagination already sensitive, from Greek poetry and tragedy, to scenes of recognition and nonrecognition. It is significant that here the agnitio is made not by the father but by the pope, after the protagonist's death, reaffirming the absolute superiority of spiritual affections and the ascetic life over carnal bonds and life in the saeculum. All of the events surrounding Alexius can be read as a narrative exegesis on this evangelical position.

Acta SS. Iulii, IV, Venice 1748, 238-270; BHO, 10-11, nn. 36-42; BHG I, 15-19, nn. 51-64h; BHL 286-301; p. 49, nn. 293-295; BS I,823; LCI 2,41; BS 1,820-823; DHGE, 2, 379-381; G. De Luca: Lateranum (1926) 46-73; L. Zambarelli, SS. Bonifacio e Alessio all'Aventino, Rome n.d.; G.H.D. Allen, Two Old Portuguese Versions of the Life of St. Alexis (cod. Alber. 36 und 266), Illinois Studies in Language and Literature 37, 1; Urbana, IL 1953; K. Kunstle, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst, vol. II, Freiburg in Br. 1928, 47-48; L. Réau, Iconographie de l'art chrétienne, vol. III, Paris 1958, 52-54; L. Vasquez de Parga: Revista de Bibliografía Nacional 2 (1941) 245-258; B. De Gaiffier, AB 62 (1944) 281-283; Id., Sources d'un text relatif au mariage dans la Vie de s. Alexis BHL 289: AB 63 (1945) 48-56; Id., Intactam sponsam relinquens. À propos de la Vie de S. Alexis: AB 65 (1947) 157-195; A.G. Hatoher, The Old English Poem St. Alexis: Traditio 8 (1952) 111-158; H. Schommadau, Zum altfranzösischen Alexiuslied: Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie LXX (1954) 161-203; G. Ferrari, Early Roman Monasteries, Vatican City 1957, 78-87; V. Bartalucci Pizzorusso, Le versioni Otrantine della leggenda di S. Alessio: Studi medio-latini and volgari 6/7 (1959) 9-24; L. Duchesne, Notes sur la topographie de Rome au Moyen Âge. VII, 1: Les légendes chrétiennes de l'Aventin: MEFRA 10 (1980) 269-271, 632-645; E. Giannarelli, La tipologia femminile nella biografia e nell'autobiografia cristiana di IV secolo, Rome 1980, 88-94; F. Halkin, Une légende grecque de s. Alexis: AB 98 (1980) 241-296; P. Golinelli, La leggenda di Sant'Alessio in due inediti volgarizzamenti del Trecento e nella tradizione letteraria italiana, Siena 1987; C. Storey, An Annotated Bibliography and Guide to Alexis Studies (La vie de saint Alexis), Genoa 1987; C.A. Vega (ed.), La vida de san Alejo. Versiones castellanas, Salamanca 1991; S. Cingolani, I tre più antichi poemetti francesi su sant'Alessio, ovvero: le metamorfosi di un santo circondato di cavalieri: Hagiographica 1 (1994) 181-205; E. Giannarelli, s.v. Cecilia, in Il grande Libro dei Santi, vol. I, Cinisello Balsamo 1998, 409-412.

E. Giannarelli

ALLEGORY - TYPOLOGY. Allegory (from Gr. ἀλλὰ ἀγορεύειν, "to say other things") is the poetic and *rhetorical procedure whereby one says one thing to mean another: Dante, writing "wood," means "sin." By extension, this term also means the hermeneutical procedure of attributing to a text an allegorical meaning not intended by the author: e.g., the ancients interpreted the wanderings of Ulysses as an allegory of the vicissitudes of the human soul in search of redemption. The Jews made sparse use of allegory in interpreting the OT: the bride and groom of the Song of Songs were interpreted as symbols of Yahweh and Israel. But the Greeks, beginning in the 5th c. BC and then esp. under the influence of *Stoic philosophy, readily intepreted the Homeric myths and legends as symbols either of supernatural forces or of situations and passions of the soul; they were thus able to render acceptable to an already mature moral sensibility myths that, taken literally, would have been immoral or in any case overly anthropomorphic. This hermeneutical criterion was widely used in Jewish *Hellenistic milieus, esp. by *Philo, to interpret the OT in such a way as to render it compatible with the *philosophical and moral requirements of Greek readers. A similar procedure was used by *Paul to interpret figures and events of the books of the law as prefigurements, symbolic anticipations of Christ and the church. In general he preferred the term typos (Rom 5:14; 1 Cor 10:6), but in Gal 4:24 he also uses the verb allegoreuein. This type of interpretation of the OT was widely accepted and set the usual standard by which Christians, beginning in the 2nd c., read and interpreted those books. *Exegetes, esp. of the *Alexandrian school, added other types of allegorical interpretation to it, esp. under the influence of Philo and Greek philosophy. Modern scholars designate by the term typology both individual examples of the Pauline hermeneutical procedure, which sees facts and figures of the OT as typoi of NT acts and figures, and this kind of scriptural interpretation taken in general. They usually distinguish typology from allegory, in that the former would represent the authentically Christian way of reading and interpreting the OT, whereas allegory derives from *pagan influence and uses arbitrary procedures to find arcane meanings in the letter of *Scripture. They point out esp. that typology is rooted in the history of both the OT (typos) and the NT (fulfillment of the typos), while pagan-style allegory prescinds entirely from history. It must be pointed out, however, that the ancient exegetes, while they used different terms to indicate the various types of allegorical interpretation of Sacred Scripture (spiritual or *mystical interpretation corresponding to modern "typology," moral interpretation in reference to matters of the soul, etc.), nevertheless used the term allegory indifferently to indicate as a whole all types of nonliteral interpretation; more specifically, they did not distinguish typos from allegoria: in effect, every interpretation that is typological in content (in that it recognizes an OT fact as the typos of a NT fact) is necessarily allegorical in hermeneutical procedure (since it gives to that fact a meaning other than the literal one).

H. de Lubac, Typologie et allégorisme: RecSR 34 (1947) 180-226; J. Daniélou, Sacramentum futuri, Paris 1950; R.P.C. Hanson, Allegory and Event: A Study of the Sources and Significance of Origen's Interpretation of Scripture, Richmond 1959; L. Goppelt, Typos: Die typologische Deutung des Alten Testaments im Neuen, Darmstadt 1973; J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie, Paris [2]1976 (bibl.); M.N. Esper, Allegorie und Analogie bei Gregor von Nyssa, Bonn 1979; P.B. Rollinson, Classical Theories of Allegory and Christian Culture, London 1981; M. Simonetti, Profilo storico dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1981; Id., Lettera e/o allegoria. Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1985; Id., Sul significato di alcuni termini tecnici nella letteratura esegetica greca: La terminologia esegetica nell'antichità: VetChr 20 (1987) 25-58; J.-N. Guinot, La typologie comme technique herméneutique: Figures de l'Ancien Testament chez les Pères, Cahiers de Biblia Patristica 2, Strasbourg 1989; M. Simonetti, Ancora su allegoria e termini affini negli scrittori greci: ASE 8/2 (1991) 363-384; C. Blömmingen, Der griechische Ursprung der jüdisch-hellenistischen Allegorese und ihre Rezeption in der alexandrinischen Patristik, Frankfurt am Main u. a., 1992; D. Dawson, Allegorical Readers and Cultural Revision in Ancient Alexandria, Berkeley 1992; Die Allegorese des Antiken Mythos, eds. H.-J. Horn - H. Walter, Wiesbaden 1997; J. Whitman (ed.), Interpretation and Allegory. Antiquity to the Modern Period, Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2000, 41-45.

M. Simonetti

ALMACHIUS (or Telemachus) (d. ca. 400). *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (HE 5,26) relates that an Eastern monk, who had come to *Rome to put an end to the gladiatorial contests, was attacked by the spectators and stoned in the amphitheatre. Pope *Honorius numbered him among the *martyrs. The Mart. hier., on 1 January, tells a similar story, which it ascribes to Almachius, placing it during the prefecture of *Alypius. There are thus two different traditions regarding the date and the martyr's name. It is known, however, that the games ceased after 410; in this context the legend of St. Almachius was able to arise.

Bede, PL 94, 799; Paul the Deacon: PL 95, 947; BBKL 22 (2003) 1332; H. Delehaye, S. Almachius ou Télémaque: AB 33 (1914) 421-428; Mart. hier., 21; BS 1,878; DHGE 2,630-631.

V. Saxer

ALMS – ALMSGIVING. Almsgiving expresses an active compassion for the *poor, both in *body and *soul. The root of compassion is in the heart, and the Bible strengthens the reasons for it, considering every person as made in the image of God. Almsgiving, *fasting and *prayer are the three works requested of the Israelite, taken up again by the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6). The book of Acts provides two examples: *Cornelius for the *pagans, *Tabitha for the Christians. In the first Christian centuries freewill offerings were taken up esp. at the Sunday *Eucharist (see Justin, Apol. 67,6), but the faithful were exhorted to help the poor whenever there was a need. The Didache* recommends almsgiving, as it says in the Lord's gospel (15,4), and suggests it as a practical means for the sharing of goods (1,5-6; see also the Sherherd of Hermas, Mand. 2,4; Cyprian, De opere et elem. 25; Basil, De avaritia hom. VI,7-8). Almsgiving is linked to prayer in 2 Clem. 16,4. Jesus' saying is often cited: "There is more joy in giving than in receiving" (Acts 20:35 = 1 Clem. 2; Epiphanius, Haer. 74,5; Const. Ap. V,3,1). The Shepherd of *Hermas invites Christians to help one another and to share the things of creation with the poor (Vis. 3,9,2), comparing the interdependence between rich and poor to that between the vine and the elm (Sim. 2). The Latins transliterated the Greek term (see *Tertullian, De virg. vel. 13; Ad ux. 2,8; De pat. 7); it is also found in *epigraphs. The community in *Carthage took up a monthly collection, and a common fund was set up to assist the indigent (Tertullian, Apol. 39,5-6). *Cyprian dedicates a whole treatise to almsgiving: De opere et eleemosynis, stressing that it is obligatory, meritorious and a principle of sanctification; he himself made solicitation for the purpose of charity (see Ep. 5,1; 7,1).

In the 4th c. the development of communities rendered inadequate the rudimentary forms of assistance of the first centuries. Moreover, deterioration of the economic and social situation, the disproportionate distribution of property and wealth, and the absence or inadequacy of governmental structures moved the Greek and Latin fathers to accentuate the importance of almsgiving, to reawaken the Christian conscience so as to discover the duty to share and to perform charitable social works. *Basil of Caesarea founded a city for the poor and the sick, *Basileiad (see the eulogy of *Gregory of Naz., Hom 43 in laudem Basilii, 63), and in his homilies denounced the unjust exploitation of the poor, the immoral enrichment of the well-to-do and the causes of poverty. Basil, *John Chrysostom and *Ambrose put the whole in the light of theology: almsgiving regulates the gifts that come from God and is a duty of justice. "The earth has been given to all, rich and poor," says Ambrose (De Nab. 1,2). The rich person is only an administrator of goods and must give an account of them to God. The excess of the rich is destined for the aid of the poor (see Basil, Sermo de elem. 3, PG 32, 1158). Poverty is an insult to divine munificence. Almsgiving is a victory over greed, i.e., over the root of all *evil; it remits sins (*Maximus of Turin, Sermo 22A), brings progress in the spiritual life (Basil, *Gregory Nyssa) and disposes the Judge to clemency (John Chrysostom). The theme recurs continually in St. *Augustine's preaching (PL 46, 272-274: s.v. eleemosyna). The poor person is identified with Christ: "Serve the poor and you have served Christ " (Ambrose, Vid. 9,54; see also *Chromatius, Serm. 11,5; *Peter Chrysologus, Serm. 8,4; the famous text of *Sulpicius Severus, Vita Mart. 3,3: the poor man to whom Martin gave half his cloak is Christ). Almsgiving brings people together, making them feel as brothers (Gregory Nyssa, De paup. amand. 1) and should be given to all without distinction (Chrysostom, In Eph. hom. 10,4) but must be the fruit of honest work (Id., In Mat. hom. 85,3). Almsgiving is a duty for all. The poor person should often fast so as to be able to give, according to St. *Leo's advice (A. Guillaume). *Monks too are bound to give alms: they must provide for their own needs through work and give to the poor the alms they receive (A. Hamman, Vie liturgique, 129-131, 292-295).

The fathers of the church, without demonizing the possession of riches, encouraged interventions of solidarity on behalf of the poor, not to enhance one's prestige or as an individual act of public philanthropy, but because of the common *baptismal and creaturely vocation. "The ecclesiastical economy of almsgiving fulfilled a 'democratic' function that was absolutely foreign to the economy of the (fiscal) State" (S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, II, Rome-Bari 1973, 168).

I. Seipel, Die wirtschaftsethischen Lehren der Kirchenväter, Vienna 1907, 209-244; art. Almosen: RAC 1, 301ff.; art. Diakonie: RAC 3, 909-917; H. Rondet, RAM 30 (1954) 193-231 (Augustine); A. Guillaume, Jeûne et charité, Paris 1954; A. Hamman, Riches et pauvres dans l'Église ancienne, Paris 1962 (patristic dossier); Id., Vie liturgique et vie sociale, Paris 1968; S. Zincone, Ricchezza e povertà nelle omelie di Giovanni Crisostomo, L'Aquila 1973, 101-118 (on alms); B. Ramsey, Almsgiving in the Latin Church: The Latin 4th and Early 5th Centuries: Theological Studies 43 (1982) 226-249; A. Fitzgerald, Almsgiving in the Works of Saint Augustine, in Signum Pietatis. Festgabe für C.P. Mayer, Würzburg 1989, 445-459; B. Leylerle, John Chrysostom on Almsgiving and the Use of Money: HTR 87 (1994) 29-47; R. Garrison, Redemptive Almsgiving in Early Christianity, Sheffield 1993; G.G. Christo, John Chrysostom, On Repentance and Almsgiving, Eng. tr., FC, Washington D.C. 1998; S.L. Bridge, To Give or Not to Give? Deciphering the Saying of the Didache 1.6: JECS 5 (1997) 555-568; C. Corsato, I volti della carità nell'esperienza dei Padri, Padua 1997; Partage avec le pauvre: Cyprien, Augustin, intr. and tr. by A.-G. Hamman, Turnhout 1998; M.G. Mara, Nota sulle ragioni della carità nell'antichità cristiana: Augustinianum 40 (2000) 5-19.

M. Maritano

ALOGI. 2nd-c. *heretical group (those who reject the Logos, from the privative a + logos), begun in *Asia Minor. *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. 3,11,9) refers, without naming anyone, to those who deny the existence of the *Paraclete and consequently John's gospel, in which he is spoken of. *Epiphanius of Salamis created the term (Haer. 51,3), giving it two meanings: those who deny the Logos and, sarcastically, those "without reason." The alogi, according to Epiphanius, in contrast to the *gnostic *Cerinthus and to the *Montanists, denied that Jesus was the eternal Logos (Jn 1:1-14) and rejected the gospel of John and the *Apocalypse, attributing the latter also to John. For more information, see esp. the entry *Gaius.

Epiphanius, Panarion 51-52; Eusebius, HE 3,28; TRE 2,290-295; C. Trevett, Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy, Cambridge 1996, 139-141.

A. Di Berardino

ALPHA and OMEGA. First and last letters of the Greek alphabet. Whenever this pairing occurs, it expresses the idea of totality: as much as is contained, symbolically and ideally, in the infinite combination of letters from A to Z. Is 41:4; 44:6; 48:12 sets the tone for successive development with the formulation "I, the Lord, am the first and the last," which explains how God can act upon and influence historical events, transcending any limit of time and space. This divine attribute appears again in Rev 1:8; 21:6, where God himself says: "I am the alpha and the omega," further specified by what follows, "He who is, who was and who is to come" (Rev 1:8), or additionally "the Beginning and the End" (Rev 21:6). The attribute "Alpha and Omega" is not conceded to Christ on his first appearance; the term "First and Last" (Rev 1:17; 2:8) is preferred, joined to the evocation of his death and resurrection so as to emphasize the infinite power that now belongs to him. In Rev 22:13 Christ receives titles that were formerly those of God: Alpha and Omega, First and Last, Beginning and End, which indicate the power that belongs to him as judge. From the *Apocalypse we infer the work of Christ both in the creation as Word (Alpha) and at the end as judge (Omega). This designation of God and of Christ has analogies with the rabbinic symbol of the Shekinah, which was expressed with the initials aleph-tau or aleph-mem-tau (= truth). In the Greek alphabet, the letter mu is halfway between alpha and omega, though mem is not halfway through in the Hebrew alphabet. In any case, by the letters of the Greek and Hebrew alphabets were represented the three phases—first, middle and last—of infinite duration (Strack and Billerbeck, II, 789). When applied to Christ, this shows that he has a name like the Father's (Rev 1:18), and that he is Being par excellence. John, taking a negative attitude toward the Jewish Christians of *Cerinthus and the *Nicolaitans, who attributed a universal and divine power over the world not to Christ but to the series of letters στοιχεῖα (αεηιουω = ΑΩ) (Reitzenstein, Poimandres 286), is happy to use symbols familiar in the cultural milieus of Asia Minor, Christianizing their meaning (E.B. Allo, L'Apocalypse, 8). The symbolic value of the two letters alpha and omega was soon appreciated in Christian speculation, both *orthodox (Orig., Com. in Jo. I, 34.35; Clem. Alex., Strom. 6, 16, 141; Isid. of S., Etymol. 1,3, 8-10) and *gnostic (Iren., Adv. haer. 1, 14, 1), and in *iconography, where it is frequently combined with the Chrismon. It received significant use throughout the Middle Ages. Rabanus Maurus repeats the schema aleph-mem-tau (= alpha-mu-omega) to recreate the trilogy of beginning, middle and end (De Laudibus S. Crucis, PL 107, 154).

E.B. Allo, L'Apocalypse (Études Bibliques), Paris 1933, 8; A. Gelin, Apocalypse, Paris 1936, 596; J. Bonsirven, L'Apocalypse de Saint Jean, Paris 1951, 93; E. Testa, Il Simbolismo dei Giudeo-cristiani, Jerusalem 1962, 366-368; Origen, Com. in Jo. 1,34.35, PG 14, 80.84; GCS 10,38-39; SC 120 (1966) 162. 164.168.170; Isidore of Seville, Etymol. 1,3,8-10, CPL 1186; PL 82, 76; R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, Leipzig 1904, 286; J. Kremer - S. Egbers, LTK^3 1,1-2; T. Holz, Diz. Esegetico NT, I, 170-172; G. Kittel, GLNT, I, 1-12; E. Lohmeier, RAC, I, 1-4; H. Kosmala, Anfang, Mitte und Ende: Annual Swed. Theol. Institute 2 (1963) 108-111.

E. PERETTO

ALTAR of VICTORY. Dedicated by Octavian in the senatorial curia in 29 BC to show that he had received the empire from the goddess Victory. There senators swore fidelity to the emperor and his laws. The first Christian attack on the cult of Victory was by *Constantius II in 357 (see Amm. Marc. XVI,10; Symmachus, Relat. III,6), though already in 219 *Heliogabalus, priest of the sun god of *Emesa, had installed a large icon in the curia above the goddess's head, depicting him sacrificing to his god. This began, if not properly a replacement of the cult of Victory, at least a loss of its absolute hegemony. The Constantinian era faced the problem of the incompatibility of that *pagan cult with the Christian faith of emperors and senators. The first known law against sacrificia is from late 341 (CTh 16, 10,2), and the altar and statue of Victory were removed from the curia in 357. The question of whether only the altar, or both altar and statue, were removed has been resolved by Mazzarino in favor of both, given that pagan worship ideally united both; moreover, Constantius II, *Gratian, *Symmachus and *Ambrose show no sign of making the distinction between statue and sacrifice, work of art and object of worship, that would have been present in the period of so-called Christian humanism (S. Mazzarino, Antico, tardoantico ed era costantiniana, Bari 1974, 339-373). The altar was restored to the curia under *Julian, but in 382 Gratian, initiating a policy of repression of paganism, ordered it removed again. Symmachus's repeated protests to Gratian in 382 (Rel. III,1.20) and to *Valentinian II in 384 (Rel. III), in which he recalls the value of the empire's religious heritage, stressing that the Altar of Victory was a fundamental aspect, were unsuccessful due to the intervention of Ambrose, who promptly refuted the Relatio (see Ep. 17 and 18). In Ep. 17 the bishop of *Milan reminded Valentinian II, drawing more on imagination than on historical fact, what *Valentinian I is supposed to have said when he learned that the Altar of Victory had been newly set up in the Senate. Other requests were made, all unsuccessful, to *Theodosius I in 391 and to Valentinian II in 391–392. Only Eugenius, a tolerant Christian who allied himself with the pagan senators of Rome, allowed the restoration of the altar to the Senate from 393 to 394, until the triumph of *Theodosius. The dispute was still alive in 402, when *Prudentius wrote the Contra Symmachum and attributed to *Arcadius and Honorius a treatise against the worship of the goddess in the curia (C. Summ. 2).

On Ambrose's dealings with the Roman emperors regarding the Altar of Victory: J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire Romani, Paris 1933; L. Malunowicz, De ara Victoriae in Curia Romana quomodo certatum sit, Wilno 1937; F. Canfora, Sulla controversia per l'altare della Vittoria tra pagani e cristiani nel IV secolo, Bari 1969; R. Klein, Symmachus, Darmstad 1971; G. Lo Menzo Rapisarda, La personalità di Ambrogio nelle Epistole XVII e XVIII, Catania 1973; D. Vera, Commento storico alle "Relationes" di Quinto Aurelo Simmaco, Pisa 1981; M. Sordi, "Pax deorum" e libertà religiosa nella storia di Roma, in La pace nel mondo antico, Milan 1985, 126-134; F. Paschoud, Le rôle du providentialisme dans le conflit de 384 sur l'autel de la Victoire: Museum Helveticum 40 (1983) 197-206; Id., Colloqui genevois sur Symmaque, à l'occasion du mille six centième anniversaire du conflit de l'autel de la Victoire, 1984, Paris 1986; Id., L'intolleranza cristiana vista e giudicata dai pagani, in L'intolleranza cristiana nei confronti dei pagani, ed. P.F. Beatrice, Bologna 1990; D. Lassandro, L'altare della Vittoria: letture moderne di un'antica controversia (an ample survey), in Metodologie della ricerca sulla tarda antichità, ed. A. Garza, Atti del primo convegno dell'Associazione di studi tardoantichi, Naples 1989, 443-450; F. Lipani, La controversia sull' "Ara Victoriae": Athens and Rome 41 (1996) 75-79; L.F. Pizzolato, Ambrogio e la libertà religiosa nel IV secolo, in Cristianesimo e istituzioni politiche. Da Costantino a Giustiniano, eds. E. dal Covolo and R. Uglione, Rome 1997, 143-155.

M.G. Mara

ALTERCATIO ADRIANI ET EPICTETI. Anonymous work of the 6th or 7th c. belonging to a group of monastic writings called Ioca monachorum, probably compiled in *Gaul from a Greek original. A number of different recensions and many MSS existed already in the 8th c., showing the popularity of this literary genre. The work, written in a mediocre Latin, is a fictitious dialogue containing questions by the emperor *Hadrian (117–138) and responses by the philosopher Epictetus (d. 130), esp. concerning the Bible.

CPL 1155f.; CPPM II B, 3675a; LMA 5,491-492; W. Suchier, Das mittellateinische Gespräch Adrian und Epictitus, nebst verwandten Texten (Joca Monachorum), Tübingen 1955, 11-52; 108-14; H.J. Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller, Freiburg [4]1995, 119.147; PLS 4, 917-923.

S. Samulowitz

ALTERCATIO CONTRA EOS. The complete title of this mutilated text, published by Caspari in 1883, is Altercatio [S. Ambrosii] contra eos qui animam non confitentur. In three MSS it is attributed to St. *Ambrose of Milan, but a judgment regarding this attribution is not easy, given the nature of the text. The argument of this brief treatise is the same as that of the Dialogus sub nomine Hieronomi on the origin of the human *soul, but is significantly inferior in both content and depth. The Altercatio is in fact only a brief diatribe, interspersed with biblical citations, against those who think differently on the question.

CPL 170; CPPM II,A, n. 52; PLS 1,611-613. P. Courcelle, Littérature latine d'époque patristique, in Actes du premier Congrès de la Féd. Intern des Ass. d'études classiques, Paris 1951, 287-307 (p. 289); G. Madec, Saint'Ambroise et la philosophie, Paris 1974, 262-267; I. Tolomio, L'origine dell'anima nell'Alto Medioevo: Medioevo 13 (1987) 51-73 (p. 62).

A. Di Berardino

ALTERCATIO DE ANIMA. Handed down under the title of an altercatio ("debate") is a text (the beginning is incomplete) against *traducianism, demonstrating exclusively with OT passages that God created the *soul in the maternal womb. The MSS and John of Seville attribute it to *Ambrose. Referring to details of the biblical version used, Caspari thinks instead that it is by an unknown author and must have been written before 600. According to Madec, who has prepared a new critical edition, Ambrosian authenticity cannot be rejected.

CPL 170; PLS 1, 600, 611-613 (C.P. Caspari 1883); C.P. Caspari, Kirchenhistorische Anecdota I, Kristiania 1883, 225-247; O. Faller, EC 1, 930; G. Madec, S. Ambroise et la philosophie, Paris 1974, 262-267.

B. Studer

ALTERCATIO ECCLESIAE ET SYNAGOGAE. This anonymous work, variously attributed to *Augustine, *Vigilius of Thapsus and *Severus of Minorca, differs slightly from typical altercationes—in which a *Christian and a Jew, or a Christian and a *pagan, or an orthodox and a *heretic, conduct a debate on religious themes—by the fact that the two protagonists are not real persons, but personifications of the church and the synagogue themselves. Under this aspect, the Altercatio ecclesiae et synagogae reelaborates a form of dialogue typical of pagan *philosophy.

This work cannot be dated with certainty, but from internal indications it can be supposed with some certainty that it was written between 438–476 by a lawyer or an author expert in *Roman law. From the many biblical citations taken directly from the Testimonia of *Cyprian of Carthage, one could hypothesize that it was composed in North *Africa and later transmitted via *Spain. In general the work shows a substantial ignorance of the Jewish religion and seems not to be concerned with the problem of the conversion of the Jews to Christianity. Rather, it limits itself to constantly emphasizing the inferiority of the Jews relative to Christians.

Editions: J. Hillgarth, Sacris Erudiri 36 (1996); CC 69A (1999).

Studies: G. Morin, Deux écrits de polémique antijuive d'aprés le Cod. Casin. 247: RHE 1 (1900); M.C. Díaz y Díaz, De Patrística española: Revista española de Teología 17 (1957); G. Segui-Vidal, J. Hillgarth, La "Altercatio" y la Basílica paleocristiana de Son Bou de Menorca, Palma de Mallorca 1955; J. Amengual i Batle, Els orígens del Cristianisme a les Balears i el seu desenvolupament fins a l'època musulmana, 2 vols., Mallorca 1992.

M. Conti

ALTERCATIO HERACLIANI. The Altercatio Heracliani laici cum Germinio episcopo Sirmiensi is the account of a public debate at *Sirmium (*Pannonia) on 13 January 366 between the pro-*Arian local bishop *Germinius, supported by the priest Theodotus and by *Agrippinus, and the layman Heraclian, a *Nicene arrested for disturbing the peace. The debate is doctrinal in character, with Heraclian reducing his adversaries to silence. The spectators threaten him with death, but Germinius sends him away unharmed. The document as it has reached us has been retouched by a retractator to make Heraclian stand out at the expense of his adversaries; even so, it is rich in historically important facts.

PLS 1,345-350; Patrologia III, 85-86; M. Simonetti, Osservazioni sull'Altercatio Heracliani cum Germinio: VChr 21 (1967) 39-58.

M. Simonetti

ALTERCATIONES. By altercatio, Latin *rhetoric means a debate in which the pro and the contra are set in opposition (see Quint., Inst. or. VI,4). Originally a part of discourse, the altercatio came to be used also for didactic and *exegetical purposes. In the ancient Christian literature of the West the concept is used primarily for an (imaginary) debate in which a Christian disputes with a Jew, but also an orthodox with a *heretic or a Christian with a *pagan. Thus *Jerome defines the dialogue mentioned by *Origen in Cels. IV, 52 between Papiscus and Jason as an altercatio (Com. Gal. 3,13—cf. Tertull., Adv. Prax. 22; Adv. Marc. 1,9). An early 5th-c. work titled Altercatio Ecclesiae et Synagogae* (CPL 577) is attributed to *Augustine or *Vigilius. From the same period, according to *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 50), is the Altercatio Simonis et Theophili, composed by the Gallic monk *Evagrius (see Sulp. Sev., Dial. 3,1), the last early Christian controversy against the Jews (CPL 482). In it, following the model of *Tertullian, *Cyprian, *Gregory of Elvira and others, the divinity of the crucified one is demonstrated exclusively from the OT. From the *Arian controversy we have the Altercatio Heracliani laici cum Germinio episcopo (CPL 687), in which *Nicene faith and the confession of *Rimini are opposed (see B. Windau, in LACL 287, bibl.). From the 6th c. are the Altercationes of Christian *philosophy against *pagan errors, compiled in *Italy or *Africa based on texts of Augustine (CPL 360). For a literary judgment on these or other Altercationes, one must bear in mind the various ancient forms of dialogue, whereas for their theological evaluation one must bear in mind the anti-Jewish and antiheretical traditions.

PWK I/2 (1884) 1692ff.; A.L. Williams, Adversus Judaeos, Cambridge 1935; Lexikon der Alten Welt 130; H. Schreckenberg, Die christlichen Adversus-Judaeos Texte und ihr literarisches und historisches Umfeld, Frankfurt 1982; A. Cisek, Altercatio: HWRhet 1 (1992) 428-432 (bibl.); LTK[3] 1,445; E. Schulz-Flügel, Gregorius Eliberritanus, Fr 1994, 256-301 (bibl.); LACL (2002), 255; 287.

B. Studer

ALYPIUS (d. after 428). Saint, bishop of *Thagaste, fellow citizen, disciple, friend, collaborator and colleague of *Augustine. We know his life from his friend's works, esp. from the Confessions (6,9,11-6,10,16) and Letters (e.g. 29; 83; 125; 227). Born at Thagaste to parents of high standing (Conf. 6,7,11), he was short in stature (De b. vita 15) but stout of heart (Conf. 9,6,14) and of virtuous disposition (ibid., 6,7,11). A few years younger than Augustine (b. 354), he became his friend (frater cordis mei; ibid., 9,4,7) and followed his lectures (ibid., 6,7,11) and his *Manicheism (ibid., 6,7,12), preceeding him to *Rome, where he studied law and, becoming comes of distributions for *Italy, gave rare examples of integrity and impartiality (ibid., 6,10,16); he accompanied Augustine to *Milan (ibid., 6,10,16), where he shared his painful return to the Catholic faith (ibid., 7,19,25); he was present at Augustine's *conversion and followed his example (ibid., 8,6,13-8,12,30). Alypius withdrew with Augustine to Cassiciacum, where he participated in the philosophical debates (ibid., 9,4,8); and was *baptized with him by *Ambrose 24-25 April 387 (ibid., 9,6,4). Returning to *Africa, he lived a *cenobitic life with Augustine and other friends, first at Thagaste (Possidio, Vita di S. Ag. 3,1-2) then at *Hippo (Ep. 22,1). Elected bishop of Thagaste ca. 394, before Augustine, he worked alongside him for nearly 40 years for the rebirth of the African church, esp. in the *Donatist controversy (in the conference of 411 he was one of the 7 Catholic bishops who participated in the discussion) and in the *Pelagian controversy, which caused him to travel much (C. duas e Pel. 1,1,2; De nupt. et conc. 2,1,1; Ep. 224,2). Pelagians included him in their dislike of Augustine (Op. imp. c. Iul. 1,42; 3,35); Catholics, however, associated him with his friend's merits (Jerome, Ep. 202,1, among Augustine's). Died probably 430. Clement X approved his cult.

E. Noris, Historia Pelagiana, II,8; Tillemont, Mémoires . . . XII,565-580; AASS, Augusti, III,202-208; BS I,871-873; PCBE 1,53-65; AugL 1,245-267; S. Lancel, Saint Augustin et la Maurétanie Césarienne: les années 418-419 à la lumière des Nouvelles Lettres récemment publiées: REAug 30 (1984) 48-59; Id., La date et le contenu du commonitorium adressé aux évêques Alypius et Peregrinus (*Ep. 22): BA 46B (1987) 523-524; M.-E. Berrouard, Un tournant dans la vie de l'Église d'Afrique: les deux missions d'Alypius en Italie à la lumière des lettres 10, 15*, 16*, 22* et 23: REAug 31 (1985) 46-70; M. Marin, Alipio e la topica della conversione (Conf. VI,7,11-12), in Le Confessioni di Agostino (402-2002): Bilancio e prospettive, Rome 2003, 133-147.

A. Trapè

AMA (Amma). Feminine of Apa (Semitic term meaning "father," not to be confused with abbas = *abbot), a woman spiritual guide. The Greek derived ἀββᾶ and ἀμμά from the Semitic root, while the Latin has only abbas and the feminine abbatissa. Ama was not necessarily equivalent to abbess or superior (see the episode in Vitae patrum V,18,19)—although normally the superior or abbess was called the "mother" of their monastery—but connotes "spiritual maternity" (see Theodore Stud., Ep. 2,68), i.e., one who offered an interior governance tempering authority with fraternity in a love that does not impose greater burdens than can be borne, giving spiritual guidance appropriate to each one's personal situation.

DIP 1,521-522; I. Hausherr, Direction spirituelle en Orient autrefois, Rome 1955; repr. 1981 (OCA 144), 251-273; Id., Le Métérikon de l'abbé Isaie: Etudes de spiritualité orientale, Rome 1969 (OCA 183), 105-120; M. Kroen, Das Moenchtum und die Kulturelle Tradition des lateinischen Westens: Formen der Askese, Autoritaet und Organisation im fruehen westlichen (Quellen und Forschungen zur antiken Welt, 29), Freiburg (Breisgau) 1997.

M.G. Bianco

AMANDUS (d. 676–684). Bishop of Maastricht, founder and first *abbot of the Abbey of Elnon (now Saint-Amand-les-Eaux), missionary and evangelizer of the Low Countries. Born late 6th–early 7th c., his birthplace is uncertain (poss. Aquitaine, Poitou or Gascony). He first withdrew to the *monastic life on the island of Yeu, then at Bourges, dedicating himself to a rigorous *asceticism. His peregrinatio (see Pilgrimages) began with a trip to *Rome and continued through all of *Gaul, after his ordination as an itinerant bishop by Dagobert (d. 639). His missionary movements were continual (he went to England to rescue imprisoned slaves, and besides his work in present-day Belgium, where his evangelistic efforts were particularly effective, he also reached the Slavic lands) until he settled at the monastery of Elnon, where he died 6 February sometime between 676 and 684.

He frequently clashed with clergy and with other bishops who could not tolerate his moral rigor, esp. after his election as bishop of Maastricht, or later as bishop of Nantes. The foundation of many monasteries throughout Europe is attributed to him. Some biographies remain, although their relation to each other is unclear, esp. after the recent discovery of a fragment in a MS at Innsbruck (1976), the so-called Vita antiqua. According to the traditional hypothesis, the Vita prima was written in the second half of the 8th c., perhaps by Gislebertus, abbot of Saint-Amand (diocese of Noyon-Tournai), but it has recently been conjectured that it was written south of the Loire. Milo, monk of Saint-Amand, wrote a Life in the mid-9th c., to which is added a supplement containing, among other things, the saint's will, probably authentic at least in its original nucleus, and his correspondence with pope *Martin I. Another Life dates to the 12th c., and still another is contained in the Speculum sanctorale of the Dominican Bernardo Gui (1329). The cult of St. Amandus (feast 6 February) is particularly widespread in N France and Belgium.

BHL 332-348; MGH Script. rer. Mer. 5,395-485; MGH, Poet. Lat. aev. Car. 3,561-603; L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3, Paris 1915, 190; E. de Moreau, Saint Amand, apôtre de la Belgique et du Nord de la France, Louvain 1927; BS 1 Rome, 1961, cols. 918-923; A. Dierkens, Saint Amand et la fondation de l'abbaye de Nivelle, in Saint Gery et la christianisation dans le nord de la Gaule: V^e^-IX^e^ siècles. Actes du Colloque de Cambrai, 5-7 octobre 1984, Paris 1986, 325-334; W. Berschin, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter 2, Stuttgart 1988, 48-52; A. Verhulst - G. Declercq, L'action et le souvenir de saint Amand en Europe centrale. À propos de la découverte d'une Vita Amandi antiqua, in Aevum inter utrumque. Mélanges offerts à Gabriel Sanders, Steenbrugge 1991, 503-526; R.A. Markus, From Caesarius to Boniface: Christianity and Paganism in Gaul, in Le septième siècle: changements et continuités. Actes du Colloque bilatéral franco-britannique tenu au Warbourg Institute les 8-9 juillet 1988, London 1992, 154-168; G. Scheibelreiter, Griechisches-lateinisches-fränkisches Christentum. Der Brief Papst Martins I. an den Bischof Amandus von Maastricht aus dem Jahre 649: Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung 100 (1992) 84-102; M. van Uytfanghe, Die Vita im Spannungsfeld von Legende, Biographik und Geschichte (mit Anwendung auf einen Abschnitt aus der Vita Amandi prima), in Historiographie im frühen Mittelalter, Vienna-Munich 1994, 194-221; B. Abou-el-Haj, The Medieval Cult of Saints: Formations and Transforma- tions, Cambridge 1994; Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico 1, Turin 1998, 102-104.

V. Milazzo

AMANDUS of Bordeaux (4th-5th c.). According to tradition the third bishop of *Bordeaux, succeeding *Delphinus, who raised him, ca. 401–404. The dates of his birth and death are uncertain. As a priest he prepared *Paulinus, *Ausonius's pupil and the future bishop of Nola, for *baptism, and exchanged frequent letters with him: see Letters 2, 9, 12, 15, 36 of Paulinus. They show in Amandus a man intent upon *exegetical and theological questions, and a friend to whom Paulinus makes personal confidences. According to Paulinus and *Gregory of Tours, Amandus was a man of extraordinary erudition and morals. Possibly identifiable with the priest of the same name to whom *Jerome sends letter 55, discussing exegetical questions and the case of a remarried divorced person. Elected bishop, he took energetic measures against *paganism and the *Priscillianist *heresy, aided by St. Severinus. According to *Gregory of Tours it was at this time that he left the office of bishop to Severinus, to then take it up again after Severinus's death: this however seems to be legendary.

Gregory of Tours, In gloria confessorum, XXV; R. Étienne, Bordeaux antique, Bordeaux 1962; H. Crouzel, Les échanges littéraires entre Bordeaux et l'Orient au IVᵉ siècle: Revue d'histoire du livre 3 (1973) 316-319; Gallia Christiana 2,789-790.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

AMASEA of Pontus (Ἀμάσεια). City of Asia Minor, on the middle Iris (Yesi Irmak); also called Hadrianopolis (Bulletin de correspondance hellénique, 101 [1976] 358). Civil (then religious) metropolis of *Pontus (2nd c.); the region was later called Diospontus (*Diocletian) and finally Helenopontus (*Constantine); from the 7th c., a stronghold of the theme of the Armeniacoi. Suffered an earthquake in 529 (Malalas, 448 Bonn) and an Arab raid in 712. The *patriarch *Eutychius of *Constantinople was exiled there in February 565 (Grumel, Regestes², 251). A tradition ascribes its evangelization to St. Peter (first bishop, *Nicetus) or St. Andrew. *Hagiography connects Amasea with Sts. *Basil, Philantia and companion, *Gregory Thaumaturgus, *Phocas of Sinope, Hesychius the homologete, *Eutychius of Constantinople and esp. Theodore of *Tyre, extolled by St. *Gregory of Nyssa (BHG 1538) and also honored with a basilica built by the emperor *Anastasius. At the beginning of the 4th c. the city had many churches, and later many *monasteries, under the authority of a *catholicos. Episcopal succession, dating from the 2nd c. and well established in the conciliar era, is dominated by *Asterius and Seleucus. In the first episcopal Notitia (7th c.), Amasea occupies the 12th place among the *Byzantine metropolises, with six suffragans.

DHGE II, 964-970; EC I, 974; ODB 1, 74; Enc. de l'Islam2 I, 444; H.-G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, Munich 1959, 166-167; Enc. relig. e mon. (in Greek), II, 263-266; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, V, 1, Paris 1963, 302-303; Rev. des ét. byzant. 32 (1974) 407; R. Boulanger, Turquie, Paris 1978, 212-213; J. Darrouzès, Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclesiae Constantinopolitane, Paris 1981, 204, 209 and passim.

D. Stiernon

AMASTRIS (Ἄμαστρις). Bishopric of Asia Minor on the Euxine (Black Sea). Civil metropolis of Ora Pontica, its bishop *Palmas presided, perhaps as such, over a synod of bishops of *Pontus ca. 190. Birthplace of the *martyr St. Hyacinth (4th c.). In the conciliar period the city was part of Paphlagonia and became the first suffragan see of *Gangra, still its position in the first episcopal Notitia (7th c.). Made an independent (autocephalous) *archbishopric ca. 800 at the request of its bishop St. George, who became famous because of an Arab attack (late 8th c.). St. John of the *Goths sought refuge and died there (785). Birthplace of St. Sergius Magister and the empress St. *Theodora (ca. 800). Modern Amasra is in the province of Zonguldak.

P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens du IIᵉ et IIIᵉ siècles, Paris 1961, 13-32; Encicl. relig. e morale (in Greek) II, 266-268; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, V, 1, Paris 1963, 319-320, 440-441; J. Darrouzès, Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclusiae Constantinopolitanae, 209, n. 228 and passim (see index); ODB 1,74-75.

D. Stiernon

AMATORIUM CANTICUM. *Manichean hymn of love to God, the Supreme King. *Augustine of Hippo (Contra Faustum manichaeum, XV,5-6) refers to it as a sort of Manichean *Song of Songs. As Augustine reports it, God, crowned with flowers and bearing a scepter, is surrounded by twelve *Aeons or seasons, along with countless inhabitants of his kingdom and angels produced from the king's substance. *Angels specifically named are the Keeper of Splendor, with six (in other sources four) luminous faces; the Great Ruler with his angelic armies; Adamas the Hero, a warrior armed with spear and shield; the Monarch of Glory, mover of the three subterranean wheels of fire, water and wind; and the Supreme Atlas, who goes down on one knee while bearing the world on his shoulders. The same names are found, in the same order, in a number of *Coptic Manichean texts (where they are identified as the five sons of the Living Spirit).

CPL 727; PL 42, 307-309; CSEL 25/1, 424-428; F. Decret, Aspects du manichéisme dans l'Afrique romaine: Les controverses de Fortunatus, Faustus et Felix avec saint Augustin, Paris 1970, 99-100; W. Sundermann, The Five Sons of the Manichaean God Mithra, in U. Bianchi (ed.), Mysteria Mithrae, Études préliminaires aux Religions orientales dans l'Empire romain, 80, Leiden 1979, 777-788; P. van Lindt, Adamas, the Belligerent Hero, in P. Bilde - H.K. Nielsen - J.P. Sørensen (eds.), Apocryphon Severini Presented to Søren Giversen, Aarhus 1993, 95-105.

J. Kevin Coyle

AMBROSE (d. ca. 250). Friend and patron of *Origen. A rich *Alexandrian whose intellectual interests led him to the *Valentinian sect, Ambrose was led by Origen back to orthodoxy. Wishing to receive from his teacher the intellectual nourishment, the lack of which had led him into *heresy, he played an important role in Origen's activity as a writer; he put considerable resources at Origen's disposal and continually urged him to write, so much so that Origen called him "God's slave-driver" (Com. Io. V,1). Origen continued to have contact with Ambrose at *Caesarea in *Palestine, and they traveled together to *Nicomedia. *Jerome knew Ambrose's letters to Origen, which gave evidence of his acuity (Vir. ill. 56). Origen dedicated a siginificant portion of his work to him, esp. the Ex. mart., since Ambrose had been persecuted under *Maximinus Thrax (235). He survived, since the Contra Celsum was written at his initiative; according to Jerome he died before Origen. He had a wife, Marcella, and children (PG 11, 85CD).

Eusebius, HE VI, passim; Jerome, Vir. ill. LVI and LXI. Texts in A. Harnack, Die Überlieferung..., Leipzig 1893, 328-330; A. Monaci Castagno, Origene e Ambrogio: l'indipendenza dell'intellettuale e le pretese del patronato, in Origeniana octava, ed. L. Perrone, Leuven 2003, I, 165-193.

E. Prinzivalli

AMBROSE (4th c.). Disciple of *Didymus the Blind. Lived at *Alexandria. The only source on Ambrose is *Jerome (Vir. ill. 126), who mentions two of his works, both lost: a large volume refuting *Apollinaris of *Laodicea and a Commentary on Job, which Jerome had heard of but not seen.

E. Prinzivalli

AMBROSE of Milan (337?-397). Born at *Trier in 339 or 337, according to the different interpretations given by scholars to a passage of Ep. 50,4 (see A. Paredi, S. Ambrogio e la sua età, 17ff.). Studied *rhetoric and was a professional rhetor in the prefecture of *Sirmium (Paul of Mil., Vita Ambr. 5, n. 1-2) and ca. 370 was apponted consularis Liguriae et Aemiliae, seated at *Milan. His impartial government is attested to by his election by both *Arians and Catholics to succeed the Arian *Auxentius as bishop of Milan. He was *baptized, and a week later consecrated bishop. Reporting on his election as bishop are Ruf., HE 11,11, Socr., HE 4,30,1-8, Soz., HE 6,24, Theod., HE 4,6. Some scholars (Faller 97-112 and Paredi 175) place the date of his consecration on 7 December 374, others (Campenhausen 26, Delehaye 192 and Dudden 68) on 1 December 373. Ambrose compensated for his hurried preparation for episcopal consecration by a systematic, lifelong study of the Bible under the constant guidance of *Simplicianus; *Augustine testified to the intensity and assiduity of this study (Conf. VI,3,3-4). His understanding of Scripture was deepened by his knowledge of the writings of the Greek fathers, and of Hebrew and *pagan authors such as *Philo and *Plotinus. Various authors have studied Ambrose's cultural formation, often arriving at different conclusions, among them P. Courcelle, G. Madec, M. Testard, G. Nauroy and more recently H. Savon (Ambroise de Milan, Paris 1977), C. Gnilka (Kultur und Conversion, Basel 1993) and P.F. Moretti (Non harundo sed calamus. Aspetti della "Explanatio psalmorum XII" in Ambrogio, Milan 2000). The study of the classical world and the Fathers, joined to meditation on the Word of God, were the foundation of his theological, moral, *ascetic, *political and social thought, and consequently of his activity as a pastor and preacher.

The Arian problem was a constant preoccupation for Ambrose. During the reign of *Valentinian I (d. 375), remembered by Ambrose as a period of mutual esteem and respect between emperor and bishop, the imperial policy of not intervening in favor of Catholics, maintained by a Christian emperor perhaps as a remnant of the traditional conception of the pax deorum, was a check on any intervention by Ambrose (see M. Sordi, "Pax deorum" e libertà religiosa nella storia di Roma, in La pace nel mondo antico, Milan 1985, 126-134). During *Gratian's reign, however, which was initially characterized by a liberal and indulgent policy toward non-Catholics, Ambrose's anti-Arian interventions increased. In 376–377 Ambrose had to calm the disturbance promoted by the Arian priest *Julian, driven out of Petovium by the Catholic population (Ep. 11,3). Also in 376, he intervened to obtain the election of the reliably *Nicene *Anemius as bishop of *Sirmium, despite the pro-Arian activities of the emperor's mother *Justina (for a somewhat hagiographical account, see Vita Ambr. 11). His meetings with Gratian at Sirmium (ca. 378) and Milan (379) strongly influenced the emperor's religious policy, to the extent that he abandoned a paternal neutrality for an increasingly antiheretical policy, and became increasingly tied to Catholic positions. Ambrose, who had become almost a counselor to Gratian, dedicated his De fide to the emperor, to teach him the true Nicene faith as opposed to the Arian heresy (see De fide 4,1). Some scholars make Ambrose the author of the edict of 22 April 380 (CTh 16,5,4), in which sanctions against the Arians were announced, and it was Ambrose who secured the restitution of the basilica, which the Arians had taken possession of (Ep. 2,28, De off. II,70,136; De Spir. Sanct. 1,19-21). In summer 380 Ambrose gave Gratian the three books on the *Holy Spirit, completing the instruction begun by De fide. A new anti-Arian intervention with the emperor by Ambrose took place in 381 on the occasion of the Council of *Aquileia (see Ep. 9 to the bishops of Gaul; Ep. 10, 11, and 12 to the emperors Gratian, *Valentinian II and *Theodosius). Ep. 12 and 14, directed to Theodosius and linked to the Council of *Rome (382), are also related to the anti-Arian polemic.

Besides the Arian problem, anti-Catholic opposition arising from many different situations, at times related to the Arian question, worried Ambrose and motivated many of his responses to the empire (see Cracco Ruggini). In 382 Gratian had the *Altar of Victory removed from the senatorial curia, and decrees against the pagans, inspired by Ambrose, followed one after the other (see CTh 16,7,1 and 2; CJ I,7,2). Gratian's murder (383) and the usurpation of his lands by *Maximus marked a pause in this policy. In 384, however, a new pagan attempt to restore the Altar of Victory was unsuccessful (see Ep. 17, 18; Vita Ambr. 26), a result perhaps not unrelated to the young Valentinian II's gratitude to Ambrose for his peace mission to Maximus. At Easter 386 the Arian bishop *Auxentius asked the court of Justina to assign him a basilica; Ambrose opposed the request and had the basilica Portiana occupied (see Ep. 20 to his sister *Marcellina and 21 to Valentinian II; C. Aux; Vita Ambr. 13). Ambrosian *chant was born on this occasion (Aug., Conf. IX,7). The episode marked an irritation in Ambrose's relations with Valentinian II, precisely at the time when the young emperor's relations with Maximus were deteriorating. This led to a second mission by Ambrose to Maximus, mentioned in Ep. 24. Following *Priscillian's execution, decreed by Maximus and Ambrose's subsequent excommunication of the latter (Vita Ambr. 19; In psalm. 61), their relationship deteriorated.

The tensions with Valentinian II and Maximus and the resulting lack of political relations led Ambrose to intensify his pastoral activity. The invasion of Maximus, the flight of the Milanese court (387), the return of Valentinian II following Theodosius (388), and the defeat and death of Maximus all marked the beginning of another political phase in Ambrose's pastoral activity, who by this time was reconciled with Valentinian II. Ambrose's welcome of Theodosius was prepared by the latter's antiheretical law of 14 June 388 (CTh 16,5,15). Bishop and emperor felt a need to fix their reciprocal spheres of influence in anticipation of events that were not slow in coming. The notorious episode of the synagogue and the Valentinian sanctuary of Callinicum occurred in 388. Theodosius's reaction and the position taken by Ambrose are echoed in Ep. 40 and 41. An initial victory by Ambrose in the nonrestitution of the synagogue and another victory in the maintenance of Gratian's decrees for the pagan world led Theodosius to underscore the autonomy of his decisions by banishing Ambrose from the court (Ep. 51,2) and by a series of regulations unfavorable to the church (CTh 12,1,121; 16,2,27). Tension between Theodosius and Ambrose increased in summer 390 with the massacre of *Thessalonica (Ep. 51), whose remote causes have been given various interpretations (see Palanque 228-229 and Mazzarino 379-380). They were reconciled at Christmas 390 after the emperor satisfied the public penance imposed by Ambrose.

In 392 and 393 Ambrose's interventions were directed to resolving the *schism of *Antioch (without however obtaining *Flavian's abdication in favor of *Evagrius) and to condemnation of the heresy of *Bonosus. Concern for the church's internal life alternated in Ambrose with that for peace among nations and among people. While Ambrose was traveling to *Gaul in 392, sent by Valentinian II to reestablish harmony between the emperor and the general Arbogastes, news reached him of Valentinian's murder (De obit. Valent.; Ep. 53). His relations with the emperor's Catholic successor *Eugenius were neither easy nor clear, and were strongly influenced by the difficult relations between Theodosius and Eugenius (Ep. 61). After Eugenius's defeat, Ambrose urged Theodosius to clemency toward the vanquished (Ep. 62), with perfect harmony reigning between Ambrose and Theodosius until the latter's death, 17 January 395. Ambrose pronounced the funeral oration in his honor, in the presence of Honorius (De obit. Theod.). Ambrose's relations with the general *Stilicho, to whom the young *Honorius had been entrusted, had little impact, an indication of the decline of Ambrose's political influence. His spiritual activity intensified, however. To the finding of the bodies of the *martyrs *Gervasius and Protasius in 386 (Ep. 22,1 to his sister Marcellina; for a historical evaluation of the event, see the differing positions of Campenhausen, Meslin) was added that of the martyrs *Nazarius and Celsus, according to the *hagiographical literature accompanied by miracles (Vita Ambr. 32-33). Ambrose was also present at the entry of *Paulinus into *Nola and at the creation of new episcopal sees in N Italy and at the appointment of their respective pastors. Ep. 63 to the church of Vercelli is considered a treatise on episcopal elections. Ambrose died at Milan 4 April 397 (see L. Cracco Ruggini, Il 397: l'anno della morte di Ambrogio, in Nec timeo mori . . ., 5-30).

Ambrose's intense pastoral, social and political activity is amply documented by his exegetical, moral, ascetical and dogmatic writings. Discourses, letters and hymns complete his output. In the exegetical works which, with the exception of a systematic commentary on the gospel of Luke, take up OT themes, Ambrose accepts the triple meaning of Scripture, though *allegorical-moral exegesis predominates. His exegetical works include: Hexaemeron, De Paradiso, De Cain et Abel, De Noe, De Abraham, De Isaac et anima, De bono mortis, De fuga saeculi, De Jacob et vita beata, De Joseph, De patriarchis, De Helia et Jejunio, De Nabuthae historia, De Tobia, De interpellatione Job et David, De apologia prophaetae David, Enarrationes in XII Psalmos davidicos, Expositio Psalmi CXVIII, Expositio Evangelii secundum Lucam and Expositio Isaiae prophetae (of which only fragments remain, collected by P.A. Ballerini [CCL 14 (1957) 403-408] from *Augustine's citations). Moral and ascetical works include De officiis ministrorum, De virginibus, De viduis, De virginitate, De institutione virginis and Exhortatio virginitatis. Among his dogmatic works are De fide ad Gratianum, De Spiritu Sancto, De incarnationis dominicae sacramento, Explanatio symboli ad initiandos, Expositio fidei, De mysteriis, De sacramentis, De paenitentia and De sacramento regenerationis sive de philosophia (of which only fragments remain in Augustine and Claudianus Mamertus).

There are three discourses—De excessu fratris (378), De obitu Valentiniani (392) and De obitu Theodosii (395)—and a Sermo contra Auxentium de basilicis tradendis (386). His 91 surviving letters (Ep. 23 is considered inauthentic) are one of the most important sources for a knowledge of Ambrose, his activity, and the political and religious situation of his time. Regarding his hymns, Ambrosian hymnology arose out of a very particular historical context. Scholars are unanimous on Ambrose's authorship of only 4 hymns (on the strength of Augustine's testimony): Aeterne rerum conditor, Deus creator omnium, Iam surgit hora tertia and Intende qui regis Israel. Not all scholars regard 14 other hymns as authentic. Ambrose also left three *epigraphs in distichs: for the tomb of his brother *Satyrus, for the *baptistery of St. *Thecla and for *St. Nazarius. The authenticity of the 21 tituli intended as captions to OT and NT episodes is disputed.

Ambrose's intense pastoral activity oriented his literary production more to practical than to speculative themes. There is an abundance of homiletic, hortatory and moral works, whereas there are few treatises or exegetical writings that directly and systematically address theological and doctrinal problems. These latter, moreover, often appear to be responses elicited by particular circumstances. Rather than elaborating new theological ideas, Ambrose preferred to draw on what the Greek fathers had already examined and formulated, adapting it with a fine sensibility to the particular needs of his situation (see L.F. Pizzolato, La dottrina esegetica . . .). Ambrose's theological thought appears clearly in his anti-Arian and *christological works (De fide; De Spirtu S.; De inc. dom. sacr.), where one notes the influence esp. of *Didymus the Blind and *Basil. Ambrose's *trinitarian doctrine defends the unity of substance and the distinction of persons (De fide IV,8,91; De Spir. III,5,108; 16,116,117; regarding Ambrose's reluctance to use the term persona in this context, see M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana, 524-525); the Father is fons and radix of the Son (De fid. IV,10,132); the Son is fons of the Spirit (De Spir. I,15,152). In Christology, esp. in polemic with *Docetists and *Apollinarists, Ambrose maintains a perfect equilibrium that allows him to distinguish two natures and two wills in Christ without detriment to the unity of his person (De inc. dom. sacr. V,35; De fid. II,7,53-58; De exc. fr. I,12. For a survey and discussion of Ambrose's anti-Apollinarist passages, see G. Madec, Ambroise, Atanase et l'apollinarisme, in Politique et théologie chez Athanase d'Alexandrie, Paris 1974, 356-376. On Ambrose's Christology, see R. Cantalamessa, Ambrogio e i grandi dibattiti teologici del suo secolo, in Ambrosius Episcopus. Atti Congresso Internazionale di studi Ambrosiani, ed. G.

Lazzati, I, Milan 1976, 483-539; F. Szabò, Le Christ créateur chez Saint Ambroise, Rome 1985). The theme of redemption is dominated by the theory of the satisfaction and expiation of Christ (In Lc. III,48; VII,114). From *Origen and *Irenaeus Ambrose takes the idea of the passion and death of Christ as the price paid to the devil for the salvation of humankind (In Lc. IV,11-12; VII,114-117; Ep. 72). Some of Ambrose's works have as their principal theme the *sacramental theology of reconciliation, *baptism and the *Eucharist (mysterium sacramentum). His constant concern for the church (see G. Toscani, Teologia della chiesa) led Ambrose to reflect on the figure of *Mary (In Lc. and the work on virginity) and her place in salvation history. He considers her life sinless and a model of every virtue but makes no clear statement of her exemption from original sin. Ambrose's works, dominated by pastoral interest, also help us to understand the rites and *liturgy of his time.

CPL 123-165, dubious: 166-168; PL 14-17; PLS 1, 569-619. Various volumes in CSEL. An It. tr. of the opera omnia of Ambrose was begun in 1977: SAEMO. Ed. and tr. of various works in SC; FC; LNPF; BKV 2; var. aus., Cento anni di bibliografia ambrosiana (1874-1974), Milan 1981; H. von Campenhausen, Ambrosius von Mailand als Kirchenpolitiker, Berlin-Leipzig 1929; Delehaye, AB 48 (1930). J.R. Palenque, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire Romain. Contribution à l'histoire des rapports de l'Église et de l'État à la fin du quatrième siècle, Paris 1933; F.H. Dudden, The Life and Times of St. Ambrose, Oxford 1935; A. Paredi, Sant'Ambrogio e la sua età, Milan 1941; O. Faller, La data della consacrazione vescovile di sant'Ambrogio, in Ambrosiana, Milan 1942, 97-112; M. Meslin, Les ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967; L. Cracco Ruggini, Ambrogio e le opposizioni anticattoliche fra il 383 e il 390: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 409-449; G. Toscani, Teologia della chiesa in sant'Ambrogio, Milan 1974; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, vol. III, Bari 1973; M.G. Mara, Ambrogio di Milano, in Patrologia 3, Augustinianum 1977, 135-169; L.F. Pizzolato, La dottrina esegetica di sant'Ambrogio, Milan 1978; Id., Ambrogio e la libertà religiosa nel IV secolo, in Cristianesimo e istituzioni politiche. Da Costantino a Giustiniano, eds. E. dal Covolo and R. Uglione, Rome 1997, 143-155; for Ambrose's trinitarian theology, see Ch. Markschies, Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie. Kirchen und theologiegeschichtliche Studien zu Antiarianismus und Neunizanismus bei Ambrosius und im lateinischen Westen (364-481 n. Chr.), Tübingen 1995; D.H. Williams, Ambrose of Milan and the End of the Nicene-Arian Conflicts, Oxford 1995; H. Savon, Ambroise de Milan, Paris 1997; A. Bonato, La figura di Cristo in sant'Ambrogio: Teologia 22 (1997) 244-290; G. Visonà, Lo "status quaestionis" della ricerca ambrosiana, in Nec timeo mori, Atti Congresso internazionale di studi ambrosiani nel XVI centenario della death of sant'Ambrogio, Milan 1998, 31-72.

M.G. Mara

AMBROSIAN LITURGY

I. Origins - II. Course of formation - III. Sources and different layers of redaction.

In antiquity the geographical area of *Italy witnessed a flowering of liturgical traditions. Besides *Rome, these included the Campano-Beneventan (see *Paulinus of Nola [d. 431], who according to *Gennadius [De vir. ill. 49 (PL 58, 1087; TU 14,79)], composed a sacramentary and a hymnal); the *Aquileian (compare *Fortunatian [d. after 360], who, according to *Jerome [De vir. ill. 97]], composed a list of evangelical pericopes "titulis ordinatis" [CCL 9,365ff.] with the pastoral and liturgical work of *Chromatius of Aquileia [387–407] [see eds. R. Etaix - J. Lemarié CCL 9A]); the *Ravennan (compare the opisthographic Rotulus [ed. L.C. Mohlberg, 1956, and by S. Benz, 1967, LQF 45] with the work of *Peter Chrysologus [ca. 425–451] and *Maximian [546–556], esp. the latter's Liber Sacramentorum described by Agnellus in the Lib. Pont. Eccl. Ravvenat. 2,6 [MGH Scrip. Rer. Lang., eds. Holder-Egger, 332; PL 106, 610]); and the Ambrosian, which, with the Roman, are the only two that survive today.

I. Origins. From the evidence of the Liber Notitiae Sanctorum Mediolani (written 1304–1311, eds. M. Magistretti - U. Monneret de Villard, Milan 1917), which used ancient sources, we know that St. *Simplicianus (d. 401) completed the Ambrosian office "ubi sanctus Ambrosius non impleverat" (col. 376) and that St. Eusebius (ca. 449–452) composed "multos cantus ecclesiae" (col. 120) in imitation of St. *Ambrose (374-397), whose biographer Paulinus attests was the first to introduce "antiphonae, hymni ac vigiliae" in the *Milanese church (see Vita S. Ambr. a Paulino . . . conscripta PL 14, 31, n. 13). In fact Ambrose did make use of alternating popular liturgical *chant (see Aug., Conf. 9,7,15) and composed other liturgical texts (see Wal. Strab., Rer. eccl. chs. 22 and 25) such as—perhaps—a laus cerei (see Aug., De Civ. Dei 15,22).

The name Ambrosian *liturgy is thus given to the liturgy inspired, in fact or merely nominally, by that used by St. Ambrose and which took form in the tradition of *Milan, Ambrose's episcopal see, and in the neighboring or satellite territories of the metropolis. In De sacramentis III,5, Ambrose says: "In all things I desire to follow the Roman church, yet we too hominis sensum habemus." It should be said, then, that the Ambrosian liturgy has its roots in the Roman liturgy, as Probst, Ceriani, Magistretti, Cagin, Cabrol, Batiffol and Jungmann think. Nevertheless, evidence (chants, antiphons, the system of biblical pericopes for the Eucharist, prayers, etc.) advanced by other scholars (Duchesne, Lejay, Cattaneo, Alzati) suggests an Eastern origin. One thing is certain: the Ambrosian liturgy has a specific quality that must be sought in its particular elements, such as systems of biblical readings, euchologies, nuances of typical themes, the structure of the *liturgical year, the sanctoral cycle and feasts, and the formation of the liturgical books themselves.

II. Course of formation. The peculiarities of the formation of the Ambrosian liturgy must be sought in both intrinsic and extrinsic factors, principal among these being: (1) The Ambrosian liturgy's profound roots in anti-*Arianism. In fact, in its origin (4th-5th c.), development (6th-7th c.) and establishment (8th-9th c.) the Ambrosian liturgy always had to combat Arianism, whether pure (4th-5th c.) or *barbarian (*Longobard, 6th-7th c.), or the imitators of Arianism (8th-9th c.). This impressed a strong christocentrism on the Ambrosian liturgy, which was strengthened at the time of the *Acacian *schism (484–519), during which the Milanese bishops showed absolute solidarity with the Roman pontiff. After the so-called question of the *Three Chapters, in which theological and political complications led a series of Milanese bishops from *Vitalis (552–556) to *Lawrence (573–592) to adhere to the schism, the Catholic bishops of Milan, faithful to orthodoxy and back from their voluntary exile at Genoa (571–649) to escape the Longobard massacres, gradually reconquered the positions of a Catholicity of faith more genuine than ever; from 670 onward, all spirit of separatism ceased. All this influenced the composition of formulas and formularies of the Ambrosian liturgy, which contain rich reflections on the person of Christ: the incarnation of the Word, his virginal birth, emphasis on his humanity-divinity, and consequently a marked veneration of Mary, Virgin and Mother. (2) Repeated contact between Milan (bearing in mind the city's central location from antiquity, making it a place of cultural and commercial exchange) and other cultural centers. This explains both the hybrid origins of the Ambrosian liturgy and its different stratifications and contaminations. This is not eclecticism, but a testimony to the multifaceted richness present in the Ambrosian liturgy. There are demonstrable exchanges, influences, contaminations and contacts with Rome; with the East through two specific cultural centers, Ravenna and Aquileia; with W *Africa (*Carthage, *Thagaste etc.) and E Africa (*Alexandria); with *Spain; and later with N Europe, through both the *Celtic monks and the so-called Carolingian reform.

III. Sources and different layers of redaction. It is well known that the name Ambrosian given to the church of Milan goes back to a letter of John VIII in 881 (legatio Ambrosianae ecclesiae: MGH Ep. Karol. Aevi V, n. 269, 237). *Gregory I, however, was already addressing Milanese ecclesiastics with the expression Sancto Ambrosio deservientibus clericis (MGH Epistulae II, 266). Moreover, it has always been the conviction that in the history of the Milanese church Ambrose was the primus, id est maximus, metropolitanam regens cathedram (Landolfo, Historia mediolanensis I,11; IL, 35: MGH Scriptores VIII,42,70). Thus Ambrose's expression in his Sermo contra Auxentium de basil. trad. 18 (PL 16, 1055) about the inheritance he received from his predecessors—Dionysius, Eustorgius, Mirocles atque omnium retro fidelium episcoporum—immediately became, after his death, the inheritance of Ambrose. Nothing that pertained to the church of Milan could fail to be Ambrosian. This explains the effort of scholars to isolate, from MS sources of the Ambrosian liturgy dating from the 9th c. on, whatever can be redactionally dated between the period from Ambrose to the final codification of the period of the Longobard revival and the Carolingian reform. The three major redactional layers demonstrably present in the Ambrosian liturgy and that testify to the ongoing enrichment of Ambrose's primitive nucleus can best be understood in relation to the Ambrosian liturgy's course of formation. The first redaction goes back to the 4th-5th c. and was isolated by the study of Paredi and others. The second redaction had its apogee in the 7th c., according to the studies of Heiming and Triacca. The third redaction was the Carolingian (9th-10th c.), which, according to the studies of Borella, Cattaneo and others, saw a gradual and coercive Romanization of the Ambrosian liturgy. One can thus distinguish within the one Ambrosian liturgy, from the formal point of view, the pure and genuine Ambrosian liturgy attested by the first redaction and in part by the second redaction, and a contaminated Ambrosian liturgy attested especially by the third redaction.

In any case, the expressive and interpretative plurality that developed through the (4th) 5th-9th (10th) c. within the one Ambrosian liturgy–i.e., the one "liturgical tradition," reinvigorated and reclothed in different "liturgical traditions" in the passage from one generation to the next and in the succcession of cultures (first Roman-Italic, then barbarian-Longobard)–did preserve what is perennially related to Christ. In general the sources of the Ambrosian liturgy evidence clear themes on the mystery of Christ in his cosmic-anthropological-salvific centrality, as well as an incisiveness of content that combines conceptual density and theologically pregnant unitariness with a style that, even where concise, seems overloaded with respect to the concinnitas romana.

Useful biographical reviews: Borella-Cattaneo-Villa, Questioni e bibliografia Ambrosiana, (Archivio Ambrosiano IL) Milan 1950; P. Borella, Bibliografia, in Id., Il Rito Ambrosiano, Brescia 1964, 475-492; Orientamenti bibliografici, in L. Prosdocimi - C. Alzati, La Chiesa Ambrosiana. Profili di storia istituzionale e liturgica, N.E.D., Milan 1980, 69-85; A.J. Schuster, Notizie sulla liturgia ambrosiana, in Storia di Milano, I, Milan 1953, 443-461; E. Cattaneo, Storia e particolarità del rito ambrosiano, in Storia di Milano III, Milan 1954, 761-837; M. Huglo - L. Agustoni - E. Cardine - E.T. Moneta-Caglio, Fonti e paleografia del Canto Ambrosiano (Archivio Ambrosiano, VII), Milan 1956: P. Borella, in M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia Liturgica, Milan: IV ([2]1959) 555-620 (= I Sacramenti nella liturgia Ambrosiana); III ([3]1966) 615-676 (= La Messa Ambrosiana); IL ([3]1969) 838-879 (= Il Breviario Ambrosiano 1); P. Borella, Il rito ambrosiano, Brescia 1964; A.M. Triacca, La liturgia ambrosiana, in La Liturgia. Panorama storico generale, ed. M. Salvatore. Casale 1978, 125-130; Id., Libri liturgici ambrosiani, in Salvatore (ed.), op. cit., 201-217; E. Cattaneo, La Chiesa di Ambrogio. Studi di storia e liturgia, Milan 1984; F. Segala, Saggio di bibliografia sulla liturgia ambrosiana dal 1950 al 1975, Verona 1995; C. Alzati, Ambosianum mysterium: la Chiesa di Milano e la sua tradizione liturgica, Milan 2000; Liturgia, eds. D. Sartore, A.M. Triacca, C. Cibien, Cinisello Balsamo 2001, 6-46 (rich bibl.).

A.M. Triacca

AMBROSIASTER (d. after 384). Author of the Commentaries on the thirteen Pauline letters that were attributed to *Ambrose throughout the Middle Ages. The discovery of the nonauthenticity of that attribution during the Renaissance resulted in the name Ambrosiaster being given to the work's anonymous author. (Erasmus of Rotterdam was responsible for correcting the communis opinio, recognizing the nonauthenticity of the entire work [see R. Hoven, Notes sur Érasme et les auteurs anciens: L'Antiquité Classique 38 (1969) 169-174]; until recently the term Ambrosiaster has been thought to derive from Erasmus as well, but Lunn-Rockliffe has argued that the term was coined by the Benedictines of St Maur in their 1686-1690 edition of Ambrose's works.) Besides the MSS that contain the Commentaries under Ambrose's name, some codices ascribe them to a certain Hilarius; most MSS (including the oldest, the mid-6th-c. Casinensis CL) present the work as anonymous. The problem of authorship is still unresolved: many hypotheses attempt to ascribe the work to an author known to us, but none have gained the consensus of scholars. Among proposed authors are the *Luciferian deacon Hilarius, the *Donatist *Tyconius, the Roman priest *Faustinus, the converted Jew Isaac (adversary of Pope *Damasus), the Roman prefect Hilarianus Hilarius, Hilarius of Pavia, *Evagrius of *Antioch, the imperial official Claudius Callistus Hilarius, the Roman prefect Emilianus Dexter (son of *Pacian of Barcelona and a friend of *Jerome), *Niceta of Remesiana and *Maximus of *Turin. Clues in his writings indicate that Ambrosiaster worked at *Rome during the pontificate of Pope Damasus (366–384), though he probably had links with N *Italy and *Spain. The author may have been a convert from *paganism or *Judaism. The Commentaries, for the first time in the West, offer a systematic explanation of the Pauline letters, which they include in their entirety according to a Latin text common in *Italy before the Vulgate revision. Their historical-literal *exegesis, averse to *allegory but not ignoring typology, uses biblical citations and rational argumentation to demonstrate theological themes. They include practical applications to the moral life of believers. A not-insignificant problem underlying the exact reconstruction of Ambrosiaster's thought is the existence of more than one recension of the Commentaries (three for Romans, two for the other letters), at times partially different in doctrinal content: Vogels, who edited the critical edition of the work with reference to the research of Brewer and Souter, considers them successive reworkings by the author himself, naming them α, β and γ, with γ being the last and definitive version.

A problem of different recensions exists with the Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti, passed down among *Augustine's works but now, following Souter's studies, unanimously attributed to Ambrosiaster. We have three collections which contain, respectively, 127, 150 and 115 treatises. Most of these explain difficult passages of Scripture; others expound the faith in polemic with *heretics, *pagans or Jews; and still others refer to precise historical conditions, such as the quaestio CI which rebukes the pride of the Roman deacons.

Some exegetical fragments in the codex Ambrosianus I 101 sup. (8th c.) are also attributed to Ambrosiaster: three fragments on Matthew 24, the Incipit de tribus mensuris (on Mt 13:33 // Lk 13:21) and De Petro apostolo (on Mt 26:52 and Peter's denial) (see A. Souter, Reasons for Regarding Hilarius (Ambrosiaster) as the Author of the Mercati-Turner Anecdoton: JTS 5 [1903-1904] 608-621).

The themes present in Ambrosiaster's work, though mainly related to the biblical texts he comments on, show some of his particular interests: the problem of the unbelief of the Jews (of whose institutions the author has a profound knowledge and whose adherence to Christ he awaits); the relationship between the Mosiac law and faith in Christ and the question of the Judaizers; the position of the pagans with respect to the Christian message; the presentation of *trinitarian and *christological faith; and the situation of the human creature, sinner and redeemed. Ambrosiaster's treatment of this last theme has often led scholars to comparisons with Augustine and *Pelagius, with differing conclusions. The earliest explicit citation of a text of Ambrosiaster is by Augustine in 420, who introduces a passage of Ambrosiaster's commentary on Rom 5:12 as a work of "sanctus Hilarius," clearly thinking of Hilary of Poitiers (c. Pelag. IV,4,7).

CPL 184-188; CPPM IIA 1745-1767; Repertorium biblicum medii aevi (F. Stegmüller) Supplementum VIII A-E (1976) 1248-1262 (for the 5 exegetical fragments n. 1261).

Commentaries: PL 17, 47-536; CSEL 81,1.2.3. Quaestiones: PL 36, 2215-2422; CSEL 50. Frammenti su Matteo: G. Mercati, Il commentario latino di un ignoto chiliasta su s. Matteo: ST 11 (1903) 23-49; C.H. Turner, An Exegetical Fragment of the Third Century: JTS 5 (1903-1904) 227-241; PLS 1, 665-670; Eng. tr., Ambrosiaster (ed. G. L. Bray), Commentaries on Romans and 1-2 Corinthians, Downers Grove 2009; Id., Commentaries on Galatians—Philemon, Downers Grove 2009.

Studies: A. Souter, A Study of Ambrosiaster: TSt 7/4, Cambridge 1905; W. Mundle, Die Exegese der paulinischen Briefe in Kommentar des Ambrosiaster, Marburg 1919; A. Souter, The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul, Oxford 1927; DBS 1, 225-241; C. Martini, Ambrosiaster. De auctore, operibus, theologia, Rome 1944; TRE 2, 356-362; Patrologia III, 169-180 (bibl.); A. Pollastri, Ambrosiaster. Commento alla lettera ai Romani. Aspetti cristologici, L'Aquila 1977; Id., Il prologo del Commento alla Lettera ai Romani dell'Ambrosiaster: SSR 2 (1978) 93-127; Id., Nota all'interpretazione di Matteo 13,33, Luca 13,21 nel frammento Incipit de tribus mensuris: SSR 3 (1979) 61-78; Id., Sul rapporto tra cristiani e giudei secondo il Commento dell'Ambrosiaster ad alcuni passi paolini (Gal 3,19b-20; 4,4; Rom 11,16.20.25-26a; 15,11): SSR 4 (1980) 313-327; L. Speller, Ambrosiaster and the Jews: SP XVII/1 (1982) 72-78; J. Chapa Prado, El comentario de Ambrosiaster a las epistolas de san Pablo (doctoral thesis directed by C. Basevi), Pamplona 1983; Ambrosiaster, Commento alla lettera ai Romani (ed. A. Pollastri), Rome 1984; N. Cipriani, Un'altra traccia dell'Ambrosiaster in Agostino (De pecc. mer. remiss. II,36,58-59): Augustinianum 24 (1984) 515-525; L. Fatica, Ambrosiaster: l'esegesi nei Commentari alle Epistole ai Corinzi: VetChr 2 (1987) 269-292; Ambrosiaster, Commento alla lettera ai Galati (ed. L. Fatrica), Rome 1986; W. Geerlings, Römisches Recht und Gnadentheologie, in var. aus., Homo Spiritalis, Würzburg 1987, 357-377; Ambrosiaster, Commento alla prima lettera ai Corinzi (ed. L. Fatica), Rome 1989; Ambrosiaster, Commento alla seconda lettera ai Corinzi (ed. L. Fatica), Rome 1989; D.G. Hunter, On the Sin of Adam and Eve: A Little-Known Defense of Marriage and Childbearing by Ambrosiaster, HTR 82 (1989) 283-299; M. Pesce, Il commentario dell'Ambrosiaster alla Prima lettera ai corinzi. Alla ricerca della differenza tra esegesi antica ed esegesi storica: Annali di storia dell'esegesi 7/2 (1990) 593-629; J.B. Valero, Pera ed Adán: según Ambrosiaster: EstEcl 65 (1990) 147-191; D. Hunter, The Paradise of Patriarchy: Ambrosiaster on Woman as (not) God's Image: JTS n.s. 43 (1992) 447-469; L. Perrone, Echi della polemica pagana sulla Bibbia negli scritti esegetici fra IV e V secolo: le Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti dell'Ambrosiaster: Annali di storia dell'esegesi 11/1 (1993) 161-185; O. Heggelbacher, Beziehungen zwischen Ambrosiaster und Maximus von Turin?: Freigurger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie 41 (1994) 5-44; A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Augustin commentateur de saint Paul et l'Ambrosiaster: SE 36 (1996) 17-65; A. Merkt, Wer war der Ambrosiaster?: Wissenschaft und Weisheit 59 (1996) 19-33; W. Geerlings, Das verständnis von Gesetz im Galaterbriefkommentar des Ambrosiaster, in Die Weltlichkeit des Glaubens in der Alten Kirche, Festschrift für Ulrich Wickert, Berlin-New York 1997, 101-113; J. Stüben, Erasmus von Rotterdam und der Ambrosiaster: Wissenschaft und Weisheit 60 (1997) 3-22; A. Pollastri, Escatologia e Scrittura nell'Ambrosiaster: Annali di storia dell'esegesi 17/1 (2000) 109-132; A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Pauline Exegesis and Ambrosiaster, in Augustine Biblical Exegete (eds. F. Van Fleteren - J. Schnaubelt), New York 2001, 33-54; PCBE 1, 102-104; S. Lunn-Rockliffe, Ambrosiaster's Political Theology, Oxford Early Christian Studies, Oxford 2007.

A. Pollastri

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS (ca. 335–400). Latin historian, born at *Antioch to a noble Greek family. As a youth he entered the corps of the protectores domestici, for a long time following the magister equitum Ursicinus, first at *Nisibis, *Milan and Antioch, then in *Gaul and the East, against the *Persians. After escaping from the siege of Amida (359), he went with Ursicinus to Melitene and from there to Antioch. In 363 he followed the emperor *Julian in the expedition against the Persians and, after Julian's death (26 July 363), retreated to Antioch; after further travels he reached *Rome, where he wrote the Rerum gestarum libri. In contact with Roman aristocratic circles, Ammianus became a senator in his final years (Symm., Ep. IX, 110), although he was expelled from Rome in 383 on the occasion of a severe famine. He died shortly after 400. Ammianus's work, the Rerum gestarum libri, covered the period from Nerva (96) to the death of *Valens (378) in 31 books. The surviving books, XIV-XXXI, include 26 years of history, from 354 (death of Gallus) to 378. While programatically following *Tacitus's Historiae, Ammianus dedicated much of his work to describing the historical events of his own time, whose customs, society and cultural trends he carefully described. The presence of a variety of substantial excursuses, the insertion of speeches and the use of an artificial style attest to his taste for the traditions of the genre. His essential *paganism, reflected in his praise of Julian, does not prevent him from detachment and impartiality toward Christianity. Claims of benign religious tolerance (XXII,10,2; XXX,9,5) accompany disapproval of Julian's persecuting zeal (XXII,10,7; XXII,12,7; XXV,4,17-20) and sincere words of admiration for the *martyrs (XXII,11,10). His interest in religious movements was a fruit of the same curiositas that caused him to diligently note miracula and signa (XIX,12,20); he was also well informed, however, about the usage and customs of the church (XIV,9,7; XXI,2,5; XXXI,12,8; XV,7,7), as well as of its internal affairs, such as the clash between *Damasus and *Ursinus (XXVII,3,12-15). His sources remain uncertain and obscure: probably Oribasius, Magnus of Carre, Virius Nicomachus Flavianus, Eutychianus of *Cappadocia, Rufius Festus, Timagenes, Pliny the Elder (these latter for the excursuses). The text is in codex Vat. lat. 1873, an exact copy of a 10th-c. codex from Hersfeld now almost completely lost. The editio princeps was published at Rome in 1474 by Angelo Sabino.

C.U. Clark, Ammiani Marcellini rerum gestarum libri qui supersunt, Berlin 1915 (= 1963); J.C. Rolfe, Ammianus Marcellinus, with an English tr., 3 vols., London 1935-39 (= 1982-86); W. Seyfarth, Ammiani Marcellini rerum gestarum libri qui supersunt, 2 vols., Leipzig 1978; Id., Ammianus Marcellinus römische Geschichte, 4 vols., Berlin 1968-86; E. Galletier - G. Sabbah - J. Fontaine - A.-M. Marié - L.A. de la Beaumelle, Ammien Marcellin Histoires, 6 vols., Paris 1968-99; O. Veh - G. Wirth, Das römische Weltreich vor dem Untergang: sämtliche erhaltene Bücher A. M., Zürich 1974 (= Amsterdam 1997); A. Selem, Le storie di Ammianus Marcellinus, Turin 1976 (= 1993); J. den Boeft, D. den Hengst et al., Philological and Historical Commentary on Ammianus, Groningen 1987-1998; M. Caltabiano, Ammianus Marcellinus, Storie, Milan 1989; PWK I, 1845-1852; EI 2, 988-990; EC 1, 1080-1082; KlP V, 302; RAC I, 386ff.; LTK 1, 440; Schanz IV, 1, 93-107; R. Syme, Ammianus and the Historia Augusta, Oxford 1968; L. Angliviel de la Beaumelle, Remarques sur l'attitude d'Ammien Marcellin à l'égard du christianisme, in Mélanges d'Histoire Ancienne offerts à William Seston, Paris 1974, 15-23; R.C. Blockley, Ammianus Marcellinus: A Study of His Historiography and Political Thought, Brussels 1975; N. Bitter, Kampfschilderungen bei Ammianus Marcellinus, Bonn 1976; G. Viansino, Studi sulle Res Gestae di Ammiano Marcellino, Salerno 1977; G. Sabbah, La méthode d'Ammien Marcellin, Paris 1978; N.J.E. Austin, Ammianus on Warfare: An Investigation into Ammianus' Military Knowledge, Brussels 1979; E.A. Thompson, The Historical Work of Ammianus Marcellinus, 1947; V. Neri, Ammiano e il cristianesimo: religione e politica nelle Res gestae di Ammianus Marcellinus, Bologna 1985; J. Matthews, The Roman Empire of Ammianus, London 1989; var. aus., Cognitio Gestorum: The Historiographic Art of Ammianus Marcellinus, Amsterdam 1991; M. Navarra, Riferimenti normativi e prospettive giuspubblicistiche nelle Res gestae di Ammianus Marcellinus, Milan 1994; T.D. Barnes, Ammianus Marcellinus and the Representation of Historical Reality, Ithaca - London 1998; J.W. Drijvers - D. Hunt, The Late Roman World and Its Historian: Interpreting Ammianus Marcellinus, London - New York 1999; F. Wittchow, Exemplarisches Erzählen bei Ammianus Marcellinus, Munich 2002.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

AMMON (4th c.). Bishop of an unspecified see. At the request of a bishop Theophilus, he wrote a letter on *Pachomius and esp. on his favorite disciple Theodore. Ammon knew the latter personally when, from age 17, he spent three years at Pbou (352-355). The letter can be likened in its literary inspiration to *Athanasius's Life of Anthony and to the Lausiac History of *Palladius: all three provide, by request, a history that is also a eulogy on the *monastic life. Ammon describes Theodore's most outward and marvelous traits, his gift of prophecy and miracles. His evidence must be used with circumspection.

CPG II, 2378; CPGS, 2378.

E. Prinzivalli

AMMON of Adrianople (d. after 394). Late 4th-c. bishop of Adrianople (*Thrace), who participated at the synod of *Constantinople (394) that resolved the *schism between Bagadius and Agapius over the see of Bostra (Mansi III, 851-854). He was again at Constantinople in 399, participating in the meeting of bishops in which Eusebius of Valentinopolis presented his accusation of *simony against Antoninus of *Ephesus. Ammon wrote a De resurrectione against *Origen.

CPG II, 2540; CPGS, 2540.

E. Prinzivalli

AMMONAS (4th c.). Feast 26 January (for the Greeks). After 14 years of *monastic life as St. *Anthony's disciple at *Scete and his successor (356) as head of a group of *anchorites at Pispir on the right bank of the Nile, he was consecrated by *Athanasius as bishop of a small unknown center mainly for monks for whom he was given a certain responsibility more pastoral than legal. He died before 396, since the Historia monachorum in Aegypto knew his successor Pithyrion (XV,2). 11 apophthegmata* are attributed to him (PG 65, 120-124), of which nos. 1, 3, 4, 9 and 11 undoubtedly belong to the original group; nos. 8 and 10, which emphasize his exceptional episcopal mercy toward (even unrepentant) sinners, are also certainly authentic. No. 2, however, is suspect. Less widespread, but of great importance, are the 14 letters attested (6th c.) in a *Syriac version (PO X, 6), some of which are preserved in *Georgian, Greek (PO XI, 4), an Arabic revision (PG 40, 1019-1066) and *Armenian. They give testimony to a very early period of *monasticism, with their citations of Jewish Christian apocrypha (Ascension of Isaiah; Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs*) and insistence on an experience of the *Holy Spirit. Other works are less certain. The texts of Ammonas sometimes circulated under the name of *Macarius; texts of *Isaiah of Gaza and even of *Evagrius have also been attributed to him. The names Amoun, Pi-Ammon, etc., are common in *Egypt; F. Nau has drawn up (PO 11, 4, 393, n. 1) a list of monks the spelling of whose names in documents is uncertain and should not be confused with our author.

CPG II, 2380-2393/CPG Suppl., 2380; F. Klejna, Antonius und Ammonas. Eine Untersuchung über Herkunft und Eigenart der ältesten Mönchshriefe: ZKTh 62 (1938) 309-348; DIP 1, 535-536. Fr. tr.: B. Outtier - L. Regnault, Lettres des Pères du Désert: Ammonas, Macaire, Arsène, Sérapion de Thmuis (Spiritualité Orientale 42; Bégrollesen- Mauges: Abbaye de Bellefontaine, 1985). Eng. tr.: D.J. Chitty, The Letters of Ammonas: Successor of Saint Antony (revised and with an introduction by S. Brock), Oxford 1979.

J. Gribomont

AMMONIUS (5th-6th c.). *Aristotelian commentator and son of Hermias and Aidesia (see Suidae Lexicon, nn. 79 and 3035, ed. A. Adler, II, Leipzig 1931, 161 and 412; Damascius, Vitae Isidori reliquiae, 74, ed. C. Zintzen, Hildesheim 1967, p. 100), who distinguished himself as a disciple of *Proclus at *Athens (Damascius, Vitae Is. 79, p. 110) but lived nearly his entire life in his native city of *Alexandria, becoming head of its school. He taught Aristotelian commentators such as *Simplicius, *John Philoponus, and Olympiodorus (see J. Freudenthal, PWK I, 2, 1865), and some *Neoplatonic philosophers, as well as Damascius (see *Photius, Bibl. cod. 181, 127a, II 192,5-6 Henry). Damascius (Vitae Is. 79, p. 110) and Photius (Bibl. cod. 181, 127a, II 192,9-10) tell us of his great versatility in various areas of philosophy, e.g., astronomy and geometry. He was also an exegete of *Plato (Photius, Bibl. cod. 181,127a, II 192,8), but dedicated esp. to interpreting Aristotle's works (Damascius, Vitae Is. 79, p. 110).

Modern criticism has not endorsed the fame he enjoyed among his contemporaries and among later Aristotelian commentators, considering him unoriginal, pedantic and trivial (see Freudenthal, PWK I, 2, 1864; C. Prantl, Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande, I, Leipzig 1927, 642). His writings are (1) a commentary on Ptolemy's Syntaxis, lost (see Photius, Bibl. cod. 181, 127a, II 192,9-10); (2) on Aristotle's god, demonstrating that it was not only the final but also the efficient cause (see Simplicius, In Phys. VIII, 10, p. 1363,8-10 Diels), also lost; (3) De fato (ed. I.C. Orellius, Alexandri Aphrodisiensis, Ammonii Hermiae filii, Plotini, Bardesanis Syri et Georgii Gemisti Plethonis De fato quae supersunt graece, Turici 1824; see K. Praechter in F. Überweg, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, I, Berlin 1926, 637); (4) a commentary on Porphyry's Isagoge (ed. A. Busse, CAG IV, III, Berolini 1891); (5) a commentary on Aristotle's Categories (ed. A. Busse, CAG IV, IV, Berolini 1895); (6) a commentary on Aristotle's De interpretatione (ed. A. Busse, CAG IV, V, Berolini 1897); (7) a commentary on Aristotle's Prior Analytics, partly lost (J.A. Cramer, Anecdota graeca e codd. man. Bibliothecae regiae I, Oxonii 1839, 239-240, pointed out the presence of a number of scholia of Ammonius on the Prior Analytics and a treatise by Ammonius on the hypothetical syllogism in frags. 88r and 254r of the Paris codex. gr. 2064; on the treatise on the hypothetical syllogism, see also Freudenthal, PWK I, 2, 1865; E. Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen, III 2, Leipzig 1903, 894 n. 1; and C. Prantl, Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande, I Leipzig 1927, 657 n. 168; the scholia contained in frags. 88r-112r of Paris. gr. 2064 were published as a genuine work of Ammonius by M. Wallies, CAG IV, VI, Berolini 1899, 1-36; the so-called treatise on the hypothetical syllogism in frag. 254r of Paris. gr. 2064 was published by Wallies, op. cit., 67-69 along with other scholia on the Prior Analytics contained in frags. 226r-261r of the same codex, see ibid., 37-76: Wallies seems to consider neither authentic); (8) a commentary on the Posterior Analytics, mentioned by John Philoponus (see Wallies, op. cit., V, I) from which a few scholia have survived in various codices (see A. Wartelle, Inventaire des manuscrits grecs d'Aristote et de ses commentateurs, Paris 1963, 184); (9) a commentary on Aristotle's De generatione et corruptione on which John Philoponus's surviving commentary on the same is based (see Wartelle, op. cit., 184); (10) a commentary on Aristotle's Meteorologica, referred to by Olympiodorus (see E. Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen, III 2, Leipzig [4]1903, 894 n. 1); (11) a commentary on Aristotle's De caelo (see Zeller, loc. cit.); (12) a commentary on Plato's Gorgias, cited by Olympiodorus (see Zeller, loc. cit.). Three codices—Paris. gr. 1899, Paris. gr. 1901 and Paris. gr. 1904—contain a commentary on the first six books of Aristotle's Metaphysics, attributed to Ammonius (see Wartelle, op. cit., 102-184; H. Omont, Invent. somm. des man. grecs de la Bibl. nat., II, Paris 1888, 160-161): in fact, it is not Ammonius's commentary but that of *Asclepius, though dependent on Ammonius's lectures; it was published by M. Hayduck (see M. Hayduck, CAG VI, II, Berolini 1888, p. VI and n. 3 of the same page; Zeller, loc. cit.). The surviving Aristotelian commentaries do not reproduce Ammonius's original words but comprise notes taken by his hearers (see Freudenthal, PWK 1,2, 1864; Wallies, CAG IV, VI, p. VI). At times there are two or three different scholia that comment on the same point (see C.A. Brandis, AAWB hist. phil. Kb. 1833, 283; Freudenthal, PWK I, 2, 1864); sometimes there are obvious interpolations (see Freudenthal, loc. cit.); and in some cases the same work is handed down in the codices in multiple recensions (e.g., the commentary on Porphyry's Isagoge—see no. 4 above—of which there are various recensions, one of which is contained, e.g., in the codices Vat. gr. 1777 frags. 1r-27v, Vat. gr. 2189 frags. 2r-49r, Neapol. gr. III D 37 frags. 1r-14, see Busse, CAG IV, III, XIV and XXIII and P. Canart, Codices Vat. gr. 1745-1962, Bibl. Vat. 1970, 112-113).

C.A. Brandis, Über die Reihenfolge der Bücher des aristotelischen Organons und ihre griechische Ausleger: AAWB hist. phil. Kl (1833) 283; J. Freudenthal: PWK I, 2, 1863-1865; E. Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung III, 2, Leipzig [4]1903, 893-896; C. Prantl, Geschichte der Logik im Abendlande, I, Leipzig 1927, 642 and 657, n. 168; G.L. Kustas, The Commentators on Aristotle's Categories and on Porphyry's Isagoge, Studies in Byzantine Rhetoric, Thessalonica 1973. On the MSS, see in particular A. Busse, CAG IV, III, Berolini 1891, V-XLVI; CAG IV, IV, Berolini 1895, V-XXII; CAG IV, V, Berolini 1897, V-LIV; M. Wallies, CAG IV, VI, Berolini 1899, V-XIV; A. Wartelle, Inventaire des manuscrits grecs d'Aristote et de ses commentateurs, Paris 1963, 184; H.D. Saffrey, Dictionnaire des philosophes antiques, I, Paris 1989, 168-169.

S. Lilla

AMMONIUS of Alexandria (6th c.). *Anastasius the Sinaite twice cites in his Hodegos (CPG 7745) the work of a certain Ammonius of Alexandria, in which the latter attacks *Julian of Halicarnassus, the founder of *aphthartodocetism. There Ammonius of Alexandria invokes an objection that "the infidel Jewish philosopher *Philo" must have raised against Mnason, a disciple of the apostles: the miracles of the OT were much greater than all of Jesus' miracles, and many NT statements show that Jesus could not be God. Obviously this statement cannot be from *Philo of Alexandria. An influence of the discussion between a *monk and two Jews, Papiscos and Philo, is unlikely, as is the relation, asserted by J.E. Bruns, with the lost dialogue of *Aristo of Pella (CPG 1101). The source is indicated—both in an account "on priestly dignity" (BHG 1322v), originally reaching us in a sermon of Anastasius the Sinaite (CPG 7750) and in an Erotapokrisis of the same Anastasius passed down independently (CPG 7746,5)—as the "history of the church of the philosopher *Philo" (CPG 7512), i.e., "Philo the historian." A scholiast mentions *Philo of Carpasia who lived late 4th c.; of his work, however, we have only a commentary on the *Song of Songs (CPG 3810) and a fragment of a commentary on the *Hexameron, cited by *Cosmas Indicopleustes (CPG 7463). Given the above, nothing can be said with certainty other than that neither of Anastasius's citations refer to the exegete Ammonius of Alexandria, who was active 6th c. (CPG 5500-5506). A third testimonium present in the Hodegos, however, must be from the work "against the heresies of *Eutyches and *Dioscorus" by a certain priest Ammonius of Alexandria.

Editions: (1) Contra Julianum Halicarnassensem (CPG 6982): Anastasii Sinaitae Viae dux, XIII, 8,23-51; XIII,10,12-79, ed. K.-H. Uthemann, CCSG 8, Turnhout - Leuven 1981, 243-244; 252-254; (2) Adversus haereses Eutychii et Dioscori: ibid., XIV,1,1-33, loc.cit., 256-257.

Studies: G. Mercati, Un preteso scritto di san Pietro vescovo d'Alessandria e martire sulla bestemmia e Filone l'istoriografo: Rivista storico-critica delle scienze teologiche (1905) 162-180 (Opere Minori II, StT 77, Rome 1937, 426-438); M. Richard, Les textes hagiographiques du codex Athos Philothéou 52: AB 93 (1975) 150; 154 (BHG 1322v in a recension of the ps.-Anastasian Erotapokriseis, CPG 7746); J.E. Bruns, The Altercatio Jasonis et Papisci, Philo, and Anastasius the Sinaite: ThS 43 (1973) 287-294; D.T. Runia, Philo in Early Christian Literature, Assen-Minneapolis 1993, 210-211; K.-H. Uthemann, Was verraten Katenen über die Exegese ihrer Zeit?, in G. Schöllgen - C. Scholten (eds.), Stimuli. Exegese und ihre Hermeneutik in Antike und Christentum. Festschrift für E. Dassmann, JbAC, Erg. 23, Münster 1996, 290.

K.-H. Uthemann

AMMONIUS Saccas (2nd-3rd c.). As Dörrie (Hermes 83, 1955, 466) and Schröder (ANRW II 36,1 [1987] 520) observed, the surname Saccas is found only in *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Graec. aff. cur. VI, 96 (PG 83, 977 B 1-5; SC 57,1 p. 276, 1-4), in the Lexicon Suidae (I 145,30-31; IV 151,23-24 Adler) and in Ammianus Marcellinus 22, 16, 16 (I 291,15-20 Seyfarth), where, however, the words Saccas and Plotini magister are an interpolation and where the Ammonius named with other grammarians is not the *Alexandrian philosopher but a grammarian (see Dörrie, 1955, 467). We have evidence on Ammonius from *Porphyry (Vita Plot. 3; 7; 10; 14; 20), *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 19,9-10), *Nemesius of Emesa (De nat. hom. 2,19,31; 3,56-60), Theodoret (Graec. aff. cur. VI, 96) and *Photius (Bibl., cod. 214, 172a). *Proclus also alludes to Ammonius's teaching in Theol. Plat. II, 4 (II 31,8-9 Saffrey-Westerink): Origen the *Neoplatonist is said to have attended the same school as *Plotinus.

A comparison of the evidence allows us to conclude the following: (1) Ammonius taught at *Alexandria for ca. 50 years, from the time of *Commodus (d. 192) until his own death, ca. 242, the year of Gordian III's *Persian expedition, which Plotinus joined: there is no reason to doubt this, as Dörrie does (1955, 468). That Ammonius had already begun his activity at the time of Commodus is considered very probable by Baltes (Gnomon 56 [1984] 205). (2) As nearly all scholars admit (Dodds, Les sources de Plotin, 31 n. 1; Theiler, Forsch. zum Neuplat. 1 and 39; Kettler, Kerygma und Logos, 322-323), Origen the Christian studied at Ammonius's school: there is no reason to assert, as do Dörrie (1955, pp. 468-469) and Goulet (RHPhR 57 [1977] 484-488), that Origen the Christian had a Christian Ammonius for a teacher, different from Plotinus's teacher, and that Porphyry had confused Origen the Christian with Origen the Neoplatonist, who did study under Ammonius (that Porphyry would have made such a mistake is highly unlikely, see Kettler, 1979, p. 323). (3) Ammonius was originally a Christian who at some point renounced his faith to embrace Greek *philosophy (see Kettler 1979, 324-325, Baltes: Gnomon 56 [1984] 205); Porphyry, however, wrongly held that Origen the Christian was originally a *pagan, misled by his extraordinary knowledge of Greek philosophy (see Dodds 31 n. 1); it is very unlikely that Ammonius remained a Christian for his entire life, as *Eusebius claims (followed by Langenbeck, JHS 77 [1957] 68-69, AAWG phil. hist. Kl. 69 [1967] 149-151 and his student K.O. Weber, Origenes der Neuplatoniker, Zetemata 27, Munich 1962, 38: see Dodds, 27 n. 1 and 31 and S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 225 n. 3). (4) The existence of the treatise On the Agreement Between Moses and Jesus, spoken of by Eusebius, might be explained by supposing that it was written either by Ammonius himself in his younger years, before his "apostasy" (see Schröder: ANRW II 36,1, p. 504, where Kettler is cited, in Epektasis, Mélanges patristiques offerte à Jean Danielou, Paris 1972, 330), or by a homonymous Christian author, with whom Eusebius confused Ammonius. (This latter hypothesis is favored by Dörrie 1955, 468; Dodds, 31 n. 1; Theiler, 1; and Quasten, Patrologia I, Turin 1967, 369; see also S. Lilla, 225 n. 3.) (5) The existence of a written collection of Ammonius's lectures is accepted by von Arnim, RhM 42 (1887) 283-284, Heinemann, Hermes 61 (1926) 3-5 and Theiler, 37-38, though denied by Zeller, Kleine Schriften II, 96-97 and Die Philos. der Griechen . . . III, 2, 504, Schwyzer, PWK XXI, 1, 478, Dörrie, 467-468 and Dodds, 25. (6) It cannot be ruled out that Ammonius had a strong interest in Eastern religions and esp. Persian religion, which he passed on to at least some of his disciples: the fact that Plotinus and Antoninus, both disciples of Ammonius, were interested in Persian religion does not seem to be pure coincidence. (7) In his lectures Ammonius aimed to reconcile *Plato's thought with that of *Aristotle, thus aligning himself with the "eclectic" tendency of Antiochus of Ascalon and *Middle Platonism, and taken up again by Plotinus and Porphyry. (8) In his lectures, from which the Enneads are derived, Plotinus continued to keep Ammonius's teaching in mind: Porphyry's statements have rightly been emphasized by von Arnim, (276), and Heinemann (5). Nor can Theiler's procedure be entirely rejected, i.e., the discovery of precise parallels between Hierocles and Origen the Christian, just as, given the close links that undoubtedly existed between Ammonius and *Pantaenus in the late 2nd and early 3rd c. (see above, 1), it is not entirely illegitimate to think that the numerous parallels observable between *Clement of Alexandria and Plotinus can be traced to the common source of the cultural milieus of Alexandria during that period; see on this R.E. Witt, CQ 25 (1931) 195-204 and S. Lilla, 4 n. 2.

Regarding the first principle, it cannot be established with certainty whether Ammonius identified this first principle with absolute being and intelligence (as Weber, Origenes der Neuplatoniker, 160; Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, 10,41; Schwyzer: PWK 21,1 col. 480; Dörrie: TRE 2,470; Lilla, Clement of Alex., 223-224; Baltes: Gnomon 56 [1984] 206-207) or considered it above being-intelligence, anticipating Plotinus (Schwyzer's thesis, Ammonios Sakkas, der Lehrer Plotins, Opladen 1983, 76-78, followed by Schröder: ANRW II 36 [1987] 517-522; thus in this new contribution Schwyrer modified his previous position, expounded in PWK 21,1). These two alternative solutions are not without foundation. On the one hand, Origen the Neoplatonist identified the highest principle with being-intelligence, as Proclus attests (Theol. Plat. II,4 [II, 31,9-11 fr. 7 Weber]); and according to Porphyry (Vit. Plot. 3 [4,24-32 Henry–Schwyzer]), in his treatise The King Is the Only Maker he published Ammonius's teaching, setting aside his pact with Herennius and Plotinus according to which the three disciples of Ammonius agreed not to reveal the teacher's doctrine. (Origen the Neoplatonist's conception of the first principle would thus reflect that of Ammonius.) On the other hand, Proclus, in expressing his surprise toward Origen the Neoplatonist, who had attended the same school as Plotinus, seems to consider the latter's doctrine of the One-good as superior to being-intelligence to be an inheritance of Ammonius, from which Origen the Neoplatonist had distanced himself (Theol. Plat. II, 4 [II, 31,4-9, 25-28 Saffrey-Westerink]). Moreover in Vit. Plot. 3 (5, 33-34 Henry-Schwyzer), Porphyry says that from the outset Plotinus's teaching was based on that of Ammonius. Though a precise position in favor of one or the other thesis is not possible due to a lack of explicit evidence on this point of Ammonius's teaching, it is preferable to suppose, with Dörrie: TRE 2, 470 and Baltes: Gnomon 56 (1984) 207, that the question of the relationship between the first principle and intelligence-being was debated in Ammonius's school but not resolved in a univocal and definitive way. (That this problem was the object of discussion in the Platonic schools of the time has been rightly shown by Whittaker regarding Origen, C. Cels. VII, 38: VChr 23 [1969] 92 = Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, XIII.) Plotinus and Origen the Neoplatonist seem to have taken different directions: while Origen remained more faithful to the letter of Ammonius's teaching without developing its implications, Plotinus seems to have taken to its extreme consequences what may have been implicit, but not yet clearly stated, in Ammonius's doctrine of the first principle (see esp. Dörrie: TRE 2, 470).

J. Freudenthal, PWK I, 2, 1863; H.R. Schwyzer, PWK XXI, 1, 477-481; Id., Ammonios Sakkas, der Lehrer Plotins, Opladen 1983; H. von Arnim, Quelle der Überlieferung uber Ammonius Sakkas: RhM 42 (1887) 276-285; E. Zeller, Ammonius Sakkas und Plotin, AGPh (1894) 295-312 (= Kleine Schriften II, Berlin 1910, 91-107); Die Philosophie der Griechen . . . III, 2, Leipzig [4]1903, 500-512; F. Heinemann, Ammonius Sakkas und der Ursprung des Neuplatonismus: Hermes 61 (1926) 1-27; R.E. Witt, The Hellenism of Clement of Alexandria: CQ 25 (1931) 195; E. Seeberg, Ammonios Sakkas: ZKG 60 (1941) 136-140; H. Dörrie, Ammonios, der Lehrer Plotins: Hermes 83 (1955) 439-477 (= Platonica minora, Munich 1976, 324-360); Id.: TRE 2, 453-471; H. Langerbeck, The Philosophy of Ammonius Saccas: JHS 77 (1957) 67-74; Id., Die Verbindung aristotelischer und christlicher Elemente in der Philosophie des Ammonius Saccas: AAWG phil. inst. Kl. 69 (1967) 146-166; E.R. Dodds, Numenius and Ammonius, in Les sources de Plotin, Geneva 1960, 24-32; K.O. Weber, Origenes der Neuplatoniker: Zetemata 2, Munich 1962, passim; W. Theiler, Ammonius der Lehrerdes Origenes, in Forschungen z. Neoplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 1-45; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 4-5, 223-226; F.H. Kettler, War Origenes Schüler des Ammonios Sakkas?, in Epektasis, Mélanges patristiques offerts à J. Daniélou, Paris 1972, 327-334; Id., Ammonius Sakkas und Porphyrius, in Kerygma und Logos, Festschrift C. Andresen, Göttingen 1979, 322-328; R. Goulet, Porphyrius, Ammonius, les deux Origène et les autres: RHPhR 57 (1977) 471-495; M. Baltes, recension of Schwyzer, Ammonius Sakkas: Gnomon 56 (1984) 204-207; F.M. Schröder, Ammonios Sakkas: ANRW II 36,1, Berlin-New York 1987, 483-526 (detailed presentation of the entire question regarding Ammonius, with discussion of the theses of earlier scholars; complete bibl., 523-526). E. Elorduy's works on Ammonius Saccas—whom he identified with ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite, a hypothesis that has found no acceptance—are listed by H. Dörrie: Hermes 83 (1955) 440 nn. 2 and 3.

S. Lilla

AMMONIUS the ALEXANDRIAN (5th-6th c.). We know of an Ammonius the *Alexandrian, an exegete who wrote commentaries on the book of Daniel (PG 85, 1364-1381; 1823-1826) and the gospel of John (PG 85, 1392-1524), but the data on him is insufficient for a precise identification. He has tended to be identified with the presbyter and bursar of the Alexandrian church who subscribed a letter to the emperor *Leo in defense of the Council of Chalcedon against Timotheos Ailurus. In the catenae on John he is called "presbyter." Since Ammonius the Alexandrian depends on 4th- and 5th-c. authors, Reuss identifies him with the other *Ammonius of Alexandria (CPG 6982), cited by *Anastasius the Sinaite and thus dated the first half of the 6th c. Others, such as Elorduy, have thought to identify him with the philosopher *Ammonius Saccas, thus 3rd c. rather than 6th c., although this opinion is not commonly accepted. The exegete seems to have lived 5th-6th c. Besides the two books cited, only fragments of other biblical commentaries survive: on the Psalms (PG 85, 1361-1364), on Lk and Acts (PG 85, 1524-1608), on 1 Cor, and on 1 Pet (PG 85, 1608-1609); the fragments on Mt are spurious (PG 85, 1381-1392).

CPG 5500-5509; Th. Zahn, Der Exeget Ammonius und andere Ammonius: ZKG 38 (1920) 1-22; 311-336; J. Reuss, Der Exeget Ammonius und die Fragmente seines Matthäus- und Iohannes-Kommentars: Biblica 22 (1941) 13-20; Id., Iohannes-Kommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, TU 89, Berlin 1965, 196-358; Id., Der Presbyter Ammonius von Alexandrien und sein Kommentar sum Iohannes-Evangelium: Biblica 44 (1963) 159-170; R. Devreesse: DBS 1,1137; 1158; 1174; 1203; 1228; Bardenhewer, 83-86; E. Elorduy, Ammonio en las catenas: Estudios Ecl. 44 (1969) 383-432; H. Dörrie, Ammonios, der Lehrer Plotins: Hermes 83 (1955) 439-477, esp. 471ff.; LACL 29.

A. Di Berardino

AMMONIUS the MONK (4th c.). Our only knowledge of Ammonius is that he was a *Coptic *monk who, returning from a pilgrimage to *Jerusalem, spent several years in the desert of *Sinai, where he was an eyewitness to and also heard further accounts of the massacres of monks at Raithu and in the Sinai committed by the *Saracens, the Blemmyes and other barbarians. He wrote an account, in some ways disturbing, which has reached us in a Greek translation and also in a translation from the Greek into Palestinian Christian Aramaic; there are also *Syriac, Georgian and Arabic versions. He says that these events took place during the *patriarchate of Peter of Alexandria, presumably *Peter II (373–380), and are commemorated 28 December. But they may be the same events (by a comparison of the names: Isaiah, Sabbas, Moses, etc.) that the monks of Sinai and Raithou commemorated 14 January in the Byzantine calendar.

CPG 6088 (for all details of the versions); Greek: F. Combefis, Illustrium Christi martyrum lecti triumphi, Paris 1660, 88-132;

D.G. Tsami - K.A. Katsani, Τὸ Μαρτυρολόγιον τοῦ Σινᾶ, Thessalonica 1989, 194-235; Palestinian Christian Aramaic: A. Smith Lewis, The Forty Martyrs of the Sinai Desert and the Story of Eulogios, Cambridge 1912, 1-54 (numbering from the end); C. Müller-Kessler and M. Sokoloff, The Forty Martyrs of the Sinai Desert, Eulogios the Stone-Cutter, and Anastasia (A Corpus of Christian Palestinian Aramaic III), Groningen 1996. Translations: Eng.: (from the Palestinian Christian Aramaic) A. Smith Lewis, op. cit., 1-14 (numbering from the beginning); C. Müller-Kessler - M. Sokoloff, op. cit.; R. Devreesse, Le christianisme dans la péninsule sinaïtique, des origines à l'arrivée des musulmans: RBi 49 (1940) 205-223, special. 216-220; P. Mayerson, The Ammonius Narrative: Bedouin and Blemmye Attacks in Sinai, in The Bible World: Essays in Honor of Cyrus H. Gordon, New York 1980, 133-148; I. Shahid, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, Washington 1984, 303-319; P.-L. Gatier, Les traditions et l'histoire du Sinai du IVᵉ au VIIᵉ siècle, in T. Fahd (ed.), L'Arabie préislamique et son environnement historique et culturel, Leiden 1989, 499-523, esp. 510-517.

A. Louth

AMPHILOCHIUS of Iconium (b. 340/345, bishop 373/374–398/404). A rhetorician at *Constantinople before becoming bishop. Little inclined to theological speculation, he pursued vigorous antiheretical activity, participating at the Council of Constantinople (381) and at some local synods against the *Macedonians (Iconium, 376) and *Messalians (Side, 383). It seems he enjoyed a certain fame after his death, testified to by the Eraniste and other old *florilegia, which cite his *christological homilies. Besides some fragments, however, we have only a few works directly from him: a treatise Contra haereticos (against the Messalians), an Epistola synodalis, a profession of faith, some homilies (IV-VI and VIII-IX in Datema's edition and the *Syriac edition published by Moss) and a short, well-composed didactic poem, the Iambi ad Seleucum. A number of spurious works represent a late homage to his fame: homily I (CPG 3231), author unknown; homilies II-III (by *Leontius of Costantinople), a *Coptic homily on Abraham's sacrifice (CPG 3240), a series of virtually unpublished *ascetic homilies (CPG 3250), and a cycle of the life and miracles of St. *Basil (CPG 3252-3254). Attribution to Amphilochius of homilies VII (ps.-Chrysostom) and In mesopentecosten is due to a transmission error.

CPG 3230-3254; PG 39; DHGE 2, 1346-1348; DTC 1, 1121-1123; BS 1, 1182-1183; C. Datema, Amphilochii Iconiensis opera . . . (CCG 3), Turnhout-Leuven 1978; C. Moss, S. Amphilochius of Iconium on John 14, 28 . . . : Muséon 43 (1930) 317-364; E. Oberg, Amphilochii Iconiensis Iambi ad Seleucum (PTS 9), Berlin 1969; E. Oberg, Das Lehrgedicht des Amphilochios von Ikonion: JbAC 6 (1973) 67-97; M. Breydy, Vestiges méconnnus des Pères Cappadociens en syriaque. Deux fragments oubliés de la profession de foi d'Amphiloque: PdO 11 (1983) 349-361; H.R. Drobner, Die Karsamstagspredigt des Amphilochius von Ikonium (CPG II 3235). Einleitung, rhetorische Textanalyse und Übersetzung: S.-T. Teodorsson (ed.), Greek and Latin Studies in Memory of Cajus Fabricius (Studia Graeca et Latina Gothoburgensia), Göteborg 1990, 1-23; B. Gain, *Note sur l'*Epistula Synodalis (CPG, t. II, No 3243) d'Amphiloque d'Iconium: SE 27 (1984) 19-25; H.R. Drobner, Bibliographia Amphilochiana: Theologie und Glaube 77 (1987) 14-35, 179-196; K. Holl, Amphilochius von Ikonium in seinem Verhältnis zu den grossen Kappadoziern, Tübingen-Leipzig 1904 [repr. Darmstadt 1969]; G. Ficker, Amphilochiana. I, Leipzig 1906; H. Gstrein, Amphilochios von Ikonion. Der vierte "Grosse Kappadokier": JÖBG 15 (1966) 133-145; S.J. Voicu, L'edizione di Anfilochio nel CChG: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 359-364; Id., Dieci omelie di Leonzio di Costantinopoli: Studi sull'oriente Christian 5 (2001) 1, 165-190 [hom. II-III]; Id., Tracce origeniane in uno Pseudocrisostomo Cappadoce, in Origene e l'alessandrinismo cappadoce (III-IV secolo). Atti del V Convegno del Gruppo Italiano di ricerca su "Origen and la tradizione alessandrina" (Bari, 20-22 September 2000), eds. M. Girardi and M. Marin, Bari 2002, 333-346 [hom. VII]; J. Wortley, An Unpublished Legend of an Unworthy Priest and Saint Basil the Great: AB 97 (1979) 363-371; M. Bonnet, La pécheresse dans la IVème homélie d'Amphilochios d'Iconium, in Figures du Nouveau Testament chez les Pères (Cahiers de Biblia Patristica 3), Strasbourg 1991, 197-208; M. Bonnet, Les Psaumes dans les homélies d'Amphilochios d'Iconium: Le Psautier chez les Pères (Cahiers de Biblia Patristica 4), Strasbourg 1994, 135-165 [mixes spurious and authentic texts]; J.H. Barkhuizen, Amphilochius of Iconium: Homily 1 "On the Nativity": Acta Patristica et Byzantina 12 (2001) 1-23.

S.J. Voicu

AMPHILOCHIUS of Side (d. 458). Bishop of Side (or Sida) in Pamphylia from at least 426–458; participated in the Council of *Ephesus (431), in which he caused some decrees against the *Messalians to be issued. While he was clear on the condemnation of *Nestorius, his position on the question of *Eutyches wavered. Favorable toward Eutyches during the "latrocinium of Ephesus" of 449, he retracted his own ideas at the Council of *Chalcedon (451). He wrote many letters, among them an Epistula ad Leonem Imperatorem (PG 77, 1515-1516; PG 86, 1841b, to *Leontius of Byzantium), of which we have only fragments, and in which he again changed his mind and described himself as against the Council of Chalcedon; translations are preserved in *Syriac (cited by Michael the Syrian, see J.-B. Chabot, Chronica minora, Paris 1901, vol. II, 145-148) and Ethiopian (see H. Zotenberg, Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale, vol. 24/1, Paris 1893, ²1935).

CPG 5965; J.B. Lightfoot, DCB 1, 107, n. 2; Patrologia V, 31-32; C.R. Henry, The Chronicle of John Bishop of Nikiu, London 1916, 110-111.

K. den Biesen

AMPHION of Epiphania (d. after 325). Also known as Alerion or Amphitryon, bishop of Epiphania in *Cilicia, saint, feast 12 June. He particpated at the Councils of *Ancyra, *Neocaesarea (314) and *Nicaea (325) as a defender of orthodoxy. He wrote anti-*Arian works (Athan., Ep. Aeg. Lyb., PG 25, 557). Not to be confused with *Amphion of Nicomedia.

E. Prinzivalli

AMPHION of Nicomedia (d. after 338). Twice successor of *Eusebius as bishop of *Nicomedia; the first time, at the end of 325 (Socr., HE I, 14; Soz., HE 1,21) after Eusebius's deposition, until ca. 328; the second, after Eusebius was elected bishop of *Constantinople (338).

E. Prinzivalli

AMULETS. In Greek phylaktērion ("something that protects") or periamma or periapton ("something hung within"—around the neck or arm or leg), in Latin phylacterium or amuletum. According to the belief of those who used them, an amulet was an object endowed with a power—in our terms a magic power—which protected from misfortune, sickness, the evil eye and evil spirits. Ordinarily they were used to protect people; some, however, were thought to protect a house or even a city. Amulets were produced primarily by specialized artisans out of a variety of materials: hard stone, amber, coral, metals, wood, animal bones, fragments of clay pottery, parchment and papyrus. Magic power was attributed to some of these materials themselves (e.g., agate, coral, amber). Other than the material, what made amulets effective were images carved or painted on them (gods or demons, often zoomorphic), and esp. inscriptions containing, besides apotropaic formulas, meaningless series of letters and/or names of gods.

Amulets were used from time immemorial, in various cultures. Many pious Jews, respecting the law prohibiting the depiction of human beings or animals or pronouncing of the name of God, would wear as an amulet a small sack or box containing a piece of parchment or papyrus with biblical verses written on them. The *Talmud mentions the practice of wearing amulets, esp. while at prayer, on the forehead and on the inside of the left arm, at the level of the heart. In the period of the *Roman Empire, texts carved or painted on pagan amulets often contained elements taken from the Jewish religion—names of God and of archangels, angels and seraphim. This was because in antiquity the Jews were known as powerful magicians.

In a special category of amulets were so-called *gnostic gems. These amulets were made of jasper (esp. green jasper with vivid red marks) or hematite (so-called bloodstone). Images of demons and gods, clearly syncretistic, were carved on their surface, as well as inscriptions, mostly in Greek, containing meaningless words and the names of gods. Often the God of the OT is mentioned by the name Iao (a Gr. spelling for YHWH) or Sabaoth, or there is a depiction of the Egyptian god Khmun in the form of a serpent with a lion's head, or Hecate, or Serapis accompanied by Cerberus. The relationship of these gnostic gems with gnosticism itself is often unclear.

The ecclesiastical authorities, synods and fathers of the church disapproved of the use of amulets. Many Christians used them regardless, continuing a centuries-old tradition. Used esp. were amulets with biblical verses written on them (passages of psalms, esp. Ps 90; Is 6:3; the prologue of John's gospel, the Our Father [see Lord's Prayer]). Often (but not necessarily) magic signs, names of demons, etc. were inserted within a verse. The presence of these elements makes it difficult in many cases to establish whether a particular amulet was used by a pagan, a Jew or a Christian.

Large numbers of amulets consisting of pieces of parchment or papyrus with writing on them have been found in Egypt, not because the use of this type of amulet was a specifically Egyptian practice, but because Egypt's climate favored the preservation of these materials.

The link between amulets and magic notwithstanding, the fact that many Christians wore pieces of parchment or papyrus with biblical verses can be considered a manifestation of a personal devotion not opposed to the Christian faith. The boundary between religion and magic was blurred in such cases.

B. Bonner, Studies in Magical Amulets Chiefly Graeco-Egyptian, Ann Arbor 1950; F. Eckstein - J.H. Waszink, RAC 1 (1950) 397-411; J. van Haelst, Catalogue des papyrus littéraires juifs et chrétiens, Paris 1976; M. Naldini, Testimonianze cristiane negli amuleti greco-egizi, Augustinianum 21 (1981) 179-188; J.G. Gager, Curse Tablets and Binding Spells from the Ancient World, New York - Oxford 1992, 218-282.

E. Wipszycka

ANACLETUS (or Cletus), pope (76–88). *Irenaeus of Lyons and *Eusebius of Caesarea, citing the oldest list of the bishops of *Rome (Adv. haer. III, 3; HE V, 6. 1; see III, 2 and 4), name Anacletus as Peter's second successor, after *Linus and before *Clement. His pontificate is thought to have been from 76–88, but the dates are uncertain. The complicated question concerning the identification of Anacletus with Cletus—that is, whether it is one or two persons—goes back to the Roman Martyrology. That document separates them, putting Anacletus's feast on 13 July and Cletus's on 26 April; both are presented as *martyrs. Baronius agrees with this interpretation and these dates. More recently the historical basis for their identification has been demonstrated (L. Duchesne), based on the testimony of Irenaeus and Eusebius. For the LP, Anacletus was a Greek, born at Athens, and was possibly Peter's coadjutor in the government of the Church of Rome. In 79 he was an eyewitness to the eruption of Vesuvius. He suffered under *Domitian's persecution, dying a martyr 13 July, and was buried near Peter's tomb, which Anacletus himself had built and embellished in Peter's honor.

LP I, 125; Caesar Baronius, Annales ecclesiastici, I, Rome 1588, 639 and 684 (Cletus); II, ibid., 1590, 20 and 48 (Anacletus); LTK³ 1, 573-574; BS I, 1032-36 (F. Caraffa - D. Valori); EPapi I, 197-199 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

ANAMNESIS (Gk ἀνάμνησις). This term, which originally meant "memory, commemoration," in *liturgical use assumed the technical meaning of a commemoration of the great moments of Christ's saving passion, in reference to the charge given to the disciples at the Last Supper—according to 1 Cor 11:24-25 and Lk 22:19—"Whenever you do this, do it in memory of me." With K. Rahner (Petit dictionnaire de théologie catholique, fr. ed. 1970, 24), we can technically define anamnesis as: "a celebration that makes present an event of salvation history, so as to take hold of the hearts and minds of those participating in the rite." The oldest surviving liturgical formulary, that of the Apostolic Tradition,* had already clarified the two essential moments of this salvific work—death and resurrection—so as to directly link them to the offering of the bread and chalice as "thanksgiving" (eucharistia), that we might be admitted to the fulfillment of a priestly service (ἱερατεύειν, a term somewhat weakened in the Latin rendering, ministrare). The Roman canon, attested from the late 4th c. by Ambrose's De Sacramentis (IV, 27), also mentions the *descent into hell and the glorious *ascension. Some see a Syrian origin in these developments, as with the reference to the passion rather than the death. In any case, it was in fact in *Syria that these formularies had their greatest development. The old *Mesopotamian *anaphora of the apostles (Addai and Mari) evoked "this great, terrible, holy, living and divine mystery of the passion, death, burial and resurrection of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." In the last decades of the 4th c. the compiler of the Apostolic Constitutions substituted a long anaphora for the sober scheme of the Apostolic Tradition, unfolding all of the steps of the economy of salvation, beginning with creation. The account of the institution of the Eucharist ends with the Pauline declaration: "Every time you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim the death of the Lord, until he comes." The formula of the anamnesis continues: "Mindful of his passion, death, resurrection from the dead, return into heaven and future second coming, when he will reappear with glory and power to judge the living and the dead, rendering to each one according to his works, we offer to You, King and God, in conformity with your commandment, this bread and this chalice; we thank you, through them, for considering us worthy to stand before you and exercise the priesthood" (Apos. Con. VIII, 38). The emphasis given here to the *eschatological perspective is also found in the various recensions of the Jerusalem anaphora of St. James, and subsequently in all the *Syriac and Egyptian anaphoras, as well as in some Spanish "Post Pridie's."

A more or less explicit response to Christ's instruction to renew the essential acts of his last meal in his memory (εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν), the formularies that have been called "anamnesis"—in fact rather late—risk focusing our attention too exclusively. In fact it is the entire eucharistic rite, and more particularly the great prayer in the form of thanksgiving (eucharistia)—the anaphora as it is understood in Eastern liturgies—which constitutes the memorial, in all the semantic richness of the biblical Hebrew terms azkarah and zikkaron. The first designates the sacrificial offering of flour, oil and incense, "that the priest will burn on the altar as a memorial" (Lev 2:1-2). The latter term characterizes the passover celebration: "This day shall be for you a memorial" (Ex 12:14). The resonances of this Passover memorial have been continually enriched, now encompassing the whole breadth of the plan of salvation. The fact is certainly not without significance that the Greek liturgical tradition has preferred the term θυσία (literally: "what goes up in smoke") to indicate the sacrificial character of the eucharistic celebration, and that Syrian Christians would call it corban, i.e., "oblation." The anaphoras of *Alexandria (St. *Mark, Gk, and St. Cyril, *Coptic), *Jerusalem (St. James and its Syrian derivatives) and *Cappadocia (St. *Basil of Caesarea and its various recensions) were elaborated within the global perspective of this plan of salvation, beginning from the work of creation and moving, through the various stages of the old covenant, toward its decisive manifestation in the *incarnation of Christ and his sacrificial offering on the *cross, which accomplished his passing-over (pascha) to the Father, the firstfruits of what will be definitively fulfilled by the ecclesial community at the time of the final coming (see Second Coming of Christ). It is thus the whole formulary of the anaphora that should be considered an anamnesis in the full sense of the word. The patristic commentaries, esp. those in Greek, love to draw out the vastness of these perspectives. In the West, until the contemporary liturgical reform, attention has generally been given to those aspects of the anamnesis referring to Christ, whereas the biblical conception of the "memorial" as an actuation of the plan of salvation, at least in its most characteristic moments, has been too little emphasized. During and since the Middle Ages, deplorable translations have been derived from it which have weighed heavily on the sacrificial interpretation of the Eucharist. It will remain one of Odo Casel's greatest merits, even if some of his interpretations are not entirely convincing, to have collected and commented on the principal patristic and liturgical evidence.

DACL 1, 1880-92; O. Casel, Das Mysteriengedächtnis der Messliturgie im Lichte der Tradition: JLW 6 (1926) 113-204 (Fr. tr. 1962); J.M. Hanssen, Institutiones liturgicae de ritibus orientalibus, III, Rome 1932, 1316-1322; C. Giraudo, L'eucaristia per la Chiesa, Rome-Brescia 1989; LTK³ 1,589-593; 4,338-339; B. Neunheuser, Memoriale, in Liturgia, eds. D. Sartore, A.M. Triacca, C. Cibien, Cinisello B. 2001, 1163-1179.

I.H. Dalmais

ANANIAS (apocryphal). *Damascus Christian who healed St. *Paul (Acts 9:10-19; 22:12-16). A Byzantine tradition makes him one of the Seventy and presents him as the first bishop of Damascus and evangelizer of Euleutheropolis, where he was stoned (1 Oct 70). The Apostolic Constitutions make him a layman (VIII,46,17), *Oecumenius, a deacon (PG 118, 169), *Augustine, a priest. Symeon Metaphrastes recounts his life and martyrdom (PG 114, 1001-1010).

F. Bovon - E. Zachariades-Holmberg, The Martyrdom of the Holy Apostle Ananias (BHG 75y), in F. Bovon et al., The Apocryphal Acts of Apostles, Cambridge, MA 1999, 309-331 (versio graeca); Codex apocryphus and manuscriptis Ucraino-Russicis collectus, I. Franko, 1-5, Lvovi 1896ff., 3, 214-217 (two Slavic versions); L. Clugnet, DHGE 2 (1914) 1431-1432; BS 1 (1961) 1037; LCIK 5 (1973) 129, F. Halkin, Ananie de Damas: Dyptycha 4 (1986) 178-184.

M. Starowieyski

ANANIAS and SAPPHIRA (iconography). The pair is rarely depicted (Acts 5:1-11). On the mid-4th-c. Brescia reliquary (Kollwitz, pl. 2), Peter sits on the left in tunic and pallium, interrogating Sapphira, who stands; a sack of money is between them; on the right four young men carry Ananias's corpse. On the basis of this depiction, the scene may be identifiable on a fragment of a *sarcophagus of Callisto (ca. 370–400; Ws 145,2). The scene also appears on a fragment preserved in the Calvet Museum at Avignon (Ws 145,3), on which two youths are depicted (only one remains) carrying a dead body.

DACL 1, 1896ff.; EC 1, 1143ff.; LCI 1, 166 (s.v. Petrus); J. Kollwitz, Die Lipsanothek von Brescia, Berlin-Leipzig 1933; F.W. Deichmann, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage. Erster Band: Rom und Ostia, (eds.) G. Bovini and H. Brandenburg, Wiesbaden 1967; A. Monachesi, s.v. Anania e Saffira, in Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, (ed.) F. Bisconti, Rome 2000, 104-105.

D. Calcagnini

ANANIAS of Shirak or Anania Shirakatsi (d. 670). *Armenian author, born in the region of Shirak ca. 600 and died 670; in the Armenian tradition is also called Anania Anetsi, from Ani, the name of the old chief city of Shirak. Renowned for his mathematical and philosophical knowledge, gained at Theodosiopolis, *Constantinople, Trebizond and elsewhere, he wrote numerous works on mathematical and astronomical questions. Thus he is also known as Metzn (the Great) Anania or Anania Hamarogh (the Mathematician). The *catholicos Anastasius (662–667) charged him with drawing up a new calendar, a reform not realized until the 12th c. He also wrote an autobiography, a chronicle and some brief theological treatises. The geographical description of the world previously attributed to *Moses of Khorene is now attributed to him.

DHGE 2, 1432-1433; Gr. Patcanian, St. Petersburg 1877: editions of the surviving works; F. Conybeare published a tr. of Sulla manifestazione di nostro Signore e Salvatore a Natale ed Epifania in Expositor (1896) 311-337, and of Sulla Pasqua del Signore in ByzZ (1897) 572; G. Zarphanalian, Histoire de l'ancienne littérature arménienne du IVe au XIVe siècle, Venice 1897, 456-465 (in Armenian); G. Broutian, "Persian and Arabic Calendars as Presented by Anania Shirkatsi [sic]," Tarikh-e Elm 8 (2009) 1-17.

K. den Biesen

ANAPHORA

I. Introduction - II. The families of anaphoras - III. Pattern of the Syro-Eastern anaphora - IV. Pattern of the Antiochene or Syro-Occidental anaphora - V. Pattern of the Alexandrian anaphora - VI. Observations.

I. Introduction. In the etymology of anaphora we find the double meaning of announcement, to bring news to someone, and that of an offering lifted up (ἀνὰ-φέρω) for the benefit of the community. The term was used by both Christians and non-Christians. The Christian sense, as in Heb 13:15 and 1 Pet 2:5, indicates the offering of a religious sacrifice. Anaphora includes four principal meanings: (1) the act of offering the *Eucharist; (2) the formulary employed in the eucharistic act; (3) the material offered in the Eucharist (equivalent to προσφορά); and (4) the *liturgical veil that covers the eucharistic species. The meaning most used in a technical sense in liturgical language is anaphora as the priestly eucharistic prayer. Christian antiquity found the term so incisive that liturgies celebrated in languages other than Greek did not translate it. *Syrians, *Copts and *Ethiopians, while using Semitic words like qûddāsā or qûrbānā, continued to use annafūtra or anfûra, a sign of continuity of archaizing terminology. The eucharistic formularies of the Syro-Occidental church call anaphora that part of the Eucharist from the kiss of peace until Communion. The Ethiopian church, having a particular and eclectic tradition, designates the entire eucharistic liturgy anaphora. For the others, the anaphora extends from the kiss of peace until the final doxology of the eucharistic prayer proper. The term anaphora emerged historically as a substitute for early Christian terms such as Eucharist, eulogia and "breaking of the bread," and it deepens the idea of the offering as a sacrifice. In the verb anapherō eucharistic theology emphasizes the idea of elevation-ascension (Apos. Con. 2,58; Funk 161), as the sacrificial moment to be lived in the fear of God: "Let us stand with devotion, let us stand with fear, mindful to offer in peace the holy oblation," as in the admonition immediately before the anaphora of St. *John Chrysostom. Before the 9th c., when the priest pronounced this introduction he would stress its importance by raising the great veil placed over the paten and chalice. In a homily St. John Chrysostom refers incidentally to the importance of this anaphoric moment: "The moment is solemn and grave, which is why we are asked to look our best, as befits men who are before God in fear and trembling" (Hom. IV contra Anom., PG 48, 734).

II. The families of anaphoras. The fixing of the priestly eucharistic prayers occurred late, with the free improvisation of the archaic period being succeeded by the fixing of a normative text, more or less invariable. The increase of *heresies and fear that the tradition would be altered were important factors in the constitution and evolution of anaphoras. Their great number, richness and variety of content show that they come from times of liturgical freedom and creativity; this process did not culminate in anarchy but in the unity of inspiration of the great anaphorical compositions. Anaphoras form liturgical families, not to be confused with the homonymous institutional or confessional families: e.g., the *Alexandrian or St. *Mark anaphora is virtually unused in the *patriarchate of *Alexandria; the churches of the *Byzantine branch use the anaphora of St. *Basil of Caesarea and St. John Chrysostom, *Antiochene in structure; the Ethiopian church currently uses the Syriac anaphora adopted during the medieval liturgical reforms carried out under the influence of the Syrian church. The most commonly accepted classification includes three families: (1) Syro-Eastern (improperly called Chaldean), (2) Antiochene (or Syro-Western) and (3) Alexandrian.

Other classifications have been proposed by L. Ligier and H. Fuchs. L. Ligier: (1) anaphoras with simple structure, which lack the celebration of the being of God and consider essentially the economy of Christ (Traditio Apost., anaphora of St. *Epiphanius); (2) anaphoras with complex structure on a line evolving from celebratory praise to the historical *anamnesis of salvation, a pattern related to that of St. *Justin Martyr, where the eucharistic prayer included the ainos, doxa, hymnoi and pompai directly joined to the eucharistiai, without the interruption of the sanctus. H. Fuchs, in the introduction to Die Anaphora des monophysitischen Patriarchen Johannan I (LQF 9, Münster 1926, IX-LXXVI), prefers a complex classification by author, almost all pseudepigraphical: (1) Greek: from the 6th-7th c. (Testimony of the Twelve Apostles;* St. *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Severus of Antioch etc.), from the 8th-10th c. (Pope St. Celestine, Pope St. Julius etc.) and after the 10th c. (St. Mark the evangelist, St. Peter prince of the apostles, etc.); (2) Syrian: pre-11th c. (*Jacob of Sarug) and post-11th c. (Dionysius bar-Salibi, John XIV the Scribe, John of Haurân, etc.).

III. Pattern of the Syro-Eastern anaphora. (1) Dialogue and theological oration before the sanctus; (2) hymn of the sanctus with related introduction and response of the people aloud (Qanona); (3) prayer after the sanctus with proper doxology (Qanona) and response, "Amen"; (4) account of the eucharistic institution (NB: this is lacking in some old documents such as the anaphora of Addai and Mari and in the remains of the 6th-c. anaphora in the MS of the Brit. Mus. Add. 14669); (5) intercession, i.e., offering and commemoration of the living and the dead; (6) anamnesis; (7) epiclesis; (8) final doxology.

Of this type are the anaphora of the apostles Addai and Mari, of St. *Theodore of Mopsuestia, of *Nestorius, the *Malabar version of the anaphora of the apostles Addai and Mari, and the *Maronite anaphora of St. Peter the apostle. The oldest is in the archaic nucleus of the anaphora of Addai and Mari, in which the basic model is the Jewish ritual meal, with the intercessions-commemorations grouped together, not after, but before the epiclesis. The problem of the absence of the account of institution can be explained analogously: it is found in the anaphora of the same family (Nestorius, Theodore of Mopsuestia) and is used in the historical practice of the Nestorian church. From medieval liturgical commentaries we deduce that it was obligatory to say it. B. Botte advances the hypothesis of recital from memory by celebrants. The theology of the divine name predominates, associated with the oikonomia/ dispensatio of Christ; the result is a general interpretation of the Eucharist, not so much a *gnostic-type onomatological speculation as a glorification of the name. Later redactions add *trinitarian clarifications, esp. in the doxologies. There is no specific sacrificial terminology, but the concept of memorial of the mystery (raza) turns on Christ's passion; in Addai and Mari the eucharistic memorial is called typus in accordance with the sacrificial implication of the Jewish memorial, i.e., an invocation of God, his name and his deeds in the hope that they would be repeated: "And we also, O Lord, your frail, weak and infirm servants, who are gathered in your name and stand before you at this moment, we also have received the type [τύπος] that comes from you, rejoicing to glorify, exalt, commemorate and celebrate this great, terrible, holy, life-giving and divine mystery of the passion, death, burial and *resurrection of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (Prex euch. 380).

IV. Pattern of the Antiochene or Syro-Occidental anaphora. (1) Dialogue, theological prayer of praise and thanksgiving with introduction to the sanctus; (2) *christological prayer after the sanctus with the account of institution and the praeceptum; (3) anamnesis; (4) *epiclesis; (5) intercessions; (6) doxology.

Belonging to this type are (1) the texts preserved in the liturgical commentaries of the 4th and 5th c. (*mystagogical *catecheses of St. *Cyril of Jerusalem, 6th mystagogical catechesis of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Testamentum Domini, Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite); (2) the Byzantine anaphoras of St. Basil, St. John Chrysostom, St. James and St. *Epiphanius of Salamis; (3) the Syro-Antiochene anaphoras of the 12 apostles, St. James brother of the Lord, St. *Timothy of Alexandria, *Severus of Antioch, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, St. *Ignatius of Antioch, John of Bostra, Pope St. *Clement, Pope St. *Julius, *Eustathius of Antioch; (4) the Maronite anaphoras of St. *Sixtus and of the Holy Roman Church; (5) the Armenian anaphoras of St. *Athanasius of Alexandria, St. *Gregory of Nazianzus, Sahag (James), St. *Cyril of Alexandria, St. James brother of the Lord; (6) the Egyptian anaphoras of St. Basil and of St. *Gregory of Nazianzus. In various anaphoras the initial dialogue is based on the greeting taken from 2 Cor 13:13: "The grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ . . ." and marks the idea that the eucharistic communion signifies union with the Holy Trinity. The prayer before the sanctus presents a true theologia, i.e., a dense discourse celebrating the holiness of the works of God the Father. The language is both cataphatic (praise, blessing of the one true God) and apophatic; the anaphora of St. Basil is the absolute masterpiece of apophatic theology, recognizing its incapacity to expound the divine marvels (διηγήσασθαι πάντα τὰ θαυμάσιά σου, Prex euch. 230) because God has no comparison with human models; he is without beginning, invisible, incomprehensible, illimitable, immutable (ἄναρχος, ἀόρατος, ἀκατάληπτος, ἀπερίγραπτος, ἀναλλοίωτος, Prex euch. 232). The christological part after the sanctus celebrates the association of the people with the angelic, celestial liturgy. With overtones of wisdom language and anti-*Arian or pneumatological doctrinal clarifications (some of which are later interpolations), the redemption hinted at in the theological prayer before the sanctus is made plain, brought about by the only-begotten Son, who must bear witness in the world to the surpassing love of God. The explicit mandate (ἐντολή) of this economy, contained in the narration of the institution, is lacking in the anaphora of St. John Chrysostom, which instead inserts it in the anamnesis in indirect speech. The economy of Christ is realized in the Holy Spirit; the anaphora of St. James extends the institution as far as this idea: "Having shown the chalice to you, God and Father, he gave thanks, blessed, sanctified, filled with the Holy Spirit . . ." (Prex euch. 248). The anamnesis proper sums up all the preceding anamneses, setting them before the gifts offered and present (προκείμενα); besides the various moments of the sacred triduum and the *parousia, the anaphora of Timothy of Alexandria also commemorates the eternal generation of the Son by the Father and the birth according to the flesh (Prex euch. 279). The epiclesis asks for the coming of the Spirit, first on the present faithful, then on the gifts. The invocation of the Spirit is a right (διὰ τοῦτο) deriving from the eucharistic celebration, according to the anaphora of St. Basil (Prex euch. 236), despite the unworthiness of all, including ministers. In the Holy Spirit the bread and the wine are revealed as the true icon (ἀντίτυπον, Prex euch. 236) of the Son; for the church a new Pentecost is brought about and the fullness of the kingdom is proclaimed under the sign of judgment (epiclesis of the anaphora of St. John Chrysostom, Prex euch 226). The intercession adds the dimensions of *anthropology and *eschatology to the progression *theology–*Christology–*pneumatology. The *ecclesiology expressed in the initial dialogue and in the idea of human unworthiness is joined to the sacrifice of Christ in the near certainty of not being rejected. The Eucharist performed in the church reshapes the visible church, which by concentric circles is joined to the invisible church, with Mary the Mother of God and with the saints. The thanksgiving, praise and intercession culminate in the final doxology: "And allow us to glorify and sing hymns with one voice and one heart to your most honorable and magnificent name, Father, Son and Holy Spirit" (anaphora of St. John Chrysostom, Prex euch. 229). The impetus to offer petitions is transformed into total praise, reaching here its logical completion.

V. Pattern of the Alexandrian anaphora. (1) Dialogue and prayer before the sanctus; (2) commemoration of the saints, the dead and the living; (3) sanctus with introduction; (4) prayer after the sanctus with introduction to the epiclesis (or first epiclesis); (5) account of institution; (6) anamnesis and offering of the gifts; (7) epiclesis (proper, or second epiclesis); (8) doxology.

To this type belong: (1) the Greek Egyptian anaphora of St. Mark the evangelist, and that also of St. Mark in papyrus fragments Strasburg gr. 254 and Manchester J. Rylands Libr. 465, the Dêr Balyzeh fragment and those of the Euchology of Serapion; (2) the Coptic anaphora of St. Cyril of Alexandria, the Louvain fr. Copt. 27, the Coptic ostrakon of the British Museum 4; (3) the Ethiopian anaphora of the holy apostolic fathers, our Lord Jesus Christ, St. John Boanerges, Mary the Virgin (Horicos of Bahnesa), the 318 orthodox fathers, St. Athanasius the apostolic, St. Epiphanius of Salamis, St. John Chrysostom, St. *Cyril of Alexandria (1a), *Dioscorus of Alexandria, Our Lady Mother of God (Abba George). Compared with the *Antiochene type, the Alexandrian anaphora gives an impression of dispersed order. Trinitarian doctrine and Christology are well developed. Here and there one notes echoes of Alexandrian Jewish and humanistic wisdom language, in concepts such as the pure sacrifice of Mal 1:11 (θυσία καθαρά), spiritual sacrifice (λογικὴ θυσία), and the themes of Christ as light and wisdom. The description of creation stresses the element of water, important in Egypt (seas, springs, rivers, lakes; Prex euch. 102). There is a notable development of the prayer of intercession, conceived of as a single great prayer, recapitulated in a few final requests. The introduction to the sanctus contains a special mention of the divine name. The epiclesis, to which a veiled allusion is made in the intercessions in the listing of the acceptable sacrifices of the OT, is divided into two moments: (1) transitional epiclesis: a general request before the institution to complete the salvific epiphany of Christ through the divine blessing of the sacrifice by the insertion-descent (ἐπιφοίτησις/adventus) of the Holy Spirit: "Heaven and earth are truly full of your holy glory through the manifestation of our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ. Perfect also this sacrifice, O God, with your blessing, through the visitation of your most Holy Spirit" (Prex euch. 113); (2) specific epiclesis: close correlation between anamnesis and epiclesis, with a formal epicletic request referring to the creation (the Paraclete in the anaphora of St. Mark is proclaimed the source of divine charisms, Prex euch. 115); the purpose of the offering of the material gifts is the spiritual and corporeal benefit of humankind. Both the last part of the epiclesis and the concluding doxology effectively emphasize the glorification of the Name, the true motive of worship and the object of human gratitude (Prex euch. 115).

VI. Observations. The eucharistic formulas and patterns of the early centuries (Didache*, St. Justin, Trad. Ap.) show a continuity and identity of forms inherited from the *Jewish Christian world. It is an acknowledged fact that the roots of the Christian anaphora are in the Jewish liturgy, preserving its essential vocabulary (semantic group brk-ydh, εὐλογέω-εὐχαριστέω) and two-poled mode of the berakot of meals (theological mode: blessing of the divine name; economic mode: distribution of the mystery of salvation in God's creative and redemptive work). Thanksgiving evolves into supplication before being transformed into doxology. The same literary form can thus be seen running from the OT todah, through the Jewish berakah, to the Christian anaphora, with the same structural elements, though differently related. The three-part structure remains basic and is easily identified: (1) theological part: a preamble on the Father, blessing directed to God, full of praise and thanksgiving proclaimed by directive verbs like αἰνεῖν, ὑμνεῖν, δοξολογεῖν; (2) christological part: fairly extensive development of the preceding, centered on Christ in an indicative anamnetic discourse that gives thanks for the economy of salvation in its various stages; (3) pneumatological-ecclesiological part: epicletic discourse in the imperative or optative, so the gifts offered by the church would be sanctified by the Holy Spirit such that those who communicate would receive the eschatological fruits of the redemption; almost everywhere it is followed by a supplication for the living and the dead, introduced by a μνήθετε ("remember") of the type zkr, with which God is reminded of the covenant. These sections are not always rigorously separated; it is possible to find anamnetic moments in the theological part (see Laus-gratiarum actio of the anaphora of St. Mark, Prex euch. 103) or also applied to the specific economy of the Holy Spirit (see epiclesis of the Greek anaphora of St. James, Prex euch. 251; epiclesis II of the anaphora of St. Mark, Prex euch. 115). Although the various phases can be clearly distinguished (praise–thanksgiving–sacrificial prayer), the anaphora forms a single, fully cohesive action and prayer: the bread and cup of the Eucharist represent both creation and salvation. The sacrifice is essentially λογικὴ θυσία because it is consecrated by the Spirit, who in turn transforms people into the firstfruits of the transfiguration. The interceding church is associated from this point on with the praise of the saints. Every epiclesis inevitably concludes with a moment of total doxology, the true end of Christian eucharistic worship.

G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, London 1945; B. Botte, L'anaphore chaldéenne des apôtres: OCP 15 (1949) 259-276; J.P. Audet, La Didachè, instruction des apôtres, Paris 1958; J. Lécuyer, La théologie de l'anaphore selon les Pères de l'école d'Antioche: OrSyr 6 (1961) 385-412; L. Ligier, Anaphores orientales et prières juives: OCP 13 (1963) 3-20, 99-113; B. Botte, La tradition apostolique de St. Hyppolite. Essai de reconstitution, LQF 39, Münster 1963; Id., Problèmes de l'anaphore syrienne des apôtres Addai et Mari: OrSyr 10 (1965) 89; W.O.E. Oesterley, The Jewish Background of the Christian Liturgy, Oxford ²1965; J.P. Audet, Genre littéraire et formes cultuelles de l'eucharistie: EphLit 80 (1966) 353-385; W.F. Macomber, The Oldest Known Text of the Anaphora of the Apostles Addai and Mari: OCP 32 (1966) 335-371; L. Ligier, De la cène du Seigneur à l'anaphore de l'Église: La MaisonD. 87 (1966) 7-51; Id., Célébration divine et anamnèse dans la première partie de l'Anaphore ou canon de la Messe orientale: Gregorianum 48 (1967) 225-252; L. Maldonado, La plegaria eucarística. Estudio de teología bíblica y litúrgica sobre la Misa, Madrid 1967; E. Lanne, La relazione dell'anafora eucaristica alla confessione di fede: Sac. Dott. 47 (1967) 383-396; Id., Liturgie et vie spirituelle dans les Églises chrétiennes: liturgie eucharistique en Orient et en Occident: DSp 9, 884-889; L. Bouyer, L'eucharistie. Théologie et spiritualité de la prière eucharistique, Tournai ²1968; A. Hänggi - I. Pahl, Prex eucharistica, Fribourg 1968; M. Arranz, L'économie du salut dans la prière Post-Sanctus des anaphores de type antiochéen: La MaisonD. 106 (1971) 46-75; A. Tarby, La prière eucharistique de l'Église de Jérusalem, Théol. Hist. 17, Paris 1972; I.H. Dalmais, L'Esprit Saint et le mystère du salut dans les épiclèses eucharistiques: Le Saint Esprit dans la Liturgie: Bibl. Eph. Litg. 8, Rome 1977, 55-64; H.J. Schulz, Die byzantinische Liturgie. Glaubenszeugnis und Symbolgestalt: Sophia 5, Trier ²1980; A. Houssiau, Les moments de la prière eucharistique: in L'expérience de la prière dans les grandes religions (ed. H. Limet - J. Ries), Louvain-la-Neuve 1980, 325-334, C. Giraudo, La struttura letteraria della preghiera eucaristica, Rome 1981; var. aus., Eucharisties d'Orient et d'Occident, vols. I and II, Paris 1970 (B. Bobrinskoy, 197-240; R. Bornet, 241-264; B. Botte, 7-24; R.G. Coquin, 51-82; I.H. Dalmais, 175-196; W. Rordorf, 65-82); G.J. Cuming, The Anaphora of St Mark: A Study in Development: Muséon 95 (1982) 115-129; var. aus., Anàmnesis, 3/2: La liturgia eucaristica, Casale Monferrato 1983; J.L. Bamdrés, The Ethiopian Anaphora of the Apostles: Historical Considerations: Proche-Orient chrétien 36 (1986) 6-13; R.F. Taft, The Authenticity of the Chrysostom Anaphora Revisited: Determining the Authorship of Liturgical Texts by Computer: OCP 56 (1990) 5-51; E. Mazza, L'anafora eucaristica. Studio sulle origini, Rome 1992; G. Panicker, West Syrian Anaphorae: The Harp. A Review of Syriac and Oriental Studies 6 (1993) 29-40; Id., La structure de l'anaphore alexandrine et antiochéenne: Irénikon 67 (1994) 5-40; E. Mazza, La celebrazione eucaristica. Genesi del rito e sviluppo dell'interpretazione, Cinisello B. 1996; P.J. Fedwick, The Anaphoras of St. Basil and St. James: An Investigation into Their Common Origin, Rome 1992; Segno di unità. Le più antiche eucaristie delle chiese, the monks and nuns of Bose (eds.), under the direction of E. Mazza, Bose-Magnano 1996 (the most complete collection); G. Filias, L'épiclèse eucharistique dans les liturgies de Basile le Grand et de Grégoire de Nazianze: NRTh 119 (1997) 37-48; var. aus., Scientia liturgica, vol. III: L'eucarestia, Casale Monferrato 1998; S. Muksuris, A Brief Overview of the Structure and Theology of the Liturgy of the Apostles Addai and Mari: Greek Orthodox Theological Review 43 (1998) 59-83; A. Verheul, La prière eucharistique de Addaï et Mari: Questions liturgiques 80 (1999) 348-357; B. Dupuis, Quel est l'auteur de l'Anaphore de Nestorius?: Istina 46 (2001) 155-159; E. Mazza, La celebrazione eucaristica, Bologna 2003.

D. Gelsi

ANASTASIA (d. 303?). Protagonist of one of the longest and most romanticized "Roman Passions," a group of epic passions composed ca. 5th c. The account (the Passio sanctae Anastasiae, or Passio sancti Chrisogoni et sociorum) is of the daughter and wife of obstinately *pagan Roman aristocrats, living in *Rome at the time of *Diocletian. Her difficult marriage—a kind of preamble to *martyrdom—with Publius, a pagan hostile to her choice of life and behavior, made of her a model for married women at a time when *virginity was coming to be regarded as the highest value to which a Christian is called. In the literary text her events are tied to those of *Chrysogonus; to the three martyrs *Agape, Chionia and Irene; and to Theodotus and her three sons, and they take place in the most disparate places of the empire, from Rome to *Aquileia, *Thessalonica to *Nicaea. Originally written in Latin, the account is the result of the combination—in an altogether external way—of at least four different *hagiographical texts about Anastasia, the noble wife and then widow who gives evidence of her charity by successively caring for the individual martyrs.

The figure is entirely legendary, very probably composed to lend a quality of sanctity to the foundress of a titulus* (the titulus Anastasiae). It is assimilated to Anastasia of *Sirmium, whose cult is attested at *Constantinople—her *relics were transferred there from Sirmium mid-5th c.—and at Rome, where as mentioned there was a titulus Anastasiae. The church, already important for its location within the city, was dedicated in the late 5th or early 6th c. *Leo the Great (440–461) preached his homily against *Eutyches and the *monophysites in the titulus Anastasiae; at the time of *Gregory the Great (594–604) three Christmas Masses were celebrated in the church, the second dedicated to Anastasia and presided over by the pope. In the Notitia ecclesiarum urbis Romae (7th c.) the church is in the third position, after the Lateran basilica and that of St. Maria Maggiore. Feast is 22 December at Constantinople, 25 December at Rome.

BHL 401-403; DACL 1/2,1919-1924; H. Delehaye, Étude sur le légendier romain, Brussels 1936, 151-171, 221-249 (Latin text), 250-258 (Gk. tr.); BS 1,1042-1109; F.E. Consolino, Modelli di santità nelle più antiche Passioni romane, in L'agiografia latina nei secoli IV-VII. XII Incontro di studiosi di antichità cristiana: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 83-113; A. Simonetti, Le fonti agiografiche di due drammi di Rosvita: Studi Medievali, s. III, 30 (1989) 661-695; K. Cooper, Of Romance and Mediocritas: Re-reading the Martyr Exemplum in the Passio Sanctae Anastasiae, in Modelli di santità e modelli di comportamento. Contrasti, intersezioni e complementarietà, Turin 1994, 107-123; Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico 1, Turin 1998, 115-118.

V. Milazzo

ANASTASIANA. Grouped under this title are many works unduly attributed to *Anastasius the Sinaite. (1) In Hexaemeron libri XII, a commentary on the work of the six days (Gen 1), partially published in a Latin version (PG 89, 851-1071). J.D. Baggarly, who prepared the edition of the Greek text, considers this work to postdate the 10th c. (CPG 7770). (2) Contra Monophysitas (PG 89, 1180-1190) appears as a series of citations of heresiarchs (*Arius, *Aetius, *Eunomius) and 4th- and early 5th-c. fathers (*Eustathius of Antioch, *Apollinaris, *Basil of Caesarea, *Ambrose, *Athanasius, *Antipater of Bostra, *Ephrem of Antioch, *Proclus, *Amphilochius and *Olympiodorus), none of which is otherwise preserved. This compilation is also considered a fraud of undetermined date (CPG 7771). (3) Disputatio adversus Iudaeos, a dialogue between a Christian and a Jew (PG 89, 1204-1281) which cannot have been written before the 9th c. (CPG 7772). (4) Sermo de tribus quadragesimis (PG 89, 1389-1397), datable to the 12th c. (CPG 7773). (5) De haeresibus et concisa et perspicua fidei nostrae notitia, works attributed to a Sinaite monk Anastasius, a theologian of an unknown period (CPG 7774-7775). (6) De liturgiis in quadragesimo die pro defunctis, Doctrina de temporibus, Capita poenitentialia et Precatio, works attributable to a certain Anastasius the Sinaite, a 9th- to 11th-c. canonist (CPG, 7776-7779). (7) Homilia in ramos palmarum, an unpublished homily attributable to a certain priest Anastasius, an allegorist (CPG 7780). (8) Doctrina Patrum de Incarnatione Verbi, a very important Greek theological *florilegium, literally titled: "Speeches (Logoi) of the holy fathers or selection of quotations by which we wisely learn all of the doctrine of the apostolic church and also the kerygma of theology and the discourses of the divine economy and the exactness of the other right dogmas of the church." In the first part (ch. 1-32) the texts are ordered systematically (*trinitarian theology, esp. *christological) and constitute a patristic arsenal against *monophysitism and *monothelitism. Interspersed with citations borrowed from the heterodox, the Greek fathers (from *Ignatius of Antioch to *Maximus the Confessor) most frequently named are the *Cappadocians and *Cyril of Alexandria. *Ambrose and *Leo the Great are mentioned among the Latin fathers. Some authors, e.g., Eubulus of Lystra, and some texts are known only through this collection. The second part (ch. 32-45) forms a kind of supplement, with no systematic order that responds with citations (fathers, heretics) and various passages to many questions about the Christian faith and errors. The whole is datable to the late 7th or early 8th c. Its author is disputed.

Fr. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum de Incarnatione Verbi. Ein griechisches Florilegium aus der Wende des siebenten und achten Jahrhunderts, Münster 1907; CPG 7781; Fr. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum de Incarnatione Verbi. Ein griechisches Florilegium aus der Wende des 7. und 8. Jahrhunderts. 2. Auflage mit Korrekturen und Nachträgen von B. Phanourgakis, hrsg. von E. Chrysos, Münster 1981.

D. Stiernon

ANASTASIUS (d. after 658). Disciple of St. *Maximus the Confessor, secretary to the empress Eudoxia (wife of *Heraclius). In 617 he became the spiritual son of Maximus, to whom he remained connected for 37 years until his death, following him to the monastery of Chrysopolis (617–630), to *Africa (630–645) and to *Rome (645–652). He shared the outrage of Maximus's two trials at *Constantinople (656, 658) and, though separated for a period, also his imprisonments and exiles. Anastaius died the last half of July 662 at or on his way to the castrum of Souanias. He likely wrote the Disputatio cum Pyrrho (PG 91, 287-353). Many pieces have been attributed to him regarding the above-mentioned trials and afflictions; only the letter to the monks of Cagliari is his, however (PG 90, 133B–136C). The letter sent to him by Maximus 19 April 658 (BHG 1232) survives, to which Anastasius added a postscript exhorting the Romans to stand firm in the faith (PG 90, 113-114).

BHG 1231-1236; BHL 5841-5844; CPG 7725; J.-M. Garrigues, Le martyre de saint Maxime le Confesseur: Revue Thomiste 76 (1976) 410-452 (Fr. tr. of the acts of the trial and the final drama); BS IX, 41-47; W. Brandes, "Juristische" Krisenbewältigung im 7. Jahrhundert? Die Prozesse gegen Papst Martin I. und Maximos Homologetes: Fontes Minores 10, ed. L. Burgmann, Forschungen zur Byzantinischen Rechtsgeschichte, ed. D. Simon, Band 22, Frankfurt a.M. 1998, 141-212; P. Allen - B. Neil, Scripta saeculi VII vitam Maximi Confessoris spectantia (CCSG 39), Turnhout-Leuven 1999; P. Allen - B. Neil, Maximus the Confessor and His Companions: Documents from Exile (Oxford Early Christian Texts), Oxford 2002.

D. Stiernon

ANASTASIUS, emperor (d. 518). A promonophysite, born at Durazzo (431), who became emperor in 491, marrying the widow of his predecessor (*Zeno). He had to promise the *patriarch *Euphemius, however, to do nothing against the faith or the canons of *Chalcedon. A good administrator and diplomat, Anastasius implemented some reforms. His reign (491–518) was much disturbed by circus factions and riots over political-religious questions. The *Acacian *schism continued under him. He ignored Pope *Gelasius's letter announcing his election (492), deposed Euphemius in favor of Macedonius II (493) and did not recognize Pope *Symmachus (498), favoring the antipope *Laurentius. From then on he favored *monophysitism with increasing openness: *Severus, who was elected patriarch at Antioch, condemned the Council of Chalcedon in 513 at *Tyre; at *Constantinople, monophysite monks added qui crucifixus est pro nobis to the Trisagion, the orthodox were persecuted and Macedonius II was deposed. Riots broke out in the stadium and the official Vitalian rebelled. Anastasius then sought to conciliate Pope *Hormisdas but broke off discussions when he again had control of the situation. His successor *Justin (518) reestablished orthodoxy.

DHGE II, 1447-1457; Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa IV, Turin 1970, 375-397; Stein-Palanque, Hist. du Bas Empire II, Amsterdam 1968, 77-217; C. Capizzi, Anastasio I, Studio sulla sua vita, la sua opera e la sua personalità, Rome 1969.

A. De Nicola

ANASTASIUS, poet (6th c.?). A famous kontakion sung for dead priests has the *acrostic Ἀναστασίου τοῦ ταπεινοῦ αἶνος and was cited in the old euchologies (e.g. Goar, Euchologion, Venice 1730, repr. Graz 1960, 561-575); the first troparion is still used on Saturdays of abstinence (ἀπόκρεω) and of the dead (ψυχοσάββατον). J.B. Pitra, Analecta Sacra I, 242-249, published a critical edition. It has been attributed to the quaestor Anastasius the Stammerer (9th-10th c.), to *Anastasius the Sinaite and to an otherwise unknown monk who lived before *Romanus Melodus, who was influenced by it.

DHGE 2,1477; Bardenhewer 5,165; Beck 446; LTK 1,491; W. Christ - M. Paranikas, Anthologia graeca carminum christianorum, Lipsia 1871 (repr. 1963), XXXV and CIIf.

A. De Nicola

ANASTASIUS I, pope (399–401). LP considers him a *Roman, son of Maximus. Esteemed by *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 20) and *Jerome (Ep. 127, 10; 130, 16), in part because he was more sensitive than his predecessor *Siricius (384–399) to the *ascetical movements, which appealed to Paulinus and Jerome. Anastasius's name is esp. linked to the *Origenist controversy, which exploded in the West during his pontificate, after the Latin translation and diffusion of the Peri archōn by *Rufinus of Aquileia. Despite the latter's attempt to amend some passages of Origen's text, Anastasius, yielding to anti-Origenist pressure (including that from Jerome), condemned the *Alexandrian teacher and his doctrines, and with him *Simplicianus, bishop of *Milan. Rufinus defended himself and Origen in the Apologia contra Hieronymum (CCL 20, 29-123), sending it to Jerome and Anastasius, who in fact had not explicitly included the Latin version of the De principiis or its author in the condemnation. In 401 Anastasius also moved against *Donatism, encouraging the bishops of N *Africa in that direction. He also confirmed the decrees of the Council of *Toledo (400), restoring to their respective sees bishops who had dissociated themselves from *Priscillianism and denouncing the *Manichees at Rome. Anastasius's letters manifest a sense of responsibility for the *orthodoxy of all the churches (see Ep. 9, 5), but that this consciousness and expression of primacy was accepted by the African bishops does not appear to have been fully the case according to *Theophilus of Alexandria, who sees in Anastasius's condemnation of Origen primarily the bishop of Rome's adherence to Alexandrian decisions (see Justinian, Liber c. Origenem: PG 86, 967).

Anastasius, Epistulae, PL 20, 65-80; PL, Supp. I, 790-792; Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 20, CSEL 29 (G. de Hartel), 142-149; Jaffé I, Leipzig 1885, 42-43; LP I, 218-219; Rufinus, Apologia ad Anastasium, CCL 20, 19-28 (M. Simonetti); Id., Apologia contra Hieronymum: CCL 20, 29-123 (M. Simonetti); Jerome, Ep. 95, 97, 127 and 130: CSEL 55-56, 1 (J. Hilberg); Id., Apologia contra Rufinum: CCL 79 (P. Lardet); E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papstums I, Tübingen 1930, 285-287, 291-292; M. Villain, Rufin d'Aquilée. La querelle autour d'Origène: RSR 27 (1937) 5-37; P. Paschini - V. Monachino, I Papi nella storia, I, Rome 1961, 60-65; DHGE 2, 1471-1473 (J.-P. Kirsch); BS I, 1065-1066 (F. Caraffa); LTK³ 1, 602 (G. Schwaiger); Dizionario storico del Papato, ed. Ph. Levillain, I, Milan 1996, 42-43; EPapi I, 381-385 (A. Pollastri).

M. Spinelli

ANASTASIUS I of Antioch (d. 598/599). *Patriarch whose *Palestinian origin is dubious, as is his status as a *monk on *Sinai. *Apocrisarius of the patriarch of *Alexandria at *Antioch, he succeeded Domninus III as patriarch of Antioch in 559. In 565 he opposed the edict of *Justinian regarding *aphthartodocetism; the emperor considered exiling him, but died before carrying this out (565). The successor, *Justin II, deposed Anastasius (570) and sent him to *Jerusalem. He was an intimate friend of *Gregory the Great who, on becoming pope, got him restored (593) to his see, where Anastasius remained undisturbed until his death (598/599).

Of his polemical-dogmatic writings only the De orthodoxa fide orationes V have survived intact: (1) De Sancta Trinitate (which treats the eternity of the Word, his consubstantiality with the Father and the Holy Spirit, the procession of the latter also from the Son, the unity of the divine nature and operations against the *tritheists and *John Philoponus); (2) De incircumscripto (which argues that God, by his nature and preserving energy, is everywhere and continually present in creation); (3) De divina incarnatione (which discusses the reason for the *incarnation of the Word, the *hypostatic union of the two distinct and unmixed natures, the consubstantiality of his assumed human nature with our own, scriptural proofs); (4) De passione et impassibilitate Christi (which sets forth cleary the communicatio idiomatum); (5) De resurrectione Christi (which discusses the real death of Christ, the *descent into hell, the resurrection's not involving destruction of the corporeal substance but only a change in its qualities, the *ascension, the final *parousia). Of his other writings we know only the titles and some fragments: his clear and almost "scholastic" exposition had a considerable influence on later *Byzantine theologians. Of his sermons, recognized as authentic by all are those on the (second) enthronement (Oratio pacificatoria) and On Lent (fragment); there is some dispute concerning the sermons On the Annunciation (two, the first of which justifies the date of the feast: 25 March), On the Presentation of Jesus in the Temple, On Easter and On the Transfiguration.

Evagrius Scol., HE 4,39ff.; 5,5; 6,24; Gregory the Great, Ep. (passim): CPG III 6944-6969: PG 89, 1289-1408; S.N. Sakkos, Anastasioû . . . hapanta . . . erga, Thessalonica 1976; Bardenhewer IV, 146-149; Beck 380-381: Altaner 549-550; S.N. Sakkos, Perì Anastasioû Sinaitoû, Thessalonica 1964; G. Weiss, Studia Anastasiana I. Studien zum Leben, zu den Schriften und zur Theologie des Patriarchen Anastasius I von Antiochien: Miscellanea Byzant. Monacensia 4, Munich 1965; E. Chrysos, Neôterai ereunai perì Anastasioû Sinaitoû, I (1969) 121-124; Patrologia V, 206-213 and index of names; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, vol. 2, Rome 1988, 70-79.

A. De Nicola

ANASTASIUS II, pope (496–498). *Son of a Roman presbyter, elected to succeed *Gelasius I 27 November 496. During his brief pontificate (two years: died 19 November 498) Anastasius made efforts to reconcile *Rome with *Constantinople and end the *Acacian *schism. Upon election he wrote to the emperor *Anastasius about this, expressing regret for the separation and his openness to recognizing consecrations and baptisms administered by Acacius, though without confirming his orthodoxy. Recognizing this first attempt as ineffective, Anastasius sent a delegation to the emperor, reiterating his conciliatory disposition (Jaffé, 748). This effort was also unsuccessful, due to the emperor's demand that the pope subscribe to the Henoticon (the Edict of Union), which the latter had rejected. Anastasius's open and hopeful disposition toward the *Byzantines, moreover, provoked a negative reaction among his own clergy (LP I, 258), who accused Anastasius of *heresy and after his death promoted the Laurentian schism (see Lawrence; Symmachus). His relations with the West in general were more constructive and better articulated. Anastasius sent the bishops of *Gaul a letter condemning *traducianism, i.e., the opinion that the parents generate the human soul (Jaffé, 751). Perhaps the most positive and significant event of Anastasius's pontificate was the conversion of the Frankish king *Clovis to Catholicism under the influence of his wife Clotilde; the sovereign was bapitized after defeating the Alemanni at Tolbiacum (modern Zulpich). Anastasius was buried in the atrium of St. Peter's basilica.

Jaffé I, Leipzig 1885, 95-96; Epistolae Romanorum Pontificum genuinae [. . .], I, ed. A. Thiel, Brunsbergae 1868, 82ff., 614ff.; LP I, 258-259; H. Grisar, Roma alla fine del mondo antico, II, Rome 1930; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 31-32 and 46ff.; P.A.B. Llewellyn, The Roman Clergy During the Laurentian Schism (498–506): A Preliminary Analysis: Ancient Society 8 (1977) 245-275; LTK 1, 602-603 (G. Schwaiger); DHGE 2, 1473-1475 (J. P. Kirsch); BS I, 1071 (P. Burchi); EPapi I, 462-464 (P. Bertolini).

M. Spinelli

ANASTASIUS II of Antioch (d. 609/610). *Patriarch who succeeded *Anastasius I in 599. He communicated his election to *Gregory the Great, who replied (Ep. 7,48) exhorting him to put an end to *simony. He died a martyr in 609/610 at the hands of the Jews who sacked *Antioch in reaction to the emperor Phocas's imposing conversion to Christianity on them. They captured the patriarch, mutilated him and threw him to the flames. In the Roman Martyrology his feast is 21 December. His writings are either lost or are of very doubtful attribution; lost also is his translation of the Regula pastoralis of Gregory the Great (Ep. 12,6 Hartmann).

CPG III, 453: Anastasius Sinaita, nota; Bardenhewer V, 150; Beck 401; DHGE II, 1460-1461; BS I, 1052-1053; Altaner 550.

A. De Nicola

ANASTASIUS MAGUNDAT (d. 628). *Persian cavalry officer, from a Zoroastrian family of Rashuoni in the Razekt region, i.e., Beth Raziquayē, the region of Ray SE of Teheran. His father, Baw, was a Zoroastrian priest. With his brother he took part in Sharvaraz's conquest as far as *Chalcedon, which included the conquest of *Jerusalem and the deportation of the Holy *Cross after 614, provoking reflection in the young Anastasius. He was presented to the *patriarch *Modestus through the mediation of Elias of St. Anastasia, was *baptized and entered the *monastery of St. Anastasia, whose name he took in 620. After seven years of monastic life he had a night vision; telling his desire to his superior, he went to Diospolis, Mt. Gerizim and then to *Caesarea, where some Persian companions recognized him. Tried by the Persian Marzipan, Anastasius not only refused every compromise offered him but also asked to be taken before the tribunal of *Chosroes II Aparwez himself. Some months before Chosroes's own fall, Anastasius was put to death with 70 other Christians 22 January 628 at Dasquarta of Malka, six miles from Beth Saloen, a little upriver from *Seleucia. Heraclius's troops were already very near, having celebrated Christmas at Kerkuk. The Gk. passion was published in a critical edition by Bernard Flusin with a volume of commentaries on the 7th-c. context. One sees esp. that this *martyrdom was possible only because the saint was born a Zoroastrian priest. Many Christians have followed Anastasius's example in adoring the power of the Spirit. In the 8th c. *Bede the Venerable introduced a eulogy in his honor in the West. Rome possesses the relics of his head at Aquas Salvias. *Constantinople dedicated a martyrion to him in that of Philemon at Strategion.

J.M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'église en Iraq, CSCO 310, Subs. 36, Louvain 1970, 98; AASS Decemb., Brussels 1940, 31; BS 1, 1054-1055; B. Flusin, Saint Anastase le Perse et l'histoire de la Palestine au début du VII^e^ siècle. T. I Les Textes. T. II Commentaire, Paris 1992.

M. van Esbroeck

ANASTASIUS of Thessalonica. *Archbishop of *Thessalonica (ca. 432–452), successor of *Rufus shortly after the Council of *Ephesus (431), corresponded with popes *Sixtus III and *Leo I from 435 to 449. He was represented at the Councils of *Ephesus II (449) and *Chalcedon (451) by Quintillus, bishop of Heraclea, who did not subscribe to the canon on the privileges of the see of *Constantinople. The Latin recension of the acts of Chalcedon, which suggested the hypothesis of Anastasius's death during the council (L. Petit), cannot prevail against the general tradition. The letters addressed to him by the popes and that of Sixtus III to *Proclus of Constantinople about him are important for the history of *Roman jurisdiction over *Illyricum through the "Apostolic Vicar" of *Thessalonica.

Jaffé 393-396, 403, 404, 409, 411, 440; C. Silva Tarouca, Epistolarum Romanorum Pontificum ad vicarios per il lyricum aliosque episcopos collectio Thessalonicensis, Rome 1937, 36-43, 53-63; Acta Romanorum Pontificum, I, Vatican City 1943, 172-183; ACO I, 1,7, 143-145; Tillemont, Mémoires XV, 443-445; L. Petit, Les évêques de Thessalonique: Echos d'Orient IV (1900-1901) 142-143; DHGE II, 1444-1445; P. Batiffol, Le Siege Apostolique, Paris 1924, 406-407; EC I, 1158; Fliche Martin-Frutaz ²IV, 287, 332; D. Staffa, Le delegazioni apostoliche, Rome 1958, 10-17; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana Recherches . . . , Rome 1976, 1143-1147.

D. Stiernon

ANASTASIUS the Apocrisarius (d. 666). Saint, papal *apocrisarius at *Constantinople, a disciple, with the *monk and *martyr St. *Anastasius (d. 24

July 662), of St. *Maximus the Confessor (d. 13 August 662). He was arrested at *Rome with Maximus by order of *Constantius II, who favored *monothelitism, and taken to Constantinople. Anastasius was exiled first to Trebizond (Trapezous) and then to Mesembria (655) and then brought back to the capital (662) and condemned by a council; his right hand and tongue were cut off. He was then exiled to Thusum near Lazica in the Caucasus, where he died 11 September 666. Of him we possess (1) the account of Maximus's trial at Constantinople (Relatio motionis); (2) the account of Maximus's debate with his opponents at Bizya and at Rhegium (Acta in primo exilio); (3) a long letter to the presbyter Theodosius of Gangra, describing the sufferings of Maximus and his two disciples and adding evidence from the Fathers on the two wills in Christ; in it are eight texts attributed to Hippolytus, bishop of Porto (once known only in the Latin translation of Anastasius the Librarian, this letter was published by R. Devreesse, AB 73 [1955] 10-16); (4) a diatribe defending Maximus against the Constantinopolitans (Invectiva a quodam monacho pro s. Maximo); (5) a letter to the Ascalonite monks, only partially published (incipit and two fragments), explaining the philosophical terms that recur in *Christology. Also proposed, among others, as author of the Doctrina Patrum de Incarnatione Verbi published by F. Diekamp, Münster i. W. 1907 (CPG III, 7781).

CPG III, 7733-7740; PG 90, 109-129, 136-172, 173-194, 201-205; PG 89, 1191; Bardenhewer V, 35-36; DHGE II, 1462; EC I, 1150-1151; LTK 1, 491; Beck 442; Altaner 561; Patrologia V, 129-131; M. Simonetti, Un falso Ippolito nella polemica monotelita: VetChr 24 (1987) 113-146.

A. De Nicola

ANASTASIUS the Sinaite (640–700). Saint (21 April). The Menaea call him the New Moses, since as the *abbot of *Sinai he guided a great number of *monks. His life is largely unknown. A polemicist, he debated the many *heretics (*monophysites, Severians, Theodosians, *aphthartodocetists, *monothelites) who swarmed in *Syria, *Palestine and *Egypt. He was at *Alexandria, a den of *heresies, shortly before 640 and again between 678–689, at the time of the monophysite patriarch *John III; he was still alive twenty years after *Constantinople III (680–681). His principal work was the Hodegos, which combats in 24 chapters the various forms of monophysitism. Though he condemns Greek *philosophy (PG 89, 49b. 108ab. 121bc. 140a. 148b. 265b.), he often appeals to ratio theologica; after listing the necessary qualities of a controversialist (ch. 1), he gives the theological definitions inherent in the theme (ch. 2), then expounds the arguments in favor of the dogma and resolves the objections of heretics. The work was written in the middle of the desert, when the author was in ill health and lacked books: some of its patristic citations are therefore inexact. Other dogmatic and polemical works are Capita VI contra monothelitas and Capita XVI contra monophysitas. The Quaestiones et responsiones on *exegetical, dogmatic and moral themes include a number of later additions. Nine discourses are his: De creatione hominis (three), De sacra synaxi (veneration of the *Eucharist; important details on the *liturgy; observations on the habits of the faithful), In VI Psalmum, In defunctos, De Transfiguratione, In passione Jesu Christi (Good Friday) and In novam dominicam et in Thomam apostolum (fragment). The Narrationes (edifying stories) are in part his. Among works no longer attributed to him are In Hexaemeron 11. XII (allegorical interpretation: Christ and the church); however, he has been suggested as the probable author of the Doctrina Patrum de Incarnatione Verbi.

CPG III, 7745-7769 (certain works) and 7770-7781 (anastasiana incertae originis); PG 89, 1-1288; Bardenhewer 5,41-47; EC 1,1157-1158; DTC 1,1167-1168; DHGE 2,1482-1483; DSp 1,546-1,547; BS 1,1059-1061; Beck 442-446; Altaner 561-562 and 590; S. Impelizzeri, La letteratura bizantina, 196-197 and 425-426; Patrologia V, 321-339 and index of names.

A. De Nicola

ANATHEMA. Meant "to set aside." With respect to the divinity it took on the meaning of a votive gift: "to consecrate," in Latin devotio or to devote a person, city, etc. to the deity, which meant it was no longer used for normal purposes. A city devoted to the gods, e.g., was destroyed. Applied to persons it came to mean to be forbidden from remaining in the community, in office, etc., i.e., to be "put out" (1 Cor 12:3; Gal 1:8). In ancient Christianity anathema meant principally banishment from the community. The Council of *Elvira (ca. 306) provides the oldest anathema, which then became normal practice, esp. regarding *heretics. Still famous are the 12 anathemas of *Cyril of Alexandria against *Nestorius and his followers in 431 (Council of *Ephesus). The penalty for those anathematized is sometimes specified in the collections of heresies from the 4th-5th c. (*Epiphanius, Panarion; *Filaster of Brescia, Divers. haereseon; Aug., De haeresibus; Arnobius, Praedestinatus esp. II, c. 19; 59; 64). From the 6th c., anathema was distinguished from *excommunication, reserving to the latter the punishment of exclusion from the *sacraments and from participation in the *liturgy, whereas anathema meant complete separation from the church (Decretum Gratiani II, can. 106).

L. Brun, Segen und Fluch im Urchristentum, Oslo 1931.

V. Grossi

ANATOLIUS of Constantinople (d. 458). Born at *Alexandria, ordained deacon by St. *Cyril and sent as *apocrisarius to *Constantinople. Anatolius retained this post when *Dioscorus became *patriarch of *Alexandria; with the latter's support he was elected patriarch of Constantinople at the death of *Flavian, during the latrocinium of *Ephesus (449). Pope *Leo the Great thus wanted to ascertain his *orthodoxy and demanded of him a declaration of faith and the condemnation of *Nestorius and Eutyches, which he gave. He worked for the acceptance of the Tomus ad Flavianum and played an important part in the Council of *Chalcedon, approving the deposition of Nestorius. Leo the Great praised his zeal for orthodoxy, but at times lamented him, esp. regarding his support for canon 28, which sanctioned the primacy of Constantinople in the East, for his deposition of archdeacon Aetius in favor of the Eutychian Andrew, and for the favor accorded two Eutychian priests Atticus and Andrew. He died 458, while negotiating this last case with the pope. M. Jugie judges him severely ("an opportunist by temperament"). The Greek church venerates him as a saint.

CPG III, 5956-5961; PL 54, 854-856, 952-960, 959-965, 976-984, 1082-1084 (= ACO II, 4, XLV-XLVI; II, 1, 3, 116-118; II, 4, 52-54; II, 4, 168-169; II, 5, 24-26); PG 95, 73c. M. Jugie, EC 1, 1161; DHGE 2, 1497-1500; R. Janin, LTK 1, 497; G. Eldarov, BS 1, 1883-1884; Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa 4, Turin [3]1972, 311-315, 396-397, 411-415.

A. De Nicola

ANATOLIUS of Laodicea (d. ca. 280). Native of *Alexandria, active in the last decades of the 3rd c., was very learned in scientific matters and therefore appointed by the *Alexandrians to the chair of *Aristotelian *philosophy. *Theotecnus of Caesarea in *Palestine consecrated him bishop to make him his coadjutor, but when Anatolius was passing through *Laodicea the local Christians elected him successor to their late bishop *Eusebius, a charge he fulfilled from 270–280. He wrote Easter Canons, of which *Eusebius of Caesarea, from whom we have almost all of our information on Anatolius, provides extracts (HE VII, 32,14-19), and 10 books of Introductiones arithmeticae, of which we have some fragments (PG 10, 232-236).

DHGE 2, 1493-1494; T. Nicklin, The Date and Origin of Ps.-Anatolius De ratione paschali: Journal of Philology 28 (1901) 137-151; BBKL I, 160; Patrologia IV, 480-481.

M. Simonetti

ANATOLIUS of Laodicea (pseudo). A text titled De ratione paschali (Ps.-Anatolius) passed down in eight MSS which, though significantly corrupt, are traced directly or indirectly to *Ireland, presents some *Easter tables. First cited by *Colombanus (603) and *Cummineus and used in the Council of Whitby of 664 (Bede, HE 3,25); *Bede uses it both in the De temporum ratione and in the letter to Wicthede, in a redaction by then already corrupt (libellum Anatolii in aliquibus latinorum exemplaribus esse corruptum, par. 11), considering it to be of Anatolius of Laodicea. The author follows an Easter cycle of 19 years and puts the spring equinox at 25 March, meaning Easter cannot be celebrated before that date, only after it, on a Sunday. Recently in their critical edition, McCarthy and Breen supported with solid arguments the existence of a Latin archetype going back to ca. 400, already used by *Rufinus of Aquileia and translated by someone in his circle. This text must be the translation from the Greek original which goes back to the second half of the 3rd c. and was written by a Christian knowledgeable in mathematical and astronomical sciences and linked to the *Alexandrian church. That person could have been none other than Anatolius of Alexandria, who later became bishop of Laodicea in *Syria and died ca. 282.

CPL 2303; CPG 1620; CPPM III/A 626; Kenney 54; BCLL 320. PG 10, 207-232 (cols. 221ff., study of Bucherius); F. Cabrol, H. Leclercq, Monumenta ecclesiae liturgica, I, Paris 1912, 148-152; B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie, Leipzig 1880, I, 311-328.

Studies: A. Anscombe, The Paschal Canon Attributed to Anatolius of Laodicea: EHR 10 (1895) 515-535; C.H. Turner, The Paschal Canon of "Anatolius of Laodicea": EHR 10 (1895) 699-710; T. Nicklin, The Date and Origin of Ps.-Anatolius De ratione paschali: Journal of Philology 28 (1901) 137-151; C.W. Jones, The "Lost" Sirmond Manuscript of Bede's Computus: EHR 52 (1937) 204-219; Id., Bedae Opera de Temporibus, Cambridge, MA 1943, 82-85 (important); A. Cordoliani, Les computistes insulaires et les écrits Ps.-alexandrins, Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes 106 (1945-46) 5-34, esp. 7-21; W.M. Stevens, Scientific Instruction in Early Insular Schools, in Insular Latin Studies, ed. M. Herren, Toronto, 1981, 83-111; D.O Cróinín, Rath Melsigi, Willibrord, and the Earliest Echternach Manuscripts: Peritia 3 (1984) 17-42, esp. 26-28; F. Wallis, Bede: The Reckoning of Time, Liverpool 1999, LVI-LVIII; D.P. McCarthy, A. Breen, The Ante-Nicene Christian Pasch De ratione paschali: The Paschal Tract of Anatolius, Bishop of Laodicea, Chippenham 2003 (crit. ed. and Eng. tr.).

A. Di Berardino

ANAZARBUS ('Ανάζαρβος or 'Αναζαρβά). From 525, after *Justin I: Iustinopolis or Iustinianopolis; today ruins are at Aïn-Varza or Aïn-Zarba or Aïn-Navzer. City of Cilicia II, birthplace of the doctor Dioscorides and the didactic poet Appian. Referred to by *Arius, who mentions its bishop in the letter to *Eusebius of Nicomedia (see Theodoret, HE, I, 4). Veneration of the *martyrs Taracus, Probus and Andronicus (see Delehaye OC, 194), all natives of Anazarbus, and of St. Julian, also born there (his body was at *Antioch at the time of *John Chrysostom), attests to the presence and vitality of Christianity in the city. The following bishops are known: Athanasius, Maximinus (431–433), Valerius (445), Stephen (449), Cyrus (451), Orestes (458), Antarchius (exiled in 518), John (550), Aetherius (553), Stephen (580–581) and Isidore (692). A regional council was held in Anazarbus in 433, in which all the bishops of Cilicia II participated except *Meletius of Mopsuestia; Maximinus presided, the bishop of Anazarbus who at the Council of *Ephesus (431) was in the party that opposed *Cyril of Alexandria. Even with clear aversion to Cyril on the part of the bishops of the province, the council decided for reconcilation between the church of Antioch and that of *Alexandria, a peace already anticipated at Ephesus; Maximinus ultimately accepted the treaty of union between the two churches.

Mansi V, 1179-1180; Hfl-Lecl II, 1, 416; DHGE I, 1504-1506; Palazzini 1, 35.

C. Nardi

ANCHORITE. The anachōrēsis was the flight of insolvent debtors deep into the desert to avoid repayment (often to live as brigands). *Moses and *David fled in this way from Pharaoh and Saul, and the term was applied to them. *Origen (Hom. Jer. 14,16 and 20,8) makes a religious model of Jeremiah's anachōrēsis. The word was applied by *Athanasius to St. *Anthony and became common in Greek in the sense of detachment from the world, even if only in habits and interests (St. *Basil of Caesarea, e.g.). *Jerome and *John Cassian latinized it, but it was reserved for the more prestigious forms of eremitic life and has passed with this meaning into modern languages.

J. Gribomont

ANCIENT LISTS of CANONICAL BOOKS and APOCRYPHA. From patristic literature and from the early Middle Ages come a certain number of lists of canonical and noncanonical books. They exist autonomously, or added to the texts of synods, or inserted in the works of writers such as *Cyril of Alexandria, *Augustine and *Cassiodorus. Listed in them are the books of the OT and NT, but often also other works or *apocrypha. The titles are often commented upon, e.g., expressing doubts regarding some canonical books or giving the names of *heretics who used the apocryphal works. The reason for these lists was entirely practical: a list of canonical books had not yet been well defined, there were a large number of apocrypha in use by heretics and use of texts in the liturgy required complete orthodoxy: the case of *Serapion of Antioch and the Gospel of Peter is typical (Eusebius, HE 3,31). These lists have great value for the history of the canon of Scripture and of the use of apocrypha. We will indicate the main lists below chronologically.

Muratorian Canon.* NT; Latin text translated from Greek (?); second half 2nd c., Rome, lacks the initial part (Zahn 1-143; Grosheide 6-11).

*Canon of Origen (d. 254). OT, NT; Greek text. In various places in his works Origen lists the books of the OT and some apocrypha, but he does not give a proper list. See Eusebius, HE 6,25,4-12; Origen, In Lc 1,1; Hom. in Ps 1, PG 12, 1084 (Zahn 172-180; Grosheide 12).

The catalog of the Codex Claromontanus. OT, NT; Latin text, ca. 300. Inserted between Philem and Heb in the codex with the letters of St. Paul; gives the relative number of the stichoi (Zahn 143-156; Grosheide 16-17).

*The catalog of Eusebius of Caesarea (d. 339). HE 3,25, OT, NT; Greek text; lists some apocrypha (Grosheide 14-15).

Codex Mommsenianus. OT, NT, Latin text, ca. 360; contains 24 canonical books; modeled on the 24 elders of the *Apocalypse (4:10). The name comes from T. Mommsen, who discovered it (Zahn 143-156; Grosheide 17-18).

*Festal Letter of St. Athanasius of 367. Greek text; OT, NT (Zahn 203-212; Grosheide 19).

*Apostolic Constitutions. OT, NT; Greek text; ca. 380. II,57; VI, 16 (SC 320, 312-314; 329, 344-346; Zahn 180-184).

*85 Apostolic canons. OT, NT; Greek text (Zahn 184-193).

Canon of Cyril of Jerusalem (ca. 350). OT, NT; Greek text; in the Catechesis 4,35-36 (Zahn 172-180; Grosheide 15).

Council of Laodicea, can. 85* (late 4th c.). OT, NT; Greek text. P.P. Joannou, Discipline générale antique, 1/2, Grottaferrata 1963, 51-53 (Zahn 193-202).

Gregory of Nazianzus* (d. ca. 390). Greek text. Carm. I,12, De veris Scripturae libris, PG 37, 471-474, OT, NT. Poetical text (Zahn 221-217; Grosheide 20).

Amphilochius of Iconium (d. 396). Iambi ad Seleucum, v. 251-313, Greek text; OT, NT (Zahn 217-219; Grosheide 20-21).

Filaster of Brescia* (4th c.). Latin text, Haeres. 40; 88-89; gives some information on the apocrypha (Zahn 233-239).

Epiphanius of Salamis* (d. 402). Some information (Zahn 219-226).

Ps.-John Chrysostom. Greek text, Synopsis SS., PG 56, 313-386 (description of the individual books of the OT); NT: 317 (Zahn 226-233).

Rufinus of Aquileia* (d. 410/411). Latin text; explicating the third article of the creed, he offers a list of the books of the OT and NT: PL 21, 373-375 (Zahn 240-244).

Innocent I* (405). Letter to Exuperius of Toulouse (Epist. 6,7 PL 20, 501); Latin text; OT, NT, a list of apocrypha with an official condemnation (Zahn 244-246).

Brevis Statutorum Hipponensium 36, PL 56, 428-429. Latin text; legislation of the Councils of *Carthage 397, 419; OT, NT. A similar list is in Augustine's De doctrina Christiana 2, 8,12-13 (Zahn 246-253; Grosheide 21-22).

Ps.-Athanasius (4th-5th c.). Synopses of the SS (CPG 2249, PG 28, 284-289, 432); Greek text; OT, NT, a list of apocrypha and antilegomena (ibid. 432; Zahn 302-318).

Turibius of Astorga* (ca. 447). Epistola ad Idatium et Ceponium; Latin text, PL 54, 693-695. A list of some apocrypha used by the *Priscillianists.

Leontius of Byzantium* (5th-6th c.). De sectis II,4, PG 86, 1203, Greek text; NT (Zahn 293-295).

Timothy the Presbyter (6th c.). Greek text; a list of apocrypha used by the *Manichees, PG 86/1, 21.

Cassiodorus* (d. 580). Latin text; Institutiones 12 (according to *Jerome), 13 (according to Augustine), 14 (according to the Septuagint), PL 70, 1123-1126; OT, NT (Zahn 269-284).

Ps.-*Decretum Gelasianum. Latin text; OT, NT, a long list of apocrypha; PL 59, 157-164; E. von Dobschütz: TU 8[38], 3/4, 1912-1913 (Grosheide 23-24).

Bobbio Codex (6th-7th c.). OT, NT; Latin text (Zahn 284-289).

John of Damascus* (d. 749). De fide orthodoxa 4,17, PG 70, 1123-1126; Greek text; NT books with Canons of the Holy Apostles (Zahn 295).

Patriarch Nicephorus (ca. 850). Chronography; Greek text, with the respective number of lines of each book included; NT, antilegomena, apocrypha (Zahn 295-301).

The Samaritan list (13th c.). Gives a list of 35 apocryphal gospels; J. MacDonald, The Samaritan Chronicle n. II, Berlin 1969.

T. Zahn, Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons, 1-2, Erlangen-Leipzig 1890-1892 (repr. Hildesheim 1975), vol. 2: cit. as Zahn; F.W. Grosheide, Some Early Lists of the Books of the New Testament, Leiden 1948: cit. as Grosheide; T. Zahn, Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons und der altkirchlichen Literatur, 1-8, Leipzig 1881-1927; J. Leipold, Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons, 1-2, Leipzig 1907-1908 (repr. Leipzig 1974); M.J. Lagrange, Histoire ancienne du Nouveau Testament, Paris [2]1933; M. Grant, La formation du Nouveau Testament, Paris 1969; H. von Campenhausen, La formation de la Bible chrétienne, Paris 1971; I. Frank, Der Sinn der Kanonbildung, Freiburg 1971; K.H. Ohling, Die theologische Begründung des neutestamentlichen Kanons in der alten Kirche, Göttingen 1972; Das Neue Testament als Kanon, ed. E. Käsemann, Göttingen 1979 (collective work); S. Amsler et al., Le canon de l'Ancien Testament, Geneva 1984; B.M. Metzger, The Canon of the NT, Its Origin, Development, and Significance, Oxford 1987 (It. tr. Brescia 1997); C.N. Haneman, The Muratorian Fragment and the Developement of Canon, Oxford 1992; L.M. McDonald, The Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon, Peabody, MA 1995.

M. Starowieyski

ANCYRA (Ἄγκυρα). Metropolis initially of Galatia (diœcesis Pontica) then, from the late 4th c., of Galatia I. In the 7th-8th c. was an integral part of the *Byzantine themes of the Opsikion and Buccellari, today Ankara. Christianity developed very rapidly in this region. Ancyra's *martyrology is substantial: ca. 30 names ranging from the "apostle" Crescentius (under *Trajan) to the famous *Hypatius (4th c.). At a later period, the monks *Leontius and *Nilus were famous. From the subapostolic age Ancyra entered history because of its struggle against the *Cataphrygians (*Eusebius, HE, V, 16,4). Soon a conciliar city, it was contested during the century of *Arianism by its bishops *Marcellus and *Basil, who were succeeded by *Athanasius. Except for *Constantinople I (381)—certainly because of the occupation of the see by the Arians—its metropolitans were present at the ecumenical councils (at Constantinople II through a representative), with a varying number of suffragans. According to the Synekdemos of *Hierocles (527–528), the province of Ancyra included seven cities (ed. E. Honigmann, Brussels 1939, 34-35, nn. 696-697). In the first known episcopal Notitia, that of ps.-Epiphanius (7th c.), Ancyra was the fourth metropolis and had seven suffragan bishops (J. Darrouzès, Notitiae, 204, n. 9; 207, nn. 123-130), a position it always maintained (ibid., 216, n. 4; p. 220, nn. 142-149). Temporarily occupied by the *Persians, from 620–626, and by the Arabs in 654, it was sacked by the latter in 806 and in 838.

DHGE II, 1540-1609; XIX, 717-723; V. Laurent, Le Corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, V, 1, Paris 1963, 239-243; V, 2; ibid., 1965, 455, n. 336 bis; Cl. Foss, Late Antique and Byzantine Ankara:

Dumbarton Oaks Papers 31 (1977) 27-87; J. Darrouzès, Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, Paris 1981.

D. Stiernon

ANDREW, apostle. Born at Bethsaida Julia in Galilee (Jn 1:44) and a fisherman like his brother Simon, later called *Peter (Mt 4:18), his name is Greek in origin, though certainly not in deference to the *Hellenistic culture fairly widespread in the region E of the Lake of Tiberias. Initially a disciple of John (Jn 1:40), then of Jesus, to whom he brought his brother (Jn 1:41-42), he was part of the first group of Jesus' followers (Mt 4:19; Mk 1:16; Lk 6:14) and present at Jesus' first miracle at Cana (Jn 2:1-2). Luke's account (5:1-11) of the call of the first group of Jesus's followers, comprising Peter, James and John, does not name Andrew, though his presence with his brother in the boat from which Jesus taught must be assumed. The omission can be explained by the fact that everything in the account is centered on the miraculous catch of fish and the person of Peter, who expresses his own amazement and that of James and John, spectators of the scene. Once the number of apostles was fixed at twelve, Andrew's name appears in the second (Mt 10:2; Lk 6:14) and the fourth position (Mk 3:18; 13:3; Acts 1:13), depending on the structure of the list. Though part of the small group that had more direct contact with Jesus (Jn 6:8; 12:22), he was unaccountably not present at the transfiguration. After the mention in Acts 1:13, there is no reliable historical information from which to reconstruct his activity after *Pentecost. While the indication in the *Muratorian fragment (10-15) that he exhorted John to write his gospel seems without historical basis, more acceptable is what *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE III, 1) recounts, based on *Origen, of the field of his apostolate being in *Scythia. Later sources mention Colchis, *Epirus (*Greg. Naz., Or. 33), *Achaia (*Jerome, Ep. 59); Greece (*Theodoret, In ps. 116); *Cappadocia, *Galatia and *Bithynia, Scythia, Greece and *Byzantium (Niceph. Callist., HE II, 39). At Patrae (Achaia), by now old, he is said to have been condemned by the governor Aegeas to die on a decussate, or St. Andrew's, cross. In a text of ps.-Hippolytus (ca. 800), it expressly says that Andrew was crucified "upright on an olive tree" (TU 31/3, 1907, 247). The Basilian menologion just mentions a tree. The image of Andrew on a trunk with two branches at an acute angle may have suggested a cross. According to *Faustus the *Manichean, the brothers Peter and Andrew died in the same way (Aug., C. Faustum man. 14,1). Eusebius counts the Acts of Andrew (HE 3, 25,6) among *heretical inventions, and *Epiphanius of Salamis attests their use by various sects: among *Encratites in general and in particular among *Origenists and *Apostolici (Panarion 47,1; 61,1; 63,2). Manicheans and *Priscillianists also valued them (*Filaster of Brescia, Haer. 88). The problem of their historicity remains open. The information regarding the areas of evangelization reached by Andrew seems historically worthy of consideration, as also his *martyrdom at Patrae by crucifixion. In 356/357 emperor *Constantius had the apostle's mortal remains transferred to the Church of the Holy Apostles in *Constantinople; in 1208 they were transferred to Amalfi by Cardinal Pietro of Capua, and since 1462, during the pontificate of Pius II, they have been in St. Peter's Basilica at the *Vatican. His feast is 30 November.

Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. III, 1,25 (CPG 3495; PG 20, 216. 269); Gregory of Nazianzus, Or. 33 (CPG 3010; PG 36, 228); Theodoret, In Psalm. 116 (CPG 6202; PG 80, 1805); Nicephorus Callistus, Hist. Eccl. 2,39 (PG 145, 860); Jerome, Ep. 59 ad Marcellam (CPL 620; PL 22, 589); Epiphanius, Panarion 47,1; 61,1; 63,2 (CPG 3145; PG 41, 852.1040.1064); Filaster of Brescia, Haer. 88 (CPL 121; PL 12, 1200; CL 9,256); Pseudo-Hippolytus, TU 31/3 (1907) 247; Augustine, Contra Faustum Manichaeum 14,1 (CPL 321; PL 42, 295; CSEL 25.1,402-404); Erbetta II, 395-399; E. Hennecke, New Testament Apocrypha, II, [2]1975, 390-425; B. Mariani - E. Tosi - E. Peterson, Andrea, apostolo, santo: EC I, 1183-1188; G.D. Gordini, Andrea, apostolo, santo: BS I, 1094-1100; F. Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew, Cambridge, MA 1958, 138-299; LTK[3] 1, 625-626; R. Pillinger, Der Apostel Andreas: ein Heiliger von Ost und West im Bild der frühen Kirche, Vienna 1994.

E. Peretto

ANDREW, apostle (apocryphal). Andrew, brother of *Peter, appears in the lists of the *apostles, always in the first group. In the canonical gospels he is often associated with *Philip. According to the *Muratorian Canon he encouraged John to write his gospel. According to *Eusebius of *Caesarea (HE 3,1), Andrew carried out his *apostolate in *Scythia. There is ample apocryphal literature concerning Andrew, one of the most popular of the apostles, which can be subdivided into two parts: (1) Acts of Andrew and (2) texts connected to them and other texts about the apostle.

1. Acts of Andrew, one of five major acts of the apostles, written in Greek 2nd/3rd c., probably in *Achaia or perhaps Asia Minor. The Acts have been lost, and only fragments are preserved. They are divided into two parts, his travels and his *martyrdom. It is very difficult to reconstruct the part regarding his travels through the cities of Asia Minor—*Amasea, Sinope, *Nicaea and others—and through the Greek cities of *Philippi, *Thessalonica, *Corinth and Patrae, and the miracles done in those places; the principal source is the *Latin translation, abridged by *Gregory of Tours (d. 594). The second part, the martyrdom, begins in the city of Patrae. After converting a large number of people, including Stratocles and Maximilla, Andrew was condemned to death by Aegeates. He says a long prayer at the cross before being bound to it and then preaches from the cross for three days. After his death he was buried at Patrae (30 November). This part is better-preserved thanks to the Greek and Armenian texts. The entire text of the Acts has been reconstructed by J.M. Prieur based on the following texts: Greek, *Coptic (two papyri), Latin (text of Gregory, letter of the deacons of Achaia) and *Armenian; and from patristic citations (*Augustine, Euodius of Uzala and others). The text has a clearly *Encratite character and reflects the spiritual atmosphere of the period (*gnostic, neo-Pythagorean and *Platonic influences). The Acts were used by *Manicheans and *Priscillianists, and for this reason were often condemned during the patristic period, whereas Gregory's version was purged of any heterodox influences.

2. Another group is composed of other texts about Andrew: that of book III in the account of ps.-*Abdias—the Acts of Andrew and Matthias in the City of the Man-Eaters, and the Acts of Peter and Andrew, which form one work. There are many Acts in Eastern languages: the Martyrdom of St. Andrew (Coptic and Ethiopian), the Acts of Andrew and Paul, the Acts of Andrew and Bartholomew (Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopian and an unpublished Greek text), the Acts of Andrew and Philemon (Coptic, Arabic and Ethiopian). All of these texts transmit different versions of Andrew's legend from that of the Acts. There was also a Gospel of Andrew (ps.-Gelasian Decree 5,3,2).

St. Andrew's feast was already confirmed in the 4th c. by *Gregory of Nazianzus and in *Africa. His relics were carried from Patrae to *Constantinople in 357 (with those of Luke and Timothy); the translation is commemorated on 9 May.

This variety of traditions became the source of medieval legends, such as that of his apostolate in the Ukraine at Kiev, or the Germanic legends (Andreas); Andrew as prōtoklētos (Gk. "the first called") played an important role in theological discussions on the role of the see of *Constantinople. Many churches have been built under his name: at *Ravenna, *Aquileia and *Rome.

CANT 225-240; BHG 93-110c; BHL 428-442; BHO 48-57. Basic Ed.: J.M. Prieur, CCAp 5-6, 1989, with ample historical, critical and theological introduction. Other Greek and Latin texts ed. by Lipsius-Bonnet II,1; Vita di Andrew by Epiphanius monk: A. Dressel, Leipzig 1843; PG 120, 216-260; Matteo e Andrea, D.R. MacDonald, Atlanta 1990. Eastern texts: Arabic: A. Smith Lewis, Acta mythologica Apostolorum, Studia Sinaitica 3-4, London 1903; Ethiopian: E.A. Wallis Budge, The Contendings of the Apostles, 1-2. London 1899-1901 (Amsterdam 1976); Armenian in Fr. tr.: L. Leloir, CCAp 3, 1986, 191-265.

Translations: Eng. - Elliott 231-302; D.R. MacDonald, op. cit.; Fr.: CCAp, op. cit.; EAC 879-972; It.: Erbetta 2, 393-449; Moraldi 2, 429-507, 543-574, 689-694; Ger.: J.M. Prieur, in Schneemelcher 2, 93-137.

Studies: BS 1, 1961, 1094-1113; LCIK 5, 138-152; Lipsius 1, 543-622; J. Flamion, Les Actes d'André et les textes apparentés, Louvain 1911; F. Blatt, Die lateinische Bearbeitungen der Acta Andreae et Matthaei apud Anthropophagos, Giessen 1930; I. Sickenberger, Apokalyptik: RAC 1, 504-510; F. Dvornik, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew, Cambridge, MA 1958 (trans. in various languages); J.M. Prieur, Les Actes apocryphes de l'apôtre André: présentation des diverses traditions apocryphes et état de la question: ANRW II,25,6 (1988) 4384-4414; D.W. Pao, The Genre of the Acts of Andrew: Apocrypha 6 (1995) 179-202 (bibl.); A.J.N. Bremmer (ed.), The Apocryphal Acts of Andrew, Leuven 2000 (collection of articles, bibl.).

M. Starowieyski

ANDREW of Caesarea (6th c.). Bishop of *Caesarea in *Cappadocia, second half 6th c., wrote a commentary on the *Apocalypse shortly after that of Oecumenius, which to our knowledge was the first such commentary written in Greek. Andrew still felt the need to defend the sacred inspiration of the work, which had been contested in various ways in the East, with an appeal to the authority of the ancient fathers. Following contemporary practice, Andrew's commentary had abundant and at times extensive citations of earlier authors, esp. *Irenaeus, *Hippolytus, *Methodius and *Gregory of Nazianzus. He also makes significant use of Oecumenius without naming him, debating his positions more than once; there is no trace in Andrew of the *Origenism so present in Oecumenius. Andrew, who maintains the traditional division of world history into seven ages and expects the world to end soon, offers an *allegorical reading of the Apocalypse, stressing *ecclesiology and *eschatology more than did his predecessor.

CPG III, 7478; PG 106, 216-457; J. Schmid, Studien zur Geschichte des griechischen Apokalypse-Textes I, Munich 1955; J. Schmid - A. Monaci Castagno, Il problema della datazione dei Commenti all'Apocalisse di Ecumenio e di Andrea di Cesarea: AAT 114 (1980) 223-246; A. Monaci Castagno, I Commenti di Ecumenio e di Andrea di Cesarea: due letture divergenti dell'Apocalisse: AAT, series V, vol. V (1981) 305-426; BBKL I, 168; Eng. tr., W.C. Weinrich (tr. and ed.), Oecumenius and Andrew of Caesarea, Greek Commentaries on Revelation, Downers Grove 2011.

M. Simonetti

ANDREW of Crete (ca. 660–740). Among the most representative homilists and ecclesiastical poets of the 7th- and 8th-c. Born ca. 660 into a powerful Christian family of *Damascus, as a youth he was taken to *Jerusalem, where he became a *monk in the *monastery of Church of the Anastasis (Holy Sepulchre); for this reason those in the East call him Andrew of Jerusalem. In 685 he was part of a delegation sent to *Constantinople to express the adherence of the Church of Jerusalem to the decisions of the 6th ecumenical council; he remained in the capital, where he exercised the *diaconate, responsible for asylums for orphans and the elderly. He was nominated by the emperor ca. 700 as *archbishop of Gortyna on the island of *Crete. Forced to subscribe to a confession of *monothelite faith under the emperor Philippikos Bardanes (711–713), he withdrew his subscription immediately upon the emperor's death and returned to orthodoxy. He founded charitable institutions and a Marian shrine, and supported resistance to the Islamic invasion. He died 740 on the island of Lesbos upon returning from a trip to Constantinople, where he had gone to ask for help in the plague and famine that menaced Crete. The Eastern church venerates him as a saint. Famous as the creator of a *liturgical canon widely popular in *Byzantium and throughout his sphere of influence (Irmscher in DPAC 192-193).

Mariology occupies a special place in Andrew's reflections. For him *Mary is God's elect, the dwelling of the divine wisdom that the world cannot understand and collaborator in Christ's work of salvation. Although the gospels did not speak of Mary's assumption, Andrew denies the corruptibility of her body, insisting emphatically on her holiness.

CPG III, 8170-8228 (of which 8220-8228 are spurious); PG 97, 789-1444; Th. Nissen, Diatribe und Consolatio in einer christlichen Predigt des achten Jahrhunderts: Philologus 92 (1937) 177-198; H.-G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, Munich [2]1977, 500-502; A. Olivar, La predicaciòn cristiana antigua, Barcelona 1991, 225ff.; M. Auzepy, La carrière d'André de Crète: ByzZ 88 (1995) 1-12 (for the life and works); G. Pons Pons (ed.), Homilías marianas. Introducción, traducción y notas, Madrid 1995; A. Giannouli, Die Kommentartradition zum Grossen Kanon des Andreas von Kreta: einige Anmerkungen: JÖByz (Jahrbuch der Oesterreichischen Byzantinistik) 49 (1999) 143-159; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, vol. 2, Rome 1988, 391-481.

C. Dell'Osso

ANDREW of Samosata (d. after 444). Bishop of Samosata (today Samsat in E Turkey) at the start of the *Nestorian crisis, he and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus were asked by *John of Antioch to refute *Cyril of Alexandria's 12 anathemas. Part of his refutation is reconstructed from Cyril's response (PG 76, 315ff.), whereas almost nothing is known of another anti-Cyrillian work of his, of which the Hodegos of *Anastasius the Sinaite has preserved a fragment. Andrew looked for contradictions in Cyril's thought, accusing him of repeating the errors of *Apollinaris and *Arius. He did not participate at the Council of *Ephesus due to illness and was later among those who refused to subscribe to the pact of union of 433 because, though recognizing Cyril's orthodoxy, he did not want to accept the condemnation of Nestorius; he did subscribe to it at a later date, however. He was still alive in 444. We have some of his letters, which contain important information on events following the Council of Ephesus.

CPG 3, 6373-6385; PG 84, 649-720; ACO I, 1, 7,33-65; DHGE 2, 1604-1606; P. Evieux, André de Samosate. Un adversaire de Cyrille d'Alexandrie durant la crise nestorienne: REByz 32 (1974) 253-300; Grillmeier 1, 700-707.

M. Simonetti

ANEMIUS (d. 382/391). Bishop of *Sirmium. Fervent anti-*Arian, at the death of *Germinius (ca. 376) he was imposed by *Ambrose as bishop of Sirmium, in the context of a coordinated fight against the last Arian centers of *Illyricum and despite the opposition of the empress *Justina (Paulinus, Vita Ambr. 11). He always acted in accord with Ambrose, participating at the Council of *Aquileia (381) and the *Roman synod (382). He died before 391 and was succeeded by Cornelius.

E. Prinzivalli

ANGEL

I. Angelology - II. Iconography.

I. Angelology. The English term angel, with the respective words in the other Western languages, comes from angelus, which from the late 2nd c. (Vetus Latina, Tertull.) was adopted in Latin as a loan translation of the Greek word ἄγγελος. Initially these two terms expressed primarily a function, that of the messenger of God (see Aug., En. ps. 135,3: "Hence, they are much more correctly called Angels, which in Latin is Nuntii; for by the name of their office, not their substance, we may plainly understand that they desire us to worship that God whom they announce." See also Tertull. Carn. 14; Aug., En. ps. 103,3; 7,5; and other texts in DSp 1,581 and RAC 5,115). Gradually, however, angelus and ἄγγελος came to be the exclusive name for those beings that, according to the Jewish Christian tradition, exist between God and human beings, thereby becoming terms for nature; in scriptural usage (see Mt 25:41, Rev 12:9), they were thus applied also to evil spirits, i.e., *demons. Good angels, however, are never called demons (see Aug., Civ. Dei 9,19 and other texts in RAC 9,716-9,717). The passage of angel from the name of a function to a term used for a category of special beings is highly significant, indicating a development from a primarily *soteriological reflection, interested mainly in the relationship of angels with divine *providence, the mysteries of Jesus, the missionary work of the church and the daily lives of individual believers, to a deeper reflection on the origin and essential characteristics (apatheia, immortality, incorporeality, knowledge, freedom) of such heavenly beings. This long and difficult development has solid foundations in the biblical world. Almost every aspect of Christian angelology that has been accentuated through the centuries—the angels as the heavenly court; eternal adorers; ministers of Christ, Savior and head of the universe; mediators between God and human beings; protectors of the faithful and of peoples; models of intimate union with God; executors of the divine judgments—is solidly based on numerous testimonies of Sacred Scripture and the writings of later *Judaism. However, Christianity's conflict—and earlier that of Judaism's—with Greco-Roman antiquity undoubtedly conditioned the development of patristic doctrine on angels, and this not only at the predominantly negative level of the defense of the Jewish Christian heritage but also on the positive level of the reinterpretation of the traditional data in light of *philosophical thought and *pagan devotion and imagination. But external influences must not be exaggerated. The basic affirmation of the superiority of the one creator-God and the primacy of Christ with respect to the angels completely separates the Jewish Christian heritage from Hellenistic traditions (see RAC 5,115).

This complex evolution of Christian angelology, conditioned by the ever-changing cultural situations of the churches, can be explained in particular by the following factors: first of all, one must bear in mind the strong persistence of Jewish traditions in the Christian apocrypha of the OT and NT. The frequent reading of these writings, especially of the Ascension of Isaiah, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs*, the II Book of Enoch, the Apocalypse of Paul and the Shepherd of *Hermas (recognized by many as quasicanonical; see Vis. III, 4: the first reference to a hierarchy), kept alive the ancient *traditions on the origin of the angels and their role in the universe and in human life, described as descent and ascent (see Daniélou, I, 139-145; HDG 23-26). Not less important was the apologetic context of the 2nd c. Having not only to explain the incisive fact of the idolatry present everywhere but also to find a reason for the unjust persecution of so many faithful and to respond to the crucial accusation of atheism by the people, the *apologists, in particular *Justin Martyr, specified scriptural beliefs more precisely. On the one hand they said that demons, considered by the Jewish tradition as apostate angels, were behind the cult of idols and also caused the sufferings of the just, as they had always done (see Daniélou 2, 391-397). On the other hand, they noted that Christians themselves venerated, not only the *Father, the Son and the *Holy Spirit, but also the angels (Just., Apol. 1,6; Athenag. Leg. 10). Also notable is a certain reaction of the apologists against the excessive Jewish veneration of angels (Aristides, Apol. 14,4). In any case, according to the *Acts of the Martyrs the angels lead the martyrs into heaven, where their choir sings the trisagion (Pass. Perp. 11-13).

In the second half of the 2nd c. the polemic against *gnostic speculation gave the authors of the great church—in particular *Irenaeus of Lyons, who for the first time presents a detailed doctrine on angels (see HDG 28-31; TRE 600-601)—the occasion to emphasize the biblical truth that all angels are creatures of the one God, not demiurges and emanations from superior *aeons as the gnostics claimed, following *Platonic traditions (see Iren., Adv. haer. 11, 30,6-9). The representatives of Christian gnosis, led by *Origen, inserted these by then-traditional angelological convictions into a theological system, central to which were the problems of the origin of multiplicity and esp. of *evil (Orig., C. Cels. IV, 65), doctrines also taken up later in the anti-*Manichean polemic (see HDG, 45-46). Indeed, the first systematic theologian admitted among spiritual beings, as distinct from the *Trinity which alone is incorporeal, a privation that descends, in conformity with the gravity of the primordial sin, from the archangels, through angels and human beings, to demons (see Orig., De Princ. 1,8; C. Cels. 8,25). According to *Origen, angels are present everywhere in the universe: in nature, in nations and in the lives of individuals, with the purpose of combating demons (see Daniélou 2, 397-403).

Later discussions of Origen's system led in the 4th c. to a more exact determination of the difference of the angels with respect to both Christ and the Holy Spirit. Clearly associating the Word with God the creator, the anti-*Arian theologians also confirmed on the level of being the *Pauline doctrine, so dear to Irenaeus (see Adv. haer. III, 16,6), of Christ, head of the angels, thus eliminating any risk of the so-called angel-Christology, which, inspired by Jewish ideas, preferred to present Christ as an angel of the Lord (see RAC 5,148-5,149). Similarly *Basil of *Caesarea, following the *Nicene tradition, made it clear that the Holy Spirit was not to be numbered among the "ministering" spirits, i.e., the angels created by God as his ministers, but must be considered a "lordly" Spirit, indeed to be adored with the Father and the Son as Lord of all things, including angelic spirits (see the Constantinopolitan Creed that follows Basil: DS 150). For the bishop of *Caesarea, in fact, the angels were not only created by the Word but also perfected by the Holy Spirit (Basil. Hom. 32,4; De Spir. 16,38, see RAC 5,149).

Still in the 4th c., a period during which the Christian *liturgy was adapted more openly to the ideas and expressions of the mystery religions, bishops and preachers, esp. *Cyril of Jerusalem, *Ambrose, *John Chrysostom and *Theodore of Mopsuestia, delighted to emphasize the active presence of the angels in the liturgy itself, the mysterium tremendum (see TRE 601, and esp. Peterson, with Chrysostom, Hom. In Seraph. 3). The presence of the angels in the Christian liturgy has its roots, however, in earlier traditions (Clem. Alex., Exc. Thdt. 27,2; Origen, Or. 31,5; Apos. Trad. 4,36). Simultaneously, as the *monastic movement was spreading from *Egypt and *Palestine to all the churches of the *Roman Empire and beyond, the traditional views on the role of the angels in the ascetic struggle and in the spiritual *ascesis of the faithful was strongly reaffirmed. Indeed, the life of perfection began to be explicitly compared with angelic life, thus exalting consecrated virginity, constant vigilance and continual praise of God, as practiced by the *monks (see Frank, Cramer).

In the following two centuries, the closer encounter between Christianity and *Neoplatonism, by then the common *philosophy, stimulated *Augustine and ps.-*Dionysius to deepen the traditional doctrine on the nature and salvific functions of angels.

Augustine based his reflections on faith, attested by the Bible (En. Ps. 103,1,15: "We know by faith that angels exist, but we also read of their many appearances in Scripture and thus we hold that their existence is not to be doubted.") He is prudent in his investigation of the biblical data (see Ench. 58; Trin. III 1,5) but does offer further reflection on biblical angelology (see AugL 304). In particular he introduces a new problem, previously neglected, which will determine the whole later development of Western angelology (HDG 46ff.). Treating of angels esp. in the context of the *exegesis of Genesis (Gen. Lit. IV) and in that of the beginning of the history of the Duae Civitates (Civ. Dei XI), he focused his attention not only on the question of the moment of the angels' creation (Gen 1:1 or 1:3) but also on the problem of angelic knowledge. For Augustine, the angels have a triple knowledge of created things: they know them in the clear light of day before their creation, in the light of evening after their creation, and in the light of morning, in themselves and in their relation to the Word (Gen. Lit. IV, 22,39-24,41). In this context Augustine also shows his understanding of the sin and blessedness of the angels. Set over all corporeal creatures, angels either ascribe their knowledge of things to the glory of the Word, thus remaining in the light, or, overcome by pride, they turn to themselves, take pleasure in themselves and become darkness (see Gen. Lit. IV, 23,40-41). Though not arriving at a clear idea of the incorporeity of the angels (see RAC 5,121), Augustine, by uniting angelology with his analysis of intellectual knowledge in this doctrine of *illumination, i.e., of the spirit as a capacity to understand God, decisively influenced the direction of scholastic thought.

Not less decisive, though for different reasons, was the influence of ps.-Dionysius's angelology. Recognizing with *Proclus the angels as pure spirits (ὑπερκόσμιοι), this unknown early 6th-c. author divides them into nine choirs, constituting a scale of beings between God and humanity. According to this idea of hierarchy—to which he dedicated a special work, the De caelesti hierarchia—the superior beings (seraphim, cherubim and thrones), on the one hand, are nearest to the divinity; principalities, archangels and angels, on the other hand, more directly help the human hierarchy to raise itself to God. Finally dominions, virtues and powers form the intermediate orders. This whole celestial hierarchy exists in a double movement of descent and ascent. A cascade of light pours from above to below, reaching as far as humanity. The inferior orders, however, with human beings, raise themselves through purification, illumination and union toward the superior, reaching as far as the deity. This is the first systematic attempt to link angelology with the spiritual life of Christians. Through *Gregory the Great and *Maximus the Confessor (the latter, however, putting the Christ-man above all the angelic orders), this universal vision would become one of the bases of medieval angelological speculation.

Besides the Neoplatonic influences taken up by Augustine and ps.-Dionysius, also noteworthy are two perhaps secondary but nonetheless important facts. On the one hand, the development of the cult of *Mary, the Mother of God, led to placing her above the angels, who until then were considered nearest to God. In *Byzantine preaching, in fact, esp. in homilies on the annunciation and on the death of the Madonna, the angels themselves serve Mary and sing her praises (see John Dam., Hom. Dorm. I, 11-12 - RAC 5,153ff.; TRE 603). On the other hand, the iconoclast controversy gave to Byzantine theologians, and thus to the 2nd ecumenical Council of *Nicaea (787), the occasion to pronounce on the question of the incorporeal nature of angels. To justify angel images a certain corporeity was attributed to them, without however definitively resolving the problem (see HDG 59). Thus toward the end of the patristic era the statements of the primitive tradition on the place of the angels in salvation history, and their ministry in the life of Jesus and in that of the church, took on more precise contours. At the same time their nature was better defined. Though only a relative incorporeity was generally accepted—in relation to human beings, not to God—it was considered a doctrine of faith that the angels were spiritual beings which, contrary to evil spirits (the apostate angels), had freely decided for God (see the texts summarized by John Dam., Expos. 17-18 (II, 3-4), and Theod. Stud., *Or. in ss. Angelo*s: PG 99, 729-747).

To better understand this long and tortuous evolution of patristic angelology, determined by factors both internal and external to the Christian faith, it is helpful to bear in mind the angelological criteria that theologians gradually elaborated in their reflections on the scriptural and traditional data. In the first place, the principle of the *canonicity of the Sacred Scriptures that governs all theological work is particularly valid in angelology. Augustine says this explicitly, writing: "But we, following Scripture, according to which we are Christians, have learned that some of the angels are good, some bad, but never have we read of good demons" (Civ. Dei IX,19). More concretely, this means that angelology is principally based on faith in divine *revelation. This fundamental principle not only imposed reservations on pagan demonology but also required that certain, overly arbitrary opinions of the Jewish tradition be submitted to criticism. Thus the opinion of a carnal sin of the angels, based on Jewish exegesis of Gen 6:1-4 (see the texts in HDG 43, esp. Augustine, Civ. Dei XV,23), was gradually eliminated. Likewise the names of the archangels were reduced to the three mentioned in the canonical writings, in particular discarding the name of Uriel (see RAC 5,182-188, and the catalog of angelic names in RAC 5,206-239). In line with biblical faith, patristic angelology took especially seriously the absolute transcendence of God the creator.

This theological principle, operative esp. in the antignostic controversy, led theologians not only to expand the already-accepted doctrine of creatio ex nihilo, applying it also to the angels, as well as excluding that certain angels were created evil, but also to assert that the existence of evil spirits is to be explained as due to their completely free *apostasy. They also specified the veneration that could be given to angels (see Orig., C. Cels. VIII, 13; Aug., Ver. rel. 55,110), distinguishing them from the Word and from the Spirit, who alone constitute, with the Father, the incorporeal Trinity, the source of angelic life. Within the framework of the same cosmology another principle was brought forth having clearly biblical roots, but whose application was favored by extrabiblical, esp. *Platonic traditions, i.e., the principle of the hierarchy of all created beings. On this principle it was accepted that there are angels nearer to God, considered as his court and messengers, and at the same time beings who are above human beings and created before them. By the same principle of gradation it was also held that angels are corporeal in relation to God, but incorporeal in relation to human beings. Another no less fundamental principle played a similarly decisive role in this vexing problem of the corporeity of angels: the fact that angels appeared to the patriarchs, and still appear at times today, presupposes that they must in some way be corporeal beings (see RAC 5,121).

Finally, the idea that angels are superior to human beings and yet constitute, as God's creatures, a community among themselves, has guided all considerations on the relation between angels and human beings. On the one hand, inspired by some biblical suggestions (see Mt 18:10; 22:30), Christian authors quickly understood the angelic life as the ideal of evangelical existence, comparing first the martyrs (see the references to the Apostolic Fathers in HDG, 20) and then the monks to the angels, not without at times exaggerating the idea of the spiritualization of the perfect person, as, e.g., in the Origenist tradition. On the other hand, the conviction that the angels, though superior to human beings and not redeemed by Christ as they were, are nevertheless their relations and friends, engaged with them in the same battle between good and evil, led the Fathers to develop reflections on the ministry of the angels, both in service to the individual believer, esp. at the crucial moment of death, and as protectors of peoples and nations (see esp. Origen, Hom. Lk 34). Indeed, this persuasion, rooted so profoundly in the Bible itself, is at the basis of Augustine's doctrine of the Civitas Dei—composed of the good angels and humanity, the latter taking the place of the rebellious angels—and of ps.-Dionysius's speculations on the hierarchical universe.

DSp 1,580-625; 3,141-238; RAC 5,53-322 (bibl.); RAC 9,546-797 (bibl.); J. Barbel, Christos Angelos, Bonn 1941; R. Roques, L'univers Dionysien, Paris 1954; E. Peterson, Das Buch von den Engeln, Munich 1955; J. Daniélou, Théologie du Judéo-Christianisme (1), Tournai 1958 (It. tr. Bologna 1974); B. Lohse, Zu Augustins Engellehre: ZKG 70 (1959) 278-291; J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux II^e^ et III^e^ siècles (2), Tournai 1961 (It. tr. Bologna 1976); K.S. Frank, Angelikos Bios, Münster 1964; O. Lechner, Idee und Zeit in der Metaphysik Augustins, Munich 1964; W. Cramer, Die Engelvorstellungen bei Ephräm dem Syrer, Rome 1965; G. Tavard, Die Engel: HDG II/2b, Freiburg 1968 (bibl.); P. Agaësse - A. Solignac, Genèse au sens littéral: BA 48/9, Paris 1972; G. Tavard, Engel: TRE 9 (1982) 580-615, esp. 599-604; G. Madec, angelus: AugL I (1994) 303-315; LTK[3] 3, 648-649; RGG[4] 2 (1999) 1279-1290, esp. 1281-1282; A. Monaci Castagno: Orig. Diz. (2000) 6-15 (bibl.).

B. Studer

II. Iconography. There is no fixed *iconography for representing angels in the figurative repertoire of the oldest Christian art. At least until the 5th c. the figure of the divine messenger does not seem to show specific individual traits, instead being distinguished by the role and position it occupies in given figurative contexts. Where we can detect their presence with certainty, angels appear in generic terms, no different from those in which sacred persons in general are depicted: they are shown as young, androgynous figures without wings or nimbus, usually beardless and dressed in tunic and pallium. Angels are depicted thus in some OT themes in which, like the biblical narratives, they form an integral part of the figurative context: in scenes of the sacrifice of Isaac, the angel restrains Abraham's arm, which holds a knife (Rome, *sarcophagus of the Studio Canova, 4th c., Ws pl. 184,2); in the episode of the three young Jews in the furnace of Babylon the angel is among the flames, representing the divine intervention that renders the fire ineffective (Ws pls. 181,3; 201,2; Wp pls. 137,1; 231,1); in the depiction of *Daniel in the lions' den the angel brings him a basket of loaves signed with a cross (Rome, "dogmatic" sarcophagus, Ws pl. 96); in the scene of Balaam the angel is on the ass (Rome, hypogeum of via D. Compagni: Ferrua, pl. 104). A final example of wingless angels appears in the cemetery of St. Sebastian, formerly called the cemetery of Vigna Chiaraviglio, where, in a triumphal iconographic context on the wall of an arcosolium, two angels (identified by the inscription angelus) are positioned on two registers to the right of a scene depicting Christ on the throne flanked by two apostles (Estivill 1997, 6-7).

Only toward the end of the 4th c. do some specific elements gradually begin to appear, such as wings, nimbus and long garment, that will later become characteristic of the *iconography of angels (an early example of disputed date: two angels holding a crown with christogram on the Sarigüzel sarcophagus at Constantinople: D. Talbot Rice, Arte di Bisanzio, Florence 1959, pl. 9. One of the oldest examples is on the Pignatta sarcophagus at *Ravenna: see most recently, P. Testini, FR 1977, 321ff.). Such attributes, taken from the Nike and winged cupid of classical art (M. Sannibale - P. Liverani, The Classical Origins of Angel Iconography, in A. Duston - A. Nesselrath [eds.], Angels from the Vatican: The Invisible Made Visible, Catalogo della Mostra, Alexandria 1998, 62-71), consistently recur only from the late 5th and early 6th c. In the 5th and 6th c., directly linked to patristic exegesis, the figure of the angel is at times depicted with red clothes and flesh, signifying their nature of ethereal fire (Kirschbaum, L'angelo rosso, 213-215): thus they appear in the triumphal arch of St. Mary Maggiore at Rome (5th c.) and in St. Apollinaris Nuovo at Ravenna (6th c.). In the great decorative cycles of churches, angels occupy a place of preeminence with respect to other sacred figures: they precede the saints and are placed immediately next to the enthroned Christ (Ravenna, St. Vitale, 6th c.) or the triumphal cross (Parentium, Euphrasian basilica, 6th c.). They often hold a long baculus, marking them as ostiarii of the church, more rarely a thurible (Bawit, chapel of St. Apollo, 6th c.) or an orb (Kiti, church of the Panaghia Angelikistos, 6th-7th c.). Of the angelic hierarchies, Christian iconography depicted only two types: archangels and cherubim. The first, in the persons of Michael, Raphael and Gabriel, are characterized by the dress of court dignitaries and are depicted as guardians of the presbyterial area of the church; sometimes, as in the mosaics of St. Vitale at Ravenna (6th c.) and of the church of the Dormition at *Nicaea, they carry a standard with the "trisagion" of the Greek *Mass. In the West the cherubim are given the appearance of the four living creatures of Rev 4:6-7; in the East, the four heads and four wings of Ezek 1:10.

G. Stuhlfauth, Die Engel in der altchristlichen Kunst, Freiburg 1897; E. Kirschbaum, L'angelo rosso e l'angelo turchino: RivAC 17 (1940) 209-249; Th. Klauser, Engel (in der Kunst): RAC 5, 258-295; Engel: LCI I, 626-642; D.E. Estivill, La imagen del angel en la Roma del siglo IV: estudio de iconología, Rome 1994; D.E. Estivill, Un contributo per lo studio dell'iconografia degli angeli nel secolo IV: Arte Cristiana 85, 778 (Jan.-Feb. 1997) 3-10; R. Giuliani, s.v. Angelo: TIP 106-109; EAM 1,629-638; G. Peers, Subtle Bodies: Representing Angels in Byzantium, Berkeley, CA 2001.

C. Carletti

ANGERS, Council of. Under the presidency of *Eustochium, bishop of *Tours, seven bishops who had come to Angers for the episcopal ordination of *Thalassius (4 October 453) promulgated twelve disciplinary canons, mainly on the duties of clerics.

CCL 148, 137-139; Hfl-Lecl 2,2,883-886; Palazzini 1,37s.

Ch. Munier

ANIANUS (Aignan) of Orléans (d. after 451). Various ancient sources, such as *Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. VIII, 15), the Vita s. Ariani, the Vita s. Genovefae 42 and *Gregory of Tours (Franc. II, 7), tell us of Anianus, noted esp. for having organized the defense of his episcopal city of Orléans against *Attila, contributing to his defeat. Gregory attributes the salvation of Orléans to the prayers sent up to God by Anianus until the arrival of Aetius with his army. Feast 7 December.

A. Loyen, Le rôle de saint Aignan dans la défense d'Orléans: CRAI, Paris 1969, 64-74; G. Renaud, Les traditions de l'Église d'Orléans sur ses saints évêques Euverte et Aignan. Vies, miracles, cultes: AEHE, IVe sect., Paris 1973 (Extrait des positions de thèses); Cath 1,1239f.; BS 1,1258.

S. Zincone

ANICETUS, pope (155–166). Born at *Emesa in *Syria to a certain John, according to the LP (I, 134). The same source, citing *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. III, 3, 3), says his pontificate lasted 3 years. Anicetus is thought to have been bishop of *Rome from 155–166. The Roman church must have been very lively during his pontificate, given the presence and visits of various important personages: *Justin Martyr, *Tatian, *Hegesippus (Eus., HE IV,11,7; IV,22,3). *Polycarp was also at Rome to discuss with Anicetus the question of the date of *Easter. The two talked at length, calmly and without rigidity on the part of either. No agreement was reached, but Polycarp departed from Anicetus in peace and friendship nonetheless (Iren., Epist. ad Vict., in Eus., HE IV,15; V,24,14-17). Polycarp also met with various *heretics during his stay, leading them back to orthodoxy (Iren., Adv. haer. III,3,4). Anicetus also fought heresies vigorously, especially the *gnosticism of *Valentinus and *Marcion, in Rome at the time to spread their doctrines (Iren., Adv. haer. III,4,3; Tertull., Adv. Marc. I,19). According to the LP, Anicetus authored some disciplinary decrees. *Martyred during the persecution of Antoninus 17 April.

P. Hinschius, Decretales pseudo-Isidorianae et Capitula Angilramni..., Leipzig 1862, 120-122; LP I, 58-59 and 134; G. Bardy, L'Église romaine sous le pontificat de saint Anicet: RSR 17 (1927) 496-501; DHGE 3, 280-281; BS I, 1259-1263 (F. Caraffa); N. Brox, Le conflict entre Anicet et Polycarpe: Concilium 71 (1972) 35-42; LTK3 1, 678; EPapi I, 222-224 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

ANICIA JULIANA (d. 528). *Valentinian-Theodosian princess, born and lived at *Constantinople ca. 463–528. Noted in late-ancient *Roman, *Byzantine and early Christian history for three main reasons: (1) the exceptional nobility of her ancestry, family and relatives; (2) her commitment to defending the church's unity and *Chalcedonian orthodoxy; (3) her intensive construction activity, especially Christian buildings.

On her father's side Anicia Juliana descended from the gens Anicia, one of the earliest families of the Roman patriciate. She was the only daughter of Flavius Anicius Olybrius, the fourth-last emperor of the West. The dignity of primicerius (or domesticus) was conferred on another family member, Maximus, by the *Goth Theodatus, cousin of Amalasuntha and king of Italy (534–536). In 541 Anicius Faustus Albinus Basilius would become in his turn the last ordinary console nominated by *Justinian. Her mother's side was of still higher nobility: she was the daughter of Placidia the Younger, descendant of no less than five of the most illustrious emperors: *Valentinian III (Anicia Juliana's grandfather), *Theodosius II, *Constantius, *Arcadius and *Theodosius I. Not by chance did complacent Byzantine poets of the day exalt the most noble Anicia Juliana as daughter, granddaughter and great-granddaughter of Roman emperors West and East (see Anthologia Palatina, I,10,7; ed. Watz, I [Paris 1928], 16).

As mentioned, Anicia Juliana was also famous as an outstanding representative of Christianity in the late Roman period and early *Byzantine Empire. The Anici family was among the first and most notable *pagan senatorial familes to embrace the Christian faith; regarding the Christian merits of this gens, it is not insignificant that a personage of the importance of Severinus *Boethius (Anicia Juliana's contemporary) belonged to one of its many branches. Beyond the Anici family, two other of Anicia Juliana's relatives noteworthy in a religious sense were *Theodosius I, who with the Edict of *Thessalonica defended *Nicene *orthodoxy with great authority and efficacy, and St. *Pulcheria (daughter of the emperor *Arcadius and herself empress: 450–453), who opposed *Nestorians and *monophysites and brought an austere morality to the court. Following in their wake, Anicia Juliana was also a fervent Christian and champion of orthodoxy. In 519 she authoritatively backed the composition of the *Acacian *schism, promoted from a *Chalcedonian, antimonophysite and pro-Roman perspective by pope *Hormisdas and the emperor *Justin I, who was advised in that direction by his nephew, the future emperor *Justinian.

Anicia Juliana also continued the pious imperial tradition of her ancestors—including *Galla Placidia, *Eudoxia and Licinia Eudoxia, her maternal aunt—as a generous promoter and financer of Christian religious buildings. At least the following construction works (all at *Constantinople) were hers: she carried out or completed decoration of the Church of St. Euphemia, building a *monastery next to it; she had the Church of St. Polyeuktus rebuilt and decorated; she built the Church of the Theotokos on the Asiatic coast of the Bosporus; and she very probably also built St. Stephen in Zeugma, near the Constantinianae quarter.

A. Premerstein, Anicia Juliana im Wiener Dioskorides-Kodex Med. gr. 1: Jahrbuch der Kunsthist. Sammlungen des allerhochsten. Kaiserhauses 24 (1903) 105-124; H. Grégoire, Saint' Euphémie et l'empereur Maurice: Muséon 59 (1946) 300; C. Bertelli, Anicia Giuliana: Diz. dell'Arte Antica I (Rome 1958) 394-396; C. Mango - I. Sevecenko, Remains of the Church of St. Polyeuktos at Constantinople: Dumbarton Oaks Papers 15 (1961) 243-247; 21 (1967) 276; C. Capizzi, Anicia Giuliana (463 ca.–528 ca.). Ricerche sulla sua famiglia e la sua vita: Studi Bizantini and Neoellenici n.s. 4/XIV (1968) 191-226; R.M. Harrison, The Church of St. Polyeuktos in Constantinople: An Excavation Report, in Akten des VII. Internationalen Kongresses für christliche Archäologie, Trier 5-11 September 1965, Vatican City-Berlin 1969, 543-549; C. Capizzi, Anicia Giuliana e il suo intervento nell'unione ecclesiastica del 519, in Atti del I Congresso Internazionale sulle Relazioni fra le due Sponde Adriatiche (Brindisi-Lecce- Taranto 15-18 ottobre 1971), Lecce 1973, 49-86; Id., L'attività edilizia di Anicia Giuliana, in Collectanea Byzantina (OCA 204), Rome 1977, 119-146; P. Speck, Juliana Anicia, Konstantin der Grosse und die Polieuktoskirche in Konstantinopel: Poikila Byzantinà 11/ Varia III (Berlin 1993), 111-147; C. Capizzi, Giuliana: la committente (ca. 463–ca. 528), Milan 1997.

M. Spinelli

ANICIA JULIANA, widow (4th-5th c.). Wife of the consul and senator Olybrius, daughter-in-law of Anicia Faltonia Proba, famous as the mother of *Demetrias. After her husband's early death in the sack of *Rome at the hands of the *Goths (410), she fled to *Carthage, where she distinguished herself by charitable works. There her daughter Demetrias created a stir by renouncing a brilliant marriage and consecrating herself to God. Letters of congratulations written on this occasion to Anicia Juliana by Pope *Innocent I (PL 20, 518-519) and *Augustine (Ep. 150, CSEL 44, 380-382) have reached us; *Jerome, in the letter Ad Demetriadem, calls her "holy mother" (Ep. 130, CSEL 56/1, 177). Augustine dedicated the De bono viduitatis (CSEL 41,303-343) to her, and later wrote a letter (Ep. 188, CSEL 57,119-130) warning her of *Pelagius's short treatise Ad Demetriadem, which was circulating anonymously. Two notes from *John Chrysostom (Ep. 168-169, PG 52, 709) have also reached us, one to Anicia Juliana and the other to Faltonia Proba.

PLRE I, 468; G. Mariani, Sant'Agostino guida spirituale. Lettere del vescovo di Ippona a Proba, Giuliana e Demetriade, Rome 1982.

G. Pani

ANIMA MUNDI. Even in the pre-Socratic tradition, there are indications of the notion of an anima mundi, based on an analogical relation between microcosm (man) and macrocosm (world). But the only clear, organized theory of the doctrine of the cosmic soul, as the universal principle of harmony and the life of the All, is offered by *Plato in the Timaeus, which depicts the cosmos as "living, animated and intelligent" (30 b), being composed of a body endowed with a *soul and an intellect, perfect in all its parts because it is the best possible image of the transcendental level of the ideas. The universal soul, prior to the cosmic "body," participates in rationality and harmony; endowed with a circular movement, it is the principle of knowledge, the intermediary between intelligible and sensible reality. This notion was received and elaborated in the later *Platonic tradition, with various results, until arriving at *Plotinus's formula of the third principle, after the One and Nous, being the universal soul which, in its mediating function between the intelligible and sensible worlds, originates the cosmic soul and individual souls, through which it exercises its function of ordering matter to produce sensible beings. This Platonic doctrine, which likely used suggestions and themes already present in Pythagorean circles, is at the basis of a wide and varied speculative tradition with strong religious connotations. In fact, linked to the notion of the divine character of the heavenly bodies, inasmuch as they too are endowed with a soul, as is explicitly expressed in the Epinomis, it developed into intense forms of "cosmic *mysticism." The harmony of the cosmos, a reflection of the ordering action of the divine soul, offers itself to the devout contemplation of the wise person who thereby attains to knowledge of the divinity, conceived sometimes as transcendent but more often as immanent to the Great All, precisely as its soul. In *Stoicism, the doctrine of Logos and Pneuma as the divine principle of rationality, immanent in the cosmos and bond of the All, was sometimes expressed in Platonic terms as equivalent to the notion of an anima mundi. This notion is also present in other philosophical contexts; e.g., Philodemus called the Logos "world soul," and Plutarch closely linked this universal soul to the Nous, saying that to be able to order and hold united the great body of the cosmos, it must participate in intellect, logismos and harmony (De animae procreat. in Tim. VI, 1014 E). *Philo of Alexandria's doctrine of the Logos blended biblical elements (Wisdom as intermediary and instrument of creation), Platonic doctrines (intelligible model of sensible reality) and the Stoic notions of Logos and Pneuma. From the latter, Philo's Logos derives its character of universal "bond" (desmos), i.e., the element of cohesion and harmony of cosmic reality (see De fuga et inv. 112; De plant. 8).

The process by which the attributes of the Stoic Logos and Pneuma were transferred to the originally Platonic anima mundi and also Philo's doctrine of the Logos, which saw Stoic and Platonic categories assumed into a biblical context, helps us understand the position of those 2nd-c. Christian authors who transferred this complex of notions to the person of the Son-Logos, often in the framework of a particular symbolism of the *cross. Thus *Justin Martyr, explicitly citing Tim. 30 b-c, declares that the Greek philosopher speaks of the Son-Logos when he describes the X shape of the anima mundi (I Apol. 60,1). Recalling the bronze cross raised by *Moses (Num 21:8), a figure of the cross of Christ, the apologist says that the Greek *philosopher, misunderstanding the biblical text, "expresses the theory that the second virtue after God, the first principle, was arranged as an X in the universe." With implict reference to the Platonic doctrine, an analogous symbolism of the cross as a figure of the universal presence of the Word of God is developed in a passage of *Irenaeus's Proof of the Apostolic Preaching, which says that he "in an invisible form is diffused in us and in the whole world, whose length and breadth and height and depth he encompasses, since by God's Word everything is administered and governed, and in these the Son of God was crucified, imprinted on the universe in the form of a cross" (ch. 34, tr. by E. Bellini, Milan 1979, 502). The notion of the cross of Christ as cosmic bond is also presented in some *apocryphal texts (Martyrdom of Andrew, ch. 14; Acts of John, ch. 99), confirming that the idea was widespread in primitive Christianity. *Gnosticism also developed its own symbolism of the cross, understood as a "limit" between the level of the pleroma and that of the cosmos. This notion is also derived from the Timaeus, where the cosmic soul assumes the appearance of an X, since it is made up of the intersection of the two spheres, that of the planets and that of the fixed stars on the ecliptic.

A.-J. Festugière, La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, II, Le dieu cosmique, Paris 1949; J. Moreau, L'âme du monde de Platon aux Stoïciens, Paris 1939; repr. Hildesheim-New York 1971.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

ANISIUS (d. 410). Bishop of *Thessalonica, disciple and successor of *Acholius, saint. Feast 30 December. The letter of *Siricius of *Rome was addressed to him (Ep. 4, PL 13, 1148-1149), in which it was established that, in the case of internal conflicts among the bishops of *Illyricum, the final decision belongs to the bishop of Thessalonica: he will later be considered by Pope *Leo the Great as a precedent of the apostolic vicariate. Anisius looked to *Ambrose of Milan, who in turn esteemed Anisius greatly (Ep. 15-16). Ambrose, in a letter that has also been attributed to Siricius (Ep. 9, PL 13, 1176-1178), stresses Anisius's role in the Synod of *Capua (391/392) against *Bonosus. Anisius, though condemning Bonosus, confirmed the ordinations performed by him, a concession later revoked by *Innocent I. Anisius was also a friend of *John Chrysostom, actively supporting him in the West (John Chrys., Ep. 162-163). Died ca. 410.

R. Aignain, DHGE 3,909-910; BS 1,1267-1268; E. Cavalcanti, Siricio, santo, in EPapi I, 375-381.

E. Prinzivalli

ANNIANUS, chronicler (4th-5th c.). The little information we have on Annianus (Ἀννιανος, Ἀνιανος) and his chronographic work, now lost to us, is provided by the 9th-c. *Byzantine historian George Syncellus in his Chronography (see ed. Venice 1729, 59-61). E. Honigmann identifies Annianus with the deacon of Celeda. An Egyptian *monk who lived early 5th c. under the emperor *Arcadius and the pontificate of *Theophilus of *Alexandria, Annianus composed a chronographic work that went from Adam to the 22nd year of the episcopate of *Theophilus at Alexandria (ca. 407), and was later extended to 412. Syncellus attests that Annianus criticized inaccuracies in *Eusebius of Caesarea's chronology; from Syncellus we also learn that Annianus put the birth of Jesus in the year 5501 from the creation; that he began the year on 1 January and not with the spring equinox, as did *Anatolius of *Laodicea (d. 258), or 29 August, as did the Alexandrian chronology from 304 on; and that he put the passion on 23 March, fifteenth day of the moon, in conformity with the synoptic chronography, and the resurrection on 25 March (of 5534)—25 March is also the date of the creation— the date that became traditional in *Byzantine chronography. Annianus's chronography also included an *Easter cycle of 532 years, with commentary. George Syncellus praises Annianus for his conciseness, diligence and fidelity to the apostolic and patristic *tradition.

CPG 5537; see G. Dindorf, Georgius Syncellus et Nicephorus Constantinopolitanus, CSHB, Bonn 1829, vol. 1, 61.3-5, 62.2-5, 19, 64.15, 66.1-2, 597.12; L. Dindorf, Chronicon Paschale, CSHB, Bonn 1832, vol. 2, 112-116; E.W. Brooks, Eliae Metropolitae Nisibeni opus chronologicum, CSCO Scr. Syr. 3,7, Paris 1910, 16-17, 26-28 (Syriac text), 7-8, 15-16 (Eng. tr.); J.-B. Chabot, Chronique de Michel le Syrien, Paris 1899, vol. 1, 2-5, 9, 17, 35, 56, 61, 89, 116; vol. 2, Paris 1901, 358 (Fr. tr.); E. Bratke, Zwei Fragmente aus Annianos und der Anfang des Weihnachtsfestes in Aegypten: Neue Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie 1 (1902) 110-154; P. Bedjan, Abu'l-Faradj Barhebraeus, Chronicon Syriacum, Paris 1890, 3, 14-17, 25, 36, 37 = Chronography, English Translation by E.A. Wallis Budge, London 1932, 3, 13, 15, 16, 19, 25, 39, 40; K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur, Munich ²1897, 338, 340, 341, 405; P. Batiffol, Anciennes littératures chrétiennes. La littérature grecque, Paris 1897, 226-227; DHGE 3,282; E. Honigmann, Annianus Deacon of Celeda (415 A.D.), in Patristic Studies, ST 173, Vatican City 1953, 54-58; Id., Le prétendu "moine Athénée" en réalité le chronographe Annianos: Annuaire de l'Institut de philologie de l'histoire orientales et slaves 12 (1952) = PAGKARPEIA Mélanges H. Grégoire, vol. 4, Brussels 1953, 177-180 n. 3; V. Grumel, Traité d'Etudes Byzantines, I, La Chronologie, Paris 1958, 92-94; W. Adler, Time Immemorial: Archaic History and Its Sources in Christian Chronography from Julius Africanus to George Syncellus, Dumbarton Oaks Studies 26, Washington D.C. 1989, 72-105; Patrologia V, 346.

V. Loi

ANNIANUS of Celeda (d. after 419). "Anianus in MSS"; deacon of an unidentified place. Shortly after 418 (Primmer 285) Annianus translated two works of *John Chrysostom into *Latin: the 7 homilies De laudibus s. Pauli apostoli (CPG 4344) and perhaps all of the Homiliae in Matthaeum (CPG 4424; only homilies 1-25 survive). In his dedicatory epistles to these two translations, one to Evangelius the presbyter (PG 50, 471-472) and the other to bishop Orontius (Primmer 279-282; see PG 58, 975-978), Annianus makes clear his opposition to *Augustine's *traducianism. Chronology and theological positions coincide with *Jerome's accusation of *Pelagianism against him in 419 (Epist. 143: CSEL 56, 293; see PL 22, 1181), though Annianus did not distort his translations toward Pelagianism. It is not proven that Annianus translated other works of Chrysostom or the homily Ad neophytos (CPG 4467) used by *Julian of Eclanum. The hypothesis that Annianus composed the Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum seems doubtful.

CPL 771-772; PCBE 2,141f.; DTC 1,1303-1305; Patrologia III, 464-465; H. Musurillo, John Chrysostom's Homilies on Matthew and the Version of Annianus: Kyriakon. Festschrift Johannes Quasten, I, Münster 1970, 452-460; R. Skalitzky, Annianus of Celeda: His Text of Chrysostom's "Homilies on Matthew": Aevum 45 (1971) 208-233 (with the crit. ed. of Hom 17); A. Primmer, Die Originalfassung von Anianus' Epistula ad Orontium: Antidosis. Festschrift für Walther Kraus, Vienna . . . 1972, 278-289; A. Piédagnel, Jean Chrysostome, Panégyriques de s. Paul . . . (SC 300), Paris 1982, 98-99 n. 5; S.J. Voicu, Le prime traduzioni latine di Crisostomo, in Cristianesimo Latino e cultura Greca sino al sec. IV. XXI Incontro di studiosi dell'antiquity cristiana, Rome, 7-9 May 1992 (SEA 42), Rome 1993, 397-415 (406-407); F.W. Schlatter, The Author of the Opus Imperfectum in Matthaeum: VC 42 (1988) 364-375; K. Cooper, An(n)ianus of Celeda and the Latin Readers of John Chrysostom: SP 27, Louvain 1993, 249-255 (doctrinal differences between Annianus and the Opus imperfectum).

S.J. Voicu

ANNUNCIATION (iconography). Scenes of the annunciation appeared in the Christian iconographical repertoire in the mid-3rd c. at a time when theological reflection on the mystery of the *incarnation was particularly active in the church of *Rome (E. Dal Covolo, Tematiche cristologiche nell'età dei Severi: Bessarione 6 [1988] 71-87); the artistic depictions were almost a figurative "translation" of the larger theological discussion. Attributed to that date is the pictorial decoration of a cubicle of one of the oldest nuclei of the catacomb of *Priscilla on the Via Salaria, now more accessible because of recent restorations (Nestori, 24 n. 15; B. Mazzei, Il cubicolo dell'Annunciazione nelle catacombe di Priscilla. Nuove osservazioni alla luce dei recenti restauri, in RivAC 75 [1999] 233-280). At the center of the vault is the image of the Virgin seated on a throne; at her right hand with his arm extended to her stands the archangel Gabriel, without wings according to the earliest *angelic *iconography. A similar scene reappears in two other later catacomb frescoes, one from the first decades of the 4th c. in the catacomb of Via Dino Compagni (Ferrua, Via Latina, 42, pl. III), also recently restored making the details more discernible, and the other, almost contemporary, in the catacomb of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter on the Via Labicana (Nestori, 50

n. 17). With these two pictures, however, unlike that of Priscilla, the depiction is inserted in cyclically conceived decorative contexts, the first with Marian themes and the second *christological. In the former, in fact, it is the insertion of the scenes into a Marian cycle in the anonymous hypogeum of Via Dino Compagni—a cycle that includes a depiction of the adoration of the *magi and probably one of the testing of the bitter waters, as a rereading of the frescoes after restorations suggests—that recommends its interpretation as a scene of the annunciation and not simply a scene of prophecy. All three cases lack any material descriptive element: the scene is extremely synthetic, as is for that matter the description of the episode in Luke's gospel (1:26-38), the only NT source that refers to it. These are the only examples of the annunciation in the iconographic repertoire of *cemetery painting.

In the early 5th c. a scene of the annunciation appears in the decoration of a *sarcophagus at *Ravenna called the "sarcophagus of Elisha the prophet" or the "Pignatta sarcophagus" (P. Testini, Su una discussa figurazione del sarcofago detto del profeta Eliseo o Pignatta, in FR 113-114 [1977] 321-327, fig. 2); unlike the images painted in the catacombs, the scene is replete with details that contribute to its interpretation. Mary is seated, spinning purple cloth that she draws from a wicker basket at her feet. Beside her is the angel—winged, in one of the earliest examples in Western iconography of this feature. The depiction is inspired by the account of the annunciation given in the apocryphal gospels of the infancy, and esp. the Protevangelium of James (XI,1-3), a Greek text perhaps of *Coptic origin, ca. 200. The *apocryphal narrations of the Protevangelium of James, as later those of the gospel of Pseudo-Matthew (IX,2) and the *Armenian gospel of the infancy (V,3), describe Mary in her house at the moment of the angel's annunciation, intent on spinning purple for the temple. For the annunciation, as with other scenes of the cycle of the infantia Salvatoris, because of the conciseness of the canonical text, the artists almost always used details from the apocyrphal gospels, which circulated widely beginning esp. from the 4th c. (see J.E. Weis-Liebersdorf, Christus und Apostelbilder. Einfluss der Apokryphen auf die ältesten Kunsttypen, Freiburg im Br. 1902; F. Bisconti, Letteratura patristica ed iconografia paleocristiana, in Complementi interdisciplinari di patrologia, ed. A. Quacquarelli, Rome 1989, 405ff.; E. Jastrzebowska, Bild und Wort: Das Marienleben und Kindheit Jesu in der christlichen Kunst vom 4. bis 8. Jh. und ihre apokryphen Quellen, Warsaw 1992). Their influence was even felt in the mosaic decoration of the triumphal arch of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome, a votive construction promised by Pope *Sixtus III (432–440). In that mosaic Mary, dressed in garments of gold and arrayed with jewels like a basilissa (queen), sits before a building (the temple or Joseph's house?) intent on spinning purple, surrounded by a guard of four angels, three standing beside her and one flying and pointing out a dove (the *Holy Spirit) who descends from heaven (C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956, pls. XLIX-LII). The same apocryphal sources also inspired, among others, the scene depicted in the mosaic of the Euphrasian basilica of Parentium, ca. mid-6th c., in which the annunciation seems to take place in front of a basilica (that of Nazareth, built over the site of Mary's house?) (Wellen, Theotokos, pl. 6c), and that on the reredos panel of the ivory cathedra of *Maximian at Ravenna from the time of *Justinian: in this depiction Mary is shown against the background of a tympanic building, perhaps her house, seated on a high wicker seat with footrest, spindles in hand and a basket of wool at her feet; before her, in an attitude of adlocutio, is the announcing angel with a rod in his left hand, symbol of his authority (C. Cecchelli, La cattedra di Massimiano ed altri avorii romano-orientali, Rome 1936, 151-154, pl. XXII).

Between the 5th and 6th c. the episode of the annunciation to Mary intent on spinning purple for the temple appears among the frescoes of Bawit in Egypt (G. Roquet, La réception de l'image et du texte à motifs d'apocryphes dans les chrétientés d'Egypte et de Nubie: Apocrypha 2 [1991] 181-215) and, in more concise forms, in a long series of works of ivory linked to Eastern culture: including the Etschmiadzin gospelbook (W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1976, n. 142, pl. 75), the so-called Diptych of St. Lupicinus (Volbach, op. cit., n. 145, pl. 77), the Berlin Pyx (Volbach, op. cit., n. 174, pl. 88) and that of Cleveland (Volbach, op. cit., n. 184, pl. 92), all datable to the 6th c. The same iconographic scene also appears in some jewelry, including a medallion of the State Museum of Berlin (A. Grabar, Christian Iconography. A Study of its Origin, Princeton 1961, fig. 247) and the two gold amulets, found at Adana, of the Archaeological Museum of Istanbul (Grabar, Christian Iconography, fig. 248); in small works of metallurgy, such as some small ampoules, datable to ca. mid-6th c., from Bobbio and Monza (A. Grabar, Ampoules de Terre Sainte (Monza, Bobbio), Paris 1958, pls. 5, 6, 48, 49, 50, 51), and two 7th-c. Syro-Palestinian bronze censors (A. St. Clair, in Age of Spirituality, ed. K. Weitzmann, New York 1979, nn. 563, 564); and in woven decoration, as a fragment of silk at the Sacred Vatican Museum (Grabar, Christian Iconography, fig. 249). The theme of the annunciation also frequently appears among scenes depicted in illustrated codices: some of the oldest examples are in the Rabbula gospel-book (Cod. Syriac 56) in the Laurentian Library at Florence, dated 586 (H.L. Kessler, Rabula Gospel, in Age of Spirituality, 495ff.), and in the Syriac Bible of the National Library of Paris (Cod. Syriac 33), also 6th c. (H. Omont, Miniatures des plus anciens manuscrits grecs de la Bibliothèque Nationale du IVe au XIVe siècle, Paris 1929).

The apocryphal theme of the annunciation to Mary intent on spinning purple was certainly more common in the East; it still appears in the West in the 7th-8th c., included with other episodes from the life of the Virgin in the frescoes of S. Maria foris portas, at Castelseprio (Varese) (K. Weitzmann, The Fresco Cycle of S. Maria di Castelseprio, Princeton 1951), probably done by Egyptians or Syro-Palestinians, and among those of the Church of S. Maria Antiqua at Rome, where the theme of the annunciation appears in the decoration of the apse—on the walls of the so-called palimpsest, in a layer dated between the last decades of the 6th or first decades of the 7th c. (M. Andaloro, in G. Matthiae, Pittura romana del Medioevo, Rome 1987, 249-250), and on a pillar on which two depictions of the annunciation, perhaps of the same iconographic scheme, succeeded one another between the 7th and early 8th c. (Matthiae, Pittura romana del Medioevo, 100-102).

The Protevangelium of James (XI,1-3), Pseudo-Matthew (IX,1-2) and the Armenian Gospel of the Infancy (V,1-8) also have an annunciation at a well where Mary has gone to draw water; though rare, there are also depictions of this episode (Bisconti, Letteratura patristica ed iconografia paleocristiana, 406). It is perhaps already present—but the interpretation of the scene is very uncertain—in the decoration of the cover of the mid-4th-c. sarcophagus of Adelphia, found in the cemetery of St. John at Syracuse, in which the well is personified by a bearded head (S.L. Agnello, Il sarcofago di Adelfia, Vatican City 1956, fig. 27); in the early 5th c. it appears in a small ivory plaque of the Victoria and Albert Museum of London (Volbach, op. cit., n. 118, pl. 62), then in an ivory *diptych of the Treasury of the Duomo of Milan, second half 5th c. (Volbach, op. cit., n. 119, pl. 63) and in a terracotta tondo in the Monza Treasury, mid-6th c. (Grabar, Ampoules de Terre Sainte, pl. 31).

DACL 1, 2255ff.; G. Millet, Recherches sur l'iconographie de l'Evangile, Paris 1916, 67ff.; G.A. Wellen, Theotokos. Eine ikonographische Abhandlung über das Gottesmutterbild in frühchristlicher Zeit, Utrecht-Antwerpen 1961, 37ff.; J.H. Emminghauus, s.v. Verkündingung an Maria: LCI IV (1972), cols. 422-437; A. Ghidoli, s.v. Annunciazione, in Enciclopedia dell'arte medievale, II, Rome 1991, 40-46; F.P. Massara, TIP 111-113.

M. Marinone

ANOINTING. For the first Christians, the "Anointed One" by antonomasia was *Jesus Christ, the Crucified One, the Risen One: christos, messias. "God anointed him with the *Holy Spirit and with power" (Acts 10:38). He said of himself: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me; for this reason he has anointed me" (Lk 4:18). Within these expressions, a readily understood metaphor reappears in the culture of the ancient Mediterranean world, and especially that of the Jewish-*Hellenistic world. Anointings were commonly performed not only in secular contexts "to cure physical maladies, to alleviate them or bring restoration," but also in the religious sphere for the consecration of objects and for the appointment of individuals to important offices (PWK 17,2 [1998] 2454-2474). The symbolic meaning of the gesture was also well known. This also held for the OT: Saul and *David were anointed kings; *Aaron and his sons, priests. In the translated sense, the infusion of the Spirit into the prophets was referred to as an "anointing" (DACL 6/2, 2777). All of this found its fulfillment in the "anointed one" par excellence, Jesus the Messiah, the Christ (christos). His anointing by the Spirit was therefore conferred upon all Christians (see 2 Cor 1:21ff.). In the NT only the symbolic meaning was directly considered. Later this is rather clear in *Ephrem the Syrian's hymns that were dedicated to the theme of oil (De virgin. IV, 8 and 7). Nevertheless, the disciples truly did anoint the sick with oil (Mk 6:13), and we learn from the anointing of the Lord by the sinning woman and the woman in Bethany how it could be considered something that was generally practiced. But above all, in Jas 5:14-16 mention is made of an anointing of the sick with oil in the name of the Lord for their healing and deliverance from sin. Here, at the very least, one finds the embryo of what would become after a long historical process the "sacrament of the anointing of the sick." We do not have information with respect to other anointings in the NT. Nevertheless, in agreement with the OT and Hellenistic use, the apostolic image of the anointing in the Spirit very early on could have also come to crystallize the practice of Christian initiation in the anointing with oil. The first testimony to this is in the writings of *Tertullian (De baptismo 7: "Having emerged from the font, we are thoroughly anointed with a blessed unction according to the original teaching"), according to the schema of the priestly anointings recorded in the OT and in memory of the anointing from which Christ derived his name.

Chapter 21 of the Apostolic Tradition has been the object of extensive discussion by modern scholarship. In particular, it seems problematic to interpret the meaning of the postbaptismal anointing and anointings. It seems that there were not many problems for *Africans in recognizing (Tertullian, Bapt. 7-8, De res. car. 8; *Cyprian, Ep. 70,2; 73,9; 74,5) the existence of a postbaptismal anointing, an imposition of hands with an *epiclesis and at times a signatio of the *baptized person. A similar line can be traced in the *Roman context of *Hippolytus's Commentary on Daniel, in which he acknowledges a postbaptismal anointing as a *pneumatological mark. It seems that, moreover, a type of bond could be established between the presbyterial anointing attested to in the Trad. Ap. 21,19 and the Roman and African tradition of a postbaptismal anointing. Instead, it was only at Rome (Trad. Ap. 21,22) in the 5th c. that there was an attestation to the second postbaptismal anointing reserved for the bishop: an anointing that subsequently would be designated by the name myron. The entire Third Mystagogical Catechesis attributed to *Cyril of Jerusalem is dedicated to this anointing with myron. There Cyril says that through the anointing those who are about to be baptized become "coheirs and participants with Christ, who was anointed with the spiritual oil of gladness, that is, the Holy Spirit" (3, 2). The myron is the reflected image of the Holy Spirit, "the free gift of Christ and the power of the Spirit through the presence of his divinity" (3, 3); the anointing of the soul with the invisible Holy Spirit corresponds to the visible anointing of the body (3, 3). With this anointing the candidates finally became worthy of the name "Christian" (3, 5). The sacramental effects here emphasized by Cyril always remain connected, in Eastern theology, with the anointing with myron; it pertains properly to what in the West is called "chrism" (B. Neunheuser, Taufe und Firmung, 104; [2]137). The *Syriac baptismal *liturgy assumes a special position, the Didascalia siriaca (second half of the 3rd c.) and the Apostolic Constitutions (end of the 4th c.). According to these texts, before the true and proper baptismal washing, the forehead and the entire body is anointed "just as the priests and the kings were anointed, as a sign of a spiritual baptism" (Apos. Con. III, 16,3 e 4: Funk 211). Although an anointing with the myron was performed even after baptism, the prebaptismal anointing was especially emphasized. This is confirmed by *Theodore of Mopsuestia's catechetical homilies, according to which in the first anointing, as in an "exordium of the sacrament," the candidate is "marked," with a consignatio, as a sheep of Christ's flock and as a soldier of the heavenly King. The second anointing pertains to the entire body of the *catechumen, who is undressed in order "to be able to be reclothed with the garment of immortality . . . through the power of the Holy Spirit" (Neunheuser, Taufe im Geist, 278ff.). The consignatio (or the signatio) after baptism is only mentioned in passing. Ephrem expressed himself along the same lines: "The anointing precedes [baptism], the Holy Spirit soars upon its wings . . . the oil remits sin" (De virg. VII, 2-15: CSCO 124, 25-29). Anointing and washing are here connected in a special way with the unitary action of "baptism in the Spirit." According to *Cyril of *Alexandria, however, the Holy Spirit is unmistakably infused with the anointing with myron, after the baptismal washing (III Cat. myst.). In the West, the second anointing after baptism was not especially emphasized. *Ambrose only recognized one signatio, without anointing, although Pope *Innocent I attached one anointing to it (Ep. ad Decent. 3,6: PL 20, 555A = DS 215). Until the Venerable *Bede and *Isidore of Seville, the situation remained practically unchanged, although from that time onward the anointing gradually achieved a place of primary importance (In Act. 8: PL 92, 961B; Hom. in Theoph.: PL 94, 63D; Isid., Etym. 6,19,50-54: PL 82, 256C; Eccl. off. 2,26; 27,1-4: PL 83, 23, 826A).

All of this is also confirmed by the Sacramentarium Gelas. V. After a prebaptismal anointing (n. 421) with the "exorcised oil" (oleum exorcizatum), once baptism in water had been performed, the second anointing with chrism (chrisma) followed, first by the presbyter, then by the bishop, with the laying on of hands and the anointing of the forehead accompanied by the words: Signum Christi in vitam aeternam (Gelas. V., 452). The anointings of the altar, the church and the king (Pepin) were less important (Hofmeister, 195-200; 206; 169). Instead, the anointing with oil, according to Jas 5, was practiced widely. In the East, because of its close connection to the remission of sins, it was placed in close relationship with penance and reconciliation (Hofmeister 180-185). In the West, it continued to be practiced as a remedy in times of sickness, which was administered by the priests, but requested by the believers themselves. Pope Innocent I stated the following: "It is permissible not only for priests but also for all Christians to apply the oil of chrism from the bishop in their own time of need or in that of those closest to them" (Ep. ad Decent. 8,11: PL 20, 559A-560A = DS 216). The pope refers to it as a genus sacramenti (ibid.); only the later scholastic theology would explain its theological meaning.

Ph. Hofmeister, Die hl. Öle in der morgenländischen und abendländischen Kirche, Wunzburg 1948; W. Dürig, Die "Salbung" der Martyrer. Ein Beitrag zur Martyrentheologie der Liturgie: SE 6 (1954) 14-47; B. Neunheuser, Taufe und Firmung, Freiburg 1956; ²1983 (French trans. Baptême et Confirmation, Paris 1966); Id., Taufe im Geist: Arch. f. Lit. wiss. 12 (1970) 268-284; H. Vorgrimler, Busse und Krankensalbung, Freiburg 1978, 215-234; TWNT 1, 230-232 (GLNT 1, 617-626); 4, 807ff. (GLNT 7, 639-646); 9, 482-573; DACL 6, 2777-2791; 12, 2116-2130; DSp 11, 788-819; M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, Milan 1953, IV, passim; L.C. Mitchell, Baptismal Anointing, London 1966; C. Ortmann, Le sacrement des malades, Paris 1971 (It. trans. Turin 1971); E.C. Whitaker, Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy, London ²1970; new ed. 2003; G. Winkler, The Original Meaning of the Prebaptismal Anointing and Its Implications: Worship 52 (1978) 24-45; G. Winkler, Das armenische Initiationsrituale, Rome 1982; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du IIe au VIe siècle, Spoleto 1988; M. Dudley - G. Rowell (eds.), The Oil of Gladness: Anointing in the Christian Tradition, Collegeville, MN 1993; M.E. Johnson, The Prayers of Sarapion of Thmuis: A Literary, Liturgical, and Theological Analysis, Rome 1995; W. Kinzig - C. Markschies - M. Vinzent, Tauffragen und Bekenntnis, Berlin 1999; P.F. Bradshaw, M.E. Johnson, L.E. Phillips, The Apostolic Tradition, Minneapolis 2002; RAC 21, 915-965. See also the bibliography for the entry "Oil" in this encyclopedia.

B. Neunheuser - P. de Navascués

ANOMOIANS – ANOMOIANISM (Anomoeans - Anomoeanism). After an interval of approximately 30 years (325–355) following the condemnation pronounced at the Council of *Nicaea during which the supporters and followers of *Arius left off the most radical propositions of their teacher's doctrine in favor of more or less moderate formulations, those propositions were taken up again and systematically developed, beginning ca. 355, first by *Aetius and then esp. by *Eunomius of Cyzicus; with their followers, they were immediately dubbed anomoians by their adversaries, since they considered the Son to be unlike (anomoios) the *Father, an affirmation that in fact does not appear in the anomoian texts that have reached us but can be deduced from their doctrine. The doctrine affirms the absolute transcendence of the Father, whose qualifying attribute is that of alone being ungenerated; the Son, therefore, as generated, is different from the Father by *hypostasis and substance, and inferior to him, not existing ab aeterno like him. Rejecting Arius's most scandalous statement, Eunomius said that the Son was not created from nothing but, by the will of the one who made him, is the only generated being created directly from the Father, to be his minister in the creation of the world, which he carried out by the Father's will. The Son participates in the Father's prerogatives, perfections, light, life and power, but at a subordinate level, since the Father is ungenerated light, life and power, whereas the Son is generated light, life and power. He can therefore be considered like the Father only in operation and not in substance. While the Son is God, though at an inferior level vis-à-vis the perfect divinity of the Father, Eunomius denies this status to the *Holy Spirit, which he considers to be only the most sublime of the creatures created by the Son according to the Father's will. Given that the three divine hypostases are not only subordinate one to the other but also different in substance (= nature), the concept of the divine *Trinity is essentially foreign to Eunomius, and it is not by chance that this term does not appear in his writings. His followers, therefore, who were divided into various conventicles, baptized not in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, but in the name of the Lord.

M. Albentz, Zur Geschichte der jung arianischen Kirchengemeinschaft: Theologische Studien und Kritiken 82 (1909) 205-278; J. de Ghellinck, Quelques appréciations de la dialectique d'Aristote durant les conflicts trinitaires du IVe siècle: RHE 26 (1930) 5-42; Simonetti 584; L.R. Wickham, The Syntagmation of Aetius the Anomean: JTS NS 19 (1968) 532-569; T.A. Kopecek, A History of Neo-Arianism, Cambridge, MA 1979, vol. I; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer, Tübingen 1988, passim; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988; M.R. Barnes - D.H. Williams (eds.), Arianism after Arius: Essays on the Development of the Fourth Century Trinitarian Conflict, Edinburgh 1993; R.P. Vaggione, Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution, Oxford 2000.

M. Simonetti

ANONYMI CHILIASTAE IN MATTHEUM 24 FRAGMENTA. We have five anonymous fragments of a commentary on the gospel of Matthew. The first three (Orate ne fiat fuga vestra hieme vel sabbato, De adventu Domini Christi, De die et hora nemo scit) deal with Mt 24:20-44. The De tribus mensuris comments on Mt 13:33, and the last fragment (De Petro) on Mt 26:31-34, 69-75. Attribution to *Ambrosiaster or *Victorinus of Petovium does not seem possible.

CPL 186-188; PLS I, 655-670; CPPM II A 1762-7. 2972; A. Pollastri, Nota all'interpretazione di Matteo 13,33, Luca 13,21 nel frammento incipit de tribus mensuris: SSR 3 (1979) 61-78; H.J. Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller, Freiburg ⁴1995, 150.

S. Samulowitz

ANONYMOUS (or Antoninus) PLACENTINUS. An anonymous author composed, ca. 560–570, an Itinerarium, in which, invoking the protection of the holy *martyr Antoninus, patron of Piacenza, he recounts a *pilgrimage made with several companions in *Syria, *Palestine, *Sinai and *Mesopotamia. There are two recensions of the work, as shown by J. Gildemeister: the first is shorter, while the second is richer in detail and written in better language. (This latter recension also exists in abbreviated form.) The second recension is a reworking of the original text, done after the reform begun by Pepin the Short and continued by Charlemagne and Alcuin; its purpose was to correct the genuine text and restore it to a normalized Latin.

CPL 2330; PL 72, 899-918; CSEL 39,159-218; CL 175,127-174; J. Gildemeister, Antonini Placentini Itinerarium im unentstellten Text mit deutscher Übersetzung, I Berlin 1889; H. Grisar, Zur Palästinareise des sog. Antoninus Martyr: ZKTh 26 (1902) 760-770; Id., Nochmals das Pilgeritinerar des Anonymus von Piacenza: ZKTh 27 (1903) 776-780; P. Piacenza, De itinerario Antonini Placentini: EphLit 17 (1903) 338-348; G.F.M. Vermeer, Observations sur le vocabulaire du pèlerinage chez Egérie et chez Antonin de Plaisance, Nijmegen 1965; F. Mian, L'Anonimo Piacentino al Sinai: VetChr 9 (1972) 267-301; C. Milani, Aspetti fonetici del ms. Sang. 133 (Itinerarium Antonini Placentini): RIL 108 (1974) 335-359; Id., Problemi di morfologia e sintassi nell'Itinerarium Antonini Placentini (ms. Sang. 133 and C ms. Rhen. 73): RIL 108, 360-416; Id., Itinerarium Antonini Placentini. Un viaggio in Terra Santa del 560-570 d.C. (ed. sinottica con tr. della recensio altera), Milan 1977; Id., Un esempio di nornalizzazione linguistica: la recensio altera dell'Itinerarium Antonini Placentini: Scritti in onore di S. Pugliatti, Milan 1978, 679-703.

S. Zincone

ANONYMOUS ANTIMONTANIST. *Presbyter (bishop?) of the province of *Asia, active between the 2nd-3rd c., author of a work in 3 books against the *Montanists, dedicated to Avircius Marcellus, identified by some with *Abercius, bishop of Hierapolis. Only 10 fragments of the work remain (CPG 1327), cited by *Eusebius of *Caesarea in HE V,16,2–17,4. The second and third books seem to have been written about a year apart (13 and 14 years after the death of the prophetess Maximilla), in very different historical contexts: an absence of *persecution in the first case (V,16,12-15.18-19), numerous and recent murders of Christians, both *orthodox and *heretics, in the second (V,16,20-22). One could also deduce a chronological link with the return of persecution under *Septimius Severus, though it would be difficult to fix a precise date.

The work is an important source on Montanism. The fragments contain data on the origins of the movement and on the first ecclesiastical condemnations (V,16,6-10). A strong *eschatological expectation is evident (V,16,18-19), and the claim to exclusive possession of the Christian prophetic charism (V,16,12; 17,4). Montanist ecstasy is described as a psychosis (V,17,2). The oracle 16 (Aland) is included (V,16,17).

*Jerome (Vir. ill. 37; 39) identifies the anti-Montanist with *Rhodo, author of a work Against Montanus, Prisca and Maximilla, in which another anti-Montanist, *Miltiades, is mentioned, just as in the anonymous author mentioned by Eusebius.

P. de Labriolle, Les sources de l'histoire du Montanisme, Fribourg-Paris 1913, XX-XXVIII; W. Kühnert, Der antimontanistische Anonymus bei Eusebius: TZ 5 (1949) 436-446 (proposes identification with Polycrates of Ephesus); C. Trevett, Montanism, Cambridge 1996, 30; M. Wünsche, Der Ausgang der urchristlichen Prophetie in der frühkatholischen Kirche, Stuttgart 1997, 264-297; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Original Condemnation of Asian Montanism: JEH 50 (1999) 1-22.

A. D'Anna

ANONYMOUS APOLLINARIST TEXTS. Early in the 5th c. various writings originating in *Apollinarist circles circulated under the name of Pope *Julius I (6 Feb. 337–12 Apr. 352). *Leontius of *Byzantium gives information on these, Adv. fraudes Apoll., proem.: PG 86, 1948B. The problem of these counterfeits has been studied by H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea und seine Schule, Tübingen 1904, 158-163. In particular, no author has been suggested for a text in the form of an encyclical letter, preserved in the Greek text, a *Syriac version, a Latin fragment corresponding almost completely to the Greek text, an Arabic fragment and some *Armenian fragments. A critical edition of the Greek text of this encyclion (among the works of Julius I: PL 8, 876 A-B) is in H. Lietzmann, 292-293; for the textual tradition, see ibid., 158. For the editions of the fragments in other languages, see CPG II, 3735.

Besides the encyclion, also indicated as anonymous, are a series of texts of disputed attribution (CPG II, 3736-3740), as well as a certain number of fragments: 185 (Syriac); 186 (Latin, Syriac, Armenian); 187 (Syriac) and 188-191 (Arabic), in the numbering of Lietzmann's collection: J. Fleming - H. Lietzmann, Apollinaristische Schriften. Syrisch mit den griechischen Texten (AGG, N.F. 7,4), Berlin 1904.

In addition to Lietzmann's work and the CPG, see DTC VIII, 2, 1917; E. Schwartz, Codex Vaticanus gr. 1431, eine antichalkedonische Sammlung aus der Zeit Kaiser Zenos, in Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-philologische und historische Klasse, XXXII B., 6 Abhandlung, Munich 1927, 8, 96; CPG II, 3735-3741.

E. Cavalcanti

ANONYMOUS ARIANS. Under this rubric CPG II, 2080-2085 lists the following works: (1) n. 2080: Pseudo-Athanasian Homily (ed. Scheidweier, ZKG 67 [1955-56] 132-140) on the deceptions of the devil, who inspires false and idolatrous cults. The conclusion has been seen as subordinationist, hence the *Arian attribution, but the text at that place is in too bad a state to allow sure conclusions. The homily appears to have been written first half 4th c. (2) n. 2081: anonymous homily (ed. Amand-Moons, RBen 63 [1953] 18-69; 211-238) on *virginity, addressed to fathers of families, that they would bring up their children to this ideal. Has seemed Arian due to the lack of *trinitarian and *Nicene ideas, but the argument is insubstantial, and all the more so if, with Vööbus (OC 40 [1956] 69-77), we consider the Greek text a translation of a 4th-c. *Syriac original. (3) nn. 2082.2083: two pseudo-Chrysostomic homilies (ed. Liébaert, SC 146) by an unknown Arian author, preached during the octave of *Easter, respectively on Act 2:22-24 and 4:5-10. They are later than 431, since the author knows of *Nestorius's heresy (Liébaert groundlessly considers this passage an interpolation). (4) n. 2084: anonymous homily (ed. Leroy, Epektasis. Mélanges J. Daniélou, Paris 1972, 343-353) on the *annunciation (Lk 1:31-44). The author, who openly attacks *Marcellus of Ancyra, offers a trinitarian doctrinal approach resembling that of the Antiochene formula of 341: he is thus anti-Nicene, though not necessarily Arian. (5) n. 2085: fragments from an unknown Arian historian are taken from Theophanes's Chronicon paschale and elsewhere, which continued *Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicle until the death of *Valens (ed. Bidez, GCS, Philostorgius, CLI-CLXIII; 202-241).

CPG 2, 2080-2085 (with bibl.); M. Simonetti, Note su due omelie ariane pubblicate recentemente, in Studi in onore di Q. Cataudella, II, Catania 1972, 417-423.

M. Simonetti

ANONYMOUS GALLUS (5th-6th c.). Disciple of *Faustus of Riez, perhaps an *abbot of SW *Gaul ca. 500. Postulated by O. Seebass as the author of most of the 17 Instructiones (PL 80, 229-260), previously attributed to *Colombanus, though some go back to Faustus himself. G. Morin later noticed a strong similarity of expression between the Instructiones attributed to the Anonymous Gallus and two fragments contained in ms o 212 Sup. Ambrosianus, concluding that the author was the same. The two fragments are a sermon for the *ascension and a succinct exposition of the mystery of the *Trinity.

CPL 978; G. Morin, Deux pièces inédites du disciple de Fauste de Riez auteur des soi-disant Instructiones Columbani: Revue Charlemagne I (1881) 161-170.

E. Prinzivalli

ANONYMOUS of VERONA. 11 homilies go by this name, written probably at Verona mid-6th c. 10 homilies are contained in the Codex Veronensis LIX (57) and are attributed either to ps.-Augustine (serm. 118, 237-239, Mai 171-173) or ps.-Maximus of Turin (tractatus 3 de baptismo). The eleventh homily is identical to ps.-Augustine's Sermo 109. The homilies appear to have been written by a well-educated, pastorally zealous preacher; they address the *baptismal creed, baptismal rites, repentance, the judgment of the dead, the mystery of Christmas and 2 Cor 5:10.

CPL 222. 368 (s 109). 809; CPPM I A, 894. 903. 1022-1024. 1117-1119. 1780-1782; C. Lambot, Le florilège augustinien de Vérone: RB 79 (1969) 70-81; J.P. Bouhot, Note sur trois "Sermons anonymes": REAug 20 (1974) 135-142; G. Sobrero, Anonimo Veronese: omelie mistagogiche e catechetiche: Bibliotheca Ephemerides Liturgicae, Collectio "Subsidia" 66 (1992) 85-155; H.J. Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller, Freiburg [4]1995, 174.

S. Samulowitz

ANONYMOUS SICILIAN. Early 5th-c. author, a layman of *Roman origin, trained in *rhetoric and theology. "Converted" in Sicily by an "exceptionally bright woman" (Ep. 1,1), this author sought to spread an authentic and *ascetic *Pelagian-style Christianity, particularly characterized by the irreconcilability of riches and Christian faith, marriage and chastity. Six works have been preserved, written probably 411–416: two collections of letters, De divitiis, De malis doctoribus et operibus fidei, De possibilitate non peccandi and De castitate.

LACL 38; C. Caspari, Briefe, Abhandlungen und Predigten aus den letzten zwei Jahrhunderte des kirchlichen Altertums, Berlin 1964 ([1]1890) 3-167; PLS, 1, 1330-1505, 1687-1694; PLS 2, 1375-1380; M. Winterbottom, Pelagiana: JTS 38 (1987) 106-129 (corrections); B.R. Rees, The Letters of Pelagius and His Followers, Woodbridge 1991 (Eng. tr.); A. Kessler, Reichtumskritik und Pelagianismus, Fribourg 1999; M.R. Rackett, Anxious for Wordly Things: SP 33 (1977) 229-235.

K. den Biesen

ANONYMOUS VALESIANUS. Name indicating two Latin fragments of different origin and time, published by H. de Valois—hence the name—in an appendix to his edition of *Ammianus Marcellinus in 1636; also called the Excerpta Valesiana. The two fragments were published together only because they were in the same MS. The first (Pars prior) was edited by Mommsen with the title Origo Constantini imperatoris (ch. 1-35) and the other Chronica Theodoriciana (Pars posterior) (ch. 36-96). The Origo Constantini is a brief biography of the emperor from 305 to 337, written some decades after his death and before 390. The author uses good sources; *Orosius also drew on them. The author ignores the political and religious reforms of the first Christian emperor, instead narrating the events of war, esp. during the first period (305–324). References to Christianity are interpolated, taken from Orosius's Historia contra paganos. The Pars posterior was written ca. 550 by an anti-*Arian Catholic who was nonetheless sympathetic to the Arian king, who promoted peace and was benevolent toward Catholics. Written in a very poor Latin, it covers the period from 474–527, treating esp. of King *Theodoric and events in *Italy.

MGH, AA 9, Chronica Minora I, 7-11 (Pars Prior); 306-328 (Pars Posterior). Repertorium 2,362f.; Eng. tr. J.C. Rolfe, LCT [3]1958, 509-569; J. Moreau, Excerpta Valesiana, Leipzig 1968; J.N. Adams, The Text and Language of a Vulgar Latin Chronicle (Anonymus Valesianus II), London 1976; W. Bracke, L'Anonymus Valesianus II, Ch. 79-96, texte et commentaire, Bologna 1992; I. König, Origo Constantini, Einführ., Text & Komm, Trier 1987; T.D. Barnes, Jerome and the Origo Constantini imperatoris: Phoenix 43 (1989) 158-161; É. Aussenac, "L'Origo Constantini": rétroaction et approche d'une datation: Latomus 60 (2001) 671-676; V. Neri, La legittimità politica del regno teodericiano nell'Anonymi Valesiani Pars Posterior, in Teoderico e i Goti fra Oriente e Occidente, ed. A. Carile, Ravenna 1995, 313-340; S.N.C. Lieu - D. Montserrat (eds.), From Constantine to Julian: Pagan and Byzantine Views, A Source History, London 1996, 39-62 (Origo); I. König (ed.), Aus der Zeit Theodorechs des Grossen, Einleitung, Uebersetzung und Kommentar einer anonymen Quelle, Darmstad 1997; V. Aiello, Aspetti della fortuna di Orosio. Il caso della pars prior degli Excerpta Valesiana, in Ad contemplandam sapientiam. Studi S. Leanza, Soveria Mannelli 2004, 5-29.

A. Di Berardino

ANTERUS, pope (235–236). Bishop of *Rome between 235 and 236, for only 40 days (LP I, 147). Besides its extreme brevity, this period also partly overlapped with the final phase of the pontificate of his predecessor, *Pontianus, exiled in Sardinia by Alexander Severus and the antipope Hippolytus. It does not appear that Anterus was *martyred. He is buried in the *cemetery of St. *Callistus; the church's *liturgy remembers him 3 January.

BHL I, Brussels 1898-1899 (Subsidia hagiographica 6), 90; Eus., HE VI, 29, 1-2; Jaffé 90, 15 (apocryphal epistle); LP I, LXV-LXXVI, XCI, XCV-XCVI, C-CI, CCXLVII-CCXLVIII, 4 and 5, 62-4, 65, 145 and 147; II, 63-64; III, 74; P. Allard, Storia critica delle persecuzioni, II, Florence 1935, 190-195; DTC I, 2, 1366-1367; DHGE 3, 520-521 (J.-P. Kirsch); BS II, 51-52, 52-56 (M.V. Brandi - M.C. Celletti); LTK[3] 1,718-719 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 263-265 (F. Fatti).

M. Spinelli

ANTHIMUS of Constantinople (d. after 548). Bishop of Trebizond (Pontos Axeinos or Black Sea) from 518. In the spring of 532 he took part at Constantinople in a dispute between *orthodox bishops (of whom he was one) and Severians. He had resigned and retired to an *ascetic life when, through the influence of the empress *Theodora, the emperor *Justinian I promoted him to the *patriarchate of *Constantinople in June 535, after the death of *Epiphanius (5 June 535). At the time of his installation he recognized the fourth ecumenical council. Theodora, however, put him in touch with *Severus of *Antioch, with whose theological position he seems to have agreed immediately. The opposition of the clergy, equivocal statements in the patriarchal acts and the opposition of Pope *Agapetus, present at Constantinople (March 536), forced his resignation. On 13 March 536 Agapetus, with the emperor's consent, consecrated his successor *Menas, who had given a dyophysite profession of faith, in the basilica of St. Maria. He was excommunicated for his *monophysitism by the synod (May-June 536)—a decision confirmed by imperial edict (6 August 536); he then lived as an ascetic in the palace. After Theodora's death (548), he was reconciled with the basileus. The date of his death is unknown.

We have Greek fragments of a letter of his to Justinian in which he defends the one energy and will in Christ (Mansi, XI, 440-441; Van Roey-Allen 61-63). We also have in *Syriac, handed down by the Ecclesiastical History of ps.-*Zacharias the Rhetor, a synodal letter to Severus and another synodal letter to *Theodosius of *Alexandria in which he accepts the first three councils, i.e., he upholds the *Henoticon.

CPG 7085-7088; V. Grumel, Les regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople, Kadiköi-Bucarest I, 1, 1932, 228-231; Mansi 11,440f.; 517: Letter to Justinian; the others written by Zacharias the Rhetor 9,21 and 25; Bardenhewer V,52; Beck 392f.; J.P. Land (ed.), Anecd. syr. 3, Leiden 1870, Nachdruck Osnabrück 1989, 299f.; DHGE III, 531 n. 8; E. Honigmann, Anthimus of Trebizond, Patriarch of Constantinople, in Patristic Studies, Vatican City 1973, 185-193; EP 1,504-508; S. Brock, The Conversations with the Syrian Orthodox under Justinian (532): OCP 47 (1981) 87-121; L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e Patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 122-124; LTK 1, 719-720; RGG[4] 1, 518-9; Grillmeier 2/2, 345-378; A. Van Roey - P. Allen, Monophysite Texts of the Sixth Century (OLA 56), Louvain 1994, 61-63.

B. Studer - D. Stiernon

ANTHIMUS of Nicomedia (d. 303). Bishop of *Nicomedia during the reign of *Diocletian, Anthimus was put to death, according to *Eusebius of *Caesarea (HE VIII 6,6; 13,1), shortly after the promulgation of the first Diocletian edict of persecution (24 February 303; Lact., De mont. pers. 13-14). Behind the killing of Anthimus and numerous other faithful was a fire that broke out in the imperial palace of Nicomedia, which *Galerius accused the Christians of starting. In the Martyrologium Hier. the dies natalis of Anthimus is 27 April, in the Martyrologium Syr. 24 April and in the *Byzantine church 3 September. A late, legendary passio attributed to Simeon Metaphrastes (PG 115, 172-184) describes in detail his life, virtues and death. The numerous Sts. Anthimus in the *hagiographical tradition have led to a possible identification (supported by Delehaye and Mara) of the St. Anthimus of the Via Salaria with St. Anthimus, bishop of Nicomedia.

G. Mercati, Anthimi Nicomediensis episcopi et Martyris de sancta Ecclesia: ST 5, Vatican City 1901, 87-98; DHGE 3,530; H. Delehaye, Propylaeum AASS Decembr. Martyrologium Romanum, Brussels 1940, 184; Id., OC 148-50; M.G. Mara, Contributo allo studio della "Passio Anthimi," Rome 1964; I Martiri della Salaria: Antimo, Massimo, Basso, Fabio, secondo gli Acta SS. Anthimi et sociorum eius: Il Paleocristiano in Bassa Sabina, Rome 1980, 11-27; BBKL 1, 189.

M.G. Mara

ANTHIMUS of Tyana (d. after 379). A contemporary of St. *Basil, known only from his relations with the bishop of *Caesarea. Cited by Basil in friendly terms in Ep. 58, Anthimus was among the 32 bishops that in 372 subscribed to the letter addressed to those of *Italy and *Gaul, at Basil's initiative (Ep. 92), asking help from the West in the struggle and *schism being stirred up and exacerbated in the East by the pro-*Arian policy of the emperor *Valens. In the complicated general situation, relations between Anthimus and Basil quickly fell apart: when Valens divided the civil province of *Cappadocia in two, Tyana became the capital of Cappadocia II, which included the W and S parts of the old province, including the crossing points to the Taurus region where the church of Caesarea had extensive property. Anthimus, upholding the parallel between civil and ecclesiastical subdivisions, claimed to be *metropolitan of the new province and laid claim to jurisdiction over several of Basil's suffragan sees, maintaining his position vigorously and harshly. In response, Basil set up new episcopal sees, e.g., *Nyssa and esp. the small town of Sasima, on the roads connecting with the Taurus. As is well known, Basil asked his friend *Gregory of Nazianzus to assume this burden, but he did not feel up to the task; it does seem, though, that Gregory did mediate a certain peace (Greg. Naz., Or. 43; Ep. 47-50; Carm. II). Conflict resumed over the *Armenian priest Faustus: Basil, on whom the Armenian church depended, refused to consecrate Faustus bishop at the wish of King Bab, who had deposed the previous bishop. Anthimus asserted his metropolitan claims and consecrated him (Basil., Ep. 120-122). Nevertheless, Basil's Ep. 210 once more mentions Anthimus in friendly terms.

S. Tillemont, Mém. IX, 174ff.; 196ff.; DCB I, 119-120; G. Bardy, in Fliche-Martin III, 333-338; H.F. Tournebize, Histoire politique et religieuse de l'Arménie, Paris 1910, 491; R. van Dam, Emperor, Bishops, and Friends in Late Antique Cappadocia: JTS NS, n. 37 (1986) 53-76; M.-M. Hauser-Meury, Prosopographie zu den Schriften Gregors v. Naz., Bonn 1960, 25f.; R. Pouchet, Basile le Grand et son univers d'amis d'après sa correspondance: une stratégie de communion, Rome 1992, passim.

E. Cavalcanti

ANTHOLOGIA LATINA. Fundamental collection of minor Latin poems, from the beginnings until the 6th c., which had no previous suitable edition. Includes many poems by Christian authors. It is divided into two parts: the first, edited by Riese, comprises poems found in codices; the second, edited by Buecheler, comprises poems found in *epigraphs. In 1982 the first volume of the new edition was published, prepared by D.R. Shackleton Bailey.

F. Buecheler - A. Riese, Anthologia Latina, sive poesis latinae supplementum, Leipzig 1894-1906, con il suppl. di E. Lommatzsch (1926; repr. Amsterdam 1972); D.R. Shackleton Bailey, Anthologia Latina I. Carmina in codicibus scripta. Fasc. I. Libri Salmasiani aliorumque carmina, Stuttgart 1982.

E. Prinzivalli

ANTHOLOGIA PALATINA. A collection of ca. 4500 poetic compositions, the work of more than 350 authors from a period of 16 centuries. The collection was collated in 980 by an anonymous author from previous anthologies: those of Constantine Cephalas (9th-10th c.), Agathias (6th c.), Philip of *Thessalonica (1st c. AD) and Meleager (early 1st c. AD). The anthology was discovered only at the end of the 16th c. in the codex Palatinus 23 of Heidelberg, hence the name Palatina. The contents of the 16 books into which it is subdivided are (1) Christian epigrams (4th-10th c.); (2) description of the statues in the Gymnasium of Zeusippus of *Constantinople, by Christodorus of Coptos (5th-6th c.); (3) epigrams from the bas-reliefs of the temple of Apollonis, mother of Attalus and Eumenes, at Cyzicus; (4) the real beginning of the anthology which connects the proems of Meleager, Philip and Agazia to their respective collections; (6) dedicatory epigrams; (7) funerary epigrams; (8) Christian epigrams by *Gregory of Nazianzus; (9) descriptive epigrams; (10) protreptic epigrams; (11) convivial and satirical epigrams; (12) Juvenilia of Strato of Sardis; (13) epigrams in various meters; (14) arithmetical, enigmatic and riddling epigrams; (15) miscellanea. A book XVI, added by moderns and called Appendice Planudea, gathers 388 new epigrams taken from the Anthologia Planudea. That anthology is similar to the Anthologia Palatina and takes its name from the *Byzantine *monk Maximus Planudis (13th-14th c.), whose autograph is in the Biblioteca Marciana, Venice. Its seven books largely correspond to the first seven of the Anthologia Palatina, from which it is derived. Planudis, by his own declaration, made use of two sources: the first probably the codex Palatinus or a copy of it, the other an independent, abbreviated edition of Cephalas.

PWK I, 2380ff.; EI III, 543-544.

Editions: H. Stadtmüller, Anthologia graeca epigrammatum Palatina cum Planudea, Leipzig 1894/1906; W. Paton (ed.), The Greek Anthology, vols. I-V, 1916-1918; H. Beckby, Anthologia Graeca, vols. I-IV, Munich 1957-1958 (1956-²1967); Les Belles Lettres: t. I: books I-IV, ed. P. Waltz, 1928, ²1960; t. II: book V, eds. P. Waltz - J. Guillon, 1928, ²1990; t. III, book VI, ed. P. Waltz, 1931; t. IV: book VII, 1-363, ed. P. Waltz, tr. by A.M. Desrousseaux, A. Dain, P. Camelot, E. Des Places, 1938, ²1960; t. V: book VII, 364-378, ed. P. Waltz, tr. E. Des Places, M. Dimitrescu, H. La Maître, G. Soury, 1941, ²1960; t. VI: book VIII, with the epigrams of Gregory of Nazianzus, ed. P. Waltz, 1944, ²1960; t. VII: book IX, 1-358, ed. P. Waltz, with tr. by G. Soury, 1957; t. VIII: book IX, 359-827, ed. P. Waltz, tr. G. Soury, with the collaboration of J. Irigoin and P. Laurens, 1974; t. X: book XI, ed. R. Aubreton, with the collaboration of F. Buffière and J. Irigoin, 1994; t. XII: books XIII-XV, ed. F. Buffière, Anthologia planudea, t. XIII, ed. R. Aubreton, 1980; An Index to the Anthologia graeca, Anthologia palatina and Planudea. Fasc. 1, Amsterdam 1985; D.L. Page (ed.), The Epigrams of Rufinus, Cambridge 1978; D.L. Page (ed.), Further Greek Epigrams, Epigrams before A.D. 50 from the Greek Anthology and Other Sources Not Included in "Hellenistic Epigrams" or "The Garland of Philip." Revised and prepared for publication by R.D. Dawe and J. Diggle, 2 vols., Cambridge 1981; P.A. Hansen (ed.), Carmina Epigraphica Graeca Saeculorum VIII-V a.Chr., Berlin-New York 1983; P.A. Hansen, Carmina Epigraphica Graeca Saeculi IV a. Chr., Berlin 1989; P. Maréchaux (ed.), La muse adolescente. Choix d'épigrammes érotiques tirées du Livre XII de l'Anthologie grecque / Straton de Sardes. Textes choisis, traduits, annotés et préf., Paris 1995; A. Bernabe (ed.), Anthologia Graeca Poetarum epicorum Graecorum testimonia et fragmenta. Pars I. Ed. corr. Stuttgart 1996; K. Rexroth (ed.), Poems from the Greek Anthology, introduction by D. Mulroy, Ann Arbor 1999; G. Galán Vioque - M.Á. Márquez Guerrero (eds.), Epigramas eróticos griegos. Antología Palatina (Libros V y XII), Madrid 2001.

Italian translations: F.M. Pontani, 4 vols., Turin 1978-1981; G. Paduano (ed.), Antologia Palatina, epigrammi erotici: libro V e libro XII, Milan 1989; G. Guidorizzi (ed.), Epigrammi di Meleagro, Milan 1992; Epigrammi erotici, ed. Meleagro, tr. M. Coco, with critical comments by F. Bornmann and N. Casiglio, Manduria 1981.

Resources: V. Citti, E. Degani, G. Giangrande, G. Scarpa (eds.), An Index to the Anthologia Graeca: Anthologia Palatina and Planudea, 4 vols., Amsterdam 1985-1990; V. Citti, An Index to the "Griechische Vers-Inschriften" (ed. W. Peek, Berlin 1955), Amsterdam 1995.

Studies: The Greek Anthology: Hellenistic Epigrams, ed. A.S.F. Gow and D.L. Page, 2 vols., Cambridge 1965; The Garland of Philip and Some Contemporary Epigrams, ed. A.S.F. Gow and D.L. Page, 2 vols., Cambridge 1968; P.A. Hansen, A. Cameron (eds.), The Greek Anthology from Meleager to Planudes, Oxford 1993; E. Degani, L'epigramma. Lo spazio letterario della Grecia antica I 2, Rome 1993, 197-233; M.G. Albiani, La poesia ellenistica ed epigrammatica, in U. Mattioli (ed.), Senectus. La vecchiaia nel mondo classico, 1: Grecia, Bologna 1995, 277-359; B. Baldwin, Notes on Christian Epigrams in Book One of the Greek Anthology, in P. Allen - E. Jeffreys (eds.), The Sixth Century: End or Beginning?, Brisbane 1996; E. Degani, Anthologie: NP 1, 734-737; D. Gall, Anthologia Graeca, in O. Schütze (ed.), Metzler Lexikon Antiker Autoren, Stuttgart-Weimar 1997, 49-51; J. Irigoin, L'Anthologie grecque: Tradition et critique des textes grecs, Paris 1997 (Histoire 36), 89-103; G. Guidorizzi, L'epigramma, in Storia della civiltà letteraria greca e latina II, Turin 1998, 181-224; K.J. Gutzwiller, Poetic Garlands: Hellenistic Epigrams in Context, Berkeley 1998.

M. Perraymond - C. Noce

ANTHOLOGIA SALMASIANA. A collection of Late Antique poetry, compiled in *Africa first half 6th c., passed down to us in the 8th/9th-c. cod. Parisinus 10318, and named after the French humanist C. Saumaise, who discovered it. Contains various kinds of poetry by a variety of authors, mostly African: Virgilian centos, highly complex distichs, epigrams by the noted poet and grammarian Luxorius (Riese 287-375), poetic compositions by Faustus Felix, Vespa, Coronato, Cato (also a grammarian and poet at the time of the *Vandal king Huneric, 477–484, whom he extols in some of his works), Symposius (rather than Symphosius), author of about 100 very popular riddles, each in three hexameters. Other poets were active after the Vandal king Trasamundo. The arguments are various: celebration of the powerful, description of buildings, epithalamia, satire, etc. Some of the poets, certainly *Luxurius and Calbulus, were Christians. Calbulus wrote a composition recalling his own *baptism (Anth. lat. n. 378), an epigram in three verses which would become an inscription in a basilica (n. 380), and some distichs praising the cross (n. 379).

CPL 1517; ed. F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia latina I,1, Leipzig 1894, 33-221; ed. R. Shackleton Bailey, Anthologia Latina, I: Carmina in codicibus scripta, Fasc. I: Libri Salmasiani aliorumque carmina, Stuttgart 1982; R. Shackleton Bailey, Towards a Text of "Anthologia Latina," Cambridge 1979; M. Spallone, Il Par. lat. 10138 (Salmasiano): dal manoscritto altomedievale ad una raccolta enciclopedica tardo-antica: Italia Medievale and Umanistica 25 (1982) 1-71; G. Focardi, Il carme del "Pescatore" sacrilego (Anth. Lat. 1,21 Riese) e una sua recente edizione: Orpheus 5 (1984) 1-31; A.J. Baumgartner, Untersuchungen zu Anthologie des Codex Salmasianus, Zürich 1981 (with ed. and tr. Anth. Lat. 199, Vespa and 82): P. Mastrandrea, Lettori cristiani di Seneca filosofo, Brescia 1988; G. Cupaiolo, Note ai Miracula Christi (A.L. 879 R.), in Polyanthema. Studi . . . offerti a S. Costanza, II, Messina 1989, 1-22; K. Vössing, Die Anthologia Salmasiana, das vandalische Karthago und die Grenzen der Stilanalyse, in Der Stilbegriff in den Altertumswissenschaften: Universität Rostock Institut für Altertumswissenschaft, Rostock 1993, 149-155; J. Pizarro Sánchez, Estructura y tipología de los "Aenigmata Symphosii": CFC(L) 16 (1999) 239-246.

A. Di Berardino

ANTHONY (6th c.). *Hagiographer of *Simeon Stylites the elder (the first of three of that name, the senior), who lived on a column near *Antioch, and died at nearly 100 (d. 459). The author of Simeon's life calls himself Anthony and claims to be Simeon's disciple and an eyewitness of the events he narrates (ch. 7). In fact the Greek life of Simeon, transmitted also in *Latin translation in many codices, seems to be the work of a hagiographer who knows *Theodoret's work (Hist. mon. 26) but has no direct experience of the country, background or traditions of the place. It can be conjectured that this "counterfeit" was composed early 6th c. at *Constantinople by a certain Anthony, to validate the authenticity of Simeon's supposed relics. The emperor *Leo I (ca. 411–474) had ordered their translation from Antioch to Constantinople, but we have no certain knowledge that the order was carried out, since the inhabitants of Antioch opposed it; if the translation occurred, it was probably only partial.

CPG III, 6724; BHG 1682-1685m; PL 73, 325-334; H. Lietzmann, Das Leben des hl. Symeon Stylites (TU 32,4), Leipzig 1908, 20-78 (Gr. and Lat. text); H. Delehaye, Les saints stylites (Subs. hagiogr. 14), Brussels 1923, II-XXXIV; P. Peteers, St. Syméon stylite et ses premiers biographes: AB 61 (1943) 29-71; R. Doran, The Lives of Symeon Stylites, Kalamazoo 1992, 85-100.

M.G. Bianco

ANTHONY, abbot (251–ca. 335). The most famous of the fathers of *anchorism, considered its founder by a substantial branch of the tradition that goes back to *Athanasius's Life of Anthony. Born 251, at age 20 he adopted the *ascetic life, first in a village (under the direction of an old man), then in a tomb dug out of a mountainside near the Nile, then in abandoned ruins in the middle of the *desert. Later a system of small *monasteries arose around him, a community of which he was the "father." Still later he moved toward the Red Sea to a place where the monastery dedicated to him still stands and where he spent most of his life until he died (ca. 355). His interventions in *Alexandria seem to have been at the time of *Diocletian's persecution (Maximinus), and later during the *Arian controversy, to register his support for Athanasius, whose Life of Anthony makes him an example of monastic life, fully describing his *ascesis, way of life, his struggles with demons in the desert and his spirituality. A corpus of letters is attributed to Anthony himself, varying in number and reaching us in various languages. A corpus of seven letters, the original Greek lost, has reached us in *Georgian, *Latin, and partially in *Coptic and in *Syriac. A corpus of twenty letters has reached us in Arabic, generally hortatory in character but inspired by doctrines typical of the *Platonism of the *Origenian school, as recently shown by Rubenson. Also attributed to him is a letter to *Theodore of Tabennesi, a series of rules and some twenty sermons. Only the corpus of seven letters and the letter to Theodore appear authentic.

BHG 140-141h; CPG 2330-2350; Letters, PG 40, 977-1000; G. Garitte, Lettres de S. Antoine, version géorgienne et fragments coptes, Louvain 1955 (CSCO 148-149); B. Steidle (ed.), Antonius Magnus Eremita, Rome 1956 (SA 38); S. Rubenson, The Letters of St. Anthony: Origenist Theology, Monastic Tradition and the Making of a Saint, Lund 1990 = Bibliotheca Historico-Ecclesiastica Lundensis, 24; Coptic Encyclopedia 1,149-151; C. Corsato, Sant'Antonio abate (251-356), Verona 2002.

T. Orlandi

ANTHONY of Choziba (d. after 630). *Monk of the Palestinian *laura of Choziba in the Wadi-el-Kelt between *Jerusalem and Jericho. Disciple of St. George, monk of that monastery (d. 625 ca.), whose life he wrote (BHG 669), in which he describes his own *conversion and desire to withdraw to Raithu, his relationship with his master, and the dispersions of the monks of Choziba at the time of the *Persian invasion (620)—the one datable event in this biography replete with exhortations that he attributes to his heroes. Anthony is also the author of a collection, Seven Miracles That the Theotokos (Mary) Worked at Choziba (BHG 1071). He must have died after 630.

CPG 7985; DHGE III, 781; BS VI, 534-536; A.N. Athanassakis - T. Vivian, The Life of Saint George of Choziba and the Miracles of the Most Holy Mother of God at Choziba, San Francisco 1994; L. di Segni, Nel deserto accanto ai fratelli. Vite di Gerasimo di Giorgio di Choziba, Bose 1991, 83-125.

D. Stiernon

ANTHROPOLOGY

I. Biblical origins - II. Extrabiblical origins - III. Anthropological developments of Gen 1:26; 2:7; and of Paul.

I. Biblical origins. The key OT texts are Gen 1:26 and 2:7; Wis 2:23; Sir 17:1-4. In Gen 1:26, on the one hand, the human being (= man-woman) is the fruit of the divine counsel, created "in the image and likeness" of God, i.e., in "appearance" the human is the image-likeness of a divine being, as a copy is to the original. The two terms image and likeness do not indicate two different aspects, but exterior (image) and interior (likeness) aspects of the same reality. The human beings are the completion of creation, over which they have "dominion" which gives value to their life that, for this reason, cannot be violated with impunity (Gen 9). The Gen 2:7 account (the human made from clay), on the other hand, emphasizes human earthly nature and kinship with the world, complementing Gen 1:26 (kinship with the heavenly world). Wisdom literature introduces two additional concepts: that of incorruptibility and therefore immortality as the human end; and that of the eternity or essence of God of which humans are the image. A fundamental category of OT humanity is that of dependence on God, which cannot be ignored without compromising the root of human nature.

In the NT, whereas the gospels emphasize human value over that of other goods and institutions, in Paul we see the beginning of an anthropological reflection according to Jewish and *Hellenistic categories. Paul's basic texts are 1 Thess 5:23 (human beings as body-soul-spirit); 1 Cor 15:45-49 (carnal and spiritual humanity; the first Adam and the last Adam, i.e., the grafting of anthropology onto *Christology); Rom 7–8 (the stages of human fulfillment). Paul's categories are "flesh and spirit": "flesh" (sarx) is that which excludes God and opposes the "spiritual" (pneuma). The "spirit" represents for Paul the sphere within which humanity can enter into dialogue with God, who constitutes the vital level of human existence. "Flesh" and "spirit" indicate decisional stages: the "carnal" and the "spiritual." Intermediate stages are those of sōma ("body"—1 Cor 15:44), psychē ("soul"—1 Cor 2:14; 15:45) and nous ("intellect"—Rom 7:23; 12:2; 1 Cor 14:14-15), which can have a positive role since they may lead to the spiritual person. In Paul the "psychical" person precedes the spiritual. The risen Christ, in 1 Cor 15:45 called the "last and second Adam," dwells within the spiritual person; indeed, he is a "life-giving spirit," i.e., he gives life to human beings just as Yahweh breathed life into the "first Adam." Anthropology is thus interconnected with Christology: persons are what they become in the strength of the risen Christ. The eikōn ("originating image") of the human is God according to Gen 1:26, but concretely, that eikōn is Christ. For Paul the principle of continuity between humanity's present and future condition ("spiritual" in the risen "life-giving spirit") is corporeity (sōma), a position that sets Paul against every *Platonizing anthropology. Paul's anthropology is also an *eschatological anthropology, rather than the protological anthropology of *gnosticism.

II. Extrabiblical origins. The cultural context with which Paul's anthropology was in constant dialectic was the thought of *Philo of Alexandria and of the rabbis, Greeks, and gnostics. Philo, accepting and contrasting Gen 1:26 and 2:7, proposed the distinction between a heavenly person (Gen 1:26) who exists prior to the earthly (Gen 2:7), and the actual person who corresponds to Gen 2:7, whose exemplar idea is Gen 1:26, identified with nous and which properly defines humanity (Leg. all. 1,31-32; Opif. mundi 134). The rabbinical conception gave priority to *Adam in paradise as God's image; despite Paul's criticism, it entered Christianity through the ps.-Clementines and *Irenaeus.

Hellenism, since it had no term anthrōpologia, and the corresponding terms anthrōpologein and anthrōpologos meant only "to represent in human form," developed the subject in treatises "on human nature." It substantially accepted the central thesis of I Alcibiades that the human structure is constituted by a divine element or *soul (particularly the nous, "intellect") as its noblest part, capable of reaching God through knowledge. On this basis, a constant of Greek thought was the inseparability of anthropology from theodicy (thesis of the syngeneia or divine kinship, appropriated by Christianity), defining human nature not in relation to the human body or its composite but by the soul alone (Alcib. 129e-130e).

For non-Christian gnosticism (*Hermeticism), historical humanity is the fruit of the union between archetypal humanity and nature (CH, Poimandres 1,15 and 17); the Christianized gnosticism of the *Valentinians divided humanity into three classes: hylic, psychic and spiritual. Only the last will escape destruction; the psychic can either become spiritual or return to the hylic state. They also distinguished between humanity made in the image of the demiurge and humanity made in his likeness ("psychic humanity"). In Gen 1:26 they understand the hylic human of Gen 2:7, into whom had been breathed that breath of life (the spiritual seed) that, through gnosis, would be rejoined to the divine (Iren., Adv. haer. 1, 5,5 and 6-7, 1).

III. Anthropological developments of Gen 1:26; 2:7; and Paul. There were basically two developments of biblical anthropology in Christian antiquity: one on the lines of Gen 1:26, the other on Paul's line of an anthropology anchored to Christology. The simple statement of the Apostolic Fathers that the human being of Gen 2:7, formed of clay, is the same as the human being of Gen 1:26, made in God's image and likeness, led to two developments. The Greek body-soul dichotomy, though generally accepted, never became an absolute dualist separation because of the common faith of Christians in the incarnation of the Word and resurrection of the body. Starting from the fundamental unity of the human being derived from the biblical creation account, Christian anthropological thought took two directions: either stressing human rationality (the *Alexandrian and Western tradition), or the plasis or formation of the human body (the *Asiatic and *Antiochene tradition). The Alexandrians sought to define the person by his essential constituent, nous, described for them in Gen 1:26: humanity in the image and likeness of God, the spiritual and perfect human who, in concrete existence, must experience the limitation of the earthly humanity of Gen 2:7, a limitation from which the perfect person must be freed by continual *ascesis. Christ did not absorb the earthly into himself; he merely became the *ethical model to which the latter must aspire, indeed, the way of return to what humanity truly is. This approach measured itself particularly against Platonism, delineating a metaphysical anthropology that gave little attention to historical humanity. Its last expression, in the Christianity of the 16th-18th c., was the anthropological hypothesis of the "purely natural" human.

The Asiatic-Antiochene approach gave first place to the historical human made of clay, whose whole being, not just part of it (the soul), is God's image. The incarnate Word is not just a human ethical model but the true human, the image of God. In this scheme, Christology became the hermeneutical principle of anthropology. As *Irenaeus expressed it: "God will be glorified in his plasma made conformable to and like his Son" (Adv. haer. 5, 6,1). Similarly the Antiochene *Diodore of Tarsus, in open polemic with the Alexandrians: "Some have thought that the creation of the human being as image of God refers to the invisibility of the soul. They have not understood that even *angels and *demons are invisible. In what sense then is the human being the image of God? Because he has dominion" (In Gen. 1,26; PG 33, 1564). Not just the human intellectual faculty but also the entire self in all its bodiliness is the image of God, i.e., bears witness to a principle (God) that transcends it. The original fact of creation is common to all beings; what distinguishes and sets them apart is their different destinies. In other words this school understood Gen 1:26 under the influence of belief in the incarnation of the Word in the context of Gen 2:7. God's image in humanity must therefore be referred to the whole person, including the body. To this end Irenaeus made a distinction not present in the biblical text, understanding "image" as referring to the human constitution, and "likeness" to life in the Spirit. Christ, from an anthropological perspective, represents the concrete person, the "image and likeness," who becomes the way for human beings to become the "image and likeness" of God. The Spirit, though not constitutive of the person, enables humans historically to become what they are meant to be. Thus Irenaeus says three elements constitute the human: flesh, soul and spirit (Adv. haer. 5, 9,1). This is a conception of anthropology on a dynamic-historical level: persons are not just what they were made; rather, persons are what they will become; they are not just "God's work" in the sense of having been created by God, but above all a "pledge" (Tertull., De resurr. carnis 6,5), indeed, according to Irenaeus, a "pledge of the Spirit" (Adv. haer. 5, 8,2).

Within the great schools of early Christianity, particularly the Alexandrian and Asiatic, we find personalities who epitomize virtually the entire development of Christian anthropology: *Justin Martyr forms the juncture between biblical and Greek anthropology; *Athanasius, as heir to the Alexandrian and Asiatic tradition, occupies a position between Christian East and West; *Augustine, antiquity's last great thinker, definitively disjoins anthropology from cosmology, and holds that persons must interrogate themselves directly to discover who they are, filtering the whole of reality that they encounter, including God, through themselves. We will examine the principal contributions of each.

*1. The apologists: Justin. The Christian apologists, while sharing Empedocles's definition of human nature as a microcosm encapsulating the four elements (Diels, Die Frag. der Vor., I, fr. 6,8,9; 112-148), tried to surpass the Greek conception of humanity as pure rationality, stressing the presence of the divine spirit within that makes a person like God and which is opposed to the "material spirit" (Tat., Orat. 12,1 and 4,2). With them, anthropology began that dialectic of continual "approach" and "distancing" between biblical and Hellenistic elements. Justin developed a Logos-anthropology that distinguished a Logos spermatikos (the seminal logos, the divine reality: originally a *Stoic expression) and a sperma ("seed") of the Logos (the human reality, according to Holte; for Waszink, the Logos-Christ is the category of truth, while the Logos spermatikos is the presence of this truth in humanity). His Logos is a synthesis of Platonic nous,* Stoic pneuma* and Jewish wisdom*, using the three terms as equivalents to explain the cosmos and human nature. The creaturely link between humanity and the Logos takes concrete form for Justin in the incarnate Word, who teaches us how to return to God as human destiny (Apol. 1, 10,4; 2, 15,5; 2, 10,1; Dial. 93,3). In the incarnate Word each person has a model and, illumined by him, becomes a mediation between God and the cosmos as its priest (hiereus). To fulfill this task, humanity is given freedom (Apol. 1, 43,3 and 8).

2. The Asiatic tradition: Irenaeus. This tradition reflects on anthropology in terms of the salvation of the whole person, body, soul and spirit (Iren., Adv. haer. V, 6,1 and 9,1). It asks: in what sense can a human being, including the bodily component, be called God's image as in Gen 1:26? Irenaeus sees the incarnate Word as the subject of that image, thus making an essential connection between Christology (Christ incarnate as image of God) and anthropology (humanity as the image of Christ) and extending the "image of God" of Gen 1:26 beyond human rationality to embodiedness. Human flesh is God's image in view of the flesh of the Word incarnate. To explain this Irenaeus was the first to introduce into the understanding of the sacred text the distinction (which is not original to the text) between image (human creatureliness in history) and likeness (what humanity becomes by the power of the Spirit)(Adv. haer. 5, 1,3 and 28,4). This is Irenaeus's somatic anthropology which, against the gnostics and Platonizers in general, who denied any possibility of salvation to corporeity, gave the human image the very lineaments of the incarnate Word. *Tertullian wrote: "In the slime that took on form was the thought of Christ who would become human" (Resurr. 6,3).

3. The Alexandrian eikōn-anthropology. The Alexandrian anthropology of the image is grafted onto the *Middle Platonism of Philo, the basic points of which were (1) the soul's kinship with God and (2) the capacity of the human nous (image of God) to relate to God to the extent of becoming like him (homoiōsis). Therefore the Alexandrians made nous (the soul's highest faculty) the seat of the divine image and the defining human characteristic (Clem. Alex., Paedag., 3, 1,1; Orig., C. Cels. 4,83). The human of Gen 2:7, humanity as image, historical humanity, is in tension with the human of Gen 1:26, humanity as likeness. Christ is the human person as likeness of Gen 1:26, the concrete model or didaskalos of every human being who, by practicing *virtue, must imitate and follow him: in this way every human realizes himself and becomes like God (homoiōsis) (Clem. Alex., Strom., 5, 88,1-3). *Origen, developing the Philonian conception of humanity's double creation, saw in Gen 1:26 the true human, the original human who must be recovered, and in Gen 2:7 the fallen human, a nous subjected to a coat of skins (In Gen. hom. 1,13; In Io. 20,22). The human image is only in the soul's nous, but precisely as image of the Logos, hence Christ always remains the paradigm of the recovery of the true human image. Athanasius developed this school's doctrine of human recovery through the Word, by being logikos, i.e., capable of relating to divine and intelligible realities (De incarnatione 3,3). The role of the incarnate Word is to restore to humans the possibility of relating with him and thus with their own image (De inc., 13,7 and 20,1). The *Cappadocian fathers, esp. *Basil (Hex. 9, homilies on Gen 1:26) and *Gregory of Nyssa (De hominis opificio and Ep. ad Arm. in PG 46, 237-249), were the Alexandrian school's last great continuers of referring the image to the Logos; but they also understood it as *hypostasis, which was their innovation on the theme. Image was thus used as a distinction or hypostasis in the *Trinity, with the consequence that not only the Word but the Trinity itself was thought of as an analogy for the human image, and the image of the human soul in particular (Hom. Adtende tibi 81, 3). The Antiochene school, however, followed Irenaeus in placing the divine image in the whole person, not just in rationality; its polemical context, however, was more christological than anthropological. Latin Christendom, except for Tertullian, who was anchored to the Asiatic tradition, gravitated to Christian Platonism and the unity of the divine persons as human image as such. Humanity is made in the image of the whole Trinity, not just of one divine person (*Hilary of Poitiers, Augustine). In the reflections of the following centuries, this approach forever broke the link between anthropology and Christology.

4. Augustine. With Augustine, anthropology, previously linked to the doctrines of *creation and Christology, was used to clarify every other problem. Humanity is no longer a "microcosm" in a cosmological scheme; the cosmos itself, and even God, become known by passing through humanity. Augustine's anthropocentrism passed into textbooks as Augustinian interiority; in the manuals of the Orthodox Church, as the reduction of theology to anthropology. For Augustine, to confront the question of "humanity" means not so much to resolve it (Conf. 4, 4,9; 10, 8,15) as to understand the nature and significance of the questions, and the authority capable of instructing us about them, i.e., Scripture (Corr. et gratia 1,1). Rather than define humanity, therefore, Augustine describes human nature in relation to its end, which is God: his anthropology, consequently, never leaves God out of consideration. In the human composite of soul and body—one of the wonders of the human mystery (Civ. Dei 21,10)—he distinguishes and emphasizes the diversity and roles of each (De cont. 12,26; Ser. 154, 10,15) without devaluing them on Platonic lines (Civ. Dei 13,16 and 24; De Gen. ad litt. 7, 27,38). In connection with the Pelagian polemic, Augustine developed the anthropological problem as freedom and image of the Trinity. In Civ. Dei he emphasized the human capacity for God—our greatest capacity—(12, 1,3), and in De trinitate our need for God—our greatest need—(14, 4,6 and 8, 11), which only God can fill (Conf. 1, 1,1). In this way Augustine recovered Origen's sense of "image" as a tendency toward the archetype, explaining it in a trinitarian way in that humanity, in composition as mens-notitia-amor or memoria-intelligentia-voluntas, is the image of the triune God. Mens implies relation to the *Father, intelligentia or notitia to the Son (Word-Truth), amor or voluntas to the Spirit (Trin. 15, 3,5). Augustine also introduced the theme of image, linked to the theology of creation, into the category of history, i.e., of Adam and Christ as roots of humanity, thus linking the protological aspect of human creation (Gen 1:26 and 2:7) to *soteriology and *eschatology. To recover one's "image" means for Augustine to rediscover the way (Christ incarnate) and the possibility of traveling it, which in Augustinian anthropological terms is equivalent to restoring to human freedom, healed by the grace of Christ, the capacity to relate to God (theme of De gr. et lib. arb. and Corr. et gratia). Grace and freedom pertain equally for him to God and to humanity, who walk together as friends in mutual help. Grace is understood as an auxilium, rather than rival, to freedom. This approach opposed the *Pelagian conception of human autonomy (humanity before God, not with God) and the Platonic anthropology that held the soul alone to be the essential constituent of the human, and the body an element from which the human must be freed. After Augustine the model of grace as help of freedom was more and more replaced by the Pelagian model of freedom and grace facing each other, which led to the *predestinationist theory that God decides human destinies. The theme of humanity as image of the Trinity, however, found a place in *mysticism, as the communication of the soul with the Trinity.

H. Schmidt, Die Anthropologie Philons von Alexandria, Würzburg 1933; L. Bieler, Theios Aner. Das Bild des "göttlichen Menschen" im Spätantike und Frühchristentum, Vienna 1935 (I), 1936 (II); G. Quispel, La conception de l'homme dans la gnose valentinienne: Eranos-Jb 15 (1947) 249-286; H. Karpp, Probleme altchr. Anthropologie, Bad Godesberg 1950; H. Merki, Homoiosis Theo, Freiburg i.d. Schw. 1952; R. Holte, Logos spermatikos . . . : STh 12 (1958) 109-168; var. aus., J. Jerveli, Imago Dei (Gen 1,26) im Spätjudentum, in der Gnosis und in den paulinischen Briefen, Göttingen 1960; E. des Places, Syngeneia. La parenté de l'homme avec Dieu: d'Homère à la patristique, Paris 1964; J.H. Waszink, Bemerkungen zu Justins Lehre vom Logos Spermatikos, Mullus (Festschr. Th. Klauser), Bonn 1964, 380-390; G. Mathon, L'anthropologie chrétienne en Occident de s. Augustin à Jean Scot Erigène, Lille 1964 (diss.); G. Giannini, Il problema antropologico. Linee di sviluppo storico-speculativo dai presocratici a S. Tommaso, Rome 1965; A. Orbe, Antropología de san Ireneo, Madrid 1969; J. Pépin, Idées grecques sur l'homme et sur Dieu, Paris 1971; R. Morissette, L'antithèse entre le "psychique" et le "pneumatique" en 1Cor 15,44 à 46: RSR 46 (1972) 97-143; L'uomo nella Bibbia e nelle culture ad essa contemporanee, Brescia 1975; J. Roldanus, Le Christ et l'homme dans la Théologie d'Athanase d'Alexandrie, Leiden 1977; U. Bianchi (ed.), La "doppia creazione" dell'uomo negli alessandrini, nei cappadoci e nella gnosi, Rome 1978; U. Bianchi (ed.), Archè e Telos. L'antropologia di Origene e di Gregorio di Nissa. Analisi storico-religiosa, Milan 1981; M. Perrin, L'homme antique et chrétien. L'anthropologie de Lactance (250-325), Paris 1981; J. Léal, La antropología de Tertulliano (SEA 76), Rome 2001. On Augustine: E. Dinkler, Die Anthropologie Augustins, Stuttgart 1934; R.J. O'Connell, S. Augustine's Early Theory of Man A.D. 386-391, Cambridge MA 1968; V. Grossi, L'antropologia agostiniana. Note previe: Augustinianum 22 (1972) 457-467; Id., La crisi antropologica nel monastero di Adrumeto: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 103-133; Id., L'antropologia cristiana negli scritti di Agostino (gr. lib. arb.; corr. gratia): SSR 4 (1980) 89-113; Id., A proposito dei testi agostiniani sulla libertà, Congresso Internazionale su St. Augustine. Atti II, Rome 1987, 281-293.

V. Grossi

ANTHROPOMORPHISM. In its religious sense, the term refers to imagining God in human form and conceiving his actions ad extra on the basis of human experience. The concept involves an obvious ambivalence: on the one hand, since human beings can only know in a human way (see Aug., Civ. Dei 16,6,1), anthropomorphism has a fundamentally positive sense; since, however, the person always risks forgetting the distance that separates divine realities from what is understood and said of them, anthropomorphism can also have a negative sense. This double sense is reflected in the language adopted by the Fathers on the theme. Ἀνθρωπομόρφος, ἀνθρωποειδής and other similar words are used in both senses (Lampe 139f.), whereas ἀνθρωπομορφῆται, a term probably created by *Origenist *monks to brand their opponents who were too attached to the letter of the Bible, and later adopted by the Latins (ThLL II/1,164), is obviously negative.

In the Fathers we meet both positive and negative senses, for reasons that lie in the Bible itself. In it we find themes, such as humanity as the image of God (Gen 1:26) and Christ as image of the invisible God (Col 1:15; 2 Cor 4:4), that provide the basis of a doctrine on the human means of knowing God. Other texts warn against any too-human, or even bodily, representation of God. Thus Jn 4:24: "God is spirit," and all the passages that confirm the impossibility of seeing God, the ineffability of his name, the inaccessibility of his dwelling, etc. In the 2nd c. theological reflection on anthropomorphism was largely negative. Guided by biblical faith in a completely transcendent God, but also by the *Hellenist polemic against pagan mythology (see *Philo of Alexandria), the *apologists fought against the too-human ideas of poytheism and idolatry (RAC 1,449). But *Origen, faced with the errors of his time, and esp. because Celsus had used a method like that of the apologists to criticize the anthropomorphic language of the Bible, was led to work out a positive theory of anthropomorphism, regarding both knowledge of God in general (Princ. I,1,7)—including the "spiritual senses"—and biblical hermeneutics (Princ. IV, 2-3: see Crouzel, SC 269, 1738). He justified the theory based on the divine condescension that culminates in the kenosis of the Word (Jo 6,5,29). He offered some provisos, however: confirming that Gen 1:26 refers to God's image in the soul, he ruled out any bodily representation of God (Cels. 6,63; Hom. in Gen. 1,13; Sel. in Gen.: PG 12, 93-96; against *Melito, etc.) and insisted on the need to go beyond "carnal" knowledge of God to reach a spiritual knowledge of him.

He thus developed a mainly spiritual *exegesis, though not without using Hellenistic methods (Gögler, Theologie). The position he took against both the "simple" and *Marcionites remained decisive for the whole of patristics, including Latin. During the 4th c., however, strong opposition to Origenist exegesis arose in certain monastic circles, whom Origen's adherents called anthropomorphitae. The rejection of *allegorism is explained in part as a criticism of *Evagrius of Pontus's doctrine of "pure prayer" (Guillaumont, Kephalaia Gnostica). It appeared esp. in the disputes between *John of Jerusalem and *Epiphanius (Jerome, C. Joh. 11) and between *Theophilus of Alexandria and the Origenist monks (Guillaumont, op. cit., 59ff., with sources), in *Cyril of Alexandria's Adv. Anthropomorphitas (CPG III, 5383) and in *John Cassian (Coll. X, 2f.). The anthropomorphite monks should not be confused with the so-called *Audiani—a confusion probably due to *Augustine (Haer. 50; RAC 1,450), who also mentions the anthropomorphites elsewhere (Ep. 148,4,13; Epist. fund. 23,25).

Finally, two further developments of anthropomorphism are noteworthy: in the East, arguments used in the 4th- and 8th-c. iconoclast controversies recall the same theology of God's image disputed in the conflict between "simple" and "allegorizers"; and in the West Augustine, while rejecting the "anthropomorphites" and any bodily knowledge of God, developed his famous psychological theory of the Trinity. Going beyond the vestigia and similitudines in creation and in human interior life, he finally sees in the triad of memoria Dei, intellegentia Dei, amor in Deum the most perfect image of the Christian God (Trin. 14). Also noteworthy is Augustine's reflection on the Bible's "anthropomorphic" language (Trin. 1,1,2).

G. van der Leeuw, Anthropomorphismus: RAC I, 446-450; H.C. Puech, Audianer: RAC I, 910-915; W. Schneemelcher, Epiphanius: RAC 5, 909-927; A. Favale, Teofilo di Alessandria, Turin 1958; A. Guillaumont, Les "Kephalaia Gnostica" d'Evagre le Pontique, Paris 1962; R. Gögler, Zur Theologie des biblischen Wortes bei Origenes, Düsseldorf 1963; HWP 1 (1971) 376-378; J.N.D. Kelly, Jerome, London 1975; C. von Schönborn, L'icône du Christ, Fribourg [2]1976; RGG[4] 1 (1998) 524-529, esp. 527f.; B. Studer, Zur Bedeutung der heiligen Schrift in Augustin's De Trinitate: Augustinianum 42 (2002) 127-147, esp. 144f.

B. Studer

ANTICHRIST. A Christian variant of God's adversary in the last days, already present in Jewish *apocalyptic literature. The antagonist is Satan or the Dragon, either directly or through the human figure of a persecuting tyrant or a false prophet, a corrupter of good people. The word antichrist appears in the NT only in 1 Jn 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 Jn 7. Except in the case of 1 Jn 2:18, the term is always in the singular. It is a creation of the *Presbyter, or he takes it from a prior tradition; the term is certainly not used before the late 1st c. in Christian contexts, as it is unknown to the earlier Christian apocalyptic literature. Among the Apostolic Fathers it is found only in *Polycarp (7,1), who takes it from 1–2 Jn and applies it to those who deny the *incarnation of Christ. The antichrist is distinguished from the the devil and Satan, from whom he comes and to whom he belongs. Satan and the Antichrist are identified in Orac. Sib. 3, 63-74. The expectation of the adversary of God as a human being facilitated the identification of the antichrist with the πλάνοι (2 Jn 7), which in turn led to the plural "antichrists" of 1 Jn 2:18. The figure also appears in 2 Th 2:1-12 and Rev 13 and 17, with different characteristics. The antichrist is a political figure. His external power and ability to seduce, which 2 Th presents as united in the same figure, in Rev 13 are divided between the antichrist and the false prophet. In 2 Th, the antichrist is an individual figure; in Rev 13, it is equally the emperor and the *Roman Empire. In 1 Jn 2:18-22, the teachers of error are seen as a number of antichrists. Did. 16,3-4 follows the NT, presenting the antichrist as an adversary of the Son of God, a corruptor with a universal dominion. *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. V, 25-30) tries to deduce the term "antichrist" from the number 666 of Rev 13:18, describing his *apostasy and his claim to be worshiped as God. *Hippolytus writes on the antichrist between 197 and 202, probably prompted by the persecution of *Septimius Severus, when many Christians thought that the last days had arrived and that the antichrist himself would soon appear (see Eus., HE VI, 7); he maintains that the antichrist cannot enter the scene before the fall of the Roman Empire. The antichrist and the afterlife, which in the NT are only marginal elements of the expectation of the *parousia, are the two main themes of Christian apocalyptic literature from the mid-2nd c. In various writings (Orac. Sib. 3,63-74; 5,28-34.214-27; Ascens. Is.) the antichrist, Belial and the resurrected Nero of the legend are combined; this disappears by the 3rd c., however, and with it the identification of the antichrist with a concrete political figure; the antichrist begins to be seen as a figure of the Jewish pseudo-Messiah, corruptor of the world (Hipp.; Testam. Dom.; Apoc. Eliae; Commod., Carmen apol.; Lact., Div. inst. 7,14). A Latin apocryphal fragment (M.R. James, TS 2,3, Cambridge 1893, 151-158) offers a description of the antichrist identical to that of the *Syriac Testam. Dom. and related to that of the *Coptic Apoc. Soph., written perhaps late 2nd c. since it was cited by *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. V, 11, 77). From the 4th c. the antichrist is again put forth as a figure of the fall of the Roman Empire. Ev. Nic. 9(25) describes the final confrontation of Enoch and Elijah with the antichrist, as described in Rev 11:3-13.

W. Bousset, Der Antichrist in der Überlieferung des Judentums, des NT und der alten Kirche, Göttingen 1895; A. Jeremias, Der Antichrist in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Göttingen 1930; B. Rigaux, L'Antéchrist, Gembloux-Paris 1932; G. Strecker, Der Antichrist. Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Hintergrund von 1 Joh 2,18.22; 4,3 und 2 Joh 7, in T. Baarda et al. (eds.), Text and Testimony: Essays on New Testament and Apocryphal Literature in Honour of A.F.J. Klijn, Kampen 1988, 247-254; A. Baumgarten, Antichrist among Jews and Gentiles, in Jews in the Graeco-Roman World, ed. M. Goodman, Oxford 1998, 113-133.

R. Trevijano

ANTIDICOMARIANITAE. *Epiphanius discusses this group amply in Haer. 78, reporting the letter he wrote about them to the church of *Arabia, where he locates their origin. The Antidicomarianitae confessed only the human nature of Christ and denied the virginity of *Mary in that, after Christ's birth, she is said to have had other children with Joseph. *Augustine first mentions them (Haer. 56) as denying the perpetual virginity of Mary, and then again (Haer. 84), identifying them with the Helvidians, followers of the Roman *Helvidius, who preached the same doctrine, and against whom *Jerome wrote De perpetua virginitate beatae Mariae.

H. Quilliet, Antidicomarianites: DTC 1,1378-1382; G. Bardy, Le "De Haeresibus" et ses sources: Miscellanea Agostiniana 2 (1931) 411-412.

F. Cocchini

ANTILEGOMENON. Word used by *Eusebius of *Caesarea (HE III, 25,3) and later by other authors to indicate those OT and NT writings whose inspiration or *canonicity were not agreed on. In contrast to those accepted by all (homologoumena), NT antilegoumena were Heb, 2 Pet, Jas, Jude, 2–3 Jn and Rev. By introducing the distinction between books considered canonical by all and those about which there was debate and dissent, Eusebius calls attention to the fact that not all agreed on the latter. Regarding the OT, *Melito of Sardis (Eus., HE IV, 26) and *Origen (ibid., VI, 25) prefer to list the protocanonical books, which suggests they were faithful to the Hebrew canon, which did not accept the deuterocanonical books (antilegoumena). *Cyril of Jerusalem qualifies the deuterocanonical books of the OT with the epithet incerti (Lat. "uncertain"; Gk. amphiballomena "disputed"—Catech. IV, 33-35). Eusebius grasped the situation better than any other ancient author: besides the books universally recognized as inspired (homologoumena), he cites two series of contested books: those under discussion, cited above, and those considered spurious (Acts of Paul, The Shepherd of *Hermas, the Apocalypse of Peter, the *Epistle of Barnabas, the Didache*, the Apocalypse, accepted by some but not by others). He then adds another list of *heretical books that no writer of the ecclesiastical tradition invokes in support of doctrine (HE III, 25,3-7). Those sacred books classified by the ancient Christian tradition as antilegoumena were first called deuterocanonical, the term now used in treatises on the inspiration of Scripture, by Sixtus of Siena (d. 1569).

Eusebius of Caesarea, Hist. Eccl. III, 25,3-7; IV, 26,14; VI, 25,2;

Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. IV, 33-35; G. Ruwet, De Canone (De S. Scriptura in universum, I), Rome [6]1951, 126-130, 154-159; G. Perrella, Introduzione generale alla sacra Bibbia, Turin [2]1952, 132-144, 152-156; H. Höpfl, Introductio generalis in S. Scripturam, Naples-Rome [6]1958, 154-159, 170-176; F. Spadafora, Il Canone (Il Libro sacro, I. Introduzione generale), Padua 1958, 24-27, 36-37; A. Zigenaus, Kanon. Von der Väterzeit bis zum Gegenwart (HDG 1/3°, 2), Freiburg 1990.

E. PERETTO

ANTIOCH in Caria, Council of. In 366 or 367, 34 *homoiousian bishops from the province of *Asia and adjoining regions met in this city of Asia Minor (Soz., HE, VI, 12). Unlike the homoiousian Council of *Tyana, which had gathered mainly bishops from the internal regions of Asia Minor and *Syria and at which the Nicene homoousios was accepted, they rejected this formula and reaffirmed the Antiochene formula of 341, which they ascribed to *Lucian of Antioch. *Sozomen (HE VII, 2) mentions another council at Antioch of Caria in 378, which condemned the homoousios and reaffirmed the homoiousios, but he is probably confusing it with the earlier one. *Socrates (HE V, 4) puts this second council at *Antioch in Syria, based on the same confusion.

Hfl-Lecl 1,2,979; Simonetti 398-399.

M. SIMONETTI

ANTIOCH of Syria

I. History - II. Councils - III. Schism - IV. Liturgy - V. School - VI. Archaeology.

I. History. Sociocultural context. Capital of W *Syria or Coele-Syria, founded in 300 BC by Seleucus I Nicanor, son of Antiochus, from whom it received its name and the epithet "royal." Capital of the Seleucid monarchy, it was also an imperial residence. Enviably situated near the river Orontes and the Silpius and Stauris Mountains, a city both fertile and commercial, Antioch had sumptuous buildings, baths, theaters and hippodromes, and a library. In the 4th c. there were still 8 pagan temples; the village of Daphne was 6 km (3.7 mi) away. Syria was one of the 5 divisions of the prefecture of the East; seat of the comes of the East, the city enjoyed a moral-cultural supremacy rather than a political-administrative one. One of the largest cities of the Roman world (4th-c. population 500,000-800,000), second or third after *Rome and *Alexandria, Antioch was home to one of the most important communities of the Jewish diaspora (C.H. Cräling, 130-160). Cosmopolitan, it was Greek in spirit and culture; its official language was Greek, though *Syriac was the popular tongue. There was a large middle class between rich and poor (Chrys., In Matth. hom. 66.3: PG 58, 630; In Gen. serm. 8,2: PG 54, 619), with a notable inequality separating large landowners, small shopkeepers, artisans, beggars and slaves. The people themselves were volatile and restless. In the 7th c. Antioch fell with Syria to the Arabs (638–969) (J. Kollwitz, Antiochia am Orontes: RAC [1950] 1, 461-463).

Christianity until the 7th century. 1. Origins. *Hellenist Jewish Christians from *Jerusalem, arriving from Cyprus and Cyrenaica, preached the gospel there, with many converts. Here the disciples were first called Christians (Acts 11:19-26) (by *pagan authorities, the populace, the Christians themselves?). With the triumph of the *Pauline thesis of the noncircumcision of converts from paganism and the overcoming of the "incident at Antioch" between *Peter and *Paul (Gal 2:1-14), the Christian community of Antioch became more settled. Antioch's authority derived from the role it assumed in the mission to the pagans and from the organizational model for the new churches (Ch. Pietri, 94). It had a particular role in *theology and *apologetics (*Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, see R.M. Grant). Christianity penetrated the rural zones only with difficulty in Syria, due to the presence of Semitic divinities, reinterpreted according to Greek mythology. It also clashed with Jewish Christian sects and Jewish proselytism, as shown by the Didascalia Apostolorum (3rd or 4th c.) (see H.J.W. Drijvers, The Persistence of Pagan Cults and Practices in Christian Syria, in East of Byzantium, Washington 1982, 35-43). The Ad Autoycum of Theophilus (169–188) attests the link, still strong, between *Judaism and Christianity (R.M. Grant, Theophilus of Antioch ad Autolycum, Oxford 1970, XVIII). Antioch was distinguished in the 3rd c. along with Alexandria: episcopal synods presided over by its bishop, e.g., *Paul of Samosata (261–272), indicated its ecclesiastical-political importance. Paul of Samosata was *excommunicated and deposed (268–269), accused of *adoptionism (the Logos did not have a personal substance) and for practices of the old Syriac and Jewish Christian tradition (alternate choirs sang the refrain of hymns, see J. Gélineau, 1960).

2. Persecution and the peace of Constantine. Antioch survived the crisis of the *persecutions, even those of *Diocletian and *Licinius, recovering through *Constantine's favor (306–337). There was also a violent persecution under *Valens (364–378), who resided at Antioch and favored the *homoians: Bishop *Meletius was exiled for the third time, Catholic churches were requisitioned and "*Nicene" Christians harassed by the emperor. Meletius was proposed by *Theodosius (379–395) as president of the Council of *Constantinople (381) but died in the first months of that year. The literary polemic of *Libanius and the emperor *Julian was opposed at Antioch with public demonstrations. In 362 Julian accused Christian teachers, who commented on classical pagan works, of teaching what was contary to their beliefs. They should instead explain Matthew and Luke in the "Galilean" [i.e., Christian] churches and refrain from teaching classical culture (Ep. 36; see H.-I. Marrou, 422-424) and proceeded to establish an alternative church with a creed, prayers, a sacrament (*baptism) and charitable works. He alienated the Christians, writing the Misopogon, that is, "The Beard-Hater," against them. His project was interrupted by his death in battle against the Persians (363): "You won, O Galilean!" (*Theodoret of Cyrrhus, HE III, 20; see Soz. HE VI, 2). In 390 *John Chrysostom considered Antioch almost completely Christian (Adv. Jud. 1,4: PG 48, 849), with few pagans and a strong Jewish community (Theod., HE III,9-12: PG 82, 1101-1108). The increase in the number of faithful in the city and the evangelization of the countryside modified the structure of the local episcopal church: new churches were built, esp. after the peace of *Constantine (313), including the splendid "Great Church," with octagonal central plan and gilded dome, begun by Constantine, finished by *Constantius II (337–361) and dedicated in the presence of the many bishops of the council "in Encaeniis" (341) (Theod., HE III, 8: PG 82, 1099). Surrounded by attached buildings in the new city, Chrysostom preached there regularly (the cathedral?). The "Old Church" (Palaia) in the old city, rebuilt after a persecution and finished by Bishop *Philogonius (319–324), was contested by the various religious groups. On the periphery was the sanctuary of the Maccabees; another church was that of Romanus and Drosis; others were dedicated to saints in the 5th c. (W. Eltesten, Die Kirchen, 286). The developments in Christianity beginning in the 4th c. are also confirmed by the density of episcopal sees: 80 bishops of the civil dioceses of the East were present at the Council of *Nicaea, 130 at *Chalcedon (R. Devreesse, 1945). New construction was carried out outside of Antioch in the 5th c. (G. Dagron, 1978, 58-63). Nevertheless, in the late 4th c. there was still a pagan and Jewish minority of approximately 10 percent (J.H.W.G. Liebeschütz, 1972, 224-241; J. Kollwitz, Antiochia am Orontes: RAC [1950] 1, 463-468).

3. Patriarchate: origin and evolution. The organization of the vast civil diocese of the East, of which Antioch was administrative capital, for a long time followed the model of political organization. Antioch was considered the mother church (P. Maraval, Storia del Cristianesimo, 841; on the bishops of Antioch, see ibid., 842). The Didascalia Apostolorum* describes the separation between clergy and faithful in the ecclesial community, in which the offices of ecclesiastics depended on the bishop, whose qualities were listed (F. Nau, La Didascalie, 1912, ch. IV, 39-44): he is his community's presbyter, as well as its prophet, head, guide and sovereign (ibid., ch. VIII, 75). Below the bishop are presbyters with nonpriestly functions, acting as the bishop's advisors (ibid., ch. IX, 88); the deacons in the bishop's service are his ears, mouth and heart (ibid., c. IX, 88), intermediaries with the laity (ibid., c. IX, 84), about whose needs they must keep him informed (ibid., ch. XVI, 135-137); next are the inferior ministries (ibid., ch. XVI, 134-135). The Traditio Apostolica, on the one hand, presents a hierarchy in an embryonic state; the Didascalia, on the other hand, presents the growing predominance of the bishop (A. Faivre, Naissance d'une hierarchie, 1977, 170). Can. 6 of the Council of Nicaea (325) reconfirmed Antioch's privileges, along with *Alexandria, *Rome and *Jerusalem, implying that the bishop of Antioch was also a supermetropolitan: from this grew the *patriarchates, influenced in their development by geographic-political-economic centrality, cultural importance and the apostolic origin—the "Petrine principle"—of the see itself. Antioch dared not protest can. 3 of the Council of Constantinople (381) (primacy of honor to Constantinople—the "new Rome"—with the old Rome next on the list). The council reconfirmed the Nicene privileges in Antioch's regard, as principal see of the "diocese" of the East; *Boniface I (418–422), however, formulated the subordination of Antioch (and Alexandria) to Rome (Ep. 14,1). *Severus of Antioch and the Severians, intransigent *monophysites (*Eutychians), rejected the formula of the Council of Chalcedon (451) as Nestorianizing. Monophysite candidates succeeded to the patriarchal sees, including *Peter the Fuller (470-471) at Antioch, under whose influence an imperial edict condemned the Chalcedonian Creed and the Dogmatic Epistle of Leo I; 500 bishops were obliged to assent. Against Constantinople, Antioch and Alexandria preferred to defend themselves without the pope. The patriarch of Antioch (482) accepted the Henoticon, prepared by *Acacius and promulgated by *Zeno. The national (Nestorian) church of *Persia detached itself from the patriarchate of Antioch under Metropolitan Babaj of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon

(497–503), who took the title of *catholicos (patriarch). Cyprus had already detached in 488, having demonstrated its apostolic origin (the supposed tomb of *Barnabas), a principle which Rome always held to: relations between Rome and the patriarchates, always tense, are one of the most pronounced features of church history. Pope *Hormisdas (514–523) wrote the emperor, exhorting him to work for unity of faith at Antioch (and at Alexandria). *Justinian (527–565) himself acknowledged Antioch as in the fourth position, after Rome, Constantinople and Alexandria. *Isidore, archbishop of Seville (600–636), for whom a patriarch was one who held an apostolic see, cites Rome, Antioch and Alexandria as such (Etymol. 7,12,5). From Antioch we have the first effective systematic collection of canon law, now titled Collectio LXXVIII capitum. The first Nomocanon (or "of the fifty titles"), containing ecclesiastical-imperial law, seems to have been composed here (late 5th c.). The Notitia Antiochena seems to date from the second half of the 6th c.

4. Arab domination. The patriarchate of Antioch, weakened by dissensions, fell under Arab rule in 637, followed by Jerusalem (638) and Alexandria (642).

5. Monasticism. *Monasticism flourished in the 4th c. at Antioch, as had *Encratism in the 2nd c. Theses maintaining that poverty and complete abstinence derived exclusively from Persian or *Manichean influence, on the one hand, or that the primitive Syrian church derived exclusively from an *ascetical movement, on the other hand, are unsustainable. An autonomous origin of Syrian eremitic life is possible; it received Egyptian influence in the post-Constantinian era (*Athanasius's Vita Antonii). Many hermits and monks lived in the mountains N and W of Antioch (Amanus and Silpius). It seems *anchorism was the first form of monastic life, its various forms sharing a common trait: the extreme rigor of *ascesis. Rigorous monasticism, at times bizarre in its expression, assumed forms of eremitism, including stylitism and anchorism, as on Antioch's periphery. Monasticism was respected, at first having no cultural interests and establishing itself through social-charitable and missionary action, for the most part with respect for the ecclesiastical hierarchy. *Chrysostom invited the monks to evangelize; when he was bishop of Constantinople, Syrian monks offered themselves for a mission in Phoenicia. In 387 monks took part in the anti-imperial rebellion at Antioch and were reproached for it by *Theodosius I (379–385), who forbade them to live in the city (CTh XVI, 3,1; IX, 40,16). *Nestorius lived in a monastery near Antioch. The distinctive sign of monks vis-à-vis the laity, for Chrysostom and others, was not the pursuit of perfection, an obligation common to all, but *celibacy: beyond evangelical perfection, monasticism was an *eschatological sign of the kingdom of God. A promoter of monasticism in the West was *John Cassian, previously a deacon at Constantinople with Chrysostom and then a priest at Antioch. Antimonastic lay currents at Antioch (4th-5th c.) considered the monks corruptors of youth, enticing them to the desert.

6. Charity. The fervent preaching at Antioch was made credible by charitable works, directed by a deacon and assisted by deaconesses and widows, in response to enormous needs. Chrysostom provides us with a 4th-c. example: 3000 virgins and widows assisted daily. Hospitals and hospices aided prisoners, the sick, convalescents and foreigners (In Matth. hom. 66,3: PG 58, 630). Financial resources (ecclesiastical goods) were supplemented by the not-very-generous offerings of the faithful. Chrysostom considered alms a first duty of the faithful, in proportion to one's wealth justly acquired; his aim was social solidarity, according to a Christian social "utopia." Only a few rich people gave (private) *agape to the poor (In 1 Thess. hom. 11,5: PG 62, 468). Chrysostom criticized euergetism, by which one squandered his fortune to finance spectacles, only for popular acclaim (Inan. glor. 4-7).

7. Missionary activity. Converts increased under Bishop Theophilus at the end of the 2nd c. (Ad Autol. I-III), and already in its first half in Osrhoene, E Syria and *Edessa (*Addai and Haggai); they also increased between *Nisibis and the Euphrates (see the inscription of *Abercius). A synod was held at Edessa (Eus., HE V, 23,4). Antioch was also involved in this movement: Bishop *Palut of Edessa was consecrated at Antioch (190). From Edessa the missionary movement spread to the surrounding countryside, as far as Mesopotamia.

The 3rd c. saw internal consolidation and external development, and the "school of Antioch" flourished. Antioch became an active missionary center (for central Asia Minor, Armenia, Mesopotamia and Persia). 22 bishops from W Syria went to Nicaea (325), 2 of them *chorbishops in the countryside. At the start of *Diocletian's persecutions (303), Syrian prisons "were everywhere full of bishops, presbyters and deacons, lectors and *exorcists" (Eus., HE VIII, 6).

At the beginning of the period spanning the 4th-6th c., most of Syria's rural population was Christian, as archaeological (G. Tchalenko) and epigraphical (L. Jalabert) evidence shows. During the Council of Chalcedon the patriarchate of Antioch had 130 episcopal sees (R. Devreesse). Chrysostom notes the persistence of pagan practices and mindsets, and the attraction of Judaism (M. Simon, 1964, 356-363; R.L. Wilken, 1983), as also outside Antioch, like at Apamea and Harran, near Edessa (R. Trombley, 1993, 123-129). Monks were active in evangelization and social assistance (e.g., the stylites). Antioch evangelized the Arab nomads in E Syria (a bishop of the Arabs was at the Synod of Antioch of 363). From Syria, evangelization spread to N India, with the religious assistance of the communities of S India. Cyprus was declared autonomous from Antioch (Council of *Ephesus 431). Laypeople were expected to play a significant missionary role, as witnesses: "There would be no pagans left if we were true Christians" (Chrys., In Ep. ad Tim. hom. 10,3; PG 62, 551). We can conclude that "the local episcopal churches sustained the mission in the territories of the empire" (K. Baus, Storia d. Chiesa, II, 233).

The period from the 7th to the 9th c. saw Christianity under Islamic rule. Byzantine Syria fell under Islam in 636. The treaty with the Christians of S Arabia was also valid for Syria, and ecclesiastical life went on in relative freedom; it became difficult under the Caliph Abd-al Malik (685–705). The imperial church lost vast territories, including Antioch. Two divisions were created: the *"orthodox" church coincided with the imperial church, and vast areas of the *monophysite and *Nestorian churches coincided with the lands conquered by Islam. Islam recognized the Byzantine emperor as a protector of the Christians, and he in turn, for obvious reasons, flaunted this role over the *Melkite patriarchates of Syria and Egypt, which were unable to assert their own rights over Islam.

DHGE 3,563-703; DACL 1,2359-2427; EC 1, 1455ff.; Didascalia Apostolorum, Fr. tr. F. Nau, La Didascalie des douze apôtres, Paris 1912; A. Harnack, Missione e propagazione del Cristianesimo nei primi tre secoli, Milan 1906; H. Dieckmann, Antiochien, ein Mittelpunkt urchristlicher Missionstätigkeit, Aachen 1920; S. Bouchier, A Short History of Antiochia, Oxford 1921; J. Schmidlin, Manuale di storia delle missioni cattoliche, I, Milan 1927, 17-126; W. Eltester, Die Kirchen Antiochias in IV. Jahrhundert: ZNTW 36 (1937) 251-286; R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche, depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Essai sur la génèse, la forme et l'usage liturgique du culte chrétien en Syrie du III^e siècle à la comquête musulmane, Paris 1947; G. Haddad, Aspects of Social Life in Antioch in the Hellenistic Roman Period, Chicago 1949; J. Kollwitz, Antiochia am Orontes: RAC [1950] 1, 461-469; G. Downey, Ancient Antioch, Princeton, NJ 1968; J.A. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne, Paris 1969; J.H.W.G. Liebeschütz, Antioch, City and Imperial Administration in the Late Roman Empire, Oxford 1972; G. Downey, A History of Antioch in Syria from Seleucus to the Arab Conquest, Princeton NJ ³1974; A. Momigliano (ed.), Il conflitto tra paganesimo e cristianesimo nel secolo IV, Turin 1975; O. Pasquato, Gli spettacoli in S. Giov. Crisostomo. Paganesimo e cristianesimo ad A. e Costantinopoli, OCA 201 (Rome 1976); K. Baus, Storia della Chiesa, II, Milan 1977, 129-244; Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa, III/2, Turin ³1977, 711-729, 399-417; W. A. Meeks, Jews and Christians in Antioch in the First Four Centuries, Missoula, MT 1978; R. Brändle, Matth. 25,3-46 im Werk des Johannes Chrysostomos, Tübingen 1979; A. Natali, Église et évergetisme à Antioche à la fin du IV^e siècle d'après Jean Chrysostome: SP 17/3, Oxford-Paris 1982, 1176-1184; R.L. Wilken, John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late 4th Century, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1983; O. Pasquato, Eretici e cattolici ad Antiochia in Giovanni Crisostomo: eresia ed eresiologia nella Chiesa antica: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 833-852; R. Brändle, Christen und Juden in Antiochien in den Jahren 386/87. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte altkirchlicher Judenfeindschaft: Judaica 43 (1987) 142-160; A. Vööbus, History of Ascetism, III, Louvain 1988, 227-278; G.M. Columbás, Il monachesimo delle origini, 1, Milan 1990, 137-169 (Syrian monasticism); L. Cracco Ruggini, Poteri in gara per la salvezza di città ribelli: il caso di Antiochia (387 d.C.): Hestiasis. Misc. S. Calderone, Messina 1991, 265-290; R.A. Krupp, Shepherding the Flock of God: The Pastoral Theology of John Chrysostom, New York 1991; F. Van de Paverd, St. John Chrysostom, the Homilies on the Statues: An Introduction (OCA, 239) Rome 1991; P. Brown, Body and Society, New York ²2008; J.H.W.G. Liebeschütz, Barbarians and Bishops: Army, Church and State in the Age of Arcadius and Chrysostom, Oxford ²1992; J.-N. Guinot, L'Homélie sur Babylas de Jean Chrysostom: la victoire du martyr sur l'hellénisme, in La narrativa cristiana antica (SEA 50), Rome 1995, 323-341; P. Klosvogt, Leben zur Verherrlichung Gottes. Botschaft des Johannes Chrysostomos. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Pastoral "Hereditas," Bonn 1992; L. Zappella, Introduzione a: Giovanni Crisostomo, Le catechesi battesimali, Milan 1998, 9-125; J.-M. Salamito, Cristianizzazione e vita sociale [312–430]: Storia del Christianity, 2, 633-672; O. Pasquato, I laici in Giovanni Crisostomo. Tra Chiesa, famiglia e città, Rome ²2001; B. Flusin, Lo sviluppo del monachesimo orientale: Storia del Cristianesimo, 3, 531-544; A. Miranda, Ministero presbiterale e autorità spirituale in Giovanni Crisostomo. I fondamenti e lo spazio ideale del presbitero nella Chiesa tra IV e V secolo, in Historiam Perscrutari. Miscellanea di studi offerti al prof. Ottorino Pasquato, ed. M. Maritano, Rome 2002, 793-813; P. Maraval, La Siria: Storia del Cristianesimo, 1, 485-488.

O. Pasquato

II. Councils

1. From 268 to 389.

268. A number of bishops (the sources give 70 or 80; the synodal letter has 16 signatures) from *Syria, *Palestine and *Asia Minor met at Antioch to judge the local bishop Paul of Samosata, accused of *heresy and immorality. Previous attempts to bring accusations against him had failed. This time the council fathers, including *Helenus of Tarsus, *Hymenaeus of Jerusalem and *Theotecnus of Caesarea (Palestine), entrusted the accusation to the priest *Malchion, who convicted Paul of *monarchianism; he was condemned and deposed. Eusebius (HE VII, 27-30), our main source, read the synodal letter and gives extracts, and the account of the debate between Paul and Malchion—of which we have only fragments—not all certainly authentic, though doctrinally very important.

324–325. During the *Arian controversy, when

*Constantine had already convoked the ecumenical council at *Ancyra (later transferred to *Nicaea), many Eastern bishops (the synodal letter has 59 signatures) from Palestine, Syria and Asia Minor met at Antioch (late 324 to early 325) under the presidency of *Ossius of Cordoba. They confirmed the condemnation that *Alexander of Alexandria had earlier inflicted on the Arians, published a formula of anti-Arian faith and provisionally suspended from their communion *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Theodotus of Laodicea and *Narcissus of Neronias, who had refused to subscribe to the formula, while demanding that the problem be settled at the next ecumenical council. We know this council only from the Syriac translation of the synodal letter, whose authenticity, long doubted, now seems beyond dispute.

ca. 327. The anti-Nicene reaction, encouraged by Constantine himself, began immediately after the Council of Nicaea ended. In ca. 327 a council met at Antioch, presided over by Eusebius of Caesarea and attended by bishops hostile to those supporting the Nicene decisions; probably on the same occasion (the course of events cannot be exactly reconstructed) they deposed *Eustathius of Antioch (accused of immorality) and *Asclepas of Gaza (accusation unknown). This same council, or one held shortly after it, promoted 25 disciplinary canons because of the confusion provoked by the succession to Eustathius; these canons clarified relations between deacons, priests and bishops within the same diocese and between dioceses.

338. *Eusebius of Nicomedia and some bishops of his party met (1) to repeat the arguments already variously adopted against *Athanasius, (2) to highlight the irregularity of his return to Alexandria upon Constantine's death and (3) to provide him a successor, who—after the refusal of Eusebius, future bishop of Emesa—was chosen in the person of *Gregory of Cappadocia. *Constantius undertook to install him at Alexandria with the help of the army.

341 (in Encaeniis). In autumn 341, on the occasion of the dedication of the Great Church at Antioch, 97 Eusebian Eastern bishops met under *Flaccillus, bishop of Antioch, to respond to accusations made against them by the Council of Rome some months earlier. Four professions of faith have reached us in connection with this council. The first, short and general, rejects Julius of Rome's charge of Arianism. The second formula, the council's official creed and much longer, is silent on the Nicene homoousios, adopts *Origen's doctrine of the three divine *hypostases, condemns the propositions of radical Arianism and strongly emphasizes the divinity of the Son, though slightly subordinate to the Father. The text attempts to exclude radical Arianism without adhering to the Nicene Creed; it probably repeats (we do not know how literally) an earlier text of *Lucian of Antioch. The third formula, presented by Theophronius of Tyana, general like the first, was perhaps presented as a guarantee of his *orthodoxy. The fourth formula was not properly published at the council but presented a year later to Constans, at *Milan, by a commission of Eusebian bishops trying to attenuate the dispute between East and West. It seems to be an abbreviation of the second formula.

357. *Eudoxius, pro-Arian bishop of Antioch, convened a council of those of his orientation, including *Acacius of Caesarea and *Uranius of Tyre. The council approved the formula of *Sirmium published shortly before, which proscribed the terms homoousios and homoiousios*.

360/361. A few months after *Meletius's election as bishop of Antioch (he having openly declared himself anti-Arian), a council of pro-Arian exponents, promoted by *Constantius, deposed him on disciplinary charges and replaced him with *Euzoius, Arius's old friend.

ca. 362. Euzoius gathered a small council of nine pro-Arian bishops to rehabilitate the radical Arian *Aetius, who was condemned at the Council of *Constantinople of 360 and who shortly before then had been consecrated bishop by radical Arian bishops like himself.

363. During the anti-Arian reaction that followed Constantius's death (362), Meletius convened at Antioch some 20 homoiousian and *homoian bishops from Syria and Palestine. They accepted, pro bono pacis, the Nicene Creed of 325, but in the letter communicating this decision to the emperor *Jovian they gave the term homoousios a wide interpretation, in the sense that the Son, generated from the Father's ousia, is like him in ousia. In this way homoousios was taken in the sense of homoiousios. At this council were, among others, Acacius of Caesarea and *Eusebius of Samosata, *Basil of Caesarea's good friend.

379. In autumn of this year Meletius gathered ca. 150 Eastern bishops, among them *Gregory of Nyssa, to reply to the West's refusal to recognize the validity of his episcopal election. The council fathers, all pro-Meletian, rejected Pope *Damasus's demand that Meletius resign his see to *Paulinus; but, to lessen the tension, they published a formula of faith (lost), and subscribed to some anti-Arian and anti-*Apollinarian documents sent to them by the West.

ca. 380. We know that ca. 380 *Eunomius and various exponents of radical Arianism, including *Theophilus the Indian, met at Antioch to reorganize their party after the death of *Valens, who had persecuted them. But the promulgation of Theodosius's anti-Arian edicts (27 February 380 and 10 January 381) put an end to their plans.

383. A council under *Flavian of Antioch condemned the *Messalians for the excesses of their *Encratite tendencies.

389. A provincial council forbade the sons of Marcellus of Apamea, killed by pagans while directing the destruction of one of their temples, to avenge his death.

268: G. Bandy, Paul de Samosate, Louvain 1929, 283-352; H. de Riedmatten, Les actes du procès de Paul de Samosate, Fribourg 1952; J.A. Fischer, Die antiochenischen Synoden gegen Paulus von Samosata: AHC 18 (1986) 9-30; H.C. Brennecke, Zum Prozess gegen Paul von Samosata: die Frage nach die Verurteilung des Homoousios: ZNTW 75 (1984) 270-290; V. Burrus, Rhetorical Stereotypes in the Portrait of Paul of Samosata: VChr 43 (1989) 215-225; L. Perrone, L'enigma di Paolo di Samosata: dogma, Chiesa e società nella Siria del III secolo; prospettive di un ventennio di studi: Cristianesimo nella storia 13 (1992) 253-327; M. Simonetti, Per la rivalutazione di alcune testimonianze su Paolo di Samosata, in Id., Studi sulla cristologia del II e III secolo, Rome 1993, 238-271; S.K. McCarthy, Apollinarian Christology and the Anti-Marcellan Tradition: JTS, n.s., 45 (1994) 545-568.

324–325: E. Seeberg, Die Synode von Antiochien im Jahre 324/325, Berlin 1913; Simonetti 38-41; A. Harnack, Die angebliche Synode von Antiochia im Jahre 324/5: Id., Kleine Schriften zur alten Kirche, Bd. 2 (= Opuscula 9/2), Leipzig 1980, 1-15; 16-40; T.E. Pollard, Eusebius of Caesarea and the Synod of Antioch (324/5), in Fr. Paschke (ed.), Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen (= Texte u. Unters. Z. Gesch. D. alchristlich. Lit. 125), Berlin 1981, 459-464; H. Chadwick, Ossius of Cordova and the Presidency of the Council of Antioch, 325, in Id., History and Thought of the Early Church (= Variorum reprints), London 1982, nr. 13; L. Abramowski, The Synod of Antioch 324/5 and Its Creed, in Id., Formula and Context: Studies in Early Christian Thought, London 1992; A. Logan, Marcellus of Ancyra and the Councils of AD 325 Antioch, Ancyra and Nicaea: JTS 43 (1992) 428-446.

ca. 327: Hfl-Lecl 1,641-647; F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche, Paris 1905, 37-41; Simonetti 105-107.

338: Simonetti, 143.

341: Hfl-Lecl 1,702-733; Simonetti, 153-159; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 284ff.; M. Tetz, Die Kirchweihsynode von Antiochien 341 und Marcellus von Ancyra. Zu der Glaubenserklärung des Theophronius von Tyana und ihren Folgen: Oecumenica et Patristica. Festschr. F.W. Schneemelcher, Stuttgart 1989, 199-218; G. Feige, Die Lehre Markells von Ankyra in der Darstellung seiner Gegner, Leipzig 1991, 135-138; W. Schneemelcher, Die Kirchweihsynode von Antiochien 341, in Id., Reden und Aufsätze. Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte und zum ökumenischen Gespräch, Tübingen 1991, 94-125; K. Seibt, Die Theologie des Markell von Ankyra, Berlin 1994.

357: Hfl-Lecl 1,2,903; Simonetti, 237.

360/361: Hfl-Lcl 1,2,903; Simonetti, 344-345.

362–363: Hfl-Lecl 1,2,972-973; Cavallera, 123-125; Simonetti, 357-358, 374-375; G. Feige, Die Lehre Markells von Ankyra, 156-158; A. Camplani, Atanasio e Eusebio tra Alessandria e Antiochia (362-363): osservazioni sul Tomus at Antiochenos, *l'*Epistula catholica e due fogli copti (edizione di Pap. Berol. 11948), in E. Dal Covolo - R. Uglione - G.M. Vian (eds.), Rome 1997, 191-246; J. Zachhuber, The Antiochene Synod of AD 363 and the Beginning of Neo-Nicenism: Zeitschrift für antikes Christentum 4 (2000) 83-100.

379: Hfl-Lecl 2,29-30; Cavallera, 212-214; Simonetti, 446-447; R. Staats, Die römische Tradition im Symbol von 381 und seine Enstehung auf der Synode von Antiochien 379: VChr 44 (1990) 209-221.

ca. 380: Simonetti 453.

383: Mansi 3,651-662; C. Stewart, "Working the Earth of the Hearth": the Messalian Controversy in History, Texts and Language to AD 431, Oxford 1991; R. Staats, Messalianer: TRE 22 (1992) 607-613.

389: Hfl-Lecl 2,75.

M. Simonetti

2. From 424 to 565.

424. Condemnation of *Pelagius (Mansi IV, 474; Hfl-Lecl II/1, 214).

432. Pseudo-council (Mansi V, 1147-1150; Hfl-Lecl II/I, 382).

432. *John of Antioch convened the bishops favorable to *Nestorius, hoping for a reconciliation. The attempt to subscribe to at least one of the six propositions (not heretical, but misunderstanding Nestorius's position as legitimate) failed, and the bishops who signed Nestorius's deposition resumed *communion with Rome and the East (433) (Mansi V, 1055-1060; Hfl-Lecl II/I, 387; 398).

435. The works of *Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia, orthodox in themselves but susceptible to heretical interpretations (as in fact was the case with the Nestorians), were examined but not condemned (Mansi V, 1081-1086; see O. Pasquato, Teodosio di Mopsuestia: Introduzione ai Padri della Chiesa, Secoli IV e V, Turin 1995, 394-396).

440 (according to Theophane). John of Antioch held a second council to defend Theodore of Mopsuestia against the accusations of *Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople. He sent letters praising Theodore to Proclus, Theodosius and *Cyril of Antioch (Mansi V, 1201-1202; R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat, 54).

445. Under John's successor *Domnus, archbishop of Antioch, Bishop Athanasius of Pena (Euphrates), self-reelected after dismissal for appropriation of ecclesiastical goods, was deposed as contumacious (Mansi VI, 465-466; VII, 274-275; Hfl-Lecl II/1, 479-480; R. Devreesse, 287).

447 or 448. Domnus and other bishops met to judge *Ibas of Edessa, who had succeeded *Rabbula and was accused of Nestorianism and appropriation of ecclesiastical goods. The accusation failed because two of the four deacons of Edessa accusing him fled to Constantinople and were therefore *excommunicated (Mansi VI, 495-496; VII, 219, 271; Hfl-Lecl II/1, 490; R. Devreesse, 57).

471. The monk of St. Bassa at Chalcedon, the self-elected first *monophysite patriarch of Antioch after *Martyrius's forced resignation, was condemned to exile. He held, against Chalcedon (451), that Christ's human and divine natures were natural coprinciples (Mansi VII, 999-1000; Hfl-Lecl II/2,907; R. Devreesse, 65, 118).

478. *Peter the Fuller was deposed after two years as patriarch of Antioch. *John of Apamea was elected but was replaced after three months, as a monophysite sympathizer, by Stephen (Mansi VII, 1017-1018, 1176).

482. John Cadonatus was elected to succeed Stephen, martyred by the monophysites, but *Acacius of Constantinople, following *Zeno's instructions, chose the loyal Calendio, who held a synod at Antioch which recognized him as the legitimate bishop (Mansi VII, 1023-1024; Hfl-Lecl II/2, 915).

485 (illegitimate). After the Henoticon*, Acacius broke with Pope *Felix III, who deposed him. He in turn deposed the orthodox Calendio and reinstalled the *Apollinarist Peter the Fuller, who called an illegitimate council which condemned Chalcedon and added to the trisagion: Qui crucifixus est pro nobis (Mansi VII, 1165; R. Devreesse, 67).

508–509 (conciliabulus). At an illegal council, *Flavian, archbishop of Antioch, signed the equivocal text of the Henoticon, which approved the Councils of Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381) and Ephesus (431) but did not mention Chalcedon (451); the council condemned the works of *Diodore of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia and drew up four propositions (attributed to Acacius) apparently conflicting with Chalcedon (Mansi VIII, 347; Hfl-Lecl II/2, 1004; R. Devreesse, 68).

542. *Ephrem, bishop of Antioch (527–545), urged by the complaints of orthodox monks harassed by *Origenist monks, wrote a synodal letter condemning some of Origen's principles. At the urging of the Origenists, *Peter, patriarch of Jerusalem, removed Ephrem's name from the diptychs (Mansi IX, 23; Hfl-Lecl II/2, 1178).

565. *Anastasius, patriarch of Antioch, and 195 bishops opposed *Julian of Halicarnassus's *aphthartodocetism (Christ's sufferings were real only by a miracle of his will), imposed by *Justinian (527–565) with a dogmatic edict. They wrote to Justinian (died 14 November 565), and circular letters were sent to the Nestorians against the heresy (Mansi IX, 767).

Mansi; Hfl-Lecl II/1-2; R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat d'Antioche, Paris 1945; Palazzini 51-56.

O. Pasquato

III. Schism. When Eustathius of Antioch was deposed and exiled during the anti-Nicene reaction (ca. 327), some of his loyal partisans separated themselves from the rest of the community, at that time headed by bishops directed by Eusebius of Caesarea, and for some decades constituted a small *schismatic community. They maintained their position even when in 360 Meletius, recently elected in place of the pro-Arian Eudoxius, who had been transferred to Constantinople, took an anti-Arian position and was himself immediately deposed and exiled. By the time Meletius returned from exile in 362, the controversy had become embittered because Lucifer of Cagliari, passing through Antioch, ordained as bishop the priest Paulinus, leader of the schismatic Eustathian community. There were now three Christian communities in Antioch, with three bishops: an Arian minority under Euzoius, an anti-Arian and Nicene minority under Paulinus, and an anti-Arian but not-Nicene majority under Meletius. Meletius's subsequent exile under Valens (ca. 365) did not change the situation; when he finally returned to his see (378), this time for good, unsuccessful attempts were made to address the schism, which had become a cause of division among anti-Arians, since the East supported Meletius, whereas Egypt and the West supported Paulinus. When Meletius died during the Council of Constantinople (381), *Gregory of Nazianzus's attempt to get Paulinus recognized as sole Catholic bishop of Antioch failed, and the council fathers substituted Flavian, who had been Meletius's right arm and was thus not recognized by Egypt or the West. When Paulinus died soon thereafter, the schismatics replaced him with *Evagrius, while Flavian resolutely refused to submit to a judgment called for by *Ambrose and the West. Finally in 398 Flavian was recognized by the West, Theophilus of Alexandria having recognized him some years earlier. But the schismatics, deprived of a bishop by Evagrius's death, did not give up; only after 413 did bishop Alexander succeed in reuniting them to the Catholic community, except for a small obstinate group, which remained in schism until ca. 482, when Calendio was bishop of Antioch.

F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche, Paris 1905; Simonetti, 584;

A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV^e siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, 541-565; A. Camplani, Atanasio e Eusebio tra Alessandria e Antiochia (362–363): osservazioni sul Tomus at Antiochenos, *l'*Epistula catholica e due fogli copti (ed. di Pap. Berol. 11948), in E. Dal Covolo - R. Uglione - G.M. Vian (eds.), Rome 1997, 191-246, esp. 197-219; J. Zachhuber, The Antiochene Synod of AD 363 and the Beginning of Neo-Nicenism: Zeitschrift für antikes Christentum 4 (2000) 83-100.

M. Simonetti

IV. Liturgy (i.e., orthodox, not *Jacobite). From the 13th c. it merged with the *Byzantine rite.

1. From origins to the 5th c. In apostolic times the Christian community of Antioch celebrated the *liturgy in Greek (Acts 9–11; Letter of Ignatius), which passed to Jerusalem and was there translated into Aramaic. Even modified, it inspired other Eastern rites. As Antioch's influence increased (150 suffragan bishops at Nicaea, 325), its liturgy, not oral but textually fixed, spread to the other churches (patriarchate of Antioch). The homilies of John Chrysostom at Antioch (386–397) and Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428) prove that this liturgy had taken form by the end of the 4th c. (Brightmann; F. Van de Paverd, Zur Geschichte der Messliturgie in Antiocheia [OCA 187], Rome 1970, 468-536). The modern-day liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, however, was not composed by him; work still needs to be done on its origins. Antiochene influences entered the Byzantine liturgy through Chrysostom, who lived at Antioch before going to Constantinople. *Mark is said to have introduced the Antiochene rite into Egypt (= Alexandrian rite). *Theodoret of Cyrrhus treats of the divine office (Hist. rel., PG 82, 1283-1496). Diodore of Tarsus and Flavian, as deacons, introduced antiphonal chant. Besides the morning and evening synaxis, the Apostolic Constitutions (4th c.), book VIII, present the formulary of the *Mass: readings from the OT, from the epistles, from the gospel and a homily by the bishop; departure of the *catechumens and public *penitents; prayer of the faithful, *kiss of peace and bishop's salutation, washing of hands, offertory, *eucharistic prayer, preface and sanctus, account of the eucharistic institution, *anamnesis, *epiclesis; prayer for the church, for the living and the dead, prayers of preparation for communion, sancta sanctis, Communion and thanksgiving after Communion; bishop's final blessing. From Jerusalem (see A. Renoux [ed.], Le codex arménien Jerusalem 121.I. Introduction aux origines de la liturgie hierosolymitaine. Lumières nouvelles, Turnhout 1969), to which the Antiochene liturgy owes much, the liturgy of St. James spread to the patriarchate of Antioch, later to be included in the Byzantine rite.

2. From 451, Council of Chalcedon, to the 7th c. With the separation of the monophysites a dissident patriarchate was set up at Antioch, but monophysites and Syrian Catholics both used the Antiochene rite. With the ecclesiastical supremacy of Constantinople in the East, the Byzantine rite came to be used more; the Antiochene was used only by the Jacobites. Then arose the Melkite rite, more closely related with that of the Byzantine Empire, in which *Romanus Melodus (6th c.) had great success with his kontakia, which imitated the Syriac poetry of St. *Ephrem and the rhythmical Greek homilies; these supplemented or replaced the homily. The so-called Syro-Occidental rite (= Antiochene rite) is opposed to the Syro-Eastern rite, which made itself independent of Antioch and coincides with the regions of *Mesopotamia and Chaldea. Those who passed from Nestorianism to orthodoxy are called Chaldeans. The Indian Malankar rite derived from the Syro-Occidental; the *Malabar rite is of Syro-Eastern origin. Both are a result of evangelization from Antioch. The language changed from Greek to Syriac (4th-5th c.), which flourished again in the 10th-15th c.

3. Feasts of the liturgical year. *Easter was preceded by *Lent, which differed in the various local churches but became more uniform in the 4th c. At Antioch it was for eight weeks of five days. John Chrysostom informs us about the 4th-c. catechumenate (see Huit Catéchèses baptismales inédites, ed. A. Wenger, SC 50). Information on *baptism comes to us from the Didascalia Apostolorum (see V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du II^e au IV^e siècle, in Settimane di Studio [. . .] XXXIII, Spoleto 1987 [repr. 1982], 217-218; see O. Pasquato, Catecumenato-Discepolato, in DPAC I). Holy Week was crowned by the Sacred Triduum (Apos. Con. V, 18). The Easter cycle closed with the feast of *Pentecost 50 days later. In the 4th c. were added the feasts of Christmas (origin uncertain) and *Epiphany (Eastern origin) (J. Leclercq, DACL V, 197). Also, Sunday replaced the Jewish Sabbath.

4. Divine office. The day was punctuated by hours of *prayer in church: prayer before the cock's crow, matins, terce, sext, none, evening and night prayers. Monks and clerics were obliged to keep them. We have abundant information for the 4th c. (Apos. Con. 1,2,59; ed. Funk, 171-173; ibid., VIII, 34,1-7; op. cit., 541; Counc. Laod., can. 1,8; ed. Johannou, 1,2,137, Rome 1963; Hfl-Lecl, XII/2, 1965-1966). Laypeople were also present (Chrys., De Anna Sermo 4,5: PG 54, 668); but one could pray anywhere if they were unable to go to a church during the day (ibid., 4,5: PG 54, 667). At the start of the day everyone had to praise God in church: Ps 62 was sung (Chrys., In ps. 140,1: PG 55, 427). In the evening all returned to the church to ask pardon: Ps 140 and other suitable psalms were sung (ibid.: PG 55, 427). Common propitiatory prayers were recited.

5. Cult of the martyrs. This underwent intensive development in the 4th c., favored by numerous *cemeteries: the cemetery (of the laity?) on the Daphne road, with the supposed *relics of St. *Ignatius (*Jerome, De vir. ill. 16: PL 23, 635), St. Babylas prior to his translation to Daphne, Domnina, Berenice and Prosdoce, Drosis, Juventinus and Maximinus. The celebration began with a nocturnal vigil with psalms, prayers and biblical readings; it included a pangeyric and celebration of the *Eucharist.

F.X. Funk, Didascalia et Const. Apostolorum, Paderborn 1905; F.E. Brightmann, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Oxford 1896, Appendix C.: The liturgy of Antioch from the writings of J. Chrysostom, 470-481; F. Cabrol, Fêtes Chrétiennes (Les): DACL V/1, 1403-1452; A.A. King, The Rites of Eastern Christendom, 2 vols., London 1950; M.H. Sheperd Jr., The Formation and Influence of the Antiochene Liturgy: DOP 15 (1961) 25-44; E.E. Finn, Antiochene Rite, Liturgy of: CE I, 629; P. Rentinck, La cura pastorale, 17-153 (iniziazione cristiana; liturgia e culto); J.F. Baldovin, The Urban Character of Christian Worship: The Origins: Development and Meaning of Stational Liturgy (OCA 228), Rome 1987; A. Olivar, La predicación cristiana antigua, Barcelona 1991; Th.J. Talley, Origins of the Liturgical Year, Collegeville, MN [2]1991 (It. tr. 1991); P. Bradshaw, The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship: Sources and Methods for the Study of Early Liturgy, London 1992; J.-P. Cattenoz, Le baptême mystère nuptial. Théologie de Saint Jean Chrysostome, Venasque 1993; P. Benoît - Ch. Munier, Le Baptême dans l'Église ancienne. Ie-IIIe, Berne 1994; J. Chrysostom, Le catechesi battesimali, ed. L. Zappella, Milan 1998; M.-Y. Perrin, La diffusione delle reliquie: Storia del Cristianesimo, 2, 566-568; P. Allen, Severus of Antioch and Pastoral Care: SP 35, Louvain 2001, 353-368; Id., Severus of Antioch as a Source for Lay Piety in Late Antiquity, in Historiam Perscrutari. Miscellanea di studi offerti al prof. Ottorino Pasquato, Rome 2002, 711-721; I. Oñatibia, "Mens concordet voci" en la catequesis de san Juan Crisóstomo, ibid., 815-827; M.A. Schatkin, Advocate of Biblical Literacy, ibid., 829-838.

O. Pasquato

V. School. This collective name is given to a group of exegetes and theologians, some of great importance (*Diodore of Tarsus, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *John Chrysostom, *Theodoret), active in Antioch in the last decades of the 4th c. and first decades of the 5th. The term school does not indicate a unified scholastic institution with an organized program of study supported by the local bishop, like the school of *Alexandria; it was, rather, a number of masters teaching in a personal capacity but sharing, both within their own circle and with culturally qualified exponents in the larger setting, the same basic approach to *exegesis and *theology. *Lucian of Antioch (second half 3rd c.), whose literalist approach clashed with Alexandrian *allegorism, is often considered the founder of the exegetical school, but the little we know of him does not justify this supposition. Indeed, the remote assumptions of the Antiochene school should be seen in the evident tendency of Asiatic learning both to a literalist exegesis, though not exclusively so, and to the full evaluation of the human component in Christ, along with the divine. In the encounter between Asiatic and Alexandrian cultures, so different in these respects, the greatest point of friction was at Antioch, as the episodes of *Paul of Samosata and Lucian of Antioch in the second half of the 3rd c. demonstrate: in the conflict the Antiochene tendencies hardened into an anti-Alexandrian polemical stance. *Eustathius of Antioch represents this well at the beginning of the 4th c., both by his exegetical polemic against *Origen, and in his anti-*Arian (= anti-Alexandrian) approach to *Christology, insisting on the integrity of the human nature assumed by the Logos, as professed by Arius. Eustathius represents the trait-d'union between Asiatic culture and the Antiochene school, but we cannot speak of a true and proper Antiochene school until toward the end of the 4th c., with Diodore. Literalists in exegesis, the Antiochenes considered Alexandrian exegesis excessive and arbitrary; while not denying that some OT passages should be interpreted allegorically as typoi and prophecies of Christ and of the church, they strictly limited their number and rejected the typically Alexandrian hermeneutical procedures (symbology of numbers, animals, plants etc., etymology of Hebrew names, real and presumed incoherences in the literal sense) so prominent in allegorical exegesis. Theodore, Diodore, and also Chrysostom were all rigid literalists; Theodoret, on the other hand, gave more room to a typological reading of the OT. Theologically, the Antiochenes shared the anti-Arian *trinitarian doctrine of *Nicaea, as elaborated by *Basil of Caesarea, which had spread throughout the East by the late 4th c. Their *Christology, however, displayed typical traits, once again opposed to that of Alexandria. The latter traditionally emphasized the divinity of the Logos, relegating his humanity to a subordinate position; the Antiochenes, rather, in polemic with Arians and Apollinarists, exalted his humanity so high as to consider it another subject alongside the Logos, with the risk of compromising Christ's unity. Theodore of Mopsuestia was aware of this danger, but his repeated declarations of Christ's indivisibility, assured by the coming together of the two natures in a single prosopon did not satisfy the Alexandrians, who in turn seemed to the Antiochenes to be heirs to the errors of Apollinaris. Hence the clash between *Nestorius and *Cyril of Alexandria and all that followed from it. It revealed the weakness of the pure Antiochene position (that of Nestorius and the early Theodoret); but even when the Antiochenes, out of conviction or necessity, abandoned it and fell back on the more moderate position of *Chalcedon, they found themselves in the minority in the larger Syrian world, by now dominated by the *monophysites, who carried Alexandrian Christology to its extreme consequences. The school declined, with no really significant representatives after Theodoret (first half 5th c.): its decline was also that of Greek culture in the face of reviving autochthonous Syrian forces. In the field of exegesis, the encounter with the Alexandrians was less dramatic and less unfavorable. It is true that allegorical exegesis, esp. of the OT, continued to be widely practiced; but the literalist tendency was no less widely practiced and in particular made its influence felt on allegorical exegesis, whose representatives, as a rule, learned to make more moderate use of their favorite hermeneutical tool. A typical example of the attitude that sought to blend the claims of the letter and those of allegory was Cyril of Alexandria himself, the great enemy of the Antiochenes.

A. Vaccari, La teoria esegetica antiochena: Biblica 15 (1934) 93-101; J. Guillet, Les exégesès d'Alexandrie et d'Antioche. Conflit ou malentendu?: RSR 34 (1947) 257-302; F.A. Seisdedos, La "teoría" antioquena: Estudios Biblicos 11 (1952) 31-67; P. Ternant, La theoria d'Antioche dans le cadre des sens de l'Ecriture: Biblica 34 (1953) 135-158, 354-383, 456-486; A.J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne, Paris 1959; R.A. Greer, Theodore of Mopsuestia: Exegete and Theologian, London 1961; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, London 1965, 243-270; 329-452; G.W. Ashby, Theodoret of Cyrrus as Exegete of the Old Testament, Grahamstone 1972; C. Schäublin, Untersuchungen zu Methode und Herkunft der antiochenischen Exegese, Bonn 1974; B. de Margerie, Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégese. I: Les Péres grecs et orientaux, Paris 1980, It. tr. Rome 1990, Eng. tr. Petersham, MA 1991; M. Simonetti, Note sull'esegesi veterotestamentaria di Teodoro di Mopsuestia: VetChr 14 (1977) 69-102; D.S. Wallace-Hadrill, Christian Antioch: A Study of Early Christian Thought in the East, Cambridge 1982; G.W. Ashby, The Hermeneutic Approach of Theodoret of Cyrrus to the Old Testament: SP 15, Berlin 1984, 131-135; M. Simonetti, Interpretazione delle rubriche e destinazione dei Salmi nei "Commentarii in Psalmos" di Diodoro: ASE 2 (1985) 79-92; Id., Lettera e/o Allegoria. Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1985, 156-201; Id., La tecnica esegetica di Teodoreto nel Commento ai Salmi: VetChr 23 (1986) 81-116; L. Fatica, I commentari a Giovanni di Teodoro di Mopsuestia e di Cirillo d'Alessandria: confronto tra metodi esegetici e teologici, Rome 1988; S. Zincone, Studi sulla visione dell'uomo in ambito antiocheno. Diodoro, Crisostomo, Teodoro, Teodoreto, L'Aquila 1988; J.N. Guinot, La typologie comme technique herméneutique: Figures de l'Ancien Testament chez les Pères, Cahiers de Biblia Patristica 2, Strasbourg 1989; M. Simonetti (ed.), Origene, Eustazio, Gregorio di Nissa. La maga di Endor, Florence 1989; D. Zaharopoulos, Theodore of Mopsuestia on the Bible: A Study on his Old Testament Exegesis, New York 1989; J.N. Guinot, L'exégèse de Théodoret de Cyr, Paris 1995; A. Viciano, Das formale Verfahren der antiochenischen Schriftauslegung. Ein Forschungsüberblick, in G. Schöllgen - C. Scholten, Stimuli. Exegese und ihre Hermeneutik im Antike und Christentum. Festschr. f. Ernst Dassmann, Münster 1996.

M. SIMONETTI

VI. Archaeology

Introduction. Excavations since 1932 by Princeton University have brought to light the extent and importance of the monuments of Antioch, a center of artistic activity. The *Roman conquest, following Greek rule, coincided with the city's architectural development, which continued into the Christian era but ceased, along with the Christian civilization itself, with the Muslim invasion of 637. Antioch measured 7 by 6 km (4.3 by 3.7 mi). "A city splendid and eminent for its public works" (Expositio 158), it has been called the Paris of the East for its beauty, and the Vienna of the 4th c. for its composite culture. An imperial see several times, it was one of the two poles, with *Edessa, of the Roman strategic system, and a meeting place of commercial routes. Lacking wood, the only construction material was stone (basalt); thus lacking beams and lintels, arches counterbalanced by external buttresses were used to sustain the stone ceiling slabs.

Christian church buildings. 1. Urban. The "Great Church," a sumptuous octagon set in large grounds in the new city, on the island in the Orontes near the imperial palace (Eus., Vita Const. III, 50), is attested by a floor mosaic (5th c.) discovered at Yakto (Daphne) in 1932 (in Antioch on the Orontes I, 114-128). It was built on two levels, with splendid interior (Eus., De laud. Const.: PG 20, 1109), gilded flooring, and cupola and inlaid walls (Theophane, Chronogr.: PG 108, 111). It was dedicated to Christ (341) with an altar facing W [sic!] (Socr., HE V, 22; PG 67, 642). The "Old Church," or Palaia, was in the old city near other churches, such as those of the *Theotokos (built by *Justinian); St. Peter; St. Stephen; Sts. Cosmas and Damian; St. Thecla; the Holy Maccabees; St. Barlaam; St. Romanus; St. Leontius; St. Simeon; and the church where *Paulinus officiated in the time of bishop *Meletius (Socr., HE III, 9; PG 7, 404).

2. Extraurban. Church of St. Babylas, indentified by Lassus at Kaoussié near the Orontes, cruciform with four equal arms (25 x 11 m), continuations of a central area 16 m square: Bishop Meletius had it built in 381 and Babylas's relics, already brought by Julian to the cemetery of Antioch when they had silenced the oracle of Daphne, were placed there; Bishop Meletius was buried in the same *sarcophagus (Chrys., De S. Babyla: PG 50, 544). The floor was ornamented by Bishop Flavian (387). Other churches were: St. Julian martyr; St. John, with baptistery, in the vicus Tiberinus; St. Martha; St. Michael; St. Paul Outside the Gates, discovered in 1936, with three naves, mosaic floor and narthex (D. Levi, Antioch Mosaic, 368); St. Simeon Stylites (late 5th c.) on the Aleppo Road (see W. Eltester, Die Kirchen Antiochias, 251-286; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires, passim). Cemeterial monuments, though amply documented in texts, have few remains. The calendar of martyrial feasts can be reconstructed from the *Syriac martyrology (411) and the Mart. hier. We know one extraurban cemetery, on the Daphne road, with relics of many *martyrs (Chrys., In coem. appl.: PG 49, 393; 541), including *Ignatius, Bishop Babylas, Juventinus and Maximinus (Chrys., In Juv. et Maxim: PG 50, 571), and the virgin Drosis (Id., De Dros.: PG 50, 685). In a second cemetery outside the Porta Romanesia, Bishop Meletius had the bodies of the martyrs translated into a monument (Chrys., In Ascens. I: PG 50, 442). Beyond St. Paul's Gate many Christian tombs covered with mosaics have been discovered, facing a 5th c. church. There were also hospitals, hospices and monasteries.

Artistic monuments. 1. Introduction. Antioch, birthplace of the Syro-Palestinian artistic style, was the cultural capital of Asia Minor. Decorative motifs of Antioch's mosaic floors recur in various miniatures, a sign of the influence of the Antiochene scriptoria. Antiochene influence is not improbable in the mosaics and inlays of the Orthodox baptistery at *Ravenna (C.R. Morey). Excessive ornamentation, tending toward polychromy using drills and a variety of materials, makes some scholars (e.g., C. Cecchelli) see Antiochene influence on the capitals of St. Mark's Venice, stolen by the Venetians from overseas.

2. Mosaics. The border of a splendid mosaic, with a symbolic bust of Megalopsychia in the center and forming part of the "Yakto complex," depicts buildings whose captions identify them as those of Daphne, including the "private bath" of Ardaburius, magister militum at Antioch in 459 at the time of the anxious translation of the body of St. Simeon Stylites into the city (Evagr., HE I, 13). We can make out the two springs of Pallas and Castalia, a semicircular nymphaeum, the Olympic stadium, the ergasterion of the martyrium, private houses near the "promenade," booths, rectangular houses of one or two floors in late Syrian style and scenes of daily life. One of the buildings can perhaps be identified with one of the early Christian three-aisled basilicas (H.C. Butler, Early Churches, 58, fig. 55). The transition from Late Antique to Early Medieval is attested by motifs of geometrical decoration, *pagan or otherwise, with an abundance of allegorical scenes, floors as if carpeted, interspersed with Persian motifs (ribbons or goats' heads). Of two mosaics decorated like carpets of rose petals, one has "a border of vine-shoots with birds, animals and grape-clusters, and, in the center of one long side, we note two superb peacocks flanking a basket of grapes, a decoration favored by a great many early Christian churches" (D. Levi, Antiochia, 427). The many mosaics attest the superstitions, religion, literary and philosophical tastes, and daily life of the Antiochenes, but almost exclusively that of the pagan, not the Christian, city.

3. Sculpture. A few sculptures and products of the minor arts, esp. silver, allow us to evaluate Antiochene sculpture. As for the famous "Antioch Chalice," adorned, like so much sculpture of the first *Byzantine golden age, with embossed decoration, discovered in 1910 and now in New York, both its Antiochene provenance and its date are disputed (from AD 50/70 to the 6th c., for de Jerphanion). The mosaic discovered at Habr Hiram is part of the same artistic tendency.

Christian epigraphy. A mosaic in the N aisle of the cruciform church of Kaoussié records Bishop Flavian of Antioch, who consecrated *John Chrysostom to the priesthoood in 386 and, in the revolt against the imperial statutes, hastened to beg Theodosius I to spare the city (L. Jalabert - R. Mouterde, Inscriptions III/1, n. 774). We possess the dedicatory inscription on the door of *Constantine's Great Church, the golden church depicted on the Yakto mosaic (ibid., n. 998).

1. Greetings. "Christ be with us" (ibid., n. 877). On a portico at Refâdi: "Lord (κύ[ριε]) bless our coming in (εἴσοδον) and our going out (ἔξοδον). Amen" (13/VIII/510) (in H. Leclercq, Antioche, 2404).

2. Professions of faith. On the road to Daphne a keystone of white marble reads on the lower side: "One God (εἷς θεός) and his Christ (ὁ χριστός) . . ." (L. Jalabert, III/1, n. 991; cf. ibid., nn. 810, 814, 815, 869, 985, 991, 1030, 1078). At Kôkanâya, the inscription (368/369) on the arcosolium of Eusebius, one of two in a hypogeum, reads, "+ To Eusebius, + Christian + / Glory (Δόξα) to the Father (πατρί) and to the Son (υἱῷ) and to the Holy Spirit (ἁγίῳ πνεύ[μα]τι)" (ibid., II, n. 598; see also Jalabert, II, nn. 595-597). A Refâdi (439): "Ἰ(ησοῦς) χ(ριστὸς) θ(εοῦ) υ(ἱὸς) σ(ωτήρ) (Jesus Christ God's Son Savior)," the same at Khirbet Hâss (no date), on both door-lintels of an ancient house (in H. Leclercq, loc. cit.). In the same place (516): "Jesus (Ἰησ[οῦς]) the Nazarene, born of Mary (ἐκ Μαρίας γεννηθ[εί]ς), Son of God (ὁ υ[ἱὸ]ς τοῦ θ[εο]ῦ)" (ibid., loc. cit.); and on the lintel of a small house: "Jesus Christ God's Son Savior (ἰχθύς) is the beginning (ἀρχή) of the new creation (τοῦ νεοκτιστοῦ) . . ." (Jalabert, II, n. 425).

3. Profession of faiths—invocations. On the village of Qâtoûra (331): "Jesus Christ (Ἰησοῦ Χριστέ), have mercy (βοήθ[ει]), / there is but one God (Εἷς Θεὸς μόνος)" (Jalabert, II, n. 443). E of Antioch, on a door-lintel, the "trisagion": "Ἅγιος ὁ Θεὸς, ἅγιος ἰσχυρὸς, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, . . . , ελεύσον ἡηᾶς"; after ἀθάνατος are the (theopaschite) words (σ)τα(υ)ροθ(εὶ)ς δι' ἡηᾶς "crucified for us," added by the *monophysite bishop of Antioch *Peter the Fuller, ca. 470 (in H. Leclercq, Antioche, 2403).

H. Leclercq, Antioche (archéologie), DACL 1/2 (1907) 2359-2427; H.C. Butler, Early Churches of Syria, Princeton 1925; W. Eltester, Die Kirchen Antiochias im IV Jahrhundert: ZNTW 36 (1937) 251-286; J. Lassus, L'église cruciforme-Antioche-Kaoussié: Antioch-on-the-Orontes II, Princeton 1938, 5-44; J. Lassus, Le mosaïque de Yakto: Antioch-on-the-Orontes I-III, Princeton 1934-1941; D. Levi, Antioch Mosaic Pavements, 2 vols., Princeton 1947; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Paris 1947; E. Josi, Antiochia di Siria: EC 1 (1948) 1456-1460; D. Levi, Antiochia: EAA I, Rome 1958, 426-428; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Rome 1958, 515, 718-723; L. Jalabert - R. Mouterde, Inscriptions grecques et latines de la Syrie I-V, Paris 1929-1959; R. Martin, Commentaire archéologique de l'Antiochikos, in A.J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne . . ., Paris 1959, 38-61; G. Traversari, Gli spettacoli in acqua nel teatro tardo antico, Rome 1960; J. Rougé (ed.), Expositio totius mundi et gentium, SC 124, Paris 1966; P.-M.T. Canivet, I complessi cristiani del IV e del V secolo a Huarte (N Syria): RivAC 56 (1980) 147-172; M. Piccirillo, Note di viaggio in alta Siria nei villaggi di Zubbet Es-Shih e Hawwa: RivAC 57 (1981) 113-125; G. Degeorge, Syrie. Art, Histoire, Architecture, Paris 1983; H.J.W. Drÿvers, East of Antiochia: Studies in Early Syriac Christianity, London 1984; Id., History and Religion in Late Syria, Aldershot 1994; P. Donceel-Voute, Les pavements des églises byzantines de Syrie et du Liban. Décor, archéologie et liturgie, Louvain 1988; J.H.G.W. Liebschütz, From Diocletian to the Arab Conquest, London 1990; A. Naccache, Le décor des églises de villages d'Antiochène du IVe au VIIe, Paris 1992; G. Tchalenko, Églises de village de la Syrie du Nord, 3 vols., Paris 1979-1990; B. Pouderon, La genesi dell'arte cristiana: Storia del Cristianesimo 1, 819-823 (821: Syria).

O. Pasquato

ANTIOCHUS CHUZON (5th c.). An Eastern praetorian prefect of the gens Flavius. Praised by *Theodoret of Cyrrhus for his political conduct (Ep. 95, PG 83, 1289-1290), after the Council of Ephesus (431) he communicated to *Nestorius the heresiarch the manner of the trip that was to take him back to *Antioch (Ep. Antiochi Praef. Praet. ad Nestorium). In 429 he seems to have suggested to the Eastern part of the empire the establishment of a commission to collect and publish, in the so-called Codex Theodosianus,* all of the laws after 312 that were of general interest.

CPG 5674, 5682, 6306, 8748; PG 84, 618-620, 640-641; PO 9, 555-556; ACO I,I,7, 71; PLRE II, 103-104.

P. Marone

ANTIOCHUS of Ptolemais (d. after 404). Bishop of Ptolemais (Acco or St. John of Acre, Phoenicia). With *Theophilus of Alexandria and *Severian of Gabala he was a bitter opponent of *John Chrysostom, and with them condemned Chrysostom at the Synod of the Oak and then brought about his second exile. Ancient writers judged him severely for this. Some called him chrysostomos for his skillful oratory. He died not after 408. His works Advensur avaritiam and In curatione caeci qui a Salvatore illuminatus est (*Gennadius, De vir. ill. 20) are lost; some passages of his Homily on the Nativity and fragments cited by ancient authors remain.

CPG II 4296f.; Bardenhewer 3,363; DHGE 3,709f., EC 1, 1479f.; Quasten, Patrologia 2, 486f.; Altaner 343f.

A. De Nicola

ANTIOCHUS Strategius (d. after 620). Born near *Ancyra in *Galatia, became a *monk of the Great Laura of St. Sabbas, with the name Antiochus. Composed (ca. 620) some Pandecta in 150 Kephalaia (CPG 7843), a spiritual florilegium of biblical citations and patristic extracts, with many rare sources such as *Ignatius, the Shepherd of *Hermas, ps.-Clement ad virgines, *Evagrius and *Diadochus. Even today this compilation has some surprises. Also attributed to him is a letter to *Eustathius and a confession (CPG 7842 and 7844). Since the latter is in the narrative of the *Persian capture of *Jerusalem (614) written by Strategius, monk of St. Sabbas (preserved in Georgian and Arabic, ed. G. Garitte, CSCO 202/203, 340/341, 347/348, Louvain 1960, 1973, 1974), N. Marr has proposed identification of the two authors, but without general support.

Patrologia V, 303f.

J. Gribomont

ANTIPATER of Bostra (5th c.), saint. Elected bishop of Bostra (*Arabia) shortly after the Council of *Chalcedon (451). The emperor *Leo I asked him and other eminent ecclesiastics their opinion on the council: his response is lost. He was a friend of St. *Euthymius (d. 473) and wrote a Refutation (Antirrhesis) of Eusebius of Caesarea's Apology for Origen, acknowledging *Eusebius's merits but mistrusting his theological sense and quietly but firmly condemning *Origen's errors. We have the opening of the work, cited at *Nicaea II (787), and some fragments in *Leontius of Byzantium and *John of Damascus (PG 85, 1792-1796; 86, 2, 2045. 2053.2077; 96, 468.488-505). The Homily on St. John the Baptist and On the Annunciation and Visitation were preached on two consecutive Sundays, probably before Christmas. Also surviving is an entire homily in Greek On the Epiphany and another On the beginning of the Fast (unpublished); fragments of On the Woman with the Issue of Blood, cited at Nicaea II; and On the Cross, cited by *Anastasius the Sinaite. The homily On the Assumption of Mary is preserved in Latin; and the four On the Nativity of Christ, in Armenian.

CPG III, 6680-6698; PG 85, 1763ff.; Bardenhewer 4, 304-307; DHGE 3,713f.; BS 2, 70f.; G. Roschini, Mariologia I[2], Rome 1947, 128; Maria nella storia della salvezza I, Isola Liri 1969, 317; Patrologia V, 258f.; Marienlexicon 1,173-174.

A. De Nicola

ANTITHESIS. Like other figures, antithesis can be of word or thought. Spoken of until Late Antiquity were schemata lexeos et dianoeas (Don., Ars. Gramm. 3,4,5 Keil 4, 397), the former the concern of the grammarian, the latter of the rhetor. The example repeated ad nauseam by grammarians was the use of olli pro illi with the definition Antithesis est litterae pro littera immutatio (Prob., Ult. Syll. 18,12,13: Keil 4, 264). Greek rhetors used the terms σύγκρισις, ἀντίθεσις and ἀντίθετον indifferently for antithesis, but Latin rhetors discussing the figures of Greek *rhetoric more often referred to ἀντίθετον and ἀντίθεσις. The rhetor Julius Rufinianus (Fig. sent. eloc. 37: Halm 47) also speaks of σύγκρισις. Latin rhetors cited Cicero's example: Domus tibi deerat? At habebas, pecunia superabat et egebas (Orat. 67,223). The definition of the figure is repeated as follows: haec figura constat ex eo quod verba pugnantia inter se paria paribus opponuntur (Aquil. Rom., Fig. sent. eloc. 22: Haim. 29-30). Julius Rufinianus shortens the definition: comparatio rerum atque personarum inter se contrariarum. *Isidore of Seville (Etym. 1,36,21) adds that beauty of expression comes from the juxtaposition of contraries: antitheton ubi contraria contrariis opponuntur et sententiae pulchritudinem reddunt. Another term that appears in the version of Latin rhetors is contentio or contrapositum. The Rhetorica ad Herennium (4,15,21) has: contentio est cum ex contrariis rebus oratio conficitur; Quintilian: contrapositum vel, ut quidam vocant, contentio ἀντίθετον dicitur (I.o. 9,3,81). Antithesis as a rhetorical figure makes two consecutive images stand out strongly, but the actual crux of the contrast must be grasped. Antithesis at a philosophical or legal level is something else. One of the tactics of a master of rhetoric like *Tertullian is to examine the elements that contradict the thesis he wants to demonstrate: in speaking of patience, e.g., he considers the evils of impatience (Pat. 5,3-4: J.G. Ph. Borleffs CCL 1,303). *Cyprian of Carthage resorts to the same principle in De bono patientiae (20: C. Moreschini CCL 3A, 129). The Symposium of *Methodius of Olympus, inspired by the Song of Songs, proceeds with rigorous logic in antitheses to demonstrate that if man inclines toward corruption, he becomes corruptible and thus subject to death; if, rather, he inclines toward incorruption, he becomes incorruptible and thus immortal (Symp. 3,7,66-68: G.N. Bonwetsch GCS 27, 34). Antithesis is often used in the popular Christian literature of the early centuries. "Correct one another not in anger, but in peace, as you read in the gospel," exhorts the Didache* (15,3-4 W. Rordorf - A. Tuilier SC 248, 194). ps.-Barnabas ends his work with the antithesis of the two ways: "The ways of teaching and freedom are two: that of light and that of darkness. Great is the difference between these two ways. Over one are set the light-bearing angels of God; over the other, the angels of Satan. The one is Lord from eternity to eternity; the other is the prince of this time of iniquity" (18,1b-2: P. Prigent - R.A. Kraft SC 172, 194-196). The darkness covering the earth that arrests human physical activity is the negation of the life given by the light. Light and darkness form an antithesis that is fundamental for both the OT and NT. Jesus himself is the light of the world, and the one who follows him will not walk in darkness but will have the light of life (Jn 8:12). For St. *Paul, once people have been freed from darkness (Col 1:13) they have become children of the light. The Christian, having put off the old works of darkness, puts on the armor of light (Rom 13:12). The antithesis of light and darkness can also be extended to other religions.

Early Christian authors found in antithesis a congenial medium of expression. For St. *Augustine (Civ. 11,18: B. Dombart - A. Kalb CCL 48,337) this figure is based in the nature of things, which is why it is often used by Sacred Scripture; he gives the example of St. Paul (2 Cor 6:7-10). Opposed contraries, Augustine concludes, make speech pleasing and beautiful, like the beauty of the world, which is formed of the eloquence of contrarities in nature. He cites Sir 33:14-15: "Against evil is good, against death is life: so is the godly against the sinner. Consider, therefore, all the works of the Most High: two by two." Again in De civitate Dei (9,20: CCL 47,267-268), the fulcrum of the two cities is provided by the opposition between humility and pride: the pride of demons and the humility of Christ. The third part of the Pastoral Rule of *Gregory the Great concerns the art of the guide of souls in adapting himself to the various antithetical situations: how to exhort servants and masters, sick and healthy, quiet and talkative, meek and irascible, married and celibate, etc., to evangelical principles (PL 77, 49-126).

Better than the written page, *iconography reveals states of mind and spiritual attitudes in a summary form developed only through figures. On a *sarcophagus at Tipasa (Ws 67,5) lions are carved on the right and left, and in the center the Shepherd with two sheep in symmetry. The antithesis is provided by the contrast between the shepherd and sheep, symbol of peace and humility, and the lions, symbol of the oppositae qualitates of pride and oppression. The iconography of the *cross and the dragon also contains an antithesis: the cross symbolizes human redemption; the dragon, damnation. The opposition of these two symbols can be considered over a vast horizon, unlimited by space or time; moreover, the metaphors remain obscure if the antitheses are disjoined. Finally, the scene of oppositae qualitates on the mosaic of the early Christian basilica of *Aquileia should be seen as an antithises.

R.A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms, Berkeley, CA [2]1991; Historische Wörterburch der Rhetorik, ed. G. Ueding, Darmstadt 1992ff., 1,722-750; Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period 330 B.C.–A.D. 400, ed. S.E. Porter, Leiden 1997.

A. Quacquarelli

ANTITRINITARIANISM. During the *Arian controversy it became common to set true faith in the *Trinity in antithesis to *Judaism and *paganism (see Greg. Nys., Or. catech. 3). All who cast doubt on the divine Trinity—*Noetus, *Sabellius, *Marcellus of Ancyra—were thus considered on a par with Jews, whereas *gnostics and Arians were likened to pagans. This reductive view certainly had a historical basis and, as unitarian tendencies had their roots in Jewish *monotheism, so theologians accused of *tritheism departed from the Greek model (doctrine of the *hypostasis). In any event, this pattern embraced all of the antitrinitarian opinions in the early period of Christianity. This was particularly true of the former (unitarian) tendency, which accepted only a triple divine action in the economy of salvation but ruled out any trinity in the eternal (immanent) life of the divinity. In a certain sense this can also be said of the gnostics and esp. of extreme Arians, who "first" set God above the Son and the *Spirit, radically excluding the Trinity. Thus the modern history of dogma reduces ancient antitrinitarianism to *monarchianism, distinguishing *adoptionism (*Paul of Samosata, *Lucian, the Arians) and modalism (*Praxeas, Sabellius, Marcellus, *Photinus and also *Priscillian). Our concern here is not to compare the antitrinitarianism of modern times with dynamic and modalistic monarchianism. Rather, we should bear in mind that behind primitive Christianity's rejection of trinitarian errors, both Judaizing "exemplifications" and Hellenizing "technologies," lies the concern to preserve the paradox of faith, the "Trinity that is one God" (*Augustine).

EC 1,1506-1510; TRE 3,168-174 (modern); LTK³ 1, 776f.; F. Mali, in Lexikon der christlichen Antike (Stuttgart 1999), 18f.; RGG⁴ 1 (1998) 574f. (modern).

B. Studer

ANTONINUS PIUS (86–161). *Roman emperor, reigned 138–161. Succeeded *Hadrian, who had designated him his successor. He earned the title "Pius" for his defense of his predecessor's memory before the Senate. His long reign, untroubled by wars, was marked by his goodness, wisdom and rectitude: he rebuilt destroyed cities and improved the condition of slaves. Respectful of the official religion, he was tolerant of other cults: he promoted Eastern religions (Magna Mater), and established that Christians should not be unjustly sought out. (There were some instances of violence, however, e.g., the execution of *Polycarp of Smyrna.) He died at age 75, after building a temple in the Forum to his wife Faustina. He was succeeded by his adoptive son *Marcus Aurelius.

L. De Regibus, A. Pio, Rome 1946; F. Jacques - J. Sheid, Roma e il suo impero, It. tr., Bari-Rome 1992; A. Ziolkowski, Storia di Roma, It. tr., Milan 2000; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

ANULINUS (first half 4th c.). Proconsul of *Africa. Recipient of *Constantine's ordinance of 312 restoring to the Catholic church all of its confiscated property (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. X, 5, 15-17). Anulinus's name appears in some documents related to the beginning of the *Donatist schism (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., X,6,4; 7,1-2). On 15 April 313 the Donatists, through Anulinus, presented a petition to the emperor, clarifying their position with respect to Bishop *Caecilian and asking for the arbitration of the bishops of *Gaul (*Augustine, Ep. 88, 2).

PCBE 1, Afrique, Anulinus 2, 80-81; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford 1952, [2]1971, 145-148; Storia del Cristianesimo 2, 178, 196, 211, 228.

G. Pilara

APAMEA. On the River Orontes, in W Syria (Syria Secunda). Pharnake was the first name of this very ancient center, which seems to have been inhabited in prehistoric times (4000 BC). Populated by Macedonian colonists, the city took the name of Pella in memory of Alexander's homeland (4th c. BC). Seleucus I Nicator (281 BC) later called it Apamea in honor of his wife Apama, and still later Claudia Apamea. This urban center constituted a tetrapolis with *Antioch, Laodicea and Seleucia, and was chosen as the headquarters of the Seleucid monarchy, with military training schools. When Pompey annexed Syria to the *Roman Empire (64 BC), the city put up a futile resistance. Apamea was a massive city, as is shown by the census ordered by Publius Sulpicius Quirinius, governor of Syria (AD 6); an inscription confirms that only the city's free men were included, numbering 117,000. The overall population could thus be estimated at approximately 500,000, including women, children, slaves and foreigners.

In the conflict that opposed *Zenobia of Palmyra to the Aurelian emperor (271), the city sided with the latter. Repeatedly devastated by earthquakes, in 540 Apamea suffered the invasion of *Chosroes. It seems, however, that the invasion was not particularly destructive, since the author of the Antonine Itinerary, visiting the city ca. 560/570, spoke of it as a "very splendid city, where all the Syrian nobility lives" (46,8). From 813–816 it fell again into *Persian hands, followed by Arab domination.

The name Apamea remains linked to some of its most illustrious citizens. The earliest was the Stoic philosopher Posidonius (140/130–51/50 BC). A man of encyclopedic knowledge, he combined *Stoic thought with the scientific advances of his time. He taught at Rhodes, where Cicero was among his students. Also native to Apamea was *Numenius, a neo-Pythagorean philosopher who lived during the second half of the 2nd c.; *Origen mentions him respectfully (C. Cels. IV 51). Among the city's pagan thinkers was the *Neoplatonic philosopher *Iamblichus, who, though born at *Chalcedon (ca. 250), taught for many years at Apamea.

The Christian presence in this important center is historically verified from the first years of the 3rd c. A group of *Elkesaites seems to have lived at Apamea. Faithful to the Mosaic law and circumcised, they opposed *Paul and considered Christ to be a common person, born like everyone else. Because of the *metempsychosis professed by the sect, they claimed that Christ would make himself present in every era. The presence of an episcopal see at Apamea is attested by the lists of bishops present at the synods of *Neocaesarea (314) and *Nicaea (325). In both, the Christian community seems to be led by Alphaeus. Iamblichus's theurgical doctrine must have been widely approved at Apamea, since it became the center of a hardened *theurgical and anti-Christian Neoplatonism. Mosaics have been found under the cathedral which suggest that Iamblichus's school was there; the mosaics' motifs are inspired by *Julian, with a didactic program impregnated with wisdom and moderation, but opposed to Christianity. In the 4th c. the increasing tension between Christians and *pagans erupted in violence: the destruction of the citizen temple of Jupiter by the Christians was followed by the murder of Bishop Marcellus. Among his successors was Polychromius (d. 430), brother of the great *Theodore of Mopsuestia and like him one of the most important exegetes of the *Antiochene school. Under *Theodosius II (408–450) Apamea assumed the rank of *metropolitan see. Bishop *Photius, according to the inscription (with the names of the presbyter and some deacons, in a nearby village, Huarte), had a large basilica built, its floor covered with mosaics. The inscription recording the execution of the central mosaic in 383 is preserved, with two other inscriptions marking the lateral mosaics (484 and 485). The church was built over a 4th-c. church. There was also a church dedicated to St. Michael—its mosaic dating from 487—with a baptistery nearby. The conspicuous presence of *monks and *hermits in the surrounding area lent importance to the see: we are told of them by *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (History of the Monks III 4), who himself became a monk (423) and was later recalled to occupy the episcopal see of Cyrrhus.

An important monastery was built near Apamea in the mid-5th c., dedicated to the hermit Maro. The monks who lived there, called *Maronites, were among the most vigorous 6th-c. defenders of the definition of Chalcedon. With the onset of the Arab invasions they settled in Lebanon, where, from 939, they established their spiritual center. Even today the remains of ancient Apamea, under continual restoration, speak to us of the city's glorious past. The city's cardo, 1,850 m long with a large colonnade, partially reconstructed, is worth mentioning; along side it were businesses, shops and public buildings. The cathedral and episcopal residence were SE of the city. Probably built as a *martyrium, the church, with a double-quatrefoil plan with ambulatory, became the cathedral before 540; a relic of the cross is supposed to have been kept there. The museum, at the foot of the city, has collected many mosaics from the churches of the region.

J. and J.Ch. Balty, Apamée de Syrie, archéologie et histoire I: Des origines à la Tetrarchie: ANRW II 8, 103-134; M.T. Canivet - P. Canivet, I complessi cristiani del IV e del V secolo a Huarte (Siria settentrionale): RivAC 56 (1980) 147-172; J. Balty - J.Ch. Balty, L'Apamène antique et les limites de la Syria Secunda, in La géographie administrative et politique d'Alexandre à Mahomet, Leiden 1981, 41-75; Id., Un programme philosophique sous la cathédrale d'Apamée. L'ensemble néo-platonicien de l'empereur Julien, in Texte et image. Actes du Colloque international de Chantilly, Paris 1984, 167-176; P. Canivet - M.T. Canivet, Huarte, sanctuaire chrétien d'Apamène (IV-VI s.), Paris 1987; P. Canivet, Le christianisme en Syrie des origines à l'avènement de l'islam, in Archéologie et histoire de la Syrie, II, Saarbrücken 1989, 117-146; B. Brenk, Die Umwandlung der Synagoge von Apamea in eine Kirche: eine mentalitätsgeschichtliche Studie, in Tesserae: Festschrift J. Engemann, Münster 1991, 1-25; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale Monferrato 1994, 37-42; A. Agosti, The Poikilia of Paul the Bishop: ZPE 116 (1997) 31-38; I. Peña, Lieux de pèlerinage en Syrie, Milan 2000; J.Ch. Balty, "Claudia Apamea": données nouvelles sur la topographie et l'histoire d'Apamée: CRAI 1 (2000) 459-481; Fedalto 775-776.

L. Padovese

APATHEIA. Two aspects of ἀπάθεια were distinguished in Greek thought, one theoretical and one ethical. In the theoretical sense ἀπάθεια is the state that characterizes the divine intelligence, and human intelligence when the latter fulfills its noetic function. This idea was already clearly formulated in Anaxagoras—who calls ἀπαθής the divine νοῦς, its highest principle (pl. 56 Diehl)—and was received in its entirety by *Aristotle, who reserves this attribute to both human intelligence in its actions (An. III 430a 17-18,24) and the divine intelligence (Met. Λ 1073a 11). Ἀπάθεια, clearly set forth by *Plato, Phaedo 82c—where the philosopher is portrayed as entirely free from bodily pleasures and indifferent to life's evils—later became the supreme ethical ideal in the earliest *Stoicism: that of *Zeno, Cleanthes and Chrysippus (see, e.g., SVF I 205-208 regarding the passions; III 443, 444, 447, 448, 449, 450 regarding the absence of passions in the wise). Replaced in the middle Stoicism of Panetius and Posidonius and also in Antiochus of Ascalon (1st c. BC) by the μετριοπάθεια (or simple moderation of the passions) of Plato's Republic, the ancient Academy and the Peripatetic school, ἀπάθεια was revived and came to represent ethical perfection in *Philo, in the *Neoplatonism of *Plotinus and *Porphyry, and in *Clement of Alexandria: in all these authors μετριοπάθεια is not rejected but relegated to an earlier ethical state, while apatheia occupies the highest level and merges with the "*purification" (κάθαρσις) of Plato's Phaedo and with the formula ὁμοίωσις Θεῷ κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν (Plato, Theaetetus 176b), whose explanation it goes on to illustrate, God being completely ἀπαθής (see the relevant material and the discussion regarding Antiochus of Ascalon in S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 99-112).

In Neoplatonism one sees a strict combination of the ethical and theoretical aspects of ἀπάθεια. Only one who has arrived at complete purification—total detachment from the body and the higher ethical level represented by the elimination of the passions (which originate in the body and in the irrational soul)—possesses the theoretical virtues, the highest class of human virtues, and can thus exercise the natural function of his intelligence which is already ἀπαθής: the contemplation of the transcendent realities present in the divine νοῦς, which is by its very nature ἀπαθής (the ethical ideal of the ὁμοίωσις Θεῷ consists precisely in this; see Plotinus, Enn. I,2,3 [67,19-21], I,2,4 [68,19], I,2,6 [70,12-13], Porphyry, Sent. 32 [25,8-9, 27,8-9, 28,3-4]).

*Origen, like Clement and Philo, also excludes any passion from God (the so-called wrath of God is not a πάθος but only the means God uses to teach sinners; C. Cels. IV 72, I: Koetschau 341-342) and sees in ἀπάθεια ethical perfection (Comm. on John VIII 36: Preuschen 376, 24-28; Comm. in Matt. I 398,27: Klostermann; fr. 64, III: Klostermann 41).

*Gregory of Nyssa, speaking through *Macrina, considers the total elimination of the passions in this life as damaging, since it would deprive the soul of the desire for God and of the weapons needed to combat the enemy of the good (De an. et res.: PG 46, 65 A-B); only after death does ἀπάθεια reflect the condition of the completely pure soul that, by now in possession of the good and having become similar to it, can rid itself of every desire (De an. et res.: PG 46, 96A); noteworthy in this last passage of Gregory is the combination of the idea of likeness to God with that of the absence of passions characteristic of Neoplatonism and Clement. In On the Beatitudes I and II, Gregory considers only contentment to be possible for human beings, not the total elimination of the passions, which remains beyond the reach of human nature; he also excludes the possibility of a complete imitation of the divine nature—which is per se not subject to the passions—and thus any kind of arrival at a true likeness to God (GNO VII, 2: pp. 82,24-28, 95,22–96,2, 96,11-16). This condition, however, represents for him only a preliminary ethical stage, that of the μετριοπάθεια. In homily V he says that "thanks to purity, we draw near to what is pure" (GNO VII, 2: p. 124,9), and he returns more than once in his writings to the reconquest of the original purity and beauty of the "divine image" impressed on the human *soul by God at the moment of creation; he also mentions this idea in a famous section of homily VI On the Beatitudes (GNO VII, 2: pp. 142,15-22; 143,4-13, 16-23; 143,28–144,4; 144,9-13). Ultimately, then, the two stages μετριοπάθεια-ἀπάθεια found in Philo, Clement, Plotinus and Porphyry are found in Gregory too.

Ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite attributes to angelic essences a "pure and impassible contemplation" (Cel. hier. II, 4 [14,14]), making his own the Anaxagoran, Aristotelian and Neoplatonic doctrine of the strict interdependence between ἀπάθεια and noetic activity. Regarding thrones he says that they "receive divine illumination in a state of total absence of passions" (Cel. hier. VII,1 [28,10]). Regarding human beings, the blessed after resurrection "will partake of the light lavished upon their impassible and immaterial intelligence" (Div. Nam. I, 4 [115,1]); and it is precisely the impassible soul that enjoys visions (Ep. IX,1 [198,8-9]). Ἀπάθεια is also present, at least to a certain degree, in the newly *baptized (Eccl. hier. II,8 [78,12]); and above all in one who rises to the highest degree of perfection (Eccl. hier. III,7 [86,15]).

Völker's studies (see bibl.) have shown how ἀπάθεια is an essential component in the ethical systems not only of Philo, Clement, Origen and ps.-Dionysius but also in later authors such as *Maximus the Confessor and *John Climacus, who dedicates to it the 29th degree of his Ladder of Divine Acsent (PG 88, 1148-1152). Regarding the presence of ἀπάθεια in these and other late authors, the article of Bardy in DS is still instructive (see bibl.).

G. Bardy DS I, 727-746; P. De Labriolle: RAC I, 484-487; M. Forschner, LTK 1, 801; A. Schmekel, Die Philosophie der mittleren Stoa, Berlin 1892, 219 and 272-273; M. Pohlenz, Das dritte und vierte Buch der Tusculanae: Hermes 41 (1906) 321-335; K. Gronau, Poseidonios und die jüdisch-christliche Genesisexegese, Leipzig 1914, 252-256; B. Strache, Der Eklektizismus des Antiochos von Askalon, Berlin 1921, 31, 37; Philo von Alexandreia, NGA phil. hist. Kl. 1942, 460-461; Klemens von Alexandreia und sein hellenisches Christentum, NGA phil. hist. Kl. 1943, 125 and 166ff.; Die Stoa, Göttingen 1959, I, 150-153, 155, 199-202, 236-252, 376-397, 411-421; II, 199; T. Rüther, Die sittliche Forderung der apatheia in den beiden ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten und bei Klemens von Alexandrien, Freiburg 1949; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 99-112; Id., La teologia negativa: Helikon 22-27 (1982-1987) 215 (Anaxagoras), 228 (Aristotle), 241 (Philo); 28 (1988) 254-255 (Plotinus), 278-279 (Porphyry); W. Völker, Fortschritt und Vollendung bei Philo von Alexandrien, TU 49.1, Leipzig 1938, 262-268; Id., Der wahre Gnostiker nach Clemens Alexandrinus, TU 57, Berlin 1952, 524-540; Id., Das Vollkommenheitsideal des Origenes, Tübingen 1931, 153-158; Id., Gregor von Nyssa als Mystiker, Wiesbaden 1955, 259-264 (It. tr. ed. C.O. Tommasi, Milan 1993, 228-233); Id., Kontemplation und Ekstase bei Ps. Dionysius Areopagita, Wiesbaden 1958, 56-67; Id., Maximus Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens, Wiesbaden 1965, 410-423; Id., Scala Paradisi: Eine Studie zu Johannes Climacus und zugleich eine Vorstudie zu Symeon dem neuen Theologen, Wiesbaden 1968, 247-254.

S. Lilla

APELLES (2nd c.). Disciple of *Marcion, first lived at *Rome with his master; he then separated, going for a while to *Alexandria of Egypt, then returning to Rome. Apelles wrote a large volume of Syllogisms to demonstrate the unreliability of the OT; *Ambrose preserved a great number of passages from it in his De Paradiso. Nothing remains of his book titled Revelations, in which Apelles divulged the visions of the prophetess Philomena, probably his disciple. Under the emperor *Commodus he had a public dispute with *Tatian's disciple *Rhodo (see Eus., HE V,13,1-7). According to *Eusebius of Caesarea, it seems Apelles distanced himself from *Marcion's doctrine on many important points. In particular, first, he repudiated his explicit dualism, admitting one, good God, who created the angelic world; one of the angels, the demiurge, then created the lower world of matter in the image of the higher world. Second, Apelles eliminated Marcion's *docetism: Jesus was no longer a ghost but had a real body and was sent by God to correct the demiurge's work. However, Apelles went well beyond his master in rejecting the OT, which he considered not only a book having no religious value whatsoever but also fraudulent, full of contradictions and altogether unreliable.

A. von Harnack, De Apellis gnosi monarchica, Leipzig 1874; Id., Sieben neue Bruchstücke der Syllogismen des Apelles, Leipzig 1890, 111-120 (TU 6,3); Id., Unbeachtete und neue Quellen zur Kenntnis des Häretikers Apelles, Leipzig 1900, 93-100 (TU 20); Id., Marcion, Leipzig [2]1924, 117ff.; G. Quispel, Die Reue des Schöpfers: TZ 5 (1949) 157-158; J.P. Mahé, Sources Chrétiennes 216, vol. I, Paris 1975, 59-61; K. Rudolph, Die Gnosis. Wesen und Geschichte einer spätantiken Religion, Leipzig 1977, 338-339; H. Savon, Saint Ambrise devant l'exégèse del Philon le Juif, Paris 1977, vol. I., 25-54; E. Junod: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 113-133.

C. Gianotto

APHRAATES (Aphrahat) (270?-345?). First father of the *Syrian church. The moniker "the wise Persian," given him by the *tradition, indicates that he was a subject of the Persian Empire. Beyond this we know nothing of his life: the approximate dates listed above are deduced from his works. From them we also know that Aphraates was one of the ascetics who at the time were called “the sons of the covenant” (b^{e}nay qyâma). Syriac scholars have reached no agreement on the exact meaning of “qyâma.” “Resurrection” has been proposed instead of “covenant,” or, in reference to the Semitic root meaning “upright position,” the term could evoke the idea of vigilance in battle. The most recent French translation (see bibl.) renders the expression “members of the order.” In any case, it is certain that the “b^{e}nay qyâma” were not *monks in the modern understanding of the term. There is no mention of monastic vows, properly speaking, in their regard. They were *ascetics who remained in the world but who even before receiving *baptism had decided to remain celibate; with baptism, this resolution became a de facto obligation. An in-depth study of their ascetical practices has never been done. Besides being a “son of the covenant,” it seems that Aphraates was also an important dignitary of the Persian church, perhaps a bishop, though this is not clear. He was at least the superior or spiritual father of a community of “sons of the covenant,” as a great part of his work is addressed to them. It is certain that he was not the superior of a *monastery, as a late (14th-c.) tradition claims. His work has come down to us in its entirety, with every desirable guarantee of authenticity. It is composed of a collection of 23 Treatises, Letters or Homilies, which in the manuscripts (5th-6th c.) bear the title “Demonstrations” (tahwiâthâ). There were originally supposed to have been 22, each beginning with a letter of the Syriac alphabet; the 23rd was added later by the author. These Demonstrations were not all written at once: the first ten (written 337) develop classical themes of *theology and Christian asceticism. The other 13 (written 342–345) are primarily dedicated to anti-Jewish polemic. Demonstration 14 is in the form of a letter addressed to a synod of bishops; in it the author denounces the grave abuses committed by some members of the clergy. The 23rd Demonstration, the last of the series, was written during winter 344–345, at the start of Shapur II’s bloody *persecution of the Christians.

All scholars agree in emphasizing the exclusively scriptural character of Aphraates’s doctrine; it shows no influence of Greek *philosophy. The author professes himself to be solely a disciple of the Sacred Scriptures. His *trinitarian doctrine and his *Christology, while thoroughly *orthodox, ignore the Council of *Nicaea, at which the Persian church was not represented. His theology on the *Holy Spirit as a person is not very explicit. Other points could be mentioned to show the “primitive” character of Aphraates’s theology. This is beside the point, however, in that the originality of his theology is in the fact that it is based entirely on biblical *symbolism, enriched by contributions from the *targumic traditions handed down by the first *Jewish Christian communities of Mesopotamia, before the break between church and synagogue.

Until now, the symbols pertaining to Christ, the apostles and the church have been the most studied. At the same time, there has been great interest in research on the influence exerted by rabbinic exegetical methods in order to clarify the origins of the first Christian communities of *Persia and *Mesopotamia. Without entering into the merits of developments in this regard, we can note the benefit the churches of the Greek and Latin world would have gained from a deeper knowledge of the first *Syriac fathers, such as Aphraates and *Ephrem, for the elaboration of their later theological syntheses. A less-intellectual theology, better integrating the symbol and “myth” of the Scriptures, would have perhaps helped avoid a crisis like the iconoclast crisis, and today we would not be facing the problem of a rationalist “demythologization,” destructive of mystery.

Another aspect of Aphraates’s work concerns the anti-Jewish polemic, with its classic themes: circumcision, the divinity of Christ, the sabbath, the election of Israel, etc. The calm, moderate tone with which Aphraates presents his arguments is admirable; his writings are free of the bitterness that characterizes Ephrem’s writings against the Jews. His ascetical theology is contained primarily in the first Demonstrations addressed to the “sons of the covenant.” The doctrine is classical and, in this case as well, entirely traceable to the Sacred Scriptures. The following points can be considered characteristic: (1) the primacy of charity, which has for its object the three divine persons, and grows with the inhabitation of the soul by the Spirit of Christ, (2) the perfection of charity as a function of the renunciation of marriage, (3) the absolute necessity of love of neighbor, (4) faith as the foundation of the entire structure and (5) insistence on the virtue of humility, a trait which will remain the fundamental characteristic of Syriac spirituality.

Aphraates’s is a spirituality imbued with optimism, surrounded with an atmosphere of gentleness and peace. “If one had to define it in a few words, one could say that it is the doctrine of peace through faith, brought about by the love of God” (I. Hausherr, DSp 1, 751).

N. Antonelli, Sancti Patris nostri Iacobi episcopi Nisibeni Sermones, Rome 1756, new ed. Venice 1765 (the author attributes the 23 Demonstrations to James, bishop of Nisibis, an error that is explained by the fact that Aphraates also bore the name of James); W. Wright, The Homilies of Aphraates, the Persian Sage, London 1869; PS 1, II (1-489); CSCO 382 Arm. 7 and 383 Arm. 8; Bardenhewer IV, 327-340; DSp I, 746-752; Ortiz de Urbina 4849; G. Garitte, La version géorgienne de l'Entretien VI d'Aphraate: Muséon 77 (1964) 301-366; R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom: A Study in Early Syriac Tradition, Cambridge 1975, 369-376; J.-M. Sauget, Le dossier éphrémien du manuscrit arabe Strasbourg 4226 et ses membra disiecta: OCP 42 (1976) 426-458 (in fact the texts of "Ephrem" without exemplar, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, correspond to Demonstrations 2, 3, 4, 9 and 6; see AB 96 [1978] n. 5 and Muséon 92 [1979] 61-69); A. Guillaumont, Un midrash d'Exode 4, 24-26 chez Aphraate et Éphrem de Nisibe, in A Tribute to A. Vööbus, Chicago 1977, 89-95; G. Nedungatt, The Authenticity of Aphraat's Synodal Letter: OCP 46 (1980) 62-88; M.-J. Pierre, Aphraate le Sage Persan. Les Exposés, 1, Exposés I-X, SC 349 (1988); 2, Exposés XI-XXIII, SC 359 (1989) (with copious bibl. and an important introduction); P. Bruns, Das Christusbild Aphrahats des Persischen Weisen, Hereditas 4, Bonn 1990; J. Botha, A Comparison Between Aphrahat and Ephrem on the Subject of Passover: Acta Patristica et Byzantina 3 (1992) 46-62; N. Koltun-Fromm, Psalm 22:17 in Light of Christian Anti-Jewish Polemic: JECS 6/1 (1998); Id., Yokes of the Holy-Ones: The Embodiment of a Christian Vocation: HTR 94/2 (April 2001); M.-J. Pierre, Aphraate, le Sage perse, in Dictionnaire des miracles et de l'extraordinaire chrétiens, ed. P. Sbalchiero, Paris 2002, 44-45.

R. Lavenant

APHTHARTODOCETISM. Extreme doctrine that arose out of *monophysitism, in *Egypt, in the first half of the 6th c., through the work of *Julian of Halicarnassus. (Thus his followers were called Julianists, in addition to Phantasiastae.) Professed the incorruptibility of Christ's body from his birth. In particular regarding the passion of Christ, it denied the real possibility of his sufferings, accepting the fact that he did suffer by explaining it as a miracle willed by him and not because his body was by nature subject to pain. *Justinian converted to this doctrine (*Evagrius Scholasticus, HE IV,39; *Leontius Scholasticus, Sect. V) and sought to impose it on the entire East, provoking opposition especially at *Antioch. *Leontius of *Byzantium described its principal points, opposing them from the perspective of the plan of salvation (C. Nest. et Eut. II). They were also known as Gaianitae, after *Gaianus, the first bishop to lead their separate church.

R. Draguet, Julien d'Alicarnasse et sa controverse avec Sévère d'Antioche sur l'incorruptibilité du corps du Christ, Louvain 1924; M. Jugie, Julien d'Alicarnasse et Sévère d'Antioche: Echos d'Orient 24 (1925) 129-162; 265-285; Id., L'empereur Justinien a-t-il été aphtartodocète?: Echos d'Orient 34 (1932) 399-402; L. Perrone, Il 'Dialogo contro gli aftardoceti' di Leonzio di Bisanzio e Severo di Antiochia: Cristianesimo nella storia 1 (1980) 411-442; F. Carcione, L'aftardocetismo di Giustiniano: una mistificazione strumentale del dissenso politico-religioso: Studi e ricerche sull'Oriente cristiano 7 (1984) 71-78; K.-U. Uthemann, Kaiser Justinian als Kirchenpolitiker und Theologe. 4.2. Justinians letztes Edikt—ein ungelöstes Rätsel: Augustinianum 39 (1999) 79-83 (with bibl.).

F. Cocchini

APIARIUS of Sicca (d. after 425). The priest Apiarius of Sicca Veneria (El Kef, Tunisia) was *excommunicated in 418 by his bishop Urban for offenses, the particulars of which are not known but which caused non leve scandalum in the *African church (CCL 149,157). He appealed to *Rome and was absolved by Pope *Zosimus, who conveyed his decision to the Africans through a Commonitorium and a legation headed by the authoritarian *Faustinus, bishop of Potenza in Piceno. The case was discussed in a plenary council in May 419 at *Carthage. Admitted to the clergy of Thabraca (Tabarka, Tunisia), Apiarius, recidivist, was again excommunicated. He again appealed to Rome and was rehabilitated by *Celestine I, who again sent Faustinus to Africa as his legate. This time, however, he admitted his guilt and was definitively excommunicated (September 425). These episodes nearly led to a clash between the African church and the Roman see, which had recently been looking to extend its primacy to countries traditionally outside its control. The African church used the occasion to put together a corpus of conciliar decrees aimed at laying legal foundations for the age-old African particularism. The move was facilitated at the time by Rome's difficulties over Zosimus's succession, but the Africans quickly found themselves in even worse difficulties with the *Vandal invasion. The question of Apiarius was thus the last manifestation of the autonomy of the African church.

L. Duchesne, Histoire ancienne de l'Église, III, Paris 1910, 242-257; DTC 15,2307-2312; C. Munier, Codex Apiarii causae, CCL 149, 79-149; C. Pietri, Roma Christiana II, Rome 1976, 1250-1275; PCBE 1,82-83; 2,750-752; J. Merdinger, Rome and the African Church in the Time of Augustine, New Haven-London 1997, 111-135; 182-199.

V. Saxer

APION (2nd c.). The only source on Apion is *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE V,27), who records his name and a treatise on the Hexameron*, mentioning him with other *orthodox writers of the late 2nd c., authors of antignostic works; we may infer that Apion's Hexameron also had antignostic content.

E. Prinzivalli

APOCALYPSE. The Christian tradition of the first centuries attributes the Apocalypse of John (Rev 1:1, 4, 9; 21:2; 22:8) to the apostle St. *John, except for *Gaius, who like the *alogi attributes it to *Cerinthus; *Dionysius of Alexandria, who refers it to another John; and *Eusebius of Caesarea, who doubted its Johannine authorship (Eus., HE III,28,1-3; VII,25,1-27). *Jerome (De vir. ill. 9 and Chron.) considers the *millenarists *Justin Martyr and *Irenaeus of Lyons its interpreters, but in fact they never wrote commentaries on the Apocalypse. Irenaeus, *Clement of Alexandria, *Methodius of Olympus, *Tertullian, *Commodian and *Lactantius explained only some passages. *Melito of Sardis's On the Devil and John's Apocalypse is known only by report (Eus., HE IV,26,2). Traces of *Hippolytus's lost commentary (Jerome, De vir. ill. 61) are preserved in his other writings and in the *Syriac apocalypse of Dionysius bar Salibi. *Origen outlined a commentary, as we see from the Latin fragment of his Comm. in Math., XXIV; the anonymous Greek MS discovered by Diobouniotis—according to Harnack, an incomplete commentary by Origen—contains, among other things, select passages from Origen. All of these writers take care to keep alive the secrets of the last days contained in the Apocalypse. They tend to a literal interpretation of the text, mingling it with *apocryphal literature and the book of *Daniel. They give ample space to *Christology and the theme of the *Antichrist. They defend the idea of the millennium, except for Clement and Origen with him. *Symbolism, which favors the use of spiritual *allegory, does not provide them with an interpretive key. The isolated explanation of particular passages obliges them to ignore the context. The first real commentary on the Apocalypse was that of *Victorinus of Petovium, preserved in Jerome's recension, based on which J. Haussleiter was able to recover the original. Influenced by Origen, Victorinus adopted allegorical *exegesis without abandoning millenarist literal exegesis. He was the first to make use of the theory of *recapitulation, already present in previous authors, to arrive at a unitary understanding of the work: the Apocalypse does not describe a continuous series of events, but every image or vision is simply a repetition and representation of the same reality: e.g., what is announced in Rev 7–8 (seven trumpets) is repeated and completed in ch. 16 (seven cups). Victorinus found christological elements in the Apocalypse and, according to Asiatic and *Alexandrian traditions, what has happened or will happen to the saints in history (*Ecclesiology). The beast, in light of the tradition of Nero redivivus, who will reappear as the Antichrist, represents *Nero. The four animals symbolize, as in Irenaeus, the Evangelists. The two witnesses are *Elijah and Jeremiah and not, as often claimed, Elijah and Enoch. Victorinus's millenarism is mitigated and less marked than in *Cerinthus, *Papias, Justin, Irenaeus, Methodius and Tertullian: he interprets Rev 20–21 literally, though without rejecting spiritual interpretations. The commentary par excellence on the Apocalypse was that of the *Donatist *Tyconius, who influenced all later exegesis on the theme. All the lost parts of the original can be recovered from authors who copied him and from the Catholic recension attested by the Turin fragments. His exegesis is faithful to the hermeneutical principles of the Liber Regularum, whose application perfects the theory of recapitulation. The great prophecy of Scripture is the revelation of God about Christ and his body, the ecclesia (Reg. I, II, VII). With good reasoning, the exegete can discern what is said personally of Christ and what regards the church. Each vision of the Apocalypse reveals the totality of the church, differently represented. It belongs to the interpreter to discover—without undervaluing the time factor—whether past, present or future is meant, and when reference is made to the real church (Rev 1–3) or to the ideal church (Rev 4–8). Each verse conceals ecclesiological content; they explain the authentic church (right) and that of the hypocrites (left); the internal struggle and the final struggle; the great separation. The traditional strong christological coloring is all reduced to ecclesiology in Tyconius. He breaks with millenarism and literalism. The two witnesses are the two Testaments. The Antichrist is the totality of the powers hostile to Christianity, protected by the city of the devil; persecutions are a manifestation of him. Tyconius accepts the number 616 (Rev 13:18) rather than 666 like Irenaeus. Jerome's commentary, a recension of Victorinus's, incorporates the prologue to Anatolius, corrects literal interpretations, introduces others, rejects millenarism and the Neronian explanation of the beast, and keeps a balance between Victorinus and Tyconius. *Augustine, in line with Tyconius, is content to comment only on some passages (Civ. Dei, XX). *Primasius's commentary and *Cassiodorus's brief notes, relying on Augustine, concentrate and purify Tyconius. *Caesarius's interpretations are a more literal summary of Tyconius. Apringius's Apocalypse shows the influence of Tyconius, *Gregory of Elvira, *Commodian and St. *Benedict; its exegesis of Rev 1–5, 7 is preserved; the rest is completed by that of Victorinus (Jerome). *Bede in his Exp. Apoc. follows the interpretations of Tyconius and Primasius together with the opinions of other Fathers, as does Ambrosius Autpertus, who blends Tyconius, Victorinus (Jerome) and Primasius with fragments of, among others, *Ambrose, Augustine, *Isidore of Seville, *Ildefonsus and *Gregory the Great. *Beatus of *Liébana copies, in a sort of *catena, the commentaries of Victorinus (Jerome), Apringius and esp. Tyconius, interwoven with passages of Irenaeus, Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, *Fulgentius, *Gregory the Great, Isidore and Gregory of Elvira. The Greek tradition is less rich than the Latin. *Nestorians and *monophysites did not acknowledge the Apocalypse as canonical. Notable among Greek commentators were *Andrew of Caesarea—who followed Irenaeus and Hippolytus, though eliminating millenarism—*Oecumenius and *Aretas of Caesarea. There is also a catena from the mid 10th c. called Σύνοψις σχολική that combines fragments of Andrew of Caesarea's commentary with parts of Oecumenius's.

Origen: C. Diobouniotis - A. Harnack, Der Scholien kommentar des Origenes zur Apokalypse Johannis, TU 38,3; Vittorino di P. e Girolamo: CPL 80 - PLS 1, 102-174; ed. J. Haussleiter, CSEL 49, 12-154; M. Dulaey, Jérôme "éditeur" du Commentaire sur l'Apocalypse de Victorin de Poetovio: REAug 37 (1991) 199-236. Tyconius: CPL 710 - PLS 1, 621-652; ed. F. Lo Bue, TSt VII, Cambridge 1963. Primasius: CPL 873 - PL 68, 793-936; PLS 4, 1208-1220; CC 92 (1985) Adams. Cassiodorus: CPL 903 - PL 70, 1406-1418. Caesarius: CPL 1016 - PL 35, 2417-2452; ed. G. Morin, S. Caesarii opera omnia, Maredsous 1942, II, 209-277; A.G. Hamman (ed.), L'Apocalypse expliquée par Césaire d'Arles, in Les Pères dans la foi 37, Paris 1989. Apringius: CPL 1093, ed. M. Férotin, Paris 1900, I; A.C. Vega, Escorial 1940. Isidore: CPL 1221, PLS 4, 1850-1863, ed. Lo Menzo Rapisarda, Catania 1967. Bede: CPL 1363 - PL 70, 1406-1418; G. Bonner, Saint Bede in the Tradition of Western Apocalyptic Commentary, in Bede and His World (The Jarrow Lectures I), Aldershot 1994, 153-183. Ambrosius Autp.: ed. R. Weber, CCM 27 and 27A (Greg. 58 [1977] 768-770). Beatus of Liébana: ed. E. Flórez, Madrid 1770; ed. H.A. Sanders, Rome 1930 (repr. by Edilán, Madrid 1975) (see Boll. dei Clas., Accad. dei Lincei 1 [1980] 221-231). Oecumenius: ed. H.C. Hoskier, Ann Arbor 1928; M. De Groote, Die Qaestio Oecumeniana: SE 36 (1996) 67-105; M. De Groote, Die Scholien aus dem Oecumenius-Kommentar zur Apokalypse. Kritische Herausgabe: SE 37 (1997) 111-131. Andrew and Aretas of Caesarea.: PG 106, 215-486, 1387-1412, ed. Schmid 1955; A. Monaci Castagno, Il problema della datazione dei Commenti all'Apocalisse di Ecumenio e di Andrea di Cesarea: AOT 114 (1980) 223-246; A. Monaci Castagno, I commenti di Ecumenio e di Andrea di Cesarea: due letture divergenti dell'Apocalisse: AOT, series V, vol. V (1981) 305-426. Dionysius bar Salibi: CSCO 101, 1-22 (see EC 4,1670f.); W. Bousset, Die Offenbarung Johannis, Göttingen [6]1906, 49-72; H.J. Vogel, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der lateinischen Apocalypsenübersetzung, Düsseldorf 1920; E.B. Allo, Saint Jean. L'Apocalypse, Paris 1921, CCXVII-CCXL; U. Vanni, La struttura letteraria dell'Apocalisse, Rome 1971, 255-259; P. Prigent, Hippolyte, commentateur de l'Apocalypse: TZ 28 (1972) 391-412; P. Prigent - R. Stehly, Les fragments de l'Apocalypse d'Hippolyte: TZ 29 (1973) 313-553; Quasten I, 451. Victorinus of Petovium.: C. Curti, Il regno millenario in Vittorino di Petovio: Augustinianum 28 (1978) 419-433; E. Romero Pose, Símbolos eclesiales en el comento a Ap 1, 13-3, 22 de Ticonio (diss. MS P.U.G.), Rome 1978; G. Morin, Le commentaire homilétique de S. Césaire sur l'Apocalypse: RB 45 (1933) 43-61. On Andrew of Caesarea, Aretas and Oecumenius: see bibl. Altaner 554; Σύνοψις σχολική: M. De Groote, Die Σύνοψις σχολική aus dem Kommentar des Oecumenius zur Apocalypse: SE 32 (1991) 107-119; M. De Groote, Die Σύνοψις σχολική zum Apokalypse-Kommentars des Arethas: SE 34 (1994) 125-134. Eng. tr.: W. C. Weinrich, Latin Commentaries on Revelation (Victorinus, Apringius, Caesarius, Bede), Downers Grove, IL 2011; Id., Greek Commentaries on Revelation (Oecumenius, Andrew of Caesarea), Downers Grove, IL 2011.

E. Romero Pose

APOCALYPSES (apocryphal). Christian apocalyptic literature derived from Jewish apocalyptic literature, which played a very important role in late Jewish culture. Apocalyptic was also born out of the expectation of the Lord's imminent return in the first centuries and influenced people's way of thinking during that period. We find apocalyptic fragments in the NT (e.g., Mt 24 or Mk 13); the *Apocalypse of St. *John (the question of authorship is still unresolved) is the only complete NT apocalypse: from its opening words, "Revelation (apocalypse) of Jesus Christ," comes the technical term apocalypse. The apocalypse in the Didache* comes from the 1st/2nd c., the Apocalypse of Peter (mentioned in the Muratorian Canon) and the Ascension of Isaiah come from the 2nd c. The Apocalypse of Paul—from which derives a later apocalypse, that of Mary—probably comes from the 3rd c. The Christianization of the Jewish apocalypses began at the same time, e.g., that of Esdras or of the Sibylline Books, the latter only partially Christianized, with the particulars of Christian and Jewish influence easily identifiable. We thus have Christian and Christianized apocalypses; apocalypses were also used by the *Gnostics. (There are some in the texts of *Nag Hammadi.) Themes of the apocalypses were the punishment of sinners (often expressed by terrible curses against them) and the end of the world, with the two often linked. Some apocalypses contain descriptions of the sufferings of condemned sinners, others stories of biblical personages who, visiting the hereafter, see the punishments of the various types of sinners (giving a picture of the moral state of the society and a valuation of sins). Apocalyptic also gives us an interesting picture of the Christian *eschatology of this period.

Apocalyptic was not, however, a literary genre per se: we have apocalypses in poetry and prose, in letters, dialogues, revelations, sermons etc. As with other *apocrypha, the apocalypses are published under the name of celebrated NT or OT personalities: e.g., Esdras; the apostles: *Peter, *Paul, John, *Thomas and others (e.g., apocalypse of ps.-Methodius). The symbolic language (images, numbers, *antithesis of darkness and light) in the apocalypses is usually from the OT and the Jewish world, but there are also folkloric elements. The difference between Christian and Jewish apocalyptic was in the Messiah's role: awaited by the Jews, already come (in Jesus) for Christians. The interpreting angel, who could also be Christ, plays an important role in apocalyptic.

Apocalypses played an important role in Christian antiquity, and even more so in the *Byzantine and Slavic worlds; we find them in all the languages of Christian antiquity. The apocalypses were nevertheless considered as suspect by the church, because of the use made of them by heretics and the prophecies expressed therein; some apocalypses (Lat. revelationes) were condemned by the Decretum Gelasianum* (5,5). This was also the reason for the late acceptance of John's Apocalypse in the canon of Scripture and for the relative scarcity of commentaries on it. In any case, apocalypses strongly influenced Christian culture, esp. popular beliefs, and flourished in the Middle Ages and the Byzantine world.

The collections of NT apocrypha of Elliott, Schneemelcher (vol. 2), EAC, Erbetta (vol. 3), Moraldi (vol. 3), Starowieyski (vol. 3) give a selection of apocryphal apocalypses with introductions; likewise for the great collections of OT apocrypha (Diez Macho, Sacchi, Charlesworth, see Denis) and the collections of the texts of Nag Hammadi (gnostic apocalypses). Apocalissi apocrife, A.M. di Nola, Milan 1993; M.C. Lucca, Milan 2000. Most of the works cited below deal with Jewish and Christian apocalyptic. K.H. Schwarte: TRE 3, 1978, 189-289; P. Vielhauer - G. Strecker, Apokalypsen und Verwandtes: Schneemelcher 2, 491-516 (bibl.); F.C. Burkitt, Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, London 1913; S.J.D. Seymour, Irish Vision of the Other World, London 1930; J.M. Schmidt, Die jüdische Apokalyptik, Neukirchen 1969; K. Koch, Ratlos vor der Apokalyptik, Gutersloh 1970; L. Morris, Apocalyptic, Grand Rapids 1972; W. Perkins, Function of Gnostic Apocalypses: CBQ 38 (1977) 382-395; Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre: Semeia 14 (1979); L. Gruenwald, Jewish Apocalyptic Literature: ANRW II, 19,1 (1979) 89-118; J.H. Charlesworth, A History of Pseudepigrapha Research: the Reemerging Importance of Pseudepigrapha: ANRW 2,19,1 (1979) 54-88; M. Himmelfarb, Tours of Hell: An Apocalyptic Form in Jewish and Christian Literature, Philadelphia 1983; G. Filoramo, Apocalissi gnostiche: Augustinianum 23 (1983) 123-129; J.J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination: An Introducton to the Jewish Matrix of Christianity, New York 1984; D. Hellholm (ed.), Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and Near East, Tübingen 1985 (acts of the congress in Uppsala); Early Christian Apocalypticism: Genre and Social Setting: Semeia 36 (1986); M. Delcor, Studi sull'apocaliptica, Brescia 1987; A. Yarbro Collins, Early Christian Apocalyptic Literature: ANRW II, 25, 6 (1988) 4664-4771; R.J. Bauckham, The Conflict of Justice and Mercy: Attitudes to the Damned in Apocalyptic Literature: Apocrypha 1 (1990) 181-196; J.J. Collins - J.H. Charlesworth, Mysteries and Revelations, Sheffield 1991; In the Last Days: On Jewish and Christian Apocalyptic and Its Period, FS, B. Otzen, eds. K. Jeppesen, K. Nielsen, B. Rosendal, Aarhus 1994; The Jewish Apocalyptic Heritage in Early Christianity, eds. J.C. VanderKam - W. Adler, Assen, Minneapolis 1996; J.J. Collins, Seers, Sibyls and Sages in Hellenic-Roman Judaism, Leiden 1997; A. Norelli, Pertinence théologique ou canonicité: les premières apocalypses chrétiennes: Apocrypha 8 (1997) 147-164; R. Bauckham, The Fate of the Dead: Studies on Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, Leiden 1998.

M. Starowieyski

APOCATASTASIS. See *APOKATASTASIS

APOCRISARIUS (or aprocrisiarius). In the *Byzantine era, an official entrusted with missions and bearer of official responses (apocriseis). There were civil, military and—particularly important—ecclesiastical apocrisarii: clerici sent by their bishops to the *metropolitan. The institution became official under *Justinian, who ordered bishops not to present themselves at court unless formally invited, but to have members of their clergy represent them. Particularly notable was the power of patriarchal apocrisarii (representatives of the great sees of *Alexandria, *Antioch and *Jerusalem at the court of *Constantinople) and pontifical apocrisarii (sent to court by the church of *Rome): *Gregory the Great and Pope *Vigilius had been permanent legates at Constantinople. The pontifical apocrisarius, a plenipotentiary, was different than a legate sent on specific occasions and had a certain autonomy of initiative; he could be compared with the modern nuncio.

P. Pargoire, Apocrisaire: DACL 1, 2537-2555; L. Chevailler - J.-C. Genin, Recherches sur les Apocrisaires: Contribution à l'histoire de la représentation pontificale (Ve-VIIIe s.), in Studi Grosso, Turin 1969, vol. III, 359-461; Niermeyer 1,65.

M. Forlin Patrucco

APOCRYPHA. The meaning of the term apokryphos ("secret") seems to come not from Jewish but from *gnostic and *pagan literature, where it often indicated a doctrine or "secret" teaching (see *Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. I,13-20; see 20.1, where it says that gnostic followers of Marcus the magician introduced a number of spurious and apocryphal scriptures "that they wrote themselves"; see also Clem. Alex., Strom. III, 29.1). In the Gospel of Thomas, a mid-2nd-c. gospel used among gnostics, we read: "These are the secret words that the living Jesus said, and that Didymus Judas Thomas wrote down. And he said: 'The one who finds the interpretation of these words will not taste death.'" For gnostics, therefore, the term apocrypha indicated a book, the reading of which was reserved for initiates. Moreover, utmost secrecy was required regarding the teaching contained in the various gnostic writings, as well as regarding any doctrines learned. Only two ancient writings—part of the writings of *Nag Hammadi containing gnostic doctrine—have an apocryphal (i.e., secret) character declared in the title: Apokryphon Iohannis and Apokryphon Iacobi. The former, thanks to evidence from Irenaeus, is dated ca. 150, whereas the latter is thought to be mid-2nd to early 3rd c.

In the Gospel of Thomas, the frequently recurring expression "Jesus said" indicates—as with many other so-called apocrypha—a claim to refer to a proclamation of the Lord himself. Such claims may stem from a desire to convey ancient traditions, or those believed to be so, handing them down as "sayings" of Jesus; or from the desire to fill in the silence of the by-then canonical gospels on the thirty years of Jesus' hidden life; or to enrich the known and accepted data of faith with clarifications helpful for popular understanding; or to put forth one's own doctrine with words attributed to Jesus, secretly revealed to the initiates of a particular group.

Precisely for this last reason the term apokryphos—used to indicate writings accepted in some churches even into the 2nd and 3rd c. and later recommended for private (i.e., secret) reading rather than public reading as done with the Bible (already a practice in the Jewish world)—later became, in the church at large, a synonym for "falsification." This change in the evaluation of apocryphal literature—the negative connotation given to many writings, very different from each other in literary genre and content, and due also to the continual comparison of this literature with what had become "canonical" (to the extent that from the 17th c., with Fabricius, one spoke of "NT apocrypha")—has led, esp. in the last 30 years, to a new approach to the literature known until now as "NT apocrypha." Many studies (see J.D. Kaëstli, Norelli, Jounod, Gori and Di Berardino, among others) have led to the recognition of the appropriateness of calling these writings "*pseudepigrapha," or "texts of ancient Christian literature," or better, "ancient Christian apocrypha," indicating the need to consider writings so different from one another not as a block but as writings that each require their own particular study, and to the extent possible not always conditioned by comparison with the canonical writings. This procedure may in fact influence the reading, interpretation and use of some "apocryphal" writings that, from a historical perspective, could become "important fragments of the early Christian message" [parcelles importants du message chrétien primitive] (L. Leloir, Utilité ou inutilité de l'étude des apocryphes: RTL 19 [1988] 70), enriching our knowledge of the canonical writings themselves. Canonicity does not depend on the greater or lesser antiquity of the texts; there are other reasons (ancient and apostolic tradition, authenticity, doctrine), not all known to us, which led the first Christian communities to consider certain specific writings to be inspired and others not. Some of these so-called apocrypha, whose authors did not have the intention of creating false or heretical works, may in fact preserve ancient traditions on Christ the preacher or Christ preached, in harmony with the canonical writings with regard to the essence of the truth of the faith, but differently transmitted, according to the geographical or cultural environment in which those traditions were received and transmitted. Some apocrypha could have had an important role in the transmission of cultural and religious traditions (see C. Paupert, L'Apocryphe, fable catéchétique: Apocrypha 7 [1996] 249-251).

In the research and analysis of ancient Christian apocrypha one must also bear in mind—and not undervalue—the judgment of ancient Christian writers on the various works, distinguishing in each case preunderstanding from prejudice.

We have seen how Irenaeus, on a number of occasions when indicating particular aspects of gnostic doctrine, emphasizes their character of error and falsehood. *Tertullian (Resurr. Mort. 63,6), addressing the *Marcionites and Valentinians, accuses them of having added "the secret doctrines of the apocrypha, blasphemous fables" to the Word of God. By this Tertullian shows that he has made a comparison between the Word of God and the writings he calls apocrypha. Between the late 2nd and early 3rd c., these so-called apocrypha were considered to be part of a literature that was not included in the list of the sacred books, which, as the late-2nd-c. Muratorian *Canon itself shows, was still in formation and not yet definitively closed.

In the fathers of the church the following are called apocrypha: writings whose origin is unknown and attribution to this or that author is false (Jerome, Ep. 107; Aug., Civ. Dei XV, 23; Faust. XI, 2); writings that contain doctrinal errors alongside useful information (Orig., Prol. In Cant.; Comm. in Mt. Serm. 28; Aug., Faust. XI, 2); writings not admitted to public reading in churches because not canonical (Ruf., Symb. 38; Jerome, Ep. 96; Prol. in Gal.); heretical writings or those used by heretics (Iren., Adv. haer. 1, 20; Tertull., De resur. 63; Clem. Alex., Strom., 1, 15; III, 4; Hipp., Philos. VII, 20).

In *Origen the term apocrypha is primarily used to indicate writings not approved by the church and that use names of OT figures. He presents a canon of 22 books of the first revelation. Origen does not use the concept of apocrypha univocally; at times he judges some writings to be apocryphal because he thinks elements of truth can be found in them; at other times he openly declares the heretical character of other apocrypha.

A first classification between OT and NT apocrypha is based precisely on the text's title, which may refer to an OT or NT figure. Normally OT apocrypha were composed by Jews, though there are instances of Christian interpolation (see the citations referring to the *incarnation in The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Apocalypse of Esdras etc.), whereas Christian apocrypha were those that made explicit reference to the NT. OT apocrypha were usually divided into two large groups: those of Palestinian and those of *Hellenistic origin (J.B. Frey, DBS). The Fathers refer to some of these apocrypha, but their evaluations of them differ. The Book of Enoch is cited as Sacred Scripture in Barn. 15-16 and Origen (Princ. I,3,3; IV,4,8; Hom. in Num.28,2). The Ethiopian church accepts it as a scriptural text, whereas the Apostolic Constitutions (6,16) explicitly condemn it (R.H. Charles, Apocrypha . . . , 163-281). Origen knows an Assumption of Moses, which he says is cited in Jude 9 (Princ. III 2,1). The Ascension of Isaiah* is known to *Justin Martyr, Tertullian, *Cyprian of Carthage (Ep. 74,9), Origen, *Commodian, *Lactantius, *Hilary of Poitiers, *Ambrose, *Jerome etc. (see E. Tisserant, Ascension . . . , 62-74, and the study of E. Norelli, L'Ascension of Isaiah. Studi su un apocrifo al crocevia dei cristianesimi, Bologna 1994); the III Book of Esdras (on the canonicity of which some Fathers seem favorable) is cited by Justin (Dial. 72), *Theophilus of Antioch (Autol. III, 25), *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. I,21,124), *Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 23), *Dionysius of Alexandria (in Athan., Dion. 25), *Basil of Caesarea (Eun. 5, 4) and *Augustine (Civ. Dei, XVIII, 36). Uncertainties remain on patristic references to the Apocalypse of Esdras or IV Esdras (see Jerome, Praef. in Ezech.: PL 28, 1403), which seem to be attested in Barn. 12,1 and Justin (see G. Otranto, Esegesi biblica e storia in Giustino, Bari 1979, 123-136). The Slavic Book of Enoch appears certainly only in a citation of Origen (Princ. I,3,2). The Christian literature of the first centuries passed down various fragments of an apocrypha of Ezekiel (1 Clem. 23,2-3; Clem. Al., Quod dives 40,2; Paed. I,10; Tertull., De res. carn. 23; Athan., Vita Ant. 16; Epiph., Haer. 64, 70).

Regarding NT apocrypha, the first major division is based on literary genre. We have apocryphal gospels, acts, epistles and apocalyptic. Apocryphal gospels are those extracanonical writings that deal with the earthly teachings of Jesus, his life and that of his family. Origen (Hom. 1 in Lk.) listed a number of gospels that did not enjoy the same authority in the various churches as did the four canonical gospels. These writings were in turn divided into three groups: synoptic-type apocryphal gospels, those containing heterodox teaching and those that use imagination to fill in the gaps in the canonical gospels. The first group contains the gospels used among Jewish Christians (for the problem of the agraphon, see entry). Included are: the Gospel of the Hebrews, already mentioned in *Ignatius of Antioch (Smyrn. 3, 12). Numerous references to this text are in the works of other fathers: Orig., Jo., 12, 87; Hom. 15,4 in Jer.; Comm. in Mt. XV, 14; Clem. Alex., Strom. II, 9,45; V, 14,96; Eus., HE III, 25, 5; 27, 4; 39, 17; IV, 22, 8; VI, 17; Jerome, In Mt. I; Vir. ill. 3; Adv. Pelag. III, 2; In Ezech. 18, 7; the way the various fathers refer to it indicates that the text must have been used without qualms in orthodox Jewish Christian communities. Quite different is the Gospel of the Ebionites, used by Jewish Christian communities that, according to Irenaeus, did not accept St. *Paul (Adv. haer. I, 26; Eus., HE III, 27) and had an inexact knowledge of the Lord (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 11), whose genealogy in Matthew they had suppressed (Epiph., Haer. XXX, 13,2; 14,3). Some passages of this gospel are found in *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE III, 39; IV, 22) and in *Epiphanius of Salamis (Haer. XXX, 3,7; 13,2.4.6.7). The Gospel of the Nazarenes was used in orthodox Jewish Christian communities. It is thought to be the Hebrew Gospel frequently mentioned by Jerome (Comm. I in Mt. 6,11; 12,13; Comm IV in Mt. 23,35; 27,16; Comm. in Is. 18 praef.) and also mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. XXIX 9,4) and *Theodoret (Haer. II 1; II 2). The Gospel of the Egyptians, mentioned by Origen (Hom. 1 in Lk.) and a few fragments of which are given in Clement (Strom. III, 9,63.64; 13,92), seems dominated by *Encratism. The Gospel of Peter, an incomplete account of the passion, death and resurrection of Christ found in the Akhmîm MS in 1887, is mentioned by Origen (In Mt. comm. X, 17) and Eusebius (HE VI, 12,2). The affinities between this text and other patristic writings (Ign.; Barn.; Polyc., Ep. 7,1; Just., I Apol. 33,5; 2 Clem. 5; etc.), esp. *Melito of Sardis's Peri Pascha, have been fully studied, as have its historical and theological position (M.G. Mara, Évangile . . .; and Id., Gospel . . .; for the Gospel of Peter, see Apocrypha Petrine).

Another group is composed of clearly heterodox gospels, in which either an important NT person is entrusted with imparting heterodox teaching or the founder of a heretical tendency uses Scripture, reworking its data to present it as a confirmation of his position. According to *Hippolytus (Philos. V, 7,20), the Naassenes made wide use of a gospel attributed to Thomas; this is confirmed by Origen (Hom. 1 in Lk.) and Eusebius (HE III, 25,6). According to *Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. IV, 36; VI, 31) the authors of this gospel were *Manichees. The discovery in 1945, among the *Coptic texts of Khenoboskhion, of the Gospel of Thomas, previously known only in a few fragments, allows us to identify it as a gnostic text. A gospel of which Clement cites several fragments is attributed to the apostle *Matthias (Strom. II, 9,45; IV 6,35; VII, 13,82; 17,108). According to Hippolytus, the followers of *Basilides claimed to have received secret teachings from a revelation of the Lord to Matthias. Other gnostic gospels are the so-called Pistis Sophia, mentioned by Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I,31) and Epiphanius (Haer XXVI, 13), and the Gospel of Judas, mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. XXXVIII, 1). The Gospel of Marcion is amply cited by Tertullian (Adv. Marc. IV 2,4, etc.) and Epiphanius (Haer. 42, 9, 1-3).

The apocrypha concerned with supplying wider information on the lives of Jesus and his family are very different. This literature provides a history of Christ's childhood, rich in detail, from his birth to the flight into Egypt and the miracles worked there and at Nazareth. The Arabic Infancy Gospel is the most characteristic text of this cycle, often using the Protevangelium of James,* not only for its information on Jesus' birth and childhood, but also for its information on Mary, from the story of her birth to her role in her Son's early years. Further information on Mary is given in the work which seems to close the cycle dedicated to her: the Transitus Mariae. Both the Protevangelium of James and the Transitus have found their way into the *liturgy, esp. in the East, not based on any attribution of canonicity to the texts but simply based on their devout and simple popular religiosity. References to the Protevangelium seem to be present in Justin (Dial. 5), Clement (Strom. VII, 93) and Origen (Comm. in Mt. X, 17). An apocrypha is also dedicated to the life and death of Joseph: the History of Joseph the Carpenter. The cycle dedicated to Pilate (Gospel of Nicodemus or Acts of Pilate) recounts Jesus's trial, passion, death and resurrection in detail. Popular interest in the mysteries of the afterlife was richly satisfied by its account—told by once-dead, now-risen eyewitnesses—of Jesus' *descent into hell to save the just.

We owe the apocryphal Acts largely to the wish to know more about the lives, journeys and preaching of the apostles. Some of these, however, are attributed to heretical circles and their aim was to confirm heterodox opinions: the Acts of Andrew, John and Paul seem to have circulated among the Manichees and *Priscillianists (Eus., HE III, 25); that of Thomas among the Encratites (Epiph., Haer. XLVII, 1), Manichees (Aug., Contr. Faust. 22,79) and Priscillianists (Turibio, Epist. Idacio: PL 54, 694). Harnack (Altchristiche Lit., 116ff.; on the apocryphal Acts see var. aus., Les Actes Apocryphes des Apôtres, Geneva 1981) gives a vast picture of the presence of the apocryphal Acts in the Fathers. Not to dispel curiosity but to avoid the dangers of heterodoxy, from the 4th c. on the apocryphal Acts were expurgated and rewritten so they could be accepted and read by believers. This occurred, e.g., with the Acts of Paul (cited from the 3rd c. by Tertull., Bapt. 17; Orig., Princ. I 2,3; Comm. in Jo. XX, 12; Pas. 36-37, 1; on this last reference see F. Bovon, Une nouvelle citation des Actes de Paul chez Origène: Apocrypha 5 [1994] 113-117), the Acts of Peter (see L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Pierre, 110ff.), of Thomas (M.R. James, Apocrypha anecdota, II, 28-45) and of Andrew (see P.M. Peterson, Andrew . . .). Another group of apocryphal Acts that deal with the adventures of a single apostle (Acts of Philip, Barnabas, Thaddaeus) or of two apostles together (Acts of Andrew and Matthias, Peter and Andrew, Paul and Andrew, Andrew and Bartholomew) appears clearly as edifying literature from the late 4th c.. Worthy of special note are the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, whose "author" and hero is no longer an apostle but *Clement of Rome (see O. Cullmann, Le problème . . .). There are also apocryphal Pauline letters like the III Epistle to the Corinthians, the Epistle to the Laodiceans and To the Alexandrians (see the bibl. in L. Vouaux, Les actes de Paul). Under the title of kerygma or predicatio, fragments have reached us attributed to the preaching of Peter and Paul (see E. Hennecke - W. Schneemelcher, II; for the Kerygma Petri see M.G. Mara, Kerygma Petrou . . .).

Among apocryphal Apocalypses, setting aside a significant number of texts that have not survived except in title, Eusebius calls the Apocalypse of Peter a "falsification" (HE III, 3,2; 25,4), while *Methodius of Olympus calls it an inspired text (Symp. II,6); according to *Sozomen (HE VII,19), the text was read on Good Friday in some Palestinian communities. Various scholars have claimed to see an influence of the Sibylline Oracles in Theophilus, Clement and in the Cohortatio ad Graecos of ps.-*Justin (on this work and its problems see A. Pincherle, Gli oracoli . . .).

In summary we can say: (1) in some ancient documents, called apocrypha, the desire emerges to fix in writing what oral traditions in various regions ascribed to Christ and his disciples; (2) other apocrypha respond—by the free and imaginative use of scriptural data and information, answering the needs of local communities—to the demands of popular curiosity about human destiny, about Jesus and about his family; (3) still other apocrypha seek to legitimate heresy through the manipulation of canonical texts; (4) late apocrypha mirror the apologetic or dogmatic problems of the time when they were written. Besides this, apocrypha were responsible for fixing a form of preaching and *catechesis which, differing in part from the canonical, nevertheless exercised considerable influence on literature, art, devotion and *liturgy. It is enough to recall that the names and information about Mary's parents, her presentation in the temple, Jesus' birth in a cave with ox and ass, the names and number of the *magi, and many other details entered the history of Christian devotion through these texts. Also, in the field of liturgy, some parts of the Mass pro eligendo Pontifice are taken from the III Book of Esdras. The first publication of an apocrypha at Basel in 1552 was followed by collections guided by increasingly scientific criteria, the most complete and philologically sound being that of J.A. Fabricius (1703–1719), even if conditioned by comprehensive judgments on the apocrypha. The first translation into a modern language was by J. Jones (18th c.) From the 19th c. to our own day, interest in the analysis, critical edition and translation of apocrypha has continually grown.

Even if apocryphal literature seems to add nothing to our knowledge of biblical revelation, it is also true that the historical value of apocrypha is considerable, and sometimes irreplaceable, for our knowledge of the moral and religious currents of early Christianity or broad strata of it. At times the apocrypha complete or correct what we have from other sources; at other times they make up for their silence. That this historical value was considered secondary by the majority of the Fathers shows that their primary interest in these apocrypha was to collect and transmit the revelation contained in Scripture. This explains (1) the concern of some fathers (Iren., Haer. 3,1; Orig. Praef. in Lk.) from the 2nd c. on to denounce some writings as apocryphal; (2) the drawing up of the so-called Muratorian fragment (Antiquitates Italicae Medii aevi III, 851-854), which divides books into sacred, disputed and apocryphal; (3) Eusebius's four-part list (books accepted by all the churches, disputed books, adulterated but not heretical books, heretical books) (HE III,25); and (4) the official lists of the Great Church (from the 5th-6th c. on), in which texts are classified as canonical, disputed and apocryphal. The fullest list of NT apocrypha is in the so-called Decretum gelasianum* (Mansi VIII, 150-151). Some writings are declared apocryphal in the letter Consulenti tibi, sent 20 February 405 by Pope *Innocent I to *Exuperius, bishop of Toulouse (Ep. 6 PL 20, 501-502). Three Greek catalogs should be mentioned: the Stichometric Catalog of Nicephorus, *patriarch of Constantinople 806–818 (PG 100, 1055-1060); the Pseudo-Athanasian Catalog (Synopsis Scripturae Sacrae, PG 28, 431); and the anonymous catalog published by Montfaucon Cotelier Pitra (see Pitra, Juris ecclesiastici graecorum Historia et monumenta, Rome 1864, vol. I, 100).

J.B. Frey, Apocryphes de l'Ancien Testament: DBS, I, 354-460; E. Amman, Apocryphes du Nouveau Testament: DBS 1, 460-533; G. Bardy, Apocryphes à tendance encratite (Actes des Apôtres): DSp 1, 752-765; J.A. Fabricius, Codex apocryphus Novi Testamenti, 2 vols., Hamburg 1703-1719; C. Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum apocrypha, Leipzig 1851-1903 (latest ed. edited by R.A. Lipsius and M. Bonnet); Evangelia apocrypha, Leipzig 1852 ([2]1876); Apocalypses apocryphae, Leipzig 1866; M.R. James, Apocrypha Anecdota, TSt, 1893-1897; A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, I, Leipzig 1893; E. Tisserant, Ascension d'Isaïe, Paris 1909; L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Paul, Paris 1913; R.H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, New York 1914; L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Pierre, Paris 1922; A. Pincherle, Gli oracoli sibillini giudaici, Rome 1922; O. Cullmann, Le problème littéraire et historique du roman pseudoclémentin, Paris 1930; P.M. Peterson, Andrew, Brother of Simon Peter: His History and His Legends, Leiden 1958; E. Hennecke - W. Schneemelcher, Apokryphen des NT, Tübingen [4]1968; M.G. Mara, Il Kerygma Petrou: Studi in onore di A. Pincherle, Rome 1967; Id., Evangile de Pierre, SC 201, Paris 1973; M. Erbetta, Gli apocrifi del NT, 4 vols., Turin 1966-1981; var. aus., Les Actes Apocryphes des Apôtres, Geneva 1981; F. Bovon, Canonical and Apocryphal Acts of Apostles: JECS 11 (2003) 165-194; F. Gori, Gli Apocrifi e i Padri, in Complementi di Patrologia, Rome 1989; E. Junod, Apocryphes du Nouveau Testament: Une appellation erronée et une collection artificielle: Apocrypha 3 (1992); A. Di Berardino, Gli apocrifi cristiani e il loro significato, in Storia della Teologia I, Casale Monferrato 1993; an exhaustive bibl. in L. Moraldi, Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, 3 vols., Turin 1994; E. Norelli, L'Ascensione di Isaia. Studi su un apocrifo al crocevia dei cristianesimi, Bologna 1994; J.-D. Kaëstli, Les écrits apocryphes chrétiens. Pour une approche qui valorise leur diversité et leurs attaches bibliques, in J.-D. Kaëstli - D. Marguerat, Le mystère apocryphe. Introduction à une littérature méconnue, Geneva 1995; the journal Apocrypha, published annually since 1990.

M.G. Mara

APOCRYPHA, PETRINE

I. Gospel of Peter - II. the Kerygma Petrou - III. Apocalypse of Peter - IV. Acts of Peter.

Several apocryphal Christian writings are collected under the name of Petrine apocrypha. They occur in a variety of literary genres, have the name Peter in common, and are dated between the 2nd and 4th c. We have a variety of evidence concerning them.

I. Gospel of Peter. An untitled, incomplete narration of the passion and resurrection of the Lord attributed to Peter was found in a 8th-9th-c. Greek parchment discovered in the Christian necropolis of Akhmîm (Upper Egypt) in 1886–1887. The name Gospel of Peter given it by scholars derives from the testimony of *Serapion of Antioch, mentioned by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE VI,12.2); *Origen, reported in the Comm. in Matth. X,17; *Jerome, present in the De viris illustribus 41 (testimony based on Eusebius); *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, who, in the Haereticorum fabulorum compendium II.2, tells us that the "Nazarites" used the gospel called According to Peter. Two brief fragments attributed to this writing have been found in the P. Oxy. 2949 and the P. Oxy. 4009, thought to be 2nd c. The Akhmîm fragment is not divided into verses and chapters.

The content of the 14 chapters and 60 verses into which scholars have divided the narrative contained in the fragment is as follows: (1) Conclusion of the trial; attitude of Pilate and Herod (vv. 1-2); (2) Joseph of Arimathea, even before the crucifixion, asks that the Lord's body be given him for burial; attitude of Pilate and Herod (vv. 3-5); (3) the passion: the Lord is handed over to the Jews, who begin the derision and insults (vv. 6-9); (4) the crucifixion between two criminals; dividing of the garments; one of the criminals acknowledges him as the "Savior of mankind" (vv. 10-14); (5) death and exaltation of the Lord; the darkness; the mixture of gall and vinegar; the veil of the temple torn (vv. 15-20); (6) deposition from the cross and burial; details accompanying the deposition; the funeral rite by Joseph of Arimathea (vv. 21-24); (7) attitude of the Jews and of the Lord's disciples (vv. 25-27); (8) the tomb guards (vv. 28-33); (9) the resurrection: the "crowd" from Jerusalem's testimony of the sealed tomb; the apparition to the soldiers of two "young men" who descend from heaven to the tomb (vv. 34-37); (10) apparition to all the tomb guards; the "three men" whose height reaches to heaven; the walking cross; a voice questions; the cross responds (vv. 38-42); (11) new apparition: a "personage" descends from heaven and enters the tomb; the guards, having agreed together on what to do, go to Pilate; request of the Jews that silence be imposed on the soldiers (vv. 43-49); (12) Mary Magdalene and friends set out for the tomb (vv. 50-54); (13) discovery of the empty tomb: the "young man" seated at the tomb, his questions and message (vv. 55-57); (14) after the Feast of the Unleavened Bread: attitude of the disciples; probable beginning of the apparition of the Lord to Peter in Galilee (vv. 58-60).

Various problems have been raised concerning this text: the place and date of composition; its relation with the canonical gospels and the Christian literature of the first centuries; the presence or not of *docetist elements; the presentation of the Lord's passion-death-resurrection-glorification according to a formulation considered popular or heterodox.

A few scholars (e.g., Völter) have proposed *Egypt as the place of origin of the Gospel of Peter. The letter of *Serapion, bishop of *Antioch in the late 2nd and early 3rd c., to the community of Rhossos, however, makes clear that the Gospel of Peter had already been read for some time in that community and perhaps had penetrated or been read in docetist circles (see Eusebius, HE VI,12,2). *Syria is thus to be favored as the location where the text was written. This thesis has been further strengthened by the fact that Origen made allusion to the Gospel of Peter after his time at *Antioch, and by the considerable dependency on the Gospel of Peter shown by the Syriac Didascalia and *Aphraates. The close relationship with other texts of the Syro-Asiatic region, such as the Perì Pascha of *Melito of Sardis, the fragment IV on Easter of *Apollinaris of Hierapolis and the homily In S. Pascha of the 2nd-c. anonymous Asiatic lead to a placing of the text in the Syro-Asiatic area. In fact the affinity of the Gospel of Peter with the *Easter homilies, as well as with the Eusebian text, have led many scholars to date the text toward the mid-2nd c.

Regarding the relation of the Gospel of Peter and the canonical gospels, our author's episodic narration harmonizes with the synoptic gospels and his theology with the gospel of John and the *Apocalypse.

A certain tendency to diminish the reality of the Lord's sufferings seems to be present in some verses of the Gospel of Peter, suggesting that the text should be located, either as to its origin or its use, in docetist circles. There are, however, numerous passages that contradict this tendency. The text seems concerned to emphasize that the kyrios who suffers and dies on the cross is still the Lord of glory. This concern leads the author to present the passion-death-resurrection-glorification of the kyrios in such a concentrated fashion as to give the impression of diminishing the historicity of the individual details. In fact this is not the case: the passion and death of the kyrios are not ignored; rather, according to the Johannine perspective that associates the lifting up on the cross with glorification, the *recapitulation in glory of the passion and death of the kyrios is stressed.

Another fact of particular interest is the presence in the Gospel of Peter of two traditions regarding the Lord's resurrection: one that describes the exit of the kyrios from the tomb in the presence of Jews and Gentiles, all witnesses to the event; and the other the same as in the canonical gospels, which entrusts the testimony of the Lord's resurrection first to the empty tomb and then to the apparitions to the disciples. The theophany of the risen Lord seems to be the fruit, not of a desire for the spectacular, but of the recovery of a tradition, also attested by other texts; this tradition proclaims the same faith in Christ died and risen, but in a different setting in which the doctrine and images of apocalyptic literature are familiar.

Among the numerous trans., see the most recent of L. Moraldi, Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento. Vangeli, Casale Monferrato 1994 and, under the direction of F. Bovon - P. Geoltrain, Ecrits apocryphes chrétiens, Paris 1998. Beyond the numerous eds., trs. and studies, see esp. L. Vaganay, L'Evangile de Pierre, Paris 1930; M.G. Mara, Evangile de Pierre, Paris 1973; J. Denker, Die theologiegeschichtliche Stellung des Petrusevangeliums. Ein Beitrag zur Frühgeschichte des Doketismus, Bern-Frankfurt 1975; W.J. McCant, The Gospel of Peter: Docetism Reconsidered: NTS 30 (1984); R.E. Brown, The Gospel of Peter and Canonical Gospel Priority: NTS 33 (1987); J.D. Crossan, The Cross That Spoke: The Origins of the Passion Narrative, San Francisco 1988; F. Bovon - P. Geoltrain, Ecrits apocryphes chrétiens, Paris 1998; E. Norelli, Situations des Apocryphes Pétriniens: Apocrypha 2 (1991a); M.G. Mara, Il Vangelo di Pietro, Bologna 2003.

II. The Kerygma Petrou or the Preaching of Peter. Ten fragments that have reached us through *Clement of Alexandria, principally in the Stromateis, though there are some explicit references to passages of the Kerygma in the Prophetic Extracts. Our text is also referred to in the *Letter to Diognetus, in *Theophilus and in *Origen, who says the text was cited by *Heracleon (Comm. in Jo. XIII, 17). Affinities have been noted between the Kerygma Petrou, the Apology of Aristides and the Ascension of Isaiah. *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE III, 3.2) counts the Kerygma among the ps.-Petrine writings. The fragments, which from the outset make reference to Peter, who in his preaching proclaimed the Lord to be "law" and "word," recall a missionary discourse of Peter, who exhorts his listeners to recognize "that there is only one God," creator of all things through the Son, and to adore him not as Greeks and Jews do, but in a new way, "through Christ," as do Christians, who are called the "third branch." The anti-idolatry and anti-Jewish polemic seems to be aimed not primarily at *pagans and Jews but at *catechumens or Christians needing consolation in their faith and needing to be made aware of the novelty this faith involves. Most scholars consider *Egypt to be the source of the fragments. The presence of the Kerygma in 2nd-c. writings and the reference to the use of some fragments by Heracleon suggest a dating of the Kerygma Petrou not after the middle of the 2nd c.

E. Bobschutz, Das Kerygma Petri kritisch untersucht (TU XI,I), Leipzig 1893; E. Klostermann, Reste des Petrus evangeliums. Der Petrus apokalypse und des Kerygma Petri. Apocrypha I, Bonn 1933; M.G. Mara, Il "Kerygma Petrou": Studi and Materiali di Storia delle Religioni 38 (1967) 314-342; P. Nautin, Les citations de la "Prédication de Pierre" dans Clément d'Alexandrie, Strom. VI,V, 39-41: JTS 25 (1974) 89-105; P. Paulsen, Das Kerygma Petri und die urchristliche Apologetik: ZKG 88 (1977) 1-37; E. Norelli, Situations des Apocryphes Petriniens: Apocrypha 3 (1992) 63-71; M.G. Mara, Note sulla "Predicatio Petri," in Atti VI Simposio su Paolo Apostolo, Rome 2000, 147-154.

III. Apocalypse of Peter. One of the earliest references to the Apocalypse of Peter is in the Muratorian *Canon (ca. 200), where it says: "We also accept only the apocalypses of John and of Peter," noting that some Christians preferred that the latter not be read in church. Until the 4th c. (see Codex Claromontanus) it was still listed among the NT canonical books. *Clement of Alexandria cites it multiple times (Ext. Proph. 41; 48-49), considering it Sacred Scripture. The Apocalypse of Peter was used by *Methodius of Olympus and mentioned by Eusebius and *Macarius of Magnesia. In the Greek MS of Akhmîm, discovered in 1886–1887, besides the Gospel of Peter was a piece of an anonymous apocalypse that, based on its affinity with a citation of Clement of Alexandria, has been identified as the Apocalypse of Peter.

In 1910 Grébaut found and translated an *Ethiopian text of the Apocalypse of Peter, more extensive than that in the Akhmîn MS and considered by some to be earlier (see Norelli). In both versions the basic theme is the *revelation to Peter of the last judgment, of "how the righteous and sinners will be separated, how it will be for the upright of heart, and how the wicked will be uprooted for all eternity." The text of the Ethiopian version opens with the scene of the Lord seated on the Mount of Olives, being asked by Peter and the disciples about the signs of his second coming and of the end of the world. The Lord, warning the disciples against false prophets, tells how unexpected his coming will be; as a sign from which the disciples can learn to recognize his actions at that time, he mentions the parable of the fruitful fig tree (Mt 24:32; Mk 13:28ff.) and that of the barren fig tree (Lk 13:6-9), which refers to Israel, where an *antichrist will appear in the last days and where there will be many *martyrs. Christ then describes in detail to Peter the punishments that will be meted out to 17 categories of sinners; the fate of the righteous is stated with a few words: "Then I will give to my elect and my righteous ones the salutary bath. . . . The righteous will then be adorned with flowers and I will go to rejoice with them . . . and I will give them the promised eternal happiness with my heavenly Father." After inviting the disciples to follow him "on the holy mountain," the Lord shows Peter "the host of the fathers," "their rest" and *Moses and *Elijah, resplendent: the scene records Jesus' transfiguration.

The variations of the Ethiopian version vis-à-vis that of the Akmîm MS have already been indicated (see Norelli): in the Greek version, Peter and the disciples do not see Moses and Elijah, but some of the "righteous brothers"; Peter sees hell, but the punishments awaiting sinners are not described. Some scholars think it probable that the Ethiopian version preserves the original form of the text, even if from ch. 18 to the conclusion at ch. 36 there are obvious later additions. The date of the work is proposed as 2nd c.; Egypt, as the place of composition. Regarding the relation between the Apocalypse of Peter found in the MS of Akhmîm and the text of the Gospel of Peter of the same MS, it does not seem as though they come from a Petrine school or from Peter's followers, or even from the same geographic area (see D.H. Schmidt, The Peter Writings: Their Redactors and Their Relationships, Illinois 1972). The placing of the two texts in the same MS in the tomb of a *Coptic *monk in the necropolis of Akhmîm can probably be explained as an anthological collection of passages on the mystery of the afterlife.

M. Erbetta, Gli apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, III. Lettere e Apocalissi, Turin 1969, 208-233; L. Moraldi, Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, III. Lettere, Dormizione di Maria, Apocalissi, Casale Monferrato 1994, 319-368; D.D. Buchholz, Your Eyes Will Be Opened: A Study on the Greek (Ethiopic) Apocalypse of Peter, Atlanta 1988; E. Norelli, Situation des Apocryphes Pétriniens: Apocrypha 3 (1992) 31-83; Id., Pertinence Théologique et canonicité: les premières apocalypses chrétiennes: Apocrypha 8 (1997) 147-164; P. Marrassini, L'Apocalisse di Pietro, in Studi in onore di Lanfranco Ricci, Istituto Universitario Orientale, Naples 1994; R.J. Bauckham, The Apocalypse of Peter: An Account of Research, in W. Haase (ed.), Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt, vol. 2.25/6 (Berlin-New York 1988); Id., The Apocalypse of Peter: A Jewish-Christian Apocalypse from the Time of Bar Kokhba: Apocrypha 5 (1994) 7-111.

IV. Acts of Peter. Written originally in Greek perhaps in Syria toward the end of the 2nd c., the Acts are in large part lost, with the exception of a text in which Peter's *martyrdom is narrated and a *Coptic fragment in which is reported the episode of the healing of his daughter of the paralysis that came upon her to save her from Ptolemy. The *Latin version of the Vercelli MSS, dated 4th-6th c. and considered the text closest to the original, has preserved most of the Acts of Peter. Various ancient testimonies (Muratorian fragment, Clement of Alexandria, Hippolytus), today considered unreliable, refer to details of Peter and his family. Only from the 3rd c. do we have citations that with a high probability depend directly or indirectly on the Acts of Peter. The Acts of Peter seem also to have been known perhaps by Origen, who tells of Peter's crucifixion with his head down; and certainly, in the first half of the 3rd c., by the author of the Didascalia, who in Didasc. 6,7-9 relates a passage with some details present in Acts of Peter 4; 5; 32. *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE III,2.25) does not name the Acts of Peter among the ps.-Petrine writings he cites, though some of his data does seem to depend on them. From the 4th c. on, possible references to our text by ecclesiastical writers multiply: see *Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. VI, 14-15); *Arnobius of Sicca (Adv. gent. 2,12); *Commodian (Carmen apol. vv. 624-626, 629-630); *Jerome (Adv. Iovin. 1,26; Comm. in Gal. 1,18; De vir. ill. I). It is probable that *Ambrose (see De interp. Iob. et David, I,1; In Ps. 118, Sermo 21; In hexaemeron 4,8) had direct knowledge of the Acts of Peter through the Vercelli MSS. The Vercelli MSS open with three paragraphs dedicated to Paul's departure from *Rome for *Spain, then narrate the arrival of Simon Magus at Rome, his preaching and Peter's being sent by the Lord from Jerusalem to Rome to refute Simon there as he had at *Jerusalem. Peter's preaching and miracles cause Simon to flee Marcellus's house, where he had been staying. The confrontation between Simon Magus and Peter began with Simon's denial of the real birth and crucifixion of Jesus. After correcting Simon's *Christology, Peter works various resurrection miracles in the name of Jesus Christ. Exhorted by the crowd to do the same, Simon cannot; Peter then saves him from the wrath of the crowd. Trying to regain the crowd, Simon, after attracting them with false prodigies, tries to levitate, but falls to the ground and is definitively defeated by Peter. The following text narrates Peter's martyrdom (MSS P).

L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Pierre. Introduction, textes, traduction et commentaire, Paris 1922; var. aus., Les Actes Apocryphes des Apôtres, Geneva 1981, 299-301; A. Leloir, Ecrits apocryphes sur les Apôtres, I, Turnhout 1986 (for the Armenian texts); P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten, Tübingen [2]1989; W. Schneemelcher, Petrusakten, in W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apoktyphen II: Apostolisches, Apokalypsen und Verwandtes, Tübingen [5]1989, 252-253; Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento. Atti degli Apostoli, ed. L. Moraldi, Casale Monferrato 1994, 41-104; var. aus., The Apocry- phal Acts of Peter: Magic, Miracles and Gnosticism (Studies on the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles 3), Louvain 1998, ed. J.N. Bremmer; the most recent redaction is by G. Poupon, Les Actes de Pierre et leur remaniement: ANRW II, 25,6 (1988) 4363-4383; E. Norelli, Sur les Actes de Pierre: à propos d'un livre récent: Apocrypha 11 (2000) 227-258, prefers, to Poupon's thesis of a primitive text and a redactor, that of a composite work from different sources, not well-integrated in the text; Chr. Thomas thinks of the Acts of Peter as a mixture of written and oral data, see in The Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles in Intertextual Perspectives, ed. R.F. Stoops, Canon and Antitype: The Relationship Beetween the Acts of Peter and the New Testament: Semeia 80 (1999) 185-205.

M.G. Mara

APOCRYPHA IN EASTERN LANGUAGES. Apocrypha also had a very important role in ancient Eastern literature. A large number were translated from the Greek, with the pattern of translation usually being *Greek-*Coptic-Arabic-Ethiopian; or Greek-*Syriac-*Armenian-*Georgian; some Georgian texts were translated from Syriac; some apocrypha were also written in Eastern languages. The texts translated from the Greek often contain many interesting variations. The translations are usually paraphrases, often with a strong accent on local customs and other local elements. We will limit ourselves here to a bibliographical summary of Muslim and Christian apocrypha in the most important languages of the Christian East.

An introduction to Eastern apocrypha: F. Haase, Literararkritische Untersuchungen zur orientalischen-apokryphen Evangelienliteratur, Leipzig 1913; information on apocrypha in M. Albert, R. Beylot, R.G. Cocquin, B. Outtier, Ch. Renoux, A. Guillaumont, Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993; Starowieyski 1/1, 842-845.

Muslim apocrypha: Texts on Jesus and Mary can be found in a Persian writer, Tabarî (839-923) in La Chronique, Histoire des prophètes et des rois, tr. H. Zotenberg, 1-5, Paris 2001, vol. 1, 86-121. On Christ and Mary in Islam, see D. Sidersky, Les origines des légendes musulmanes dans le Coran et dans les Vies des Prophètes, Paris 1933, 136-150 (Qur'an and the apocrypha); J.M. Abd-el-Jail, La vie de Marie selon le Coran et l'Islam, in Maria, Études sur la Sainte Vierge, 1, Paris 1949, 183-211; F.F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins Outside the NT, London 1974, 167-186; R. Arnaldez, Jésus, fils de Marie, prophète d'Islam, Paris 1980; A.J. Wensinck - P. Jonstone, Maryam, in Encyclopèdie d'Islam, 6, Leiden 1986, 613-617 (bibl.); G. Rizzardi, Il fascino di Cristo nell'Islam, Milan 1989.

Gospel of Barnabas: See Barnabas.

Muslim agrapha: ed. M. Asín y Palacios, PO 13,3, 1916; PO 19,4, 1926, edition with Latin tr.; R. Dunkerley, The Muhhamedan Agrapha: Expository Times 39 (1927-1928) 167-171; 230-234.

Christian apocrypha: Arabic: M. Dunlop Gibson, Apocrypha Arabica (Studia Sinaitica 8), London 1901; Gospels: the Arabic infancy gospel. Ed.: CANT 58; BHO 619; H. Sike, Traiecti ad Rhenum (Utrecht 1697, commentary); J.C. Thilo, Codex apocryphus NT, 1, Leipzig 1832, 66-131; E.A. W. Budge, A History of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the History of Likeness of Christ, 1-2, London 1899; M.E. Provera, Il vangelo arabo dell'infanzia secondo il Ms. Laurenziano orientale (n. 387), Jerusalem 1973 (introd., theology). Trans.: Fr. - P. Peeters, Evangiles apocryphes, 2, Paris 1914, 1-65; C. Ganeguaud: EAC 1,207-238; Lat. - Tischendorf 181-209; Ger. - Schneider 174-195; It. - Erbetta, 1,2, 102-123; Moraldi 1, 281-311; A. di Nola, Vangeli apocrifi. Natività e infanzia, Parma 1986 (TEA). G. Messina, I Magi di Betlemme e una predicazione di Zoroastro, Rome 1933. G. Graf, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, 1, Vatican City 1944, 224-257; R.G. Coquin, et al., Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993, 53f.; G. Levi della Vida, Leggende agiografiche cristiane nell'Islam, in Acts del convegno internazionale sul tema: L'Oriente cristiano nella storia di civiltà, Rome 1964, 139-151 (Lincei, Quaderni 62); Starowieyski 1,405-439. Arabic Gospel of John: CANT 44; J. Galbiati, Ioannis Euangelium apocryphum arabice, 1-2, Mediolani 1957 (in CANT, a concordance of fragments with the Ethiopian Miracles of Jesus). Trans.: Swed. - O. Löfgren, Stockholm 1967; It. - L. Moraldi, Milan 1991. O. Löfgren, Ein unbeachtetes apokryphes Evangelium: Orientalistische Literaturzeitung 4 (1943) 153-159; Id., Zur Charakteristik des apokryphen Johannesevangeliums: Orientalia Suecana 10 (1961) 147-154; E. Peretto, Cristo e la Vergine nel Vangelo Arabo di Giovanni: Marianum 25 (1963) 99-139; M. van Esbroeck, À propos de l'Évangile apocryphe arabe attribué à S. Jean: Mélanges de l'Université S. Joseph 49 (1975-1976) 597-603; L. van Rompay, Les manuscrits éthiopiens des "Miracle de Jésus," comprenant l'Evangile apocryphe de Jean et l'Evangile de l'Enfance selon Thomas Israélite: AB 93 (1975) 133-146; W. Witakowski, The Miracles of Jesus: An Aethiopian Apocryphal Gospel: Apocrypha 6 (1995) 279-298. Transitus: M. Enger, Ioannis Apostoli de transitu Beatae Mariae Virginis liber, Eberfeld 1854. Joseph the Carpenter: A. Battista, B. Bagatti, Historia Iosephi fabri lignarii, Jerusalem 1978. Apocryphal Acts: A. Smith Lewis, Acta mythologica Apostolorum (Horae Semiticae 3-4), London 1904.

Aramean: See A. Desremaux, Les œuvres de la littérature chrétienne en araméen christo-paléstinien: Bulletin de AELAC 9 (1999) 9-14.

Armenian: Gospels: Ed.: Mechitaristes 1-2, Venice 1898-1904. Infancy Gospel: ed.: CANT 59; BHO 617f.; E. Dayeci, 1, Venice 1898, 127-235; trans.: Fr. - P. Peeters, Evangiles apocryphes, 2, Paris 1914, 66-286; It. - Erbetta 1,2, 124-185; Craveri 149-213; Pol. - Starowieyski 1,1, 440-541. N. Marr, Iz letniej pojezdki w Armeniju: Zapiski Wostoczniego Otdielienija Impieratorskogo Russkogo Archieoğogičeskogo Občšestwa 6 (1892) 135-145 = Hamdes Amsorya 6 (1892) 232-235; S.J. Voicu, Gli apocrifi armeni: Augustinianum 23 (1983) 161-180 [174]. Acts: Ecrits apocryphes sur les Apôtres. Traduction de l'édition arménienne de Venise, ed. L. Leloir, OSB, CCAp 3-4, 1986 (tr. from the Mekhitarist ed.). See M.E. Stone, The Apocryphal Literature in the Armenian Tradition: Proceedings of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities 4 (1969) 59-78 (OT apocrypha); Id.: Apocrypha 1 (1990) 303-311; S.J. Voicu: Augustinianum 23 (1983) 161-180; Ch. Ronoux, in var. aus., Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993, 129 n.; L. Leloir, Les citations évangéliques dans la version arménienne des Actes apocryphes, in R. Gryson (ed.), Philologia sacra, FS, H. Frede, W. Thiele, 2, Freiburg 1993, 364-377; V. Calzolari, Réecriture des textes apocryphes en arménien, l'exemple de la légende de l'apostolat de Thadée en Arménie: Apocrypha 8 (1997) 97-110; B. Outtier, Paralytique et Resuscité (Cant 85 et 62). Vie des apocryphes en arménien: Apocrypha 8 (1997) 111-120; V. Calzolari - J.D. Kaëstli - B. Outtier, Apocry- phes arméniens, traduction, création, transmission, iconographie, Lausanne 1999.

Coptic: E.A.W. Budge, Coptic Apocrypha in the Dialect of Upper Egypt, London 1913. See W. Grosouw, De Apocriefen van het Oude en Nieuve Testament in de koptische Letterkunde: Studia catholica 10 (1933/1934) 434-446; 11 (1934/1935) 19-36; T. Orlandi, Gli apocrifi copti: Augustinianum 23 (1983) 57-71; F. Morard, Notes sur le recueil des actes apocryphes coptes: RThPh 113 (1981) 403-413; A. Perez: Coptic Encyclopaedia 1, 161-169 (bibl.); R.G. Coquin, in var. aus., Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993, 190f.; M. Rassart-Debergh, Littérature apocryphe et l'art copte: Apocrypha 7 (1996) 253-259. See also the texts of Nag Hammadi.

Ethiopian: Gospels and Transitus: M. Chaine, Apocrypha de Beata Maria Virgine: CSCO 39-40/Aeth 1-2, 1909 (1961); S. Grébaut, Les miracles de Jésus: PO 12,4 (1919); 14,5 (1920); 17,4 (1924); ROC 16 (1911) 255-265, 356-367; 21 (1918/1919) 73-87, 94-99, 100-103, 190-203, 204-213; E.A.W. Budge, One Hundred and Ten Miracles of Our Lady, London [2]1933; Id., Legends of Our Lady Perpetual Virgin and the Mother Hanna, London [2]1933; E. Cerulli, Il libro etiopico dei Miracoli di Maria e le sue fonti nelle letterature del Medio Evo latino, Rome 1943; V. Arras, De Transitu Mariae Apocrypha Aethiopice: CSCO 342,351/Aeth 343,352 (1973-1974); M.A. van den Oudenrijn, Gamaliel äthiopische Texte zur Pilatusliteratur, Fribourg 1959. Acts: E.A.W. Budge, The Contendings of Apostles, 1-2, London [2]1935 (repr. Amsterdam 1976); R. Basset, Les apocryphes éthiopiens traduits en français, 1-11, Paris 1893-1909. See E. Cerulli, La letteratura etiopica, Florence [3]1968; E. Hammerschmidt, Das Pseudo-apostolische Schrifttum in äthiopischer Überlieferung: Journal of Semitic Studies 9 (1964) 114-121; P. Piovanelli, Les aventures des apocryphes en Ethiopie: Apocrypha 4 (1993) 197-224; R. Beylot, in var. aus., Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993, 237-239; ANT 615 n.

Georgian: Ed.: C. Kurcikidze, Tbilisi 1959. Georgian Infancy Gospel: unpubl.; Pol. tr. G. Peradze, in Starowieyski 1/1, 204-229. See M. Tarchnišvili, Geschichte der kirchlichen georgischen Literatur, SeT 185, Vatican City 1955; M. van Esbroeck: Augustinianum 23 (1983) 57-91; B. Outtier in var. aus., Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993, 279.

Syriac: Ed.: W. Wright, Contribution to the Apocryphal Literature of the New Testament, 1-2, London 1865; M. Dunlop Gibson, Apocrypha Sinaitica (Studia Sinaitica 5), London 1896; E.A.W. Budge, The History of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the Likeness of Christ, London 1899; A. Smith-Lewis, Apocrypha Syriaca: The Protevangelium Iacobi et Transitus Mariae (Studia Sinaitica 11), London 1902. Acts: W. Wright, Apocryphal Acts of Apostles, 1-2, Edinburgh 1871 (repr. Amsterdam 1968); E. Meščerskaja, Apokrifičeskie dejania apostołow. Nowozawetnye apokrifi w sirijskoj literaturie, Moscow 1997 (anthology of Syrian texts in Russian tr.). See A. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur, Bonn 1922; I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia Syriaca, Rome [2]1965; H.J.W. Drijvrs, Apocryphal Literature in the Cultural Milieu of Osroëne: Apocrypha 1 (1999) 231-246; J. Texidor, L'apôtre d'après la littérature syriaque: Apocrypha 1 (1999) 267-277; M. Albert, in var. aus., Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993, 318-320; A. Desremaux, Remarques sur le rôle des apocryphes dans la théologie des Églises syriaques: l'exemple de "Testimonia" christologiques inédits: Apocrypha 8 (1997) 165-177.

M. Starowieyski

APOCRYPHA of the OT, Christian and Christianized. In most cases OT apocrypha—i.e., regarding persons of the OT, also called intertestamentary writings—are of Jewish origin. A certain number of these apocrypha, however, are of Christian origin, or have been more or less Christianized. Alongside the Christian elements we find others: *gnostic, Bogomil and *pagan.

The number of purely Christian OT apocrypha is quite limited. Among them are some works of the Esdras cycle: the Apocalypse of Esdras, the Vision of Esdras, the Revelation of Esdras and the Apocalypse of Sedrach. These works are most often from the High Middle Ages.

There are apocrypha in which Christian authors have reworked, more or less thoroughly, the Jewish material, as with the legend of the death of Isaiah in the Ascension of Isaiah or Lives of the Prophets, where the Jewish material was profoundly reworked and put to use by Christians.

A separate case are the Sibylline oracles, a work composed of various elements: the pagan substrate was Judaized, and the Jewish material was then Christianized by Christians. Some of its books are entirely Jewish (III) or entirely Christian (VI), and some are *Jewish Christian (VII); gnostic, Jewish Christian and even Bogomil elements can be found in the other books.

Many OT apocrypha—like the *apocalypses—enjoyed a certain popularity among Christians and were therefore Christianized, which took place in various ways and at different levels. Some works had only a very limited number of passages inserted, whereas others were more or less profoundly reworked. Some have Christian additions only in certain versions. Finally, some Jewish apocrypha were influenced by a Christian spirit, such as the Apocrypha of Ezekiel.

There are also non-Christianized apocrypha that have points of contact with the NT: they are cited, like the Book of Enoch in the Epistle of Jude (14-15); the same book has points of contact with Colossians and Hebrews—the latter knows the legend of the death of Isaiah (11:37). The author of the Testament of Adam knows the NT apocrypha, etc. Intertestamentary writings are cited by the fathers of the church, such as *Clement of Alexandria and *Origen. Some know these writings from their own reading, others through Flavius Josephus or *Philo. Jewish historians and poets are esp. cited; the OT apocalypses enjoyed a certain popularity among ecclesiastical writers.

On OT apocrypha see CAVT; the great collections like those of Diez Macho, Sacchi or Charlesworth; introductions like Denis or R. Rubinkiewicz, Wprowadzenie do Apokryfów Starego Tstamentu, Lublin 1987; J.H. Charlesworth, The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha and the New Testament, Harrisburg [2]1998 (esp. 79-90: The Pseudepigrapha and the New Testament).

M. Starowieyski

APOKATASTASIS (apocatastasis). In general the term means "restoration, reestablishment, return"; astronomically it means the time required for a planet to complete its orbit. In the first Christian centuries the word assumed various meanings that can only be fully understood in light of its previous history. Its was used in medicine, law and politics, and was linked to the astronomical theory of the Great Year; it appears in Jewish thought, in the NT and often in *gnostic writings. The noun appears in *Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. 134,4); with somewhat greater frequency the so-called Apostolic Fathers and other *apologists use the corresponding verb ἀποκαθίστημι. Sometimes the idea of a return to a previous moment is accompanied by that of fulfillment, the arrival at a better state, which presupposes the changing of events rather than the restoration of a state already known (see, e.g., Ign., Smyrn. 11,2). At other times the two terms indicate properly Christian notions: Justin uses them to indicate the idea of *redemption, *Tatian (Or. ad Gr. 6,2) alludes to bodily *resurrection, as does *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. V, 3,2), who elsewhere uses them to touch on humanity's new foundation in God through Christ (Adv. haer. V, 12,1) or on the Lord's *parousia (Adv. haer. IV, 58,9). Nonetheless, these authors do not exclude from the meanings of ἀποκατάστασις and ἀποκαθίστημι the idea of the restoration of a primitive state. After the use made of it by *Clement of Alexandria, *Origen gives considerable emphasis to the notion of ἀποκατάστασις: it is generally held that he links the term to the doctrine of restoration to the primitive state, i.e., the restoration at the end of time of all rational creatures, without exception, to the state of primitive happiness. Some of his texts support this opinion, whereas others express otherwise; in particular the Letter to His Friends at Alexandria rejects the idea that the devil would be saved. (For a discussion of this, see E. Prinzivalli, in Origen, Dizionario, cited in bibl., 24ff.). The term appears in many later authors, sometimes in connection with anti-Origenist polemic.

Oepke: TWNT I, 386ff.; Chr. Lenz: RAC I, 510ff.; J. Daniélou, L'apocatastase chez saint Grégoire de Nysse: RecSR 30 (1940) 328-340; A. Méhat, Apocatastase. Origène, Clément d'Alexandrie, Act 3,21: VChr 10 (1956) 196-214; G. Muller, Origenes und die Apokatastasis: TZ 14 (1958) 174-190; P. Siniscalco, Ἀποκατάστασις e ἀποκαθίστημι nella tradizione della Grande Chiesa fino ad Ireneo, SP III (= TU, 78), Berlin 1961, 380-396; G. Bien - H. Schwabl, Apokatastasis: Hist. Wörterbuch der Philosophie 1 (1974) 440-441; A. Mehat, Ἀποκατάστασις chez Basilide: Mélanges d'histoire des religions offerts à H.Ch. Puech, Paris 1974, 365-373; H. Crouzel: L'apocatastase chez Origène: Origeniana IV (1985/87) 282-290; A.P. Pauw, Origen's Doctrine of the Apokatástasis Pántōn: Studia Biblica et Theologica 14 (1986) 37-50; G. May, TRE X, 302ff., s.v. Eschatologie; H.U. von Balthasar, Apokatastasis: TTZ 97 (1988) 169-182; W. Breuning: LTK[3] 1, cols. 821-824; J.R. Sachs, Apocatastasis in Patristic Theology: ThS 54 (1993) 617-640; E. Prinzivalli, Origen, Dizionario, Rome 2000, 24-29, s.v. Apocatastasi.

P. Siniscalco

APOLLINARIS the Elder (d. after 362). *Socrates and *Sozomen give information on the father of *Apollinaris of Laodicea. Born at *Alexandria, a Christian and a grammarian by profession, he taught first at Berytus (Beirut), then at Laodicea in Syria (Latakieh), where his son Apollinaris was born between 300 and 315. He was a priest during *Theodotus's episcopate (332–335) and his son a lector; both of them taught, the father grammar, the son *rhetoric. They attended the lectures of the *pagan rhetor Epiphanius, which provoked various prohibitions on the part of Bishop Theodotus, reaching the point of a period of excommunication for the two clerics. The excommunication was repeated by Bishop George, Theodotus's successor. Sozomen, however, gives a complex interpretation of this second excommunication: *George of Laodicea's measures were a sign of his opposition to the strong *Nicene attachment of the two Apollinarises, and to their friendship with *Athanasius who, passing through Laodicea on his return from exile in 346, was a guest at their house. In 362 the law of *Julian the Apostate aimed at removing Christian professors from schools by prohibiting the explanation of Christian authors led the elder Apollinaris to draw up an adaptation of the Pentateuch in hexameters; he is said to have done the same for the other historical books of the OT in 24 poems. It is said he titled this vast Homeric-style poem the Jewish Archaeology. Still, according to Socrates and Sozomen, Apollinaris the father also drew subjects for lyric and dramatic compositions from the sacred books, in the manner of Pindar and Euripides. Nothing remains of his work.

Socrates, HE II, 46; III, 15-16: PG 67, 361-364; 417-424; Sozomen, HE V, 18; VI, 25: PG 67, 1269-1272; 1630-1631; DCB I, 133-134; DHGE III, 961-962; DB I, 773; P. Batiffol, La littérature grecque, Paris 1901, 288-289; J. Dräseke, Apollinaris von Laodicea (TU VII), Leipzig 1872, 3-4; 7-9; 15-17; 63-80; H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea und seine Schule, Tübingen 1904, 1-3; 9-10; 44-46; 150-152; P. Allard, Julien l'Apostate, II 369-371.

E. Cavalcanti

APOLLINARIS of Hierapolis (2nd c.). Bishop of Hierapolis in *Phrygia during the reign of *Marcus Aurelius (161–180) (see Eus., Chron. ad an. 170; HE IV, 21; 26.1), Claudius Apollinaris carried out an intense apologetic and antiheretical literary activity, almost none of which has survived. *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE IV, 27) provides a list of Apollinaris's works that had reached him, mentioning in particular an Apology to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, a work To the Greeks in five books, two books On Truth and two To the Jews; he also mentions in a general way writings against *Montanism, which was just beginning to spread. Apollinaris's anti-Montanist work was commended in HE V, 16.1. However, the attribution to Apollinaris of the anti-Montanist work cited by Eusebius in HE V, 16.2-22 is unfounded; the same attribution had previously been made by *Rufinus in his version of HE V, 16.2-5. *Serapion of *Antioch testifies to the importance of Apollinaris's work against the *cataphrygian *heresy; Serapion used it as an ideal document for showing the unified position of the church toward Montanism (Eus., HE V, 19.1-2; see CPG 1333). Regarding the Apology, already mentioned by Eusebius in HE IV, 26.1, it may well be Apollinaris's work in which a Christian interpretation was offered of the account of a thunderstorm that miraculously intervened to save Marcus Aurelius's army during the military campaign of 172 against the Marcomanni (see Eus., HE V, 5.3-4). From the Chron. Pasch. (PG 92, 80C-81A) we know that Apollinaris was the author of a work On Easter; the two fragments reported there put him among the promoters of the Johannine chronology of Jesus' death, 14 Nisan; it is uncertain, however, whether Apollinaris celebrated Easter according to the *quartodeciman or Roman usage. *Photius (Bibl., cod. 14), in addition to his works To the Greeks and On Truth, read Apollinaris's work On Piety, which may have to be identified with the Apology to Marcus Aurelius. *Theodoret, who mentions Apollinaris as an anti-Montanist writer (Haer. III, 2), also mentions him as a polemicist against the Severian *Encratites (Haer. I, 21). From *Socrates (HE III, 7.5) it seems that Apollinaris, with *Irenaeus, *Clement of Alexandria and Serapion of Antioch, asserted the presence of the human soul in the incarnate Christ. The Apollinaris that *Jerome (de Vir. ill. 18) mentions, with Irenaeus, as a *millenarian, should be identified with *Apollinaris of Laodicea. Baronius inserted Apollinaris's anniversary in the Roman Martyrology, 8 January.

CPG 1103; P. de Labriolle, Les sources de l'histoire du montanisme, Fribourg (Switz.)-Paris 1913, XXII-XXIV; Id., La crise montaniste, Paris 1913, 151-155, 570-571; G. Laiti, Acqua e sangue nel frammento pasquale di Apollinare di Gerapoli, in Atti della Settimana Sangue e antropologia nella letteratura cristiana, ed. F. Vattioni, Rome 1983, 931-937; R.M. Grant, Greek Apologists of the Second Century, London 1988, 83-90.

V. Zangara

APOLLINARIS of Laodicea (d. 392) – APOLLINARIANISM. Apollinaris was born at Laodicea ca. 315. His father, an *Alexandrian and also named *Apollinaris, taught grammar at Berytus (Beirut) before starting a family at Laodicea in Syria. He was a priest and his son a lector in the local church when, in 335, both attracted the anger of the local bishop, *Theodotus, because they attended the lectures of the Sophist Epiphanius (Socr., HE 2,46; Soz., HE 6, 25,9-11). *Athanasius stayed with them in 346, on return from his second exile; their relations with Athanasius, as with his closest collaborater, *Serapion of Thmuis, were deep and lasting. Father and son were also excommunicated by Theodotus's *Arian successor, *George of Laodicea (Soz., HE 6,25,12). At the Council of *Constantinople of 360, George was deposed and replaced by *Pelagius, candidate of the *homoian party led by *Acacius, against whom Athanasius turned the whole weight of his influence. During these events it seems that Apollinaris was chosen as bishop responsible for the Nicene community of Laodicea. Likewise, though in an even more turbulent situation at the nearby metropolis *Antioch, *Paulinus led the Nicenes, also called Eustathians, from his predecessor's name, as distinct from the larger community guided by *Meletius, whom Acacius's party put forward in 360. These two bishops, both favorable to *Nicaea, sent delegates to the Synod of Alexandria, convoked by Athanasius in 362. Paulinus was represented by two deacons; Apollinaris, by some monks. The two delegations used the same language in trinitarian matters; the terms ousia and hypostasis* were considered the same. This was essentially the doctrine bequeathed by *Eustathius and, practically speaking, also that of Athanasius himself. Nonetheless, between these allies who formed a common front against those they considered "Arians," there was friction when it came time to specify their *christological terminology. No. 7 of the Tomus ad Antiochenos, drawn up during that synod and presented under Athanasius's name, openly attests this. At about the same time, when the emperor *Julian decided to ban Christians from teaching the classics, the two Apollinarises accepted the challenge; the father composed Homeric poems inspired by the OT, and the son composed evangelical dialogues in the manner of contemporary rhetors.

In 363 Apollinaris presented Julian's old officer *Jovian (Lietzmann 250-253) with his profession of faith, in perfect order like the other regional bishops. While Athanasius, also present at Antioch, confined himself to handing over a copy of the Nicene formula with a short commentary, Apollinaris felt it his duty to give that formula a wholly personal cast—which shows that the basic ideas of *heretical Apollinarianism were already clearly defined in his thought. On the level of church politics, he immediately scored some important points. It is probable that ca. 372 one of his disciples, *Timothy, for whom he had obtained a letter of recommendation from Athanasius, was recognized at *Rome by Pope *Damasus. Similarly in 375 another disciple, *Vitalis, a deserter from Meletius's party, obtained a certificate of *orthodoxy from Damasus. In 376, however, the pope attempted to impose on Vitalis a form of union with Paulinus. Vitalis's election as bishop must have occurred in that year, and this risky undertaking turned Apollinaris's friend *Basil of Caesarea, and Damasus himself, against him. Probably in 377, Timothy was censured at Rome; at that time *Jerome was still following Apollinaris's courses at Antioch. The Roman censure, however, extended to Apollinarianism as such, was confirmed at Antioch in 379 and at Constantinople in 381 (can. 1). While the Apollinarists organized synods of their own, first at Antioch in 379 and certainly in 382 at Nazianzus (Greg. Naz., Ep. 101), where they also enthroned one of their own as bishop (Greg. Naz., Ep. 125), a Roman synod in 382 repeated the condemnation with greater force. In the same year *Gregory of Nyssa became acquainted with Apollinarianism during a trip to *Jerusalem, and soon after returning to *Cappadocia undertook to refute it in his Antirrheticus, though he had never met Apollinaris personally. In 387 *Gregory of Nazianzus begged Bishop *Nectarius of Constantinople to exhort the emperor *Theodosius to resist by force the Apollinarists, who were trying to place one of their own men in the see of Nazianzus, where Gregory had provisionally replaced the late bishop. He had made a similar request in 385 or 386 to *Theophilus of Alexandria. The first imperial decrees against the Apollinarists were issued in 388 (CTh XVI, 5, 14, 15), without, however, Vitalis losing his episcopal see. Apollinaris died before 392. The Apollinarist community of Antioch rejoined the orthodox only in 425 (Theod., HE V, 38,2); traces of this heresy remained in the East until the second half of the 5th c. Apollinaris's writings, saved from destruction thanks to literary falsifications (denounced from earliest times), occupy 50 numbers of the CPG (II, 3645-3695); they are essentially dedicated to the theological formulation of the dogma of the *incarnation of God. Some of Apollinaris's apologetic works, such as his 30-vol. treatise against *Porphyry and his apology against Julian and the Greek *philosophers, have been completely destroyed. Numerous citations of his biblical *exegesis have been preserved in *catenae. Jerome mentions commentaries on Eccl, Is, Hos, Mal, Ps, Mt, 1 Cor, Gal and Eph. Exegetical extracts on Pr, Song, Is, Ez, Dan and Lk have been published. Critical editions have verified the fragments on the Octateuch, Ps, Mt, Jas and Rom. There are also fragments on Job and Jer.

The most recent critical study of Apollinaris's whole work is that of E. Mühlenberg, who has also edited the fragments on the Psalms; the first part of this essay owes much to his notable summary in TRE of Apollinaris and his school. The formula mia physis tou theou logou sesarkōmenē is the most striking expression in the whole of Apollinaris's doctrine (Lietzmann 206,28, 251, 1). *Cyril of Alexandria, deceived by some writings of Apollinaris transmitted under the name of his predecessor St. Athanasius, attributed them to the latter and interpreted them. In doing so he prepared the way that, from the 5th c., would link *monophysitism to Apollinaris's initial insights. Firm on the notion of physis, these insights departed from the identity of ousia and hypostasis, an identity preserved intact by both Apollinaris and Athanasius in the sphere of trinitarian doctrine. While he developed his theory on the relationship between the Father and the Son departing from a keen perception of their unity, Apollinaris reflected primarily on the essential unity of the Word made flesh, thinking of the theology of the incarnation. A long period of theoretical reflection, not yet well studied, preceded the explicit structure of his whole system. The recent identifcation of three Easter homilies of Apollinaris by E. Cattaneo sheds light on this first period of his curriculum. Directly following Athanasius, the position of nascent Apollinarianism has likewise been clarified by careful study of the (ps.-?) Athanasian third treatise Against the Arians (Hübner, Kannengiesser). Moreover, a genuine philosophical rigor, whose presuppositions, *Aristotelian or otherwise, have been the object of several studies, guided the final exposition of Apollinaris's Christology. Finally, the polemical context of the struggle against *Arianism also played a role in his Christology's final structure. Formulating Christ's unity as his hypostasis, Apollinaris conceived the composite being of the Word made flesh as a substantial integration of the flesh with the Word. From Christ's being he therefore excluded reason (nous), or the higher soul, since this is a subject capable of self-determination. In the most rigorous sense he defined Christ as "God incarnate," without yet possessing the idea of the hypostatic union of his two natures, which was not defined until later. In this way he provoked the doctrinal crisis at the end of which the great christological councils of *Ephesus (431) and *Chalcedon (451) defined the church's faith once and for all. After Apollinaris's death his disciples broke up: Vitalis of Antioch and Timothy of Berytus remained fairly close to the Great Church; *Polemon and Julian radicalized the notion of the Word as the sole subject of Christ's volition and action. Fully condemning the heresy that deprived Christ's humanity of a true soul, Cyril of Alexandria, *Philoxenus of Mabbug, *Severus of Antioch and the monophysites in general were only minimally influenced by Apollinaris.

CPG 3645-3700.

Indispensable studies: TRE 3, 370-371 (with bibl.); H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris v. Laodicea und seine Schule, Tübingen (1904) - Hildesheim (1970); E. Mühlenberg, Apoll. v. L. zu ps. 1-150: Psalmenkommentare aus der Katenenüberlieferung 1, PTS 15 (1975) 1-118.

Studies: G. Voisin, L'Apollinarisme. Étude historique, littéraire et dogmatique sur le début des controverses christologiques au IVe siècle, Diss. Louvain-Paris 1901; G. Furlani, Studi apollinaristici I. La dottrina trinitaria di Apollinare di Laodicea: Riv. trim. di St. filos. rel. 2 (1921) 257-285; II. I presupposti psicologici della cristologia di Apoll. di L.: ibid. 4 (1923) 129-146; E. Raven, Apollinarianism: An Essay on the Christology of the Early Church, Cambridge 1923; M. Richard, L'introduction du mot "hypostase" dans la théologie de l'incarnation: MSR 2 (1945) 5-32, 243-270 (Opera Minora II, n. 42); H. de Riedmatten, La christologie d'Apoll. de L., SP 2, TU 64 (1957), 208-234; R. Cadiou, Apollinaire et l'Isaïe de Qûmran: RHR 171 (1967) 145-148; E. Mühlenberg, Apollinaris von Laodicea, Göttingen 1969; C. Kannengiesser, Une nouvelle interprétation de la christologie d'Apollinaire: RSR 59 (1971) 27-36; R. Hübner, "Gotteserkenntnis durch die Inkarnation": Kleronomia 4 (1972) 131-161; P. Jay, Jérome auditeur d'Apollinaire de Laodicée è Antioche: REAug 20 (1974) 36-41; B. Kramer, Protokoll eines Dialog zwischen Didymos dem Blinden und einem Ketzer: ZPE 32 (1978) 201-211; R. Hübner, Die Hauptquelle des Epiphanius (Panarion, haer. 65) über Paulus von Samosata: Ps Athanasius, Contra Sabellianos: ZKG 90 (1979) 55-74; E. Cattaneo, Trois Homélies pseudo-Chrysostomiennes comme œuvre d'Apollinaire de Laodicée, Th. Hist. 58, Paris 1980; F.R. Gahbauer, Das Anthropologische Model, Würzburg 1984, 127-224; E. Cattaneo, Le Traité d'Apollinaire "Contre Photin" et les "Homélies pascales" pseudochrysostomiennes: OCP 60 (1994) 233-237; R.M. Hübner, Ps-Athanasius, "Contra Sabellianos." Eine Schrift des Basilius von Caesarea oder des Apollinarius von Laodicea?: VChr 41 (1987) 386-395; K. McCarthy Spoerl, Apollinarian Christology and the Anti-Marcellan Tradition: JTS 45 (1994) 545-568; Id., The Liturgical Argument in Apollinarius: Help and Hindrance on the Way to Orthodoxy: HTR 91 (1998) 127-152; LACL 48-50.

Ch. Kannengiesser

APOLLINARIS of Ravenna (2nd-3rd c.). Legendary first bishop of *Ravenna and the city's first and only known *martyr. His episcopate is dated from the late 2nd to the early 3rd c. According to the Passio s. Apollinaris (which is of doubtful historical value), he arrived at *Rome with *Peter; from there the apostle sent him as a missionary to Ravenna, where he worked for nearly twenty years until, ca. 75, he died from blows received from a group of *pagans in revolt. His cult is attested in ancient times by the Mart. hier. (23 July); sermo 128 of *Peter Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna in the 5th c. (424–451); and by an epigraph at Classe from the 6th c. indicating the place of his burial (basilica of S. Apollinare in Classe). The church of S. Apollinare Nuovo later also claimed possession of the body, the remains supposedly having been removed there during the time of the *Saracen incursions. These events, which in the 12th c. produced an opposition between the two religious entities, led to the drafting of two *hagiographical texts, each claiming possession of the saint's body for their respective basilica (the Historia translationis beati Apolenaris linked to S. Apollinare Nuovo and the Tractatus domni Rodulfi venerabilis prioris Camaldulensis de inventione corporis beati Apolenaris linked to S. Apollinare in Classe). The Passio, one of the sources of Agnellus's Liber pontificalis,* was composed, perhaps based on a preexisting text, in the mid-7th c. at the time of Archbishop *Maurus (together with the false diploma of *Valentinian III, which concedes to the diocese of Ravenna metropolitan rights over 14 suffragan churches), with the intent of claiming the apostolicity of the see of Ravenna and its autocephaly with respect to Rome. Apollinaris is the patron of Emilia Romagna and Ravenna. Other than at Ravenna, his cult is attested to at Rome from the time of Pope *Symmachus (498–514) and in *Italy, esp. in the *Longobard territories and along the via Flaminia and the via Amerina. At Dijon, France, *Clovis had a church built in his honor; from the 14th c. in Germany, at Remagen, S of Bonn, the local mount of St. Apollinaris became a place of pilgrimage.

BHL 623-632; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 737-748; E. Will, Saint Apollinaire de Ravenne, Paris 1936; G. Lucchesi, Note agiografiche sui primi vescovi di Ravenna, Faenza 1941; BS 2, 239-248; G. Orioli, La "Vita sancti Apolenaris" di Ravenna e gli antecedenti storici dell'organizzazione ecclesiastica ravennate: Apollinaris 59 (1986) 63-108; G. Binazzi, Orso, Cassiano, Apollinare. Appunti sulla diffusione dei culti al seguito delle milizie: RomBarb 9 (1986-87) 5-24; E. Morini, Santi orientali a Ravenna, in Storia di Ravenna, 2/2: Dall'età bizantina all'età ottoniana. Ecclesiologia, cultura e arte, Venice 1992, 283-303; G. Ropa, Agiografia e liturgia a Ravenna tra alto e basso Medioevo, in Storia di Ravenna, 3: Dal Mille alla fine della signoria polentana, Venice 1993, 341-393; R. Benericetti, Il

Pontificale di Ravenna. Studio critico, Faenza 1994; G.D. Gordini, Giovanni Lucchesi agiologo, in Mons. Giovanni Lucchesi nel decimo anniversario della morte, Faenza 1994; P. Golinelli, Antichi e nuovi culti cittadini al sorgere dei Comuni nel nord-Italia: Hagiographica 1 (1994) 159-180 (esp. 169ff.); G. Arrighi, Il culto di sant'Apollinare in Lucca: Torricelliana 46 (1995) 155-157; N. Orchard, The Medieval Masses in Honour of St Apollinaris of Ravenna: RBen 106 (1996) 172-184; Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico, 1, Turin 1998, 198-200.

V. Milazzo

APOLLINARIS of Valence (d. after 523). Brother of *Avitus of Vienne, related to *Sidonius Apollinaris and perhaps to the emperor Avitus (455), Apollinaris became bishop of Valence (*Gaul) shortly before 492. Participated at the councils of Epaône (517) and *Lyons (516–523); died after that date. Feast 5 October. His Life (BHL 634) dates from the Carolingian period but may preserve reliable information.

L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 1, Paris 1907, 210-218; DHGE 3,982-986; Vies des SS., Paris 1952, vol. 10, 114-117; BS 2,249-250; M. Heinzelmann, Clovis dans le discours hagiographique du VI^e au IX^e siècle, in Clovis chez les historiens. Études réunies par O. Guyotjeannin (= Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes 154 [1996]), 87-112.

V. Saxer

APOLLONIA (d. 249). In HE 6,41,7, *Eusebius of Caesarea mentions a letter of *Dionysius, bishop of *Alexandria, to *Fabius of *Antioch. It tells of the violence suffered by the city's faithful in the wake of a sudden anti-Christian revolt that broke out a year before the persecution of *Decius. It gives particular attention to Apollonia, a woman "already advanced in age," who, threatened with being burned alive "if she did not proclaim impious words with them," spontaneously threw herself into the flames, shocking the bystanders.

Her cult is first attested in the East, then in the West, where a legend spread that she was the daughter of a *Roman senator and victim of *Julian the Apostate. She is represented in *iconography with a pliers holding a tooth, in reference both to Dionysius's account (Apollonia, before throwing herself into the fire, was repeatedly struck on the jaw until she lost all her teeth) and to the legend that Julian the Apostate himself tortured her by pulling out her teeth. Her feast is 9 February in the Roman Martyrology.

BHL 638-642d; DHGE 3, 1008; BS 2,258-267; M.P. van Buijtenen - A.K. de Meijer, Westbroeks heiligen in polderperspectief, Nijmegen 1981; M. Natoli, L'agiografia come disciplina storica: introduzione per un discorso sui santi di Ariccia: Atti dell'Accademia degli Sfaccendati 3 (1997) 48-54; Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico 1, Turin 1998, 200-201.

V. Milazzo

APOLLONIUS (d. ca. 185). *Martyr and perhaps *apologist. According to the Acts regarding him, which contain reliable information, Apollonius appeared at* Rome before the praetorian prefect Perennes, ca. 185. In a second audience, after defending himself in the presence of senators and educated people, he was condemned to death by virtue of a senatorial decree that denied legal existence to Christians. Died 11 April. An adaptation of the Acts makes Perennes a proconsul of *Asia and confuses the martyr with the Apollos of Acts 18:24. *Eusebius of Caesarea reports a summary of the Acts of his martyrdom in HE 5,21,2-5. He was almost certainly a philosopher, perhaps a senator, who during his interrogation at Rome defended himself with arguments like those of the apologists. The entire *hagiographical dossier (also complicated by the presence of numerous other Apolloniuses) raises many historical, legal and literary problems, esp. concerning the involvement of the Roman Senate, before whom Apollonius was supposedly called to defend himself by Perennes. Also discussed is the drafting of a true and proper Apology by Apollonius, supposedly combined with other documents in the martyrium.

BHG 149; BHO 79; Eusebius, HE 5,21; Rufinus, HE 5,21,2-5; Delehaye PM, 92-99; G. Lazzati, Gli sviluppi della letteratura sui martiri nei quattro primi secoli, Turin 1956, 39-42; G. Lanata, Gli atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 145-157; E. Griffe, Les Acts du martyr Apollonius et le problème de la base juridique des persécutions: Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 53 (1952) 65-76; C. Tibiletti, Gli "Atti di Apollonio" e Tertulliano: Atti dell'Accademia delle Scienze di Turin, cl. mor., 99 (1964-1965) 295-337; V. Saxer, Martyrium Apollonii Romani: analyse structurelle et problèmes d'authenticité: Rend. PARA 55-56 (1982-1984) 265-298; V. Saxer, L'Apologie au Sénat du martyr romain Apollonius: Mélange de l'Ecole française de Rome, Antiquité 96 (1984) 1017-1038; Il grande libro dei Santi. Dizionario enciclopedico 1, Turin 1998, 201-204.

V. Saxer - V. Milazzo

APOLLONIUS of Ephesus (late 2nd-early 3rd(?) c.). Author of an anti-*Montanist treatise, probably in one book, cited by *Eusebius (HE V, 18,2.3.4.5.6-10.11), in which he deeply examines Montanist prophecies to prove their insubstantiality (Eus., HE V, 18,1) and denounces the reprehensible morals that he attributes to exponents of the movement. Apollonius wrote 40 years after Montanus had started preaching (Eus., HE V, 18,12), which according to Eusebius was in 172–173: thus Apollonius wrote in 212. This date seems late given the vigor with which Apollonius opposes the sect's leaders, esp. a prophetess who seems to be *Maximilla (Eus., HE V, 18,6-10). Perhaps the figure of 40 years is erroneous, or perhaps Apollonius argued with Maximilla as though she were still alive. According to *Jerome (Vir. ill. 40), *Tertullian wrote book VII of his lost treatise On Ecstasy against Apollonius.

P. de Labriolle, Les sources de l'histoire du montanisme, Paris-Fribourg 1913, 78-82; DHGE 3, 1013-1014; Cath 1,710; LTK[3] 1, 831.

F. Scorza Barcellona

APOLLONIUS of Tyana (4–96). Neo-Pythagorean philosopher (1st c. AD), known to us through a sometimes-romanticized biography written by Flavius Philostratus at the request of Julia Domna, wife of *Septimius Severus and mother of *Caracalla. Studied at *Tarsus, traveled to Babylon and India and was then at *Rome, from where he was expelled by *Nero. Returning to *Italy, he died under Nerva. Apollonius believed in a supreme transcendent god, clearly distinguished from the minor deities. Famous as a *magician: the *pagans considered him sent by God, a kind of pagan Christ to whom miracles and prophecies were attributed. *Temples were built to him, and he was honored as a god. Christian writers (*Ambrose, *Augustine, *Sidonius Apollinaris) speak of him with respect.

D. Ghezzi, A. di Tiana nella storia e nella leggenda, Rome 1910; M. Dzielska, Apollonius of Tyana, Rome 1986; V. Longo, Apollonio di Tiana: taumaturgo o ciarlatano?: AALig 54 (1997) 413-422; A.M. Reimer, Miracle and Magic: A Study in the Acts of the Apostles and the life of Apollonius of Tyana, Sheffield 2002.

L. Navarra

APOLOGISTS – APOLOGETIC (general characteristics)

I. The Greek and Latin apologists - II. Common characteristics - III. The two tendencies.

I. The Greek and Latin apologists. Name given to the writers who defended Christianity against accusations coming from various parts of non-Christian society, which at times erupted in *persecution. Today their work would be considered "fundamental theology." Similar Jewish writings (*Philo, Contra Apionem) were models of the early Christian "apologies," since up to a certain period *pagan aversion to Christianity was simply part of their aversion to *Judaism. The apologies in a certain sense substituted for the forensic defense that *Roman authorities did not allow to *confessors and *martyrs; the literary model was often *Plato's Apology of Socrates. Apologetic literature in the territory of the *Roman Empire flourished in the 2nd-3rd c. but also continued after the "*Constantinian revolution." The apologists recalled the right of the *philosopher to parrēsia with respect to the emperor and had in mind always not only the defense of the faith ad extra, i.e., the instruction of non-Christians (in the case of a petition to the emperor, in the hope of its publication by the imperial chancellery in the portico of *Trajan's baths), but also *catechesis ad intra, i.e., the encouragement of the faithful, such that many apologetic arguments are found in other genres of Christian literature: homilies, legends about the martyrs, etc.

The first authors of apologies, from the 2nd c., are *Quadratus (125-126; CPG 1060), *Aristides (between 124-140; CPG 1062) and *Justin (153-155; CPG 1073), *Miltiades (under *Marcus Aurelius: Eusebius, HE 5,17,5), *Apollinaris of Hierapolis (under Marcus Aurelius: ibid., 4,26,1), *Melito of Sardis (171-172 or 176: CPG 1093,1-2) and *Athenagoras (Supplicatio pro Christianis, 177; CPG 1070). The *philosophical backdrop of these authors was *Middle Platonism. The proliferation of apologies under Marcus Aurelius is an indication of the increasingly hostile policy of the Roman authorities toward the new religion, which seemed to be causing the decline of the empire. This spawned a literary polemic (*Lucian of Samosata, De morte Peregrini; *Fronto of Cirta [ca. 162–164]; esp. the first systematic criticism of *Celsus, Alethes Logos [176–180 or early 3rd c.?]), to which the Christians responded. They no longer addressed the emperors, but pagan society ("To the Greeks"). The protagonists were *Tatian, Justin's disciple (Oratio ad Graecos, held in Rome 165–172 or in Athens 176/77; CPG 1104), *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autolycum after 180; CPG 1107), the anonymous author of the *Letter to Diognetus (200?; CPG 1112), *Clement of Alexandria (various writings late 2nd c.; CPG 1375-1377), ps.-*Justin (Oratio ad Graecos, first half 3rd c.; CPG 1082), *Hermias (Gentilium philosophorum irrisio, ca. 200; CPG 1113), *Tertullian (Ad nationes/Apologeticum, 197; CPL 2, 3), *Minucius Felix (Octavius after 197 [depends on Tertullian's Apologeticum]; CPL 37), *Cyprian of Carthage (Ad Donatum, ca. 245; CPL 38; Ad Demetrianum, 253; CPL 46), ps.-Cyprian (Quod idola dii non sint, ca. 350; CPL 57), *Commodian (Instructiones and Carmen apologeticum ca. 251-260 in N *Africa or at Rome (?); CPL 1470-1471) and *Origen (Contra Celsum, 245-248; CPG 1476). *Porphyry the *Neopla-tonist, who knew Origen of Caesarea Maritima, wrote antiquity's most intense anti-Christian polemic, probably after 270 in Sicily (Contra Christianos). Against him wrote the Greeks *Methodius of Olympus (CPG 1818), *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Apollinaris of Laodicea (CPG 3672) and *Diodore of Tarsus, and the Latins *Arnobius of Sicca (Adversus Nationes, ca. 302–305; CPL 93), *Lactantius (Divinae Institutiones; CPL 85), *Firmicus Maternus (De errorum profanarum religionum; CPL 102), *Augustine (De Civitate Dei; CPL 313) and *Pacatus (410–430; CPL 1152a).

From the early 4th c. various propagandistic writings justify the anti-Christian measures of the emperors (Fiedrowicz 79-81). A new type of apology appeared in this period, more systematic and complete: Lactantius (Div. Inst., 304-311), Eusebius (various writings, esp. Praeparatio Evangelica and Demonstratio Evangelica; CPG 3485-3488), *Marcellus of Ancyra (Cohortatio ad Graecos, ca. 312–322; CPG 1083), *Athanasius of Alexandria (Contra Gentes and De incarnatione Verbi, before or during his exile at Trier 335–337; CPG 2090-2091) and Firmicus Maternus (Err., 346 c.) describe the truth of the Christian religion, which is no longer prohibited, in the context of the pluralism of the traditional religions. *Julian the Apostate (361–363), seeing in the Christians only a barbarous sect, tried to restore the traditional cults with Neoplatonic arguments, provoking with his Contra Galilaeos a new series of apologies written by *Ephrem the Syrian (Contra Iulianum 363; CSCO 174/175), *Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 4-5 contra Iulianum, 364–365; CPG 3010), *Theodore of Mopsuestia (a reply, ca. 380), *John Chrysostom (De Babyla contra Iulianum et gentiles, 378/379; CPG 4348) and *Cyril of Alexandria (Contra Iulianum between 423–428; CPG 5233). Also noteworthy is *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's refutation of *Hellenism (Graecarum affectionum curatio, 420-423; CPG 6210). In the late 4th c. at Rome the pagan opposition was led by the aristocracy; well known are the interventions of *Symmachus and *Ambrose (and later of *Prudentius) in the controversy over the Altar of Victory in the curia. The last phase of apologetics was fomented by the sack of Rome in 410 and the presumed "failure" of the Christian religion. Apologies then responded to the question, why couldn't the Christian cult guarantee the well-being of the city? On the matter, Augustine (De Civitate Dei, 413–426; CPL 313) and *Orosius (Historiae adversum paganos, 416-417; CPL 571) developed a vast interpretation of world history on theological bases.

II. Common characteristics. Apologetic literature documents the effort of a group of Christian intellectuals to defend their religion from attacks by cultured pagans, popular accusations and persecutions by imperial or local authorities. Their cultural level is generally that of their time. On the whole, these texts present to us a Christian community animated by sincere faith, whose best-educated elements enthusiastically and courageously take on the defense of calumniated and persecuted fellow believers, with the more or less clear intention of gaining "those who are far off" from the gospel. The sincerity, morality, religiosity and political loyalty of the Christians are used as arguments, as well as the philosophical rationality, originality, antiquity and missionary success of Christianity, which are all based on the unique human-divine character of Jesus Christ.

III. The two tendencies. The apologists are distinguished according to the different attitudes they assume vis-à-vis the policies and culture of the pagan world they oppose by both defense and debate. Aristides, Melito, Justin and Athenagoras among the Greeks, and Minucius Felix among the Latins, seek to build a bridge with pagan institutions and culture, in which they acknowledge elements of truth which they attribute to the intervention of divine *providence. Conversely Tatian, Hermias, Tertullian and Arnobius of Sicca are unsparing in their attack on every aspect of paganism. Lactantius, while consciously rejecting philosophy, takes another tone. Each author displays a different culture, interests and style while making use, with more or less success, of the means of expression of the classical tradition in which they were formed.

RAC 19, 801-873; LACL 3, 50-51; M. Schanz - C. Hosius, Geschichte der römischen Literatur, Munich [3]1922, 245-260; M. Stern, Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism 1-3, Jerusalem 1974-1984; W.J. Malley, Hellenism and Christianity, Rome 1978; G. Rinaldi, Biblia Gentium. Primo contributo per un indice delle citazioni, dei riferimenti e delle allusioni alla Bibbia negli autori pagani, greci e latini, di età imperiale, Rome 1989; P. Pilhofer, Presbyteron kreitton. Der Altersbeweis der jüdischen und christlichen Apologeten und seine Vorgeschichte, Tübingen 1990; Quasten 1, 166-223; S. Krauss - W. Horbury, The Jewish-Christian Controversy 1, Tübingen 1995; O. Limor - G.G. Stroumsa, Contra Iudaeos: Ancient and Medieval Polemics between Christians and Jews, Tübingen 1996; H.R. Drobner, Patrologia, Casale Monferrato 1998, 123-147; K. Schneider, Studien zur Entfaltung der altkirchlichen Theologie der Auferstehung, Bonn 1999; Ph.F. Esler (ed.), The Early Christian World, 2, London-New York 2000, 840-889; J. Lehnen, Zwischen Abkehr und Hinwendung. Äußerungen christlicher Autoren des 2. und 3. Jahrhunderts zu Staat und Herrscher, in R. von Haehling (ed.), Rom und das himmlische Jerusalem, Darmstadt 2000, 1-28; K. Rosen, Von der Torheit für die Heiden zur wahren Philosophie.

Soziale und geistige Voraussetzungen der christlichen Apologetik des 2. Jahrhunderts, ibid., 124-151; M. Fiedrowicz, Apologie im frühen Christentum, Paderborn 2000; H.E. Lona, An Diognet, Freiburg 2001; L. Tanganagba, Miracle comme argumentum fidei chez saint Augustin, Bonn 2002.

M. PELLEGRINO - S. HEID

APONIUS (6th c.). Passed down under this name, thought to be *Roman, is an Expositio in Canticum Canticorum. The author's exact biographical data are unknown. There are allusions in the texts to military invasions. The author shows an interest in *monastic life. Allusions to *Chalcedonian faith indicate the work cannot have been composed before 450; comparison of his interpretation of Song with 6th-c. exegesis recommends a dating after 500. Inspired by previous models (*Origen, ps.-*Hippolytus) and based on a fair level of theological and philosophical education, Aponius's commentary merits study, both from the perspective of the history of *exegesis (concept of salvation history; spiritual vision of union between Christ and the soul) and regarding its *Christology, according to which Jesus' soul, definitively united to the Word at the moment of crucifixion, found an eminent place (see esp. Lib. IX, with Song 6:8-11). It also contains a pneumatology (*Holy Spirit) of some interest. The work's influence cannot have been great, however. *Gregory the Great and *Bede the Venerable knew the work; in the 9th c. a shortened form of 12 homilies was produced.

CPL 194 (bibl.); CCL 19; SC 420, 421, 430; LTK³ 1, 887; LACL (2002) 54; B. Jaspert, "Stellvertreter Christi" bei Aponius, einem unbekannten "Magister" und Benedikt von Nursia: ZThK 71 (1974) 219-334 (bibl.); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, I, London ²1975, 384-388 (bibl.); P. Hamblenne, Peut-on dater Aponius?: RTAM 57 (1990) 5-33; B. Stubenrauch, Der heilige Geist bei Aponius, Freiburg 1991; H. König, Die Auslegung zum Lied der Lieder, Freiburg 1992; P. Hamblenne, Le monde d'Apponius: Euphrosyne 20 (1992) 211-230; 25 (1997) 171-205; Id., Deux métaphores apponiennes: (In Cant. III, l. 92 s. et IX, l. 110-112): SE 39 (2000) 21-35; Id., Apponius: le moment, une patrie: Augustinianum 41 (2001) 425-464.

B. STUDER

APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM. The apophthegmata, or Paterika, of the Fathers are collections of reflections and anecdotes that are the fruit of the spiritual experience in the desert. The number of collections, their rapid spread from the 4th c., their continual enrichment, their translation first into *Latin, *Coptic and *Syriac; then into *Armenian and *Georgian; and finally into Arabic, Ethiopian and Palaeoslavonic has thus far rendered vain any attempt at genealogy. Basic work has been done in some fields of research; others remain almost entirely unexplored, even at the MSS level. The first attempt at a classification was by W. Bousset (Apophthegmata. Studien zur Geschichte des ältesten Mönchtums, Tübingen 1923). Since then the bibliography has reached considerable size. Due to space, we will limit ourselves to indicating the main publications, by language.

Greek: alphabetical collection. According to PG 65, 76-440, to be supplemented by the collection of MS Coislin Greek 126, published by F. Nau in a series of articles in the "Revue de l'Orient Chrétien" from 1907–1909, supplemented by J.C. Guy, Recherches sur la tradition grecque des Apophthegmata Patrum, Brussels 1962, who distinguishes, among other things, between the systematic collection and the derived collection. Also Coislin 127, which contains the largest collection known to date. Also important are *Palladius's Historia Lausiaca, ed. Dom Cuthbert Butler, Cambridge 1904; the Historia monachorum in Aegypto, ed. A.J. Festugière, Brussels 1961; the Scala Paradisi of *John Climacus, PG 88, 677-781; the Pratum spiritualis of *John Moschus, PG 87, 3,2852-3112; the Spiritual Works of *Dorotheus of Gaza, ed. L. Regnault, Paris 1963 (SC 92); and finally the huge compilation of Paulus Evergetinos, published at Athens in 4 vols., 1957–1968. The sayings are rearranged and modified in every collection.

Latin. Though old, Rosweyde's compilation, Vitae Patrum, Anvers 1628, remains exhaustive. Reproduced in PL 73, its 10 parts are attributed to *Jerome, *Rufinus, *John Cassian, *Pelagius, *John (deacon), *Paschasius of Dumium, *Palladius, *Theodoret and *John Moschus, plus appendixes. A critical edition of Paschasius's collection was produced by J.G. Freire, A versão latina por Pascasio de Dume dos Apophthegmata Patrum, 2 vols., Coimbra 1971; the collection is from the 7th c. That of Paschasius and John is derived from the Greek systematic collection. Finally, Freire found a 5th-c. Latin collection: Commonitiones sanctorum Patrum. Una nova colleção de apotegmas, Coimbra 1974.

Syriac. Three types of collections have been brought together by P. Bedjan in vol. 7 of the Acta Martyrum (Paris 1897), fully used by Bousset. The oldest testimonies have been classified in two works published by R. Draguet: Les cinq recensions de l'Ascéticon syriaque d'Abba Isaïe, CSCO, v. 189, 290, 293 and 294, script. Syri 120-124 (Louvain 1968); Les formes syriaques de la matière de l'Histoire Lausiaque, CSCO, v. 389, 390, 398 and 399, script. Syri 169, 170, 173 and 174 (Louvain 1978).

Coptic. A. Guillaumont, L'ascéticon copte de l'Abbé Isaïe, Cairo 1956. The complete Coptic and Syriac sayings have been studied for over a century: Coptic text and Fr. tr. in É. Amélineau, Histoire des monastères de la Basse-Égypte. Vies des saints Paul, Antoine, Macaire . . ., Paris 1894; M. Chaîne, Le manuscrit de la version Copte . . . Sahidique des "Apophthegmata Patrum," Cairo 1960; with intr., Coptic text and It. tr. Paolo di Tamma, Opere, ed. T. Orlandi, Rome 1988; for the life and fragments of *Pachomius in Coptic: Appendix, La Règle de St. Pachôme, fragments coptes, in Pachomiana Latina, eds. A. Boon - L. Lefort, Louvain 1932; Les vies coptes de St. Pachôme et de ses premiers successeurs, ed. L. Lefort, Louvain 1943; Oeuvres de St. Pachôme et de ses disciples, ed. Id., Louvain 1956, CSCO Coptici 23-24; Le vie de St. Pachôme selon la tradition copte, ed. A. Veilleux, Abbaye de Bellefontaine 1984 (Greek lives edited by F. Halkin, Brussels 1932, SH 19; Pachomius's Athens corpus in BHG 1396a, 1399a and 1397, Geneva 1982). For the Syriac versions: E. Budge, The Paradise of the Holy Fathers, I-II, 1907, repr. Washington 1984; Id., The Syrian Version of the "Apophthegmata Patrum" by 'Ânân Îsho' of Bêth-'Âbhê, Oxford-London 1924; R. Draguet, La Vie primitive de St. Antoine conservée en syriaque, Louvain 1980 (CSCO 418), 104-112; L. Abramowski, Vertritt die syrische Fassung die ursprüngliche Gestalt der Vita Antonii*?*, in Mélanges A. Guillaumont, Geneva 1988, 47-56; R. Lorenz, Die griechische Vita Antonii des Athanasius und ihre syrische Fassung: ZKG 100 (1989), 77-84.

Armenian. The Mekhitarists of Venice published two volumes of compilations in the last century, which have been translated into a literal Latin by L. Leloir, Paterica armenica a PP. Mechitaristis edita (1855) nunc latine reddita, in CSCO, vols. 353 and 361 (Louvain 1974 and 1975). Urgently needed investigation of the MSS has not yet begun. There are some collections that were not used in 1855, e.g., at the end of the Girk^c Tghtoc^c (Tbilisi 1901), 510-525.

Georgian. Several types of collections have been published by M. Dvali in Šua saukunet^{c}a novelebis jveli k^{c}art^c uli t^{c}argmanebi, vol. 1 (Tbilisi 1966), vol. 2 (Tbilisi 1974).

Arabic. The Arabic tradition of the letters of St. *Anthony (already published in PG 40, 972-1066 and translated by A. Louf, Saint Antoine, Lettres, Abb. Bellefontaine 1976) has been studied by S. Rubenson, The Arabic Version of the Letters of St. Antony, in Actes du deuxième congrès international d'études arabes chrétiennes, Rome 1986 (OCA 226) and M. El-Maskîne, St. Antoine ascète selon l'Évangile, suivi de les vingt Lettres de st. Antoine selon la tradition arabe, Abb. Bellefontaine 1993.

In the last quarter-century scholars have also researched the rich spirituality of the desert fathers (and mothers) from different angles, with publications on the theme multiplying, whether scientific—as those of J. Pollok, The Present State of Studies on the Apophthegmata Patrum, in The Spirituality of Ancient Monasticism, Krakow 1995, 79-89, F. Dodel, Das Sitzen der Wünstenväter: eine Untersuchung anhand der Apophthegmata Patrum, Freiburg 1997, Paradosis 42, or B. Müller, Der Weg des Weinens: die Tradition des "Penthos" in den Apophthegmata Patrum, Göttingen 2000, Forschung zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte 77, containing among other things a rich bibliography—or more popular but also rigorous such as that of M. Driot, Les pères du désert. Vie et spiritualité, Paris 1991, It. tr. Cinisello B. (Mi) 1993, and the collections of L. Mortari, Vita e detti dei Padri del Deserto, I-II, Rome 1985, [3]1990, or L. Cremaschi, Vita di Antonio, Apoftegmi, Lettere, Cinisello B. (Mi) 1984; Id., Detti inediti dei Padri del deserto, Bose 1986; Id., La Parola e la preghiera nei Padri del deserto: Parole di Vita 2 (1989), 48-55, or of H. Hanakam, Antonios der Grosse, Stern der Wüste, Freiburg i.B. 1989, besides the new critical editions of the texts, among which stands out the systematic collection of sayings with French translation edited for Sources Chrétiennes by J.-C. Guy, Les Apophtegmes des Pères: collection systématique. Chapp. I-IX, Paris 1993, SC 387. In the same series is also a recent critical edition with French translation of the Vita Antonii of St. *Athanasius (already in PG 26, 835-978 and translated into German in the Bibliothek der Kirchenväter 31, Munich 1917, and by A. Gottfried, Athanasius, Vita Antonii, Graz 1987; the anonymous Latin version has been critically edited and translated in Vita di Antonio, intr. C. Mohrmann, ed. and comm. G.J.M. Bartelink, Milan 1974): Athanase d'Alexandrie, Vie d'Antoine, ed. G.J.M. Bartelink, Paris 1994, SC 400, ed., prefaced and prepared by Id., Die literarische Gattung der Vita Antonii*: Struktur und Motive*: VC 36 (1982) 38-62. See A. de Vogüé, La Vie de St. Antoine, in Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'antiquité, I, Paris 1991, 17-80; Id., The Specificity of Christian Monasticism: The Life of St. Antony: Monastic Studies 19 (1991) 23-32. Other works of individual fathers have been edited and translated in the SC, e.g., those of Cassian (already in PL 49-50): Jean Cassien, Institutions, ed. J.-C. Guy, Paris 1965, SC 109; Conférences, ed. E. Pichéry, Paris 1955–1959, SC 42-54-64, or of Evagrius: Evagre le Pontique, Traité pratique ou le moine, eds. A. and C. Guillaumont, I-II, Paris 1971, SC 170-171; Le gnostique, ed. Id., Paris 1989, SC 356. On Evagrius, published in German are Evagriuss Pontikos, Briefe aus der Wüste, ed. G. Bunge, Trier 1986, Sophia 24, and Über die acht Gedanken, ed. Id., Würzburg 1992. The Centurie of Callistus and Ignatius, the Greek text of which are in PG 147, 635-812, have been translated by A. Rosenberg, Das Herzensgebet . . . die Centurie der Mönche Kallistus und Ignatius, Munich-Planegg 1955. We have now the critical text of Palladius's Historia Lausiaca of G.J.M. Bartelink, with It. tr. and intr., Milan [4]1990, besides the translation by J. Laager, Zürich 1987. Useful are the lexicographic tools of P. Miquel, Lexique du désert, Abb. Bellefontaine 1986, and Le vocabulaire de l'expérience dans la tradition patristique, Paris 1989. V. Arras published the Ethiopic collections in CSCO, 238, 239 and 277, 278 (Louvain 1963, 1967). Finally W. Veder began a better classification of the Slavonic collections, later completed by M. Capaldo, L'azbučnoierusalimskij Paterik: Polata k'nigopic'naja 4 (1981) 26-75. A coherent genealogical tree of all the translations, including the Sogdian version, still awaits.

Les Apophtegmes des Pères du désert, Abbaye de Bellefontaine 1966; P.F. Anson, Partir au désert, Paris 1967; S. Frank, Mönche im frühchristlichen Ägypten, Düsseldorf 1967; Abbé Isaïe, Recueil ascétique, intr. L. Regnault, Abb. Bellefontaine 1970; Les Sentences des Pères du désert, II-III, eds. L. Regnault - Moines de Solesmes, Solesmes 1970-76; Athanase, Vie et conduite de notre père st. Antoine, intr. G. Couilleau, Abb. Bellefontaine 1979; G. Vannucci, Le parole dei Padri del deserto, Florence 1979; I. Hausherr, Solitude et vie contemplative d'après l'hésychasme, Abb. Bellefontaine 1980; Palladius, Histoire Lausiaque, Paris 1981; N. Russell, The Lives of the Desert Fathers, London-Oxford 1981; E. Brunner, Die Kopten, Cologne 1982; H. Bacht, Das Vermächtnis des Ursprungs, II: Pachomius, Würzburg 1983; B. Outtier et al., Lettres des Pères du Désert, Abb. Bellefontaine 1985; Les Sentences des Pères du désert. Série des anonymes, ed. L. Regnault, Abb. Bellefontaine and Solesmes 1985; F.S. Pericoli Ridolfini, Il lavoro nelle più antiche fonti monastiche (Vita di Antonio e fonti pacomiane), in Spiritualità del lavoro, ed. S. Felici, Rome 1986, 141-150; B. Miller, Weisung der Väter. Apophthegmata Patrum, Trier [3]1986; Spiritualität des frühen Mönchtums, Erlangen 1988; G.J.M. Bartelink, Les rapports entre le monachisme égyptien et l'épiscopat d'Alexandrie, in Alexandrina. Mélanges C. Mondésert, Paris 1987, 365-379; G.M. Colombo, Il monachesimo delle origini, Milan [2]1990; L. Regnault, La vie quotidienne des pères du désert, Paris 1990, It. tr. Casale Monferrato 1994; S. Rubenson, The Letters of St. Anthony, Origenist Theology, Monastic Tradition, Lund 1990; T. Špidlík, East Syrian Asceticism, in East Syrian Spirituality, ed. A. Thottakkara, Bangalore 1990, 129-142; L.W. Barnard, Asceticism in Early Syriac Christianity, in Monastic Studies, II, ed. J. Loades, Bangor 1991, 13-21; H. Brunner, Die Weisheitsbücher der Ägypter, Zürich-Munich 1991; Les chemins de Dieu au désert. Collection systématique des apophthegmes, ed. L. Regnault, Solesmes 1992; H. Holz, Erfahrung und Theologie im frühen Mönchtum, Göttingen 1992; S. Abouzayd, Ihidayutha: A Study of the Life of Singleness in the Syrian Orient, Aram, Oxford 1993; G.J.M. Bartelink, Les apophthegmes des pères, VC 47 (1993) 390-397; D. Burton-Christie, The Word in the Desert, New York-Oxford 1993; G.E. Gould, The Desert Fathers on Monastic Community, Oxford 1993; H. Holze, Schrifterfahrung und Christuserkenntnis im pachomianischen Mönchtum: TZ 49 (1993) 54-65; K. Koch, Geschichte der ägyptischen Religion, Stuttgart-Berlin-Cologne 1993; P. Miquel et al., Déserts Chrétiens d'Égypte, Nice 1993; K. Rudolph, Das frühe Christentum in Ägypten: Riggisberger Berichte 1 (1993) 21-31; P. Sloterduk, Weltfremdheit, Frankfurt a.M. 1993; K. Vogt, Ascétisme féminin en Égypte aux IV[e] et V[e] siècles: Le Monde Copte 21-22 (1993) 107-113; E. Dassmann, Christusnachfolge durch Weltflucht. Asketische Motive im frühchristlichen Mönchtum Ägyptens, in A. Gerhards - H. Brakmann, Die Koptische Kirche, Stuttgart-Berlin-Cologne 1994, 28-45; The Spirituality of Ancient Monasticism, ed. M. Starowieysky, Krakow 1995, 163-181; G.G. Gould, The Influence of Origen on IV[th] Century Monasticism, in Origeniana VI, Louvain 1995, 591-598; S.H. Griffith, Asceticism in the Church of Syria, in Asceticism, ed. W.L. Wimbush, New York 1995, 220-248; H. Holze, Anapausis in anachoretischen Mönchtum: ZKG 106 (1995) 1-17.

I. Ramelli

APOSTASY – APOSTATES. Early Christians were accused of apostasy against Jewish and pagan society. As deniers of Jewish religion and classical paideia, before the edict of *Constantine they were considered a tertium genus between Jews and *pagans, i.e., those who had burned their bridges with the mos maiorum of both. Alongside this meaning of apostasy, common in early *apologetic literature (adversus iudaeos and adversus paganos), there was also an application within Christianity itself: those who denied the Christian faith or the discipline of the Christian life. Thus the lapsi (*lapsed) were considered apostate, i.e., those who had failed in the struggle for the faith, divided in 3rd-c. *Africa into three categories: sacrificati (who offered a cup of wine as a libation); thurificati (who offered incense to the gods); and libellatici (from libellum = certified or attested as having complied with orders—many such certifications have been discovered, including in Egypt). In some cases attestation was sought even by those who were not publicly apostate. A fourth category was added during the persecution of Diocletian, traditores (from tradere = to hand over, i.e., those who handed over the sacred books to the authorities). A focus of attention during the *donatist polemic, traditores were equated with murderers and fornicators (moechi et adulteri in *Tertullian's De pudicitia) regarding their readmission to ecclesial *communion. The question of apostates was thus tied closely to *penitential discipline—whether or not to readmit them and how. Later, the term meant more generally the abandonment or public denial of Christianity and adherence to a *heretical sect.

S. Hübner, Kirchenbusse und Exkommunication bei Cyprian: ZKTh 84 (1962) 49-84, 171-215; M. Simon, Verus Israel, Paris [2]1964; A. Portolano, Il dramma dei lapsi nell'epistolario di Cipriano, Napoli 1972; Ch. Mohrmann, Tertium genus (= Études IV), Rome 1977, 195-210.

V. Grossi

APOSTLE – APOSTOLATE
I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. The Greek term in general means "one who is sent," a messenger; its specifically Christian use obviously referred to one who announces a religious message. Clearly the concept of "apostle" had a particular connotation within Christian parlance. If the historical expansion of the church must be attributed to the apostles, then the term must be applied to a wide group of missionaries, of whom many are little more than a name and many completely anonymous.

Initially this term was linked to the world of the apocalyptic representations of the primitive community (see Mt 19:28; Lk 22:28-30), where the Twelve represent the true Israel of the righteous, in symbolic contraposition to the twelve tribes of Israel (Rev 21:14). It seems that by the time of *Paul's frst trip to *Jerusalem to visit the "apostles" (Gal 1:17ff.), the institution of the Twelve was already in existence. Confirming this are the lists of the Twelve (Mt 10:2-16; Mk 3:16-19; Lk 6:14-16; Acts 1:13), which present historical problems of difficult resolution (Bienert 11). The fact that Judas the traitor originally belonged to the Twelve ("one of the Twelve": see Mt 26:14; Mk 12:10, 20, 43; Lk 22:3; Jn 6:71)—according to Luke's account he was replaced by Matthias (Acts 1:26)—is inescapable evidence in G. Klein's view that the group of the Twelve arose only after Easter. Moreover, the continuity between the pre- and post-Easter communities with Jesus Christ is a true symbol of the elect of the people of God in the last days. From then on this circle had a primary place in apostolic office (Bienert 11-12). At the same time the role of the apostles in the founding of the church will remain connected to the function of the Twelve companions of Jesus. The identification of the apostles with the Twelve attests the interest in rooting the activity of the church in the ministry and intention of Jesus (see Brown 474-480).

The formula "the Twelve" is used particularly by Mark to indicate the closest circle of Jesus' disciples; it is also found in the other Evangelists, including John (see Jn 6:67-71). The Lukan conception of the twelve apostles (Lk 6:13; Act 1:21-22) is the result of a long evolution; its presuppositions are the apostolate attested by Paul and the picture of the Twelve offered by Mk 3:13-19; 6:7-13. An apostle in the strict sense recalls the necessary connection between the paschal event and the prepaschal community of Jesus; thus Luke was unable to designate his beloved and venerated Paul an apostle in this sense (except in Acts 14:4, 14). The connection between the primitive Christian apostle and the prepaschal community of Jesus finds its most clear expression in the notion of the twelve apostles, as though there were an unbreakable link between the concepts "apostle" and "the Twelve." Originally, the two elements seem to have been independent. Paul clearly distinguishes them (1 Cor 15:5-7), and lets it be understood that not every witness of the risen one is also an "apostle" (Bienert 11). Mark presents the Twelve to the missionary church (Mk 13:10; 14:9) as an archetype of missionary preachers (Mk 1:16-20; 3:13-19; 6:6b-13) (see Guenther).

Jesus, therefore, linked the disciples to a mission. He did not recruit them as the rabbis did, but made them charismatic leaders, inspired prophets and itinerant philosophers (see Bovon). We hold Jesus' choosing of the Twelve and their mission in Galilee to be historical fact, though contemporary exegesis disputes it. The group existed at least prior to Paul's conversion (1 Cor 15:5; Act 6:2), which gives us a first characteristic—though varied—overall vision of primitive Christianity. All of this indicates that the concept was not yet precisely fixed and that Paul had received it from the earlier tradition (Gal 1:17, where he mentions the apostles before him). In this context, the apostles at Jerusalem gathered around Cephas/Peter (Gal 1:18-19) represent an already-defined group. In Paul, one can distinguish three levels of meaning. The first level is as delegates of the community (Phil 2:25; 2 Cor 8:23). Second, another specifically Christian concept, but without precise demarcation, is that of "preachers of the gospel," charged by the risen one or by the *Holy Spirit and endowed with special gifts (1 Cor 9:5; cf. Acts 14:4, 14) to work in the world as missionaries. Among these are the so-called super-apostles (2 Cor 11:5; 12:11) and Paul himself, who insistently opposed their claims; in this sense the fraternal relations of Rom 16:7 also assume a positive meaning. It also refers to prophets called and sent by God who speak and work as commissioned by God, with divine powers. We do not know what relation these prophets had with the Jerusalem community or with the earthly Jesus. It is probable that the concept of an apostle as a primitive Christian missionary derived from *Hellenistic Jewish circles. In its later evolution "apostles" and "prophets" came to be considered as on the same level (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 2:20; 3:5; 4:11; Lk 11:49; Did. 11,3-6); Third, with this distinction and the preeminence of the apostles one sees the tendency to limit the apostles to the church's origin and to a specific circle of witnesses of the risen Lord (1 Cor 15:1-11). In Paul, a personal encounter with the risen Lord becomes the most important criterion (1 Cor 9:1; 15:8) (Bienert 9-11).

Decisive for Luke (see Acts 1:21-22) is the fact that an apostle had accompanied the earthly Jesus from his *baptism by John until the *ascension. He would certainly also be a witness to his *resurrection, as Paul claims; but Luke does not speak of a mandate on the part of the risen Lord. Clearly Luke's interest is that a close group of eyewitnesses, without gaps, would represent historical certainty; with this idea Luke limits the concept of apostle to a particular historical period (Bienert 12-13). Regarding his readers, Luke's objective with the term ἀπόστολος is not so much a clear definition or numerical limitation of the circle of persons thus designated but the knowledge that, in this circle's narrative-kerygmatic capacity, there is a faithful testimony of historical facts and a personal credibility (see Haacker 9-38). Luke's merit is to have raised to a literary level a tradition that until then was only oral and popular. He had received a twofold inheritance: the Petrine tradition of foundation, and the Pauline tradition of mission (see Bovon 240). Beyond the sharply differing concepts offered by Luke and Paul of the concept of an early Christian apostle, the term is found only rarely in the NT, though with distinctive accents. The prescriptions of 1–2 Pet are similar to the Pauline and deutero-Pauline. 2 Pet 3:2 also mentions "your apostles," without further specification. 2 Pet 3:15 already indicates an effort, continued by 1 Clem 5 and Ign. Rom. 4,3 to present Peter and Paul together as the two most important apostolic authorities. Heb 3:1 offers a unique accent, designating only Christ himself as an "apostle" and not speaking of the others (Bienert 13).

The notion that an apostle of Jesus Christ can only be one who has seen the risen Lord (1 Cor 9:1; 15:7-9; Gal 1:15-17) later came to prevail, to the point of eliminating the earlier concept of itinerant preachers sent by the communities (found in Acts 14:4, 14). In the post-Pauline period, Paul's idea of an apostle prevailed completely in the conception of the Twelve as apostles to the *pagans (Mt 28:18-20; Acts 1:8). Eph 2:20 and Rev 21:14 find their echo in Luke.

Did. 11,3.4.6. also knows of itinerant apostles, called to mission by the Spirit and legitimated only by their message and conduct. 1 Clem. and *Polycarp know the apostle only as an institution of the past. Barn. (5,9-10; 8,3-4) presupposes the establishment of the apostolate in Jesus' lifetime, but without limiting it to the Twelve. For *Hermas (Vis. III, 5,1) the apostles already belong to the past; except in Sim. IX, 17,2 he always cites them together with teachers—thus an open conception of an apostle, not limited in number. Thus, in the 2nd c. there were three ways of understanding the apostles: (1) *Jewish Christian, according to which the apostles come to be, after Jesus himself, the point of departure of a chain of tradition (*Papias, Polycarp, *Polycrates). *Irenaeus would later systematically express the idea of an apostolic tradition. (2) Hellenizing, which tends to a spiritual vision of the apostles as "divine men," wanderers and wonderworkers. This conception flourished esp. in the apocryphal Acts, producing ecclesiastical traditions at the local level. The Gentile church turned the twelve disciples whom Jesus sent to Israel into apostles to the pagans. Ascens. Is. 3,13-14; Keryg. Petr. (*Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 43,3); *Aristides (Apol. 2); and Ep. Apost. (ca. 30, *Coptic) describe them as missionaries to the world. (3) For *gnostics, the apostles are the initiates of God the revealer. After Christ, they became revealing divinities, opening the way of return to the divine sphere. With the defeat of gnosticism, ecclesiastical tradition on the apostles was not limited to popular stories; not all the stories of the apostles can be dismissed as legend or anecdote. The *parenetic or *kerygmatic tradition was interested in the apostles and in the early communities from the beginning (1 Th 1:9; 1 Cor 15:3-8). According to the ancient ecclesiastical representation, the apostles were not only the guarantee of a trustworthy transmission of the church's ways and doctrine but esp. bearers of the mission and models in their life and death. The gnostic *Heracleon tells that four of the disciples did not die as *martyrs (see Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 71,3) and that this fact prevented the places of apostolic activity from being venerated as the tombs of the apostles (see Tertullian, praescr. haer. 36,1). The missionary charge was from the beginning constitutive of apostolic office, and not only for Paul. The NT missionary mandates (Mt 28:19f.; Lk 24:47f.; Acts 1:8; 10:42) are collected and transmitted by the primitive Christian literature (Didaskalia syriaca; TU 25/2 [1904] 77; Ep. Apost. 30). One should note the peculiar position of the people of Israel within the mandate understood universally (Mt 19:28//Lk 22:30; Barn. 8,3), which was differently expressed through history, highlighting in Jewish Christian circles the preeminence of Israel, and among the pagans the meaning of the apostolic mission; the Kerygma Petrou relates the two stages in this way (Clem. Alex., Strom. VI 5,43). The image was thus spread of the division of the world into twelve parts by the apostles (Acts Thom. 1; Did. Syr.); *Origen's Comm. Gen. (Eusebius, HE III,1) says they did this by drawing lots, mentioning only five (*Thomas/the homeland, *Andrew/*Scythia, *John/*Asia [dying at *Ephesus after a long time there], Peter according to 1 Pet 1:1 reaching *Rome, and Paul according to Rom 15:19 martyred at Rome). The first mention of Thomas and Andrew is in Pistis Sophia ca. 136. *Eusebius of Caesarea's information is completed by *Rufinus of Aquileia (HE, I, 9f.), with the addition of *Matthew/*Ethiopia and *Bartholomew/Hither India. Thomas was in India according to Acts Thom. (Bienert 19-20). From the 2nd c. "the apostles" became the decisive point in Christian consciousness for the historical passage from Jesus Christ to his church.

GLNT 1, 1063-1196; TRE 4,430-466; H. von Campenhausen, Le concept d'apôtre dans le Christianisme primitif: STh 1 (1947/48) 96-130; E. Lohse, Ursprung und Prägung des christlichen Apostolates: TZ 9 (1953) 259-275; E.M. Kredel, Der Apostelbegriff in der neueren Exegese: ZKTh 78 (1956) 169-193, 257-305; W. Schmithals, Das kirchliche Apostelamt, Göttingen 1961 (Eng. tr. Nashville 1969); L. Cerfaux, La mission apostolique des douze et sa portée eschatologique, in Mél. Tisserant, I, Vatican City 1964, 43-66; F. Bovon, L'origine des récits concernant les apôtres: RThPh 17 (1967) 345-350; R. Schnackenburg, L'apostolicité: état de la recherche: Istina 14 (1969) 5-32; Mysterium Salutis, vol. VII, Brescia 1972, 605-613; G. Frizzi, L' ἀπόστολος delle tradizioni sinottiche: RivBib-Ital 22 (1974) 3-37; A. Kirk, Apostleship Since Regenstorf: NTS 21 (1974) 249-264; S. Brown, Apostleship in the New Testament as an Historical Problem: NTS 30 (1984) 474-480; J. Dupont, Le Douzième Apôtre (Actes 1,15-16), in The New Testament Age: Essays in Honor of B. Reicke, I, Macon, GA 1984, 139-145; H.O. Guenther, The Footprints of Jesus' Twelve in Early Christian Traditions, New York 1985; L. Cerfaux, Pour l'histoire du titre Apostolos dans le Nouveau Testament: RecSR 48 (1960) 76-92 = Recueil L. Cerfaux, III. BETL 71, Louvain 1985, 185-200; F.H. Agnew, The Origin of the NT Apostle-Concept: A Review of Research: JBL 105 (1986) 75-96; W. Horbury, The Twelve and the Phylarchs: NTS 32 (1986) 503-527; W.A. Bienert, Das Apostelbild in der altchristlichen Überlieferung, in W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung. II. Apostolisches, Apokalypsen und Verwandtes, Tübingen [5]1989, 6-28; F. Bovon, Révelations et Écritures. Nouveau Testament et littérature apocryphe chrétienne, Geneva 1993; G. Klein, Die zwölf Apostel, Göttingen 1961.

R. Trevijano

II. Iconography. The earliest figurative evidence of the apostles appears in the pre-*Constantinian era with depictions of the apostolic college arranged around Christ—images of the heavenly court deliberately and polemically opposed with the imperial court. Their *iconography closely follows the type of the ancient philosopher and is essentially undifferentiated: only *Peter, *Paul and *Andrew have individual characteristics.

The oldest examples of the apostolic college date from the time of the tetrarchy. From the beginning they were depicted in a fixed scheme—in three (Christ, Peter and Paul) or in twelve—which remained substantially unchanged. In the frescoes of the *Roman *cemetery of Pietro e Marcellino (Wp pl. 96) and of the anonymous cemetery of Via Anapo (RivAC 5 [1928] fig. 19 = J.G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Anonima di via Anapo," no. 8), Christ the "teacher" sits on a cathedra with footrest, his right hand in the gesture of adlocutio ("word"), surrounded by his disciples in a semicircle; some decades later, on the front of an arcosolium of the cemetery of S. Ermete at Rome (Wp pl. 152), the twelve disciples, like Christ, are seated on cathedrae, to emphasize the concept of missio apostolorum.

On *sarcophagi, the theme of the apostolic college appears in the wake of the Peace of the Church. The original pattern, as in the cemetery paintings, occurs sporadically; an artistically important example is that of the sarcophagus of Concordius (Arles, late 4th c., Ws 34, 3), in which the inscriptions carved on the books and scrolls carried by Christ and the apostles include the expression dominus legem dat and the names of the four Evangelists, representing the traditio legis* entrusted to the whole apostolic council. Only from the late 4th c. were the apostles shown standing and acclaiming Christ, who is royally seated on a draped throne, as on the sarcophagus of Mantua, dated 395–408 (Ws pl. 30).

Still in the 4th c. the theme of the apostolic college penetrated the mosaics of churches in solemn, monumental compositions. In S. Aquilino, *Milan (4th c.), following the oldest pattern, the apostles are seated around Christ magister; in S. Pudenziana, Rome (early 5th c.), together with other figures, they symbolize the church triumphant; in the Orthodox baptistery at *Ravenna (5th c.) they stand above the prophets as witnesses to the concordantia Veteris et Novi Testamenti.

Where individuation was desired, images of the apostles were accompanied by their names; not the traditional list of Mt 10:2-4 and Mk 3:16-19 (in inverted order) but the so-called popular list in which Paul replaces Matthias, Mark replaces Thaddaeus and Luke replaces James, as in Theodoric's mausoleum at Ravenna or the Barletta relief (the oldest example of this list).

From the late 4th to early 5th c. the apostles were also represented symbolically: as doves in a fresco of the cemetery of Commodilla, Rome (RivAC 34 [1958] 9ff. = J.G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Commodilla." Repertorium der Malerein, no. 5), as lambs in the apse mosaic of Sts. Cosmas and Damian at Rome, and as volumina in the apse of St. John the Evangelist at Ravenna. From a passage of *Eusebius of Caesarea (De vita Const. 3,38: PG 20, 1097) we learn that Constantine had 12 columns set up symbolizing the apostles in the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre at *Jerusalem.

At times the apostles are shown individually in scenes from Christ's public life: in these cases it is the narrative context and the presence of particular attributes or gestures that allow their identification. Thus Thomas can be recognized putting his finger in the wound in Christ's side in the episode of unbelief (Ravenna, relief, National Museum: Corpus della scult. paleocr. altomedioevale di R., n. 6; Como, sarc. of Celsus: Ws pl. 243,3), and a figure hanging from a tree, as in the Brescia Reliquiary (4th c.), is obviously *Judas Iscariot.

J. Ficker, Die Darstellung der Apostel in der Altchristlichen Kunst, Leipzig 1887; G. De Jerphanion, Quels sont les douze apôtres dans l'iconographie chrétienne?: La voix des monuments 1 (1930) 189-200; K. Künstle, Ikonographie der Heiligen, Freiburg i.Br. 1926; P. Testini, Osservazioni sull'iconografia del Cristo in trono fra gli apostoli: RIA 11-12 (1963) 230-300; J. Myslivec, s.v. Apostel: LCI I, 150-170; J.G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Anonima di via Anapo." Repertorium der Malerein, Vatican City-Münster 1992; J.G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Commodilla." Repertorium der Malerein, Vatican City 1994; M. Minasi, s.v. Apostoli: TIP 124-126.

C. Carletti

APOSTLES. Feasts in the Greek church 30 June and 4 January.

I. Apocrypha on the Apostles – II. Lists of the Apostles – III. Legal-liturgical and dogmatic texts of the Apostles – IV. Homilies on the Apostles – V. The cult of the Apostles – VI. Apostolic Fathers.

There is a wide literature on the apostles in Greek, Latin and the Eastern languages. This regards the apostles, often called the Twelve (with *Matthias, *Paul and often also *Barnabas; *Judas was excluded), the Evangelists, and the disciples of the Lord or of the apostles (the 70 or the 72). This literature can be divided into the following categories.

I. Apocrypha on the Apostles. The most important group of writings on the apostles are the *apocrypha, which can be subdivided into (1) apocryphal Acts of the individual apostles, (2) collections of Acts of the Apostles and (3) other apocrypha regarding the apostles.

1. Acts of the Apostles (Periodoi, Praxeis, Virtutes). 5 great Acts of the apostles were written in the 2nd-3rd c.: of *Peter, *Paul, *John, *Andrew and *Thomas; the first four are preserved partially, the Acts of Thomas in their entirety (in two versions: Greek and *Syriac). These texts were ascribed to the *gnostics Leucius and Charinus, or to Leucius-Charinus (a thesis now abandoned). Each work is subdivided into acts (actus, praxeis), whereas the whole is composed of a description of their activities (travels, miracles, preaching) and *martyrdom—this latter was often incorporated into the *liturgy. There are important poetic passages in the Acts of Thomas and the Acts of John. These Acts include some *gnostic elements; some (Acts of Andrew) are preserved in a version censured by *Gregory of Tours. From the 4th c. until the *Byzantine period an ample production of apocryphal Acts developed, in which motifs from the above-mentioned Acts were developed, along with the lives and martyrdom accounts of the other Acts. Normally the Acts deal with one apostle, but there are some that treat of two, e.g., Peter and Paul or Andrew and *Matthias. There is an ample body of work on some apostles (Peter, Andrew), very sparse on others (James, Judas). This later literature is increasingly characterized by fantastic elements (exotic countries, strange miracles, etc.). Some Acts open with a description of the apostle's field of activity. These works are preserved in various versions and paraphrases, some *orthodox, some composed of gnostic or *heretical elements. Apocryphal Acts of the apostles were used by gnostics, *Manichees and heretics (e.g., *Priscillianists), but the texts cannot be generally classified as heretical. The Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles were written in Greek, Latin and the Eastern languages, but the Eastern texts are generally translations or paraphrases of the Greek. These apocryphal texts were a source of legends on the apostles for the medieval collections of *hagiographical legends and are an important source for the *iconography of the apostles. Besides these Acts, there are gnostic texts of *Nag Hammadi regarding the apostles, such as the Acts of Peter and of the Twelve Apostles (codex VI).

CANT 190-299. Principal editions of the texts:

Greek and Latin: R.A. Lipsius, M. Bonnet, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, 1-2,2, Leipzig 1891, 1898, 1903 (Darmstadt 1959, 1976).

Arabic: A. Smith Lewis, Acta mythologica apostolorum (Horae Semiticae 3), The Mythological Acts of Apostles (Horae Semiticae 4), London 1903; see I. Guidi, below.

*Armenian: K. Èerakian, Venice 1904 (Armenian text only); Fr. tr. L. Leloir: CCA 3-4, 1988. See L. Leloir, Rapporte entre les version arménienne et syriaque des Actes apocryphes des apôtres, in Symposium Syriacum: OCA 205 (1978) 137-148; V. Calzolari, La Bible et les textes apocryphes dans l'Arménie: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 81 (2001) 38-48.

*Coptic: O. von Lemm, Koptische apokryphe Apostelakten: Mélanges Asiatiques 10 (1890) and Bulletin de l'Accadémie des Sciences des St. Péterburg 33 (1890), 37 (1894), 10 (1892); E.A.W. Budge, Coptic Apocrypha in the Dialect of Upper Egypt, London 1913 (with Eng. tr.); W.H.P. Hatch, Three Hitherto Unpublished Lives from Manuscript of the Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha in Bohairic, in Coptic Studies in Honour of E.W. Crum, Boston 1950; I. Guidi, Gli apocrifi degli apostoli nei testi copti, arabi ed etiopici, Rendiconti della R. Accademia dei Lincei, notes I-VII, vol. III, 1887, 1, part 2; II, parts 2, 4, 8, 10, 11, vol. IV, 1888, 1, part 2; Id., Gli Atti apocrifi degli Apostoli nei testi copti, arabi et etiopici: Giornale della Società Asiatica Italiana 2 (1888) 1-66 (translation).

Ethiopian: S.C. Malan, The Contendings of the Holy Apostles, London 1871; E.A.W. Budge, The Contendings of the Apostles, 1-2, London 1899-1901 (repr. Amsterdam 1976).

*Georgian: C. Kurčikidze, Tbilisi 1959 (only in Georgian).

*Palaeoslavonic: in the large collections of Tichonravov, Franko and others.

Syriac: W. Wright, Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, 1-2, London 1971 (Amsterdam 1968). See L. Leloir, Rapport entre les version arménienne et syriaque des Actes apocryphes des apôtres, in Symposium Syriacum: OCA 205 (1978) 137-148.

Translations: Eng. - Schneemelcher; Eng. 2 - Elliott; It. - Erbetta 2, Moraldi 2; Ger. in Schneemelcher 2; Fr., in EAC 1.

R.A. Lipsius, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten und Apostellegenden, 1-2,2, and Ergänzungsband; Braunschweig 1883-1890 (Amsterdam 1976); E. Plümacher, Apokryphe Apostelakten, PWK 15, 11-70; R. Söder, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten und die romanhafte Literatur der Antike, Stuttgart 1932 (1969); M. Blumenthal, Formen und Motive in den apokryphen Apostelgeschichten: TU 48/1 (1933); A. Hamman, "Sitz im Leben" des actes apocryphes de NT: SP 8 (1966) 62-69; P. Nagel, Die apokryphen Apostelakten in der manichäischen Literatur, in Gnosis und NT, ed. W. Tröger, Berlin 1973, 149-182; F. Morard, Coptic Encyclopaedia 1, 58-61; D.M. Parrot, ibid. 61-63; var. aus., Les Actes apocryphes des Apôtres, Geneva 1981; E. Junod - J.D. Kaëstli, L'histoire des Actes apocryphes du III^e au IX^e s., Lausanne 1982; F. Bovon et al. (eds.), The Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, Cambridge, MA 1999.

2. Collections of the Acts of the Apostles. A collection of the Acts of the Apostles was composed in the 6th-7th c. in *Gaul: attributed to *Abdias, bishop of Babylon, written in Hebrew, translated into Greek by Eutropius and into *Latin by *Julius Africanus (Introd.; see 6,20). The work is in 10 books and contains lives of the Twelve, except Matthias and Judas (the traitor), and that of Paul. A collection of the apocrypha probably existed in *Coptic. In the 12th c. an Ethiopian collection was composed of the Acts of the Apostles, of the Evangelists and of the disciples of the Lord, also containing some lists of the apostles. This collection contains elements not contained in the Western texts (Latin and Greek).

Ps.-Abdias: CANT 256; J.A. Fabricius, Codex apocryphorum NT, Hamburg [2]1719. It. tr.: Erbetta 2 (in chapters on the individual apostles); Moraldi 2, 511-682; Polish: E. Nowak, M. Starowieyski, Kraków 1995. Lipsius 1, 117-178; Ergänzungsband 5-11; G. Besson, La collection du Ps. Abdias. Un essai de définition à partir de l'étude des manuscrits: Apocrypha 11 (2000) 181-194; M. Brossard-Dandré, La collection du Ps. Abdias. Approche narrative et cohérence interne: Apocrypha 11 (2000) 195-205; D. Alibert, Vision du monde et immaginaire dans quelques textes de la collection dite du Pseudo-Abdias: Apocrypha 11 (2000) 207-226; Ethiopian collection: E.A.W. Budge, The Contendings of Apostles, 1-2, London [2]1935 (Amsterdam 1976).

3. Other apocrypha on the apostles. There are other apocryphal writings on the apostles, i.e., the letters of some of the apostles (e.g., the famous letters of Paul and Seneca, the apocryphal letters of St. Paul, the letter of ps.-Titus, Epistula Apostolorum), and the Lives of the apostles, such as that of *Epiphanius the Monk (Life of Andrew) and anonymous stories of John the Evangelist. Many writings are published under the name of an apostle or all of the apostles, such as the Protevangelium of James,* the Apocalypses of Peter, the Epistula Apostolorum* and a few Gospels of the Twelve or Gospels of the Apostles, either preserved in fragments or of which we know only the titles (one of these texts is a modern falsification, see Starowieyski 1/1, 120); all of theses writings are more or less linked to an apostle. There are, moreover, the Sortes Apostolorum and Lusa Apostolorum condemned by the *Ps.-Gelasian Decree (5, 6, 8f.), but of them we know nothing more.

II. Lists of the Apostles. Another group of writings on the apostles consists of various types of lists of the apostles. The most numerous are lists containing a brief biography of each apostle. The most important are those of ps.-Epiphanius, ps.-Hippolytus, ps.-Dorotheus (Greek) and the Breviarium Apostolorum* (Latin). The oldest work is that of ps.-Epiphanius (700–750). In some lists, Paul comes after Peter and, to keep the number to Twelve, Matthias is excluded. The work of ps.-*Isidore of Seville, De ortu et obitu Patrum, includes the lives of the apostles, and of the disciples of the Lord (68–86). Some lists contain the etymologies of the apostle's names, information on their places of birth, the names of their relatives, explanations of who was baptized and by whom, and definitions of faith proclaimed by them, e.g., some articles of the creed. Some are written in verse. Their large number in every language of the ancient world show their popularity. They are generally the products of the *Late Antique and *Byzantine eras, and their historical value is rather negligible. Poetic lists of the apostles can be found in the poets, e.g., *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. 19, PL 61, 513-515).

BHG 150-160 (1957) completed by the Auctarium (1969) and Novum Auctarium (1984); BHL 648-654 (1898) completed by the Novum Supplementum (1986); T. Schermann, Prophetarum vitae fabulosae, indices Apostolorum, Leipzig 1907; F. Dolbeau: AB 104 (1986) 299-314; Id.: Revue d'histoire des textes 16 (1986)

83-139; Id.: AB 108 (1990) 51-70; Id.: Apocrypha 3 (1992) 259-279 (Lat.); Id.: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 91-107; M. van Esbroeck, Neuf listes d'Apôtres orientales: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 199-109; T. Schermann, Propheten und Apostellegenden, Leipzig 1907.

III. Legal-liturgical and dogmatic texts of the Apostles. Another group of writings attributed to the name of the apostles are legal-liturgical and dogmatic texts, such as the Didache,* the Apostolic Constitutions,* the Didascalia Apostolorum,* the Apostolic Canons* and other texts, often very ancient, extremely important for the history of canon law and the *liturgy. To this category can be added the *Apostles' Creed; in some versions the individual articles of faith are ascribed to the individual apostle.

CPG 1, 1983, 1730-1743 (bibl.). Creed: J. de Ghellinck, Histoire de symbole des Apôtres, in Id., Patristique et Moyen-Age, 1, Gembloux 1946; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, Oxford 1950, [2]1972. A. Di Berardino, Letteratura canonica, penitenziale e liturgica, in Res christiana, temi interdisciplinari di paristica, ed. A. Quacquarelli, Rome 1999, 279ff.

IV. Homilies on the Apostles. Although there is a significant number of homilies of the Fathers on the individual apostles, homilies on the apostles in general are rather rare in the patristic era: a text of *Ephrem, some of ps.-John Chrysostom; others are from the Byzantine period, such as those of Gennadius II (Georgios Scholarios—d. after 1472) and in particular those of Nicetas of Paphlagonia (d. after 910), who left a collection of homilies on all of the apostles. Of particular value are the lives of the apostles of Symeon Metaphrastes (d. 982/987) and the first chapters of book II of the Ecclesiastical History of Nicephorus Callistus (d. 1335 ca.). A theological synthesis of the number Twelve is in *Rabanus Maurus (PL 107, 891).

BHL, BHG, BHO, see above.

V. The cult of the Apostles. In the early church the cult of the apostles was collective in character, because of the dignity of the mandate given them. The first church built in honor of the apostles, the Apostoleion at *Constantinople, was the work of *Constantine, later rebuilt by *Justinian. The commemoration of the apostles was constituted at Rome under Byzantine influence. Churches in honor of the apostles were built in the 4th-5th c. at *Milan, Lodi, Como, *Aquileia, Concordia, Verona. Sts. Peter and Paul enjoyed special honor, and later Andrew. Feasts were later created in the Latin liturgy for Sts. James and *Philip, St. John in Porta Latina and the other individual apostles.

A.P. Frutaz, L'origine del culto liturgico degli Apostoli, Scuola Cattolica 1936, 213ff.; E. Vida, Il culto agli Apostoli nell'Italia settentrionale alla fine del IV sec., Ambrosius 1957, 245ff.; M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, 2, Milan 1969, 448-466.

VI. Apostolic Fathers. Finally, from 1672, with the publication by J.B. Cotelier of Sanctorum Patrum, qui temporibus apostolicis floruerunt, the term "Apostolic Fathers" was used, indicating a group of the first Christian writers who lived in the first half of the 2nd c., or some anonymous writings of that period.

All of this clearly shows the importance of the apostles in ancient and Byzantine Christianity.

BS 2, 278-317; LCIK 1, 150-176; 5, 236-239; F.X. Pötzl, Die Mitarbeiter des Weltapostels Paulus, Regensburg 1911; F. Haase, Apostel und Evangelisten in den orientalischen Übeliefrungen, Münster 1922; V.L. Kennedy, The Saints of the Canon of the Mass, Vatican City 1938; P.L. Spatling, De apostolicis, pseudo-apostolicis, apostolinis. Dissertatio ad diversos vitae apostolicae conceptus saeculorum decursu elucidandos, Munich 1947; O. Hopham, Die Apostel, Luzern 1946; J. Blinzler, Die Brüder und Schwestern Jesu, Stuttgart 1967; W. Wiemer, Der Apostel und seine Mitarbeiter, Wuppertal 1987; P. Jounel, Le culte des Apôtres à Rome, in Saints et sainteté dans la liturgie, ed. A. Triacca et al., Rome 1987, 167-187; Légendier apostolique anglo-normand, ed. D.W. Russel, Montréal-Paris 1989; J. Texidor, L'apôtre d'après la littérature syriaque: Apocrypha 1 (1990) 269-277; W. Schneemelcher, Apostolische Pseudepigraphen, in Schneemelcher 28-34; Id., Apostelgeschichten des 2. und 3. Jahrhunderts, in ibid. 2,71-81.

M. Starowieyski

APOSTLES' CREED (for professions of faith in general, see Creeds and Confessions of Faith). According to some ancient sources the twelve apostles composed the first creed of faith, the Apostles' Creed or the Symbolum Apostolorum. It was cited for the first time in a letter to *Ambrose (Ep. 42, 5) sent by Pope *Siricius to the Synod of *Milan (390). *Rufinus of Aquilea (Comm. in symb. apost. 2) recounts that the apostles "established . . . a unanimous norm for their future preaching . . . granting each one a contribution that he regarded better." Rufinus is in agreement with another document from the same era titled the Explanatio symboli ad initiandos, which was based on St. Ambrose's speech and the Apostolic Constitutions* 6,14.

The account of the composition of the Apostles' Creed enjoyed a consensus during the entire Middle Ages. It thus also found expression in the figurative arts as, e.g., in the Liebfrauenkirche of Trier, which was constructed between 1235 and 1260, where the twelve columns that support the ceiling were adorned during the 15th c. with representations of the apostles and their articles of faith.

The apostolic origin of the creed was criticized by Lorenzo Valla and Reginald Pecock, but the first scholar was forced to retract and the second renounced his episcopal see in 1458. These criticisms, however, returned in the 17th c. with Voss and Usher. Starting from the Reformation the historical account of the composition of the creed was considered apocryphal by all scholars.

Throughout the NT one finds the phenomenon of teaching that was imposed and transmitted with authority. Then, in the baptismal questions and answers of the first three centuries, although the formulas were very simple, a declaration of faith was always present. In the second half of the 2nd c., Catholic circles took for granted that the regula fidei went back to the apostles, a type of schematic summary of Christian teaching for *catechesis and other objectives. Although the rule of faith and the Apostles' Creed were not the same thing, the relationship between the two was very close. Very specific traces of this regula fidei can be found in the writings of *Justin Martyr (Apol. I, 6,2; I, 65,3; I, 13), *Ignatius of Antioch (Magn. 13, Trall. 9, Smirn. I, 1-2), the Didache* (7), *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. Haer. I, 10,1-2; III, 4,1), *Tertullian (Apol. 47, Praescr. 21 and 37) etc., and all these testimonies speak of it as having been transmitted by the apostles.

Modern-day scholarship tends to affirm that the account of the assembly of the twelve apostles to compose the Apostles' Creed was most likely a pious invention, but the ancient conviction that the regula fidei went back to the apostles contains an element of truth.

J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, London 1972; F.E. Vokes, Apostolisches Glaubensbekenntnis I: TRE, 528-554; H.M. Barth, Apostolisches Glaubensbekenntnis II: ibid. 554-566; H. Schröer, Apostolisches Glaubensbekenntnis III: ibid. 566-571; L.H. Westra, Apostles' Creed: Origin, History, and Some Early Commentaries, Turnhout 2002; M. Vinzent, Der Ursprung des Apostolikums im Urteil der kritischen Forschung, Göttingen 2006.

J. Leal

APOSTOLIC CANONS, The 85

I. The 85 canons - II. The appendix to can. 50.

I. The 85 canons. The Apostolic Constitutions* end with 85 disciplinary canons (8, 47), concerning esp. sanctions to be adopted against clerical offenses; they also deal with *baptism, *divorce, ordinations, the *liturgy, the laity, marriage of clergy and laity, fasting, participation in Jewish feasts, etc. Schwartz has maintained that these were not the work of the editor of the Apos. Con., but his hypothesis is unfounded inasmuch as they present many basic parallels and similarities in form with the parts that are by the editor of that work and also reflect the same mode of composition: the author used the apocryphal letter of *Clement to *James and the canons of the Councils of *Antioch and *Laodicea as canvases on which to insert additions of all kinds, dictated by his own spirit. There is therefore no reason to deny the authorship of the 85 canons, in the form in which they are preserved in the Apos. Con., to the editor of that work: they were composed in Cilicia by *Julian the Arian shortly after 381. The Council of *Constantinople of 394 already refers to them by the name Apostolic Canons.

Because the 85 canons were thought to be of apostolic origin, separate copies of them were very soon produced, and they were included in collections of conciliar canons, e.g., at the beginning of *John III Scholasticus's Synagoge, the basis of Greek church law. The council *In Trullo of 691 also lists them at the beginning of its list of authoritative canons (ch. 2). They were translated from the Greek into most of the languages used in the Eastern churches, and into *Latin by Dionysius Exiguus, who put them at the head of his collection of conciliar decrees, though stopping at the end of canon 50 (number 49 in Dionysius's list). The Decretum Gelasianum (De libris recipiendis et non recipiendis), unduly attributed to Pope *Gelasius and actually the work of a 6th-c. Provençal cleric, lists them among the *apocrypha because they contradicted the tradition of the Latin church on a number of points; this did not prevent Popes John VIII and Leo IX, and great canonists such as Ivo of Chartres and *Gratian, from explicitly referring to them.

II. The appendix to can. 50. One of these separate copies of the Apostolic Canons gave canon 50 a long theological appendix of *pneumatomachian tendency (text preserved in the Syriac Clementine Octateuch; retroversion in Schwartz 14-15; tr. in Nau, 123-124), which was not in the Apos. Con. Its unorthodox character doubtless led Dionysius to end his translation just before reaching it. *John Scholasticus kept it but reworked it to make it orthodox (text in Joannou 33-35).

Editions: CPG 1740; Mansi 1, 29-48; 49-57 (the 50 in Dionysius Exiguus's translation); PG 137, 36-217 (with commentary by Balsamone, Zonara and Aristeno); Hfl-Lecl 1, 2, 1216-1220; F.X. Funk, Didascalia et constitutiones apostolorum, Paderborn 1905 (repr. Turin 1979), vol. I, 564-592; M. Metzger, Les Constitutions Apostoliques, SC 336, Paris 1987, 274-311 (ed. and Fr. tr.); H. Tattam, The Apostolical Constitutions or Canons of the Apostles in Coptic with an English Translation, London 1848 (repr. New York 1965); Winand Fell, Canones apostolorum aethiopice, Leipzig 1871 (with Latin version; Eng. tr. by H. Schodde in Journal of Biblical Literature and Exegesis [1885] 63-72; the Ethiopic collection is composed of 57 canons, some of them having been combined); Syriac tr.: F. Nau, La version syriaque de l'Octateuque de Clément, Paris 1913, new ed., ed. P. Ciprotti, Milan 1967; E. Gabidzashvili, Didi Sadzuliskanoni, Tbilisi 1975; V. Hakobian, Kanonenagirk' Hayoc', I, Ereven 1964; C.H. Turner, EOMIA, Oxford 1899-1913, I,1, 1-34; 1,2, 32n-32nn; E. Hauler, Didascaliae apostolorum fragmenta Veronensia latina. Accedunt Canonum qui dicuntur Apostolorum et Aegyptiorum reliquiae, Leipzig 1900, 93-101; E. Tidner, Didascaliae apostolorum, Canonum ecclesiastorum, Traditionis apostolicae versiones latinae, Berlin 1963; P.P. Joannou, Discipline générale antique, I,2, Grottaferrata 1962, 1-55 (with Fr. and Lat. tr.); A. Vööbus, The Synodicon in the West Syrian Tradition, Louvain 1975, CSCO 367, 58-72; CSCO 368, 72-83 (Eng. tr.); F. Boxler, Die sogenannten Apostolischen Constitutionen und Canones, Kempten 1874 (Ger. tr.); A. Roberts - J. Donaldson, The Constitutions of the Holy Apostles: Ante-Nicene Fathers, 7, 391-505 (Eng. tr.; canons 500-505). Edition of an Armenian version: H. Ghedighian, Collectio canonum Ecc. Armenae, I, Canones Apostolici, Venice 1941, 42-72. It.: D. Spada - D. Salachas, Costituzioni dei Santi Apostoli per mano di Clemente, Urbania Univ. Press, Rome 2001, Canoni Apostolici 244-261.

Studies: H. Leclercq, DACL 2, 1910-1950; F. Nau, DTC 2, 1605-1626; G. Bardy, DDC 2, 1288-1295; Coptic En. 2, 451-453; E. Schwartz, Über die pseudoapostolischen Kirchenordnungen: Schriften der wiss. Gesellschaft in Strassburg, 6, Strassburg 1910, 17-27 (Gesamm. Schriften, V, Berlin 1963, 214-245); B. Steimer, Vertex traditionis. Die Gattung der altchristlichen Kirchenordnungen, Berlin 1992, 87-94.

P. NAUTIN

APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS. A great late 4th-c. canonical-liturgical work in eight books. Its author took various earlier works and rewrote them, keeping some sentences or phrases of the earlier text and making additions or modifications of varying importance: the whole is presented as "Injunctions" (diatagai or diataxeis) addressed by the "apostles and presbyters to all believers scattered among the nations" (I prol.; VIII, 4,1) and transmitted by *Clement of Rome (VI, 18, 11; VIII, 46, 13; 47, 85).

The basis of books I-VI is the Didascalia Apostolorum,* adapted to the evolution of institutions and with some prescriptions mitigated.

Book VII comprises three parts: (1) chs. 1-32, an amplification of the Didache;* (2) chs. 33-38, five prayers of praise to God, seemingly modeled on Jewish prayers; (3) chs. 39-45, a Christian initiation ritual with echoes of the baptismal ritual of the Apostolic Tradition,* here much more developed. The book ends with various appendixes (46-49): a list of the bishops ordained by the *apostles; short prayers for morning (Gloria in excelsis Deo like that of the Roman Mass), evening and meals.

Book VIII also has three parts: (1) chs. 1-2, a treatise on charisms, certainly based on that preceding the Trad. Apost.; (2) chs. 3-46, a rearrangement of the Trad. Apost., developed in detail except for the baptismal ritual already dealt with in book VII; these chapters are sometimes called the "Clementine liturgy"; (3) ch. 47, the 85 Apostolic Canons,* using the apocryphal Clementine letter to James and a conciliar collection known elsewhere which contained the canons of *Nicaea (325), *Ancyra, *Neocaesarea, *Gangra, *Antioch and *Laodicea (these two used in more detail), and *Constantinople (381).

Traces of *Arianism in the text (Bibl., 112-113) were already noticed by *Photius. The name of this Arian was recently discovered. In 1973 D. Hagedorn edited an unpublished Arian commentary on Job and proved by numerous indisputable parallels that the same author, an *anomoian named *Julian, wrote the Apostolic Constitutions and the pseudo-Ignatian letters. I believe that he was bishop of Neapolis near Anazarbus and can thus be identified with Julian, the Cilician bishop and partisan of *Eunomius mentioned by *Philostorgius. However, at the time he wrote the Apostolic Constitutions he no longer openly attacked the homoousios* as in the commentary but confined himself to opposing the doctrinal consequences to which the homoousios seemed to lead, such as that Christ was ungenerate and without beginning. He also kept his distance from Eunomius, rejecting baptism by single immersion, clearly because of its condemnation by the Council of Constantinople of 381. The modification of his position is explained by circumstances. After the accession of *Theodosius I in 379 and the council of 381, the creed became the rule of the empire; no one could risk contradicting it. So the Apostolic Constitutions are after 381 but before the Council of Constantinople of 30 October 394, which refers to book VIII, 47, 74. Besides complete copies of the Apostolic Constitutions, there were soon many partial copies, some just of book VIII: one such constitutes books IV-VIII of the *Syriac collection known as the "Clementine Octateuch"; the Greek document usually called the Epitome of book VIII or Constitutions of Hippolytus is also an abridged copy. Others contain just the 85 canons which end book VIII, known as the Apostolic Canons. Canon 2 of the Council in *Trullo of 692 repudiated the Apostolic Constitutions as containing heterodox passages but allowed the Apostolic Canons, since they already had a place in the conciliar collections. With these canons, Julian's work exercised a certain influence on the history of ecclesiastical law in East and West, but it seems to have had little importance in the evolution of liturgy.

CPG 1731; PG 1, 509-1156 (Lat. tr. by J.B. Cotelier, 1724); F.X. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones apostolorum, 2 vols., Paderborn 1905 (repr. Turin 1962); P.A. de Lagarde, Constitutiones apostolorum, Leipzig 1862 (repr. Osnabrück 1962); M. Metzger, Les Constitutions apostoliques, SC 320 (1985); 329 (1986); 336 (1987).

Translations: Lat.: PG 1, 557-1155; important intr. by Cotelier; Funk (above); Fr.: Metzger, above; Ger.: F. Boxler, Die sogenannten Apostolischen Constitutionen und Canones, Kempten 1874 (BKV 17-333); Eng.: J. Donaldson, The Constitutions of the Holy Apostles: Ante-Nicene Fathers, 385-505; It.: D. Spada and D. Salachas, Costituzioni dei Santi Apostoli per mano di Clemente, Urbaniana Univ. Press, Rome 2001.

Studies: DACL 3, 2732-2748 (bibl.); DTC 3, 1520-1537; DDC 4, 453-459 (bibl.); Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 451-453; F.X. Funk, Die apostolischen Konstitutionen, Rottenburg 1891; E. Lanne, Les ordinations dans le rite copte, leurs relations avec les Constitutions apostoliques et la Tradition de s. Hippolyte: OrSyr 5 (1960) 81-106; D. Hagedorn, Der Hiobcommentar, Berlin 1973, XXXVII-LVII; J. Magne, Tradition Apostolique sur les charismes et Diataxeis des saints Apôtres, Paris 1975, 107-192; P. Sigal, Early Christian and Rabbinic Liturgical Affinities: Exploring Liturgical Acculturation: NTS 30 (1984) 63-90; D.A. Fiensy, Prayers Alleged to Be Jewish: An Examination of the Constitutiones Apostolorum, Chico, CA 1985; A. Enermalm-Ogawa, Un langage de prière juif en grec. Le témoignage des deux premiers livres des Maccabées, Stockholm 1987; D.A. Fiensy, The Hellenistic Synagogal Prayers: One Hundred Years of Discussion: Journal Stud-Pseud 5 (1989) 17-27; Th. Kopecek, Neo-Arian Religion: The Evidence of the Apostolic Constitution, in R.C. Gregg, Arianism: Historical and Theological Reassessments, Philadelphia 1985, 153-179; B. Steimer, Vertex traditionis. Die Gattung der altchristlichen Kirchenordnungen, Berlin 1992, 114-133; M. Metzger, La fidélité dans le mariage selon le témoignage des Constitutions Apostoliques: RDC 44/2 (1994) 1-15; P.F. Beatrice, Traditions apocryphes dans la Théosophie de Tübingen: Apocrypha 7 (1996) 109-122; E.M. Synek, "Diese Gesetz ist gut, heilig, es zwingt nicht . . . ," Zum Gesetzsbegriff der Apostolischen Konstitutionen, Vienna 1997; A.H.B. Logan, Post-Baptismal Chrismation in Syria: The Evidence of Ignatius, the "Didache" and the "Apostolic Constitutions": JTS 49 (1998) 92-108; E.M. Synek, Oikos. Zum Ehe- und Familienrecht der Apostolischen Konstitutionen, Vienna 1999; M.E. Bottecchia Dehò, Nota a un testo delle Costituzioni Apostoliche, Libro VIII, capitolo 46: OCP 66 (2000) 173-183; M. Metzger, Pages féminines dans les Constitutions Apostoliques, in Crossroads of Culture. Studies in Liturgy and Patristics in Honor of Gabriele Winkler, H.-J. Feulner et al. (eds.), Pont. Oriental Inst., Rome 2000, 515-541; J.G. Mueller, L'ancien Testament dans l'ecclésiologie des Pères. Une lecture des Constitutions Apostoliques, Turnhout 2004.

P. Nautin

APOSTOLIC SEE. The syntagma apostolic see is one of the expressions by which, from the 4th c., the see and the ministry of the bishop of Rome have been customarily named. The expression, however, is not a Roman creation, but was often employed during the first four centuries, together with the more common ecclesia apostolica, to designate other episcopal sees, those traditionally linked to the memory of the apostolic generations and those founded later. Specified by an ample series of adjectives, including apostolikos-apostolicus, the terms thronos and sedes were used to indicate the sees most conspicuous for their civil importance and their links with the Christian origins (*Rome, *Antioch, *Alexandria, *Jerusalem and later *Constantinople: Lampe, 655), as well as other particular churches of apostolic origin, such as *Corinth, *Philippi, *Thessalonica, *Ephesus (*Tertullian, De praescr. 36,1), *Cyprus (*Alexander of Cyprus, Barn. laud., CCG 26,692) and, finally, also for sees of minor importance. The Latin apostolica sedes appears in a letter of *Paulinus of Nola in reference to the particular church of *Thagaste (Ep. 3,1, CSEL 29,14,7), and *Augustine uses a similar expression in the plural, sedes apostolorum, to point out that *communion with the most important sees is a sure guarantee of *orthodoxy (Augustine, Ep. 118,32 CSEL 34, 696,15-16). From the 4th c., making reference to a special Petrine heritage of the Roman Church, the documents of the bishops of Rome begin to constantly use the expression apostolic see as a synonym for the more archaic cathedra Petri and sedes Petri. The expression is attested for the first time in a letter of 354 by *Liberius to *Eusebius of Vercelli (Ep. 6, PL 8,1350B); *Athanasius also uses it (apostolikos thronos) to refer generally to the apostolicity of the episcopal see of the Urbe, but describing, significantly, precisely the difficulties of Liberius during the *Arian crisis (Athanasius, Hist. Arian., 35,2). The use of the formula is widely attested in the documentation of *Damasus, to whom is unanimously attributed a decisive role in the development of the doctrine of primacy. The syntagma apostolic see was increasingly understood as a title par excellence of the Roman see and, in these terms, the expression and the underlying doctrine were used by the Roman synod of 378 (PL 13,575-584), and contested by the Arians condemned at *Aquileia in 381 (Scolies ariennes, SC 267,306). The expression is widely attested in the documentation produced by Damasus's successors, but also in non-Roman Western texts between the 4th and 5th c. (*Priscillian, Lib. ad Dam., CSEL 18, 34,11; *Rufinus of Aquileia, Anast., 4, PL 21,625; Augustine, Ep. 1,5,1, CSEL 88, 6,7; Id., Ep. 20,12,4, CSEL 88, 101,16; Id., Ep. 22,5,3, CSEL 88, 115,23; *Facundus of Hermiane, Def. trium capit., CCL 90A, 123,20; 125,78-79; 155,289; 252,65; Id., Moc., CCL 90A, 403,101; 404,118.122; 414,505; 412,423; Conciliae Galliae, CCL 148, 105,4; and numerous other attestations). At the council of Ephesus of 431 the syntagma was usually attributed exclusively to the bishop of Rome, obviously in Roman and Western documentation (*Celestine, Ep. 17, PL 50,503; *Capreolus of Carthage, ACO I,I,2, 53,12-21), but also in Eastern (sedes is rendered both as thronos and as kathedra; see the many recurrences in ACO I,I,8, Indices vol. primi, 44). The doctrinal content attached to Rome in this formula is expressed in a statement of the presbyter Philip, Roman legate to Ephesus, and passed down by the Greek version of the Gesta Ephesina (ACO I,I,3, 60,25-35). At Rome the expression is used by *Leo the Great and by *Arnobius the Younger in Praedestinatus (I,88, CCL 25B, 51,2), and esp. in the Conflictus in which the author presents himself as sedis apostolicae defensor (Conflict. 1,1), since, after the Ephesian synod of 499, he intervened in the *christological debate to defend the pronouncements of Leo and the authority of the Roman see. With *Felix III and *Gelasius I the doctrinal and disciplinary content of the formula was further specified in reference to the Petrine heritage of the church of the Urbe and the responsibilities of its bishop. During the *Acacian schism Roman documentation uses the traditional syntagma along with that of prima sedes—first, that is, among the four main churches mentioned in cans. 6 and 7 of *Nicaea (Rome, Antioch, Alexandria and Jerusalem); whereas, because of the conflict with Constantinople at the time, the order of the sees established at the council of 381 was explicitly rejected (E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma, 17,31-37). The expression prima sedes is sometimes also attested in Eastern texts, both ecclesiastical and imperial (Mansi XI, cols. 684CD; 716B; XII, 1082C-1083D). After nearly three centuries of elaboration, the sense of an orthodox see par excellence, heir of the testimony of the apostle Peter, was firmly attached to the expression apostolic see, (Hormisdas, Exempl. libell., CSEL 35, 521,4). The Libellus fidei of *Hormisdas can be considered the point of arrival of the doctrinal elaboration that accompanied this expression and that would remain constant, in the successive centuries, in the language of the Roman chancellery and of those who would address or make reference to it (*Gregory the Great, Ep. ad Leandrum, CSEL 143, 1,2; Bede, H. eccl., 4,1,1, SC 490, 192,14; 5,11,1, SC 491, 62,3-4). Although the expression apostolic see with other equivalents occurs only infrequently before 680-681 in the language and in the official titles given to the bishop of Rome by the prelates of the Eastern sees and by the imperial chancellery, other references related to the Petrine heritage are not lacking (De episcoporum ordinatione of *Valentinian III of 445, Leges nouellae, 17,102-103; Codex Iustinianus I,1,8,8; 6th-c. letters of the Collectio Auellana, CSEL 35, 322, 8.13.18; 323, 19-20; 324, 22.23.24; 652, 4; 658, 3-6; 660,4; 710,14-15; 713, 10; Constantinopolitan synod against Anthimus: ACO 3, 153,30; letters of Menas: ACO 3, 182,2; CSEL 35, 232, 2-3; libellus of the three Eastern patriarchs of 553: ACO 4, 1, 16-22; an inscriptio of Constantine IV: Mansi XI, 720A).

E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma, Munich 1934; Lampe, s.v. apostolikos, 210-211; thronos, 655; G. Bareille, Apostolicité, DTC 1/2,1621-1622; P. Batiffol, Le Siège Apostolique (359-451), Paris 19243; Id., Cathedra Petri. Études d'Histoire ancienne de l'Église, Paris 1938 (Unam Sanctam, 4); M. Maccarrone, Vicarius Christi e vicarius Petri nel periodo patristico: RSCI 1 (1948)1-32; Id., Vicarius Christi. Storia del titolo papale, Rome 1952; Id., Apostolicità, episcopato e primato di Pietro, Rome 1976; Id., Sedes Apostolica-Vicarius Petri. La perpetuità del Primato di Pietro nella sede e nel vescovo di Roma (sec III-VIII): Il primato del Vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio. Ricerche e testimonianze, ed. M. Maccarrone, Vatican City 275-362; Id., La concezione di Roma città di Pietro e di Paolo da Damaso a Leone I: Romana ecclesia. Cathedra Petri. M. Maccarrone, I-II, eds. P. Zerbi - R. Volpini - A. Galluzzi, Rome 1991 (Italia sacra, 47-48),175-206; P. Stephanou, Sedes Apostolica, Regia Civitas: OCP 33 (1967) 563-582; P. Nautin, Félix III (II), DHGE 16, Paris 1967, cols. 889-895; Id., La lettre de Félix III à André de Thessalonique et sa doctrine sur l'Église et l'empire, RHE 77 (1982) 5-34; Id., Gélase, DHGE 20, Paris 1984, cols. 283-294; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana. Recherches sur l'Eglise de Rome, son organisation, sa politique, son idéologie, de Miltiade à Sixte III (311-440), II, Rome 1976; Id., Damase évêque de Rome: Saecularia Damasiana. Atti del Convegno internazionale per il XVI centenario della morte di papa Damaso I (Città del Vaticano-Roma, 11-12-384-10/12-12-1984), Vatican City - Rome 1986, 31-58; Id., La conversion de Rome et la primauté du Pape (IV-VIe): Il primato del Vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio. Ricerche e testimonianze, ed. M. Maccarrone, Vatican City 1991, 219-243; C. Carletti, Damaso, EPapi I, Rome 2000, 349-372; E. Morini, Roma nella Pentarchia: Roma fra Oriente e Occidente, II, Spoleto 2002, 833-939.

R. Ronzani

APOSTOLIC TRADITION. Preserved partially in Latin, Sahidic and Bohairic *Coptic, *Ethiopian and *Arabic, and some fragments in Greek, from which the original text must be reconstructed, this "church order" has been widely regarded, starting from the beginning of the 20th c., as a work composed by *Hippolytus. On that basis it has had a heavy influence on the 20th-c. liturgical reforms.

After a brief preface, in which the author affirms that the purpose of the work is that of supporting the tradition in response to what the author perceived as the ignorance of those who were leading the churches, the document proceeds with the descriptions of the rules for the elections and the ordination of a bishop (including the *anaphora that the bishop might recite at his ordination, with prayers for the offering of other foods in addition to bread and wine), for the election and ordination of presbyters, deacons and other offices. Afterward, the rules for the rites of initiation are described, from the initial selection of the catechumens to the communion of the newly baptized. And last there is a collection of material that governs the various aspects of religious ministry, ritual meals, private prayer and study, and the provision and administration of a cemetery.

The attribution of the work to Hippolytus has been rigorously questioned of late, and most recently Bradshaw and others, who, though recognizing the possibility of a nucleus in the work that dates back to 2nd-c. *Rome, posit that the document was widely interpolated in the 4th c. Stewart-Sykes, however, building on the work of Brent, has reaffirmed the traditional attribution in a more nuanced way, suggesting that the redactional effort that the document appears to have undergone took place within the context of Hippolytus's school. He maintains that an ancient Roman order, which contained instructions on *baptism and ritual meals, was expanded with the addition at the beginning of directions on ordinations, with other interpolated material on prayer and instruction in the section pertaining to ritual meals, and that this text was further expanded when the school of Hippolytus united with other Roman Christian communities before the death of Pope *Pontianus. In any case the work is "living literature" and should not be uncritically considered a description of the 3rd-c. Roman liturgy. If Brent and Stewart-Sykes are correct, however, it is nonetheless a vital document for understanding the emergence of the Roman episcopate in the late 2nd and early 3rd c., in that between the lines of the work the establishment of a monepiscopate may be recognized, with the consequent redefinition of the role of a presbyter from that of patronage to that of teaching under the authority of the bishop. At the same time, due to the use of an ancient Grundschrift, the work may be seen to contain liturgical information of an antiquity even greater than that imagined before.

Editions: SC 11bis; B. Botte, La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte: essai de reconstitution, Münster 1963.

Studies: E. Jungklaus, Die Gemeinde Hippolyts, TU 46.2; Leipzig 1928; G. Horner, The Statutes of the Apostles, London 1904; H. Duensing, Der aethiopische Text der Kirchenordnung des Hippolyt, Göttingen 1946; W. Till - J. Leipoldt, Der koptische Text der Kirchenordnung Hippolyts, TU 58, Berlin 1954; J.M. Hanssens, La liturgie d'Hippolyte. Ses documents, son titulaire, ses origines et son caractère: OCA 155, Rome 1959; E. Tidner, Didascaliae apostolorum, canonum ecclesiasticorum, traditionis apostolicae versiones Latinae, TU 75, Berlin 1963; G. Dix (H. Chadwick rev.), The Treatise on the Apostolic Tradition of St. Hippolytus of Rome, Ridgefield, CT 1968; R. Tateo, Ippolito di Roma: Tradizione Apostolica, Rome 1972; P. Nautin, Patristique et histoire des dogmes: AEHE, Ve sect. 86 (1977-78) 33-35; J. Magne, Tradition apostolique sur les charismes et Diataxeis des saints apôtres, Paris 1975; E. Mazza, Omilie pasquali e Birkat ha-Mazon: fonti dell'Anafora di Ippolito?: EphLit 97 (1983) 409-481; A. Stewart-Sykes, Hippolytus on the Apostolic Tradition: An English Version with Introduction and Commentary, Crestwood, NY 2001 (bibl.); P.F. Bradshaw et al., The Apostolic Tradition: A Commentary, Minneapolis 2002 (bibl.).

A. Stewart-Sykes

APOSTOLICI. Also called Apotactites. In the early church the term was used of a sect in Asia Minor derived from the *orthodox *Encratite tradition, which rejected marriage, condemned all private property and promoted a type of *ascetic life after the example of the apostles, in poverty and chastity. They had different *sacraments than the *Catholic church and did not accept all the OT books, preferring some *apocrypha. The sect was known to *Basil of Caesarea (Ep. 188,1; 199,47) and *Epiphanius (Haer. 61); the other sources, such as *Augustine (Haer. 40), *Ammonius of Alexandria (Exp. in ev. Jo. 1) and *John of Damascus (Haer. 61), all derive from Epiphanius. From 381–383, *Theodosius I persecuted the sect and condemned it as similar to *Manicheism (CTh XVI, 5,7. 11). Other groups that were part of the apostolici were the saccofori (distinguished by their irregular clothing) and the hydroparastatae (who celebrated the Eucharist with water).

DACL 1,2604-2626; G. Blond: RSR 32 (1944) 157-210; J. Gribomont, Saint Basile. Évangile et Église. Mélanges 1, Bellefontaine 1984, 3-20; 26-64.

S. Samulowitz

APOSTOLICITY. The ancient patristic tradition distinguished apostolicity of ecclesiastical office from that of doctrine. A ministry is apostolic because (1) it has the task of building on the foundation of the apostolic gospel; (2) in the accomplishment of this task it follows certain norms established, based on the gospel, by the apostolic witnesses of the first generation (see Roloff 363-379); and (3) the church that considers itself apostolic is convinced of its continuity in mission and succession from the first apostolic generation.

One notes throughout the entire apostolic and postapostolic period the strong consciousness of all the faithful of belonging to the one church of Jesus Christ (see Hahn 76-94). Paul's incorporation into the recognized and normative apostolic tradition is among the most important decisions made by the early church. The church's path to this incorporation builds from Luke-Acts through the so-called deutero-

Paulines, the Pastoral Epistles and 2 Pet, to arrive at 1 Clem., in which the two great *martyrs Peter and Paul are thought of together (1 Clem. 5), a notion from which will derive, among other things, the special position of the apostolic foundation of *Rome (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. III, 3, 2; Tertullian, Praescr. haer. 36). Paul's incorporation finds its peculiar expression in the church's canonization of the Pauline and deutero-Pauline writings (Bienert 16-17). 1 Clem. (42, 1; 43, 3-4; 44, 1-2) bases the apostolic office on the link with the apostles and with Christ, using the Judaic theory of succession.

Episcopal office and the succession to it of "proven men" were ancient, and this, for 1 Clem., meant apostolic right. Apostolicity represented the organic link between the head of the church and the historical church, in both discipline and teaching. *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 27; III, 3, 1-3) makes episcopal succession go back to the apostles. *Tertullian (Praescr. 2 1,4; 37,1) and *Cyprian (Ep. 37, 15) went back to the origin of the church and its founder through the doctrine and discipline transmitted by the apostles. Faced with *schismatics whose beliefs were uncontestable, Cyprian (Ep. 8,1; 59,5; 69,5) turned to the episcopate as the principle of unity in the church: bishops occupied the place of the apostles, succeeding them in a direct line and, like them, were instituted by the Lord: the apostles themselves were the first bishops. Cyprian sees the institution of the bishops in Mt 16:18-19; Jn 20:21-22 (De unitate eccl. 4). The authority of a series of anonymous "Ecclesiastical Constitutions" were also made to depend on the supposition that they were of apostolic origin (Did., tit.; Apos. Con., tit., I, inscr.; II, 26,7; 28,4; 39,1, etc.). 1 Clem. 44 appealed to the apostolic origin of the episcopal office when disputes arose over removing those who occupied it.

*Polycarp (Ep. 3,2; 6,3; 9,1) did the same regarding the validity of doctrine in dispute. The apostolicity of transmitted doctrine was seen as the criterion for settling doctrinal differences within the church, and for avoiding the *gnostic peril, a criterion suitable for both ecclesiastical *pseudepigrapha and *heretical *apocrypha (Eus., HE III, 25,6). *Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 42,4) referred his theology to the preaching of the apostles, which he claimed was the same everywhere: it was they who recorded everything about the Savior (1 Apol. 33,5), and their authority extended to their written memories (Dial. 103,8). By turning to the beginnings of the faith as the only sure guarantee, one arrived at the conviction that Christianity had had a single originating figure (Ep. Apost. 1, Ethiop.). Both 2 Clem. (14,2) and *Hermas (Sim. IX, 15,4; 16,5; 17,1; 25,2) appealed to the authority of the apostles to guarantee their different theologies. The author of Diogn. (11,1.6) claims to be a disciple of the apostles in the church that preserves their tradition. Irenaeus (Haer. I, 10,1-2; III, Praef.; 3,1-3; 4,1) stresses that the universal church received its faith from the apostles and from their disciples and that, for its proper explanation, one must go back to the oldest churches, where they had worked. Tertullian too (Apol. 47; Praesc. 21,37) spoke of the rule of faith that comes from Christ and was transmitted by his disciples. The conviction that the "rule of faith," believed in and taught in the Catholic church, had been inherited from the apostles gave origin to the legend that the twelve apostles compiled the Symbolum Apostolorum (a formula which came to us from the ancient Roman baptismal creed; see Apostles' Creed). The title is found in *Ambrose (Ep. 42,5) and the account in *Rufinus (Comm. in symb. apost. 2). The 4th-c. creeds and professions of faith (*Alexander of Alexandria, *Nicaea-*Constantinople, *Damasus, *Epiphanius, Const. App. VII, 41) include the character "apostolic" as a mark of the church.

G.L. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole and Glaubensregeln der Alten Kirche, Breslau [3]1897 (Hildesheim 1962); P. Meinhold, Geschehen und Deutung im ersten Clemensbrief: ZKG 58 (1939) 82-129; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christians Creeds, London [2]1960; Id., Early Christian Doctrines, London 1960; A. Benoit, L'apostolicité au second siècle: Ver Caro 15 (1961) 173-184; W. Schneemelcher, Zur Entstehung pseudoapostolischer Literatur, Hennecke - Schneemelcher 2, Tübingen 1964, 8-10; M. Hornschuh, Die Apostel als Träger der Überlieferung, ibid., 41-52; J.N. Bakhuizen, Tradition and Authority in the Early Church, SP VII, TU 92, Berlin 1966, 3-22; F. Hahn, Das apostolische und das nachapostolische Zeitalter als ökumenisches Problem, in Exegetische Beiträge zum ökumenischen Gespräch. Gesammelte Aufsätze, 1, Göttingen 1986, 76-94; K. Haacker, Verwendung und Vermeidung des Apostelbegriffs im lukanischen Werk: NovT 30 (1988) 9-38; W.A. Bienert, Das Apostelbild in der altchristlichen Überlieferung, in W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen in deutscher Übersetzung. II. Apostolisches, Apokalypsen und Verwandtes, Tübingen [5]1989, 6-28; J. Roloff, Die Apostolizität der Kirche und das kirchliches Amt nach dem Zeugnis der Heiligen Schrift, in Exegetische Verantwortung in der Kirche. Aufsätze, Göttingen 1990, 363-379.

R. Trevijano

APOTHEOSIS. Term coined in the *Hellenistic age to express the concept, already widespread, of the divinization of a mortal being after death. Aspired to by the founders of cities, great conquerors and sovereigns, it tended to be identified with state religion and was attached to the concept of the divine origin of the king's authority. Alexander the Great was one of the first, if not the first great man, to be divinized. While in Greece and Egypt the culture favored the development of the idea, its appearance and acceptance at *Rome were laborious and involved a considerable effort at adaptatation to Roman religious tradition. It was not by chance that this occurred at the time of the crisis of the republic, a historical-religious crisis of the Roman ethos. This crisis precipitated a turning aside from the native traditions— upheld by the Senate and the auspices—to the new formula of the heavenly exaltation of the well-deserving by the res publica, at first after death and later already in this life (see Suetonius, Domitian 13). After the Senate's decree conferring apotheosis on Julius Caesar, Augustus took a cautious attitude to proposals of divinization before death, refusing to be numbered among the gods. He did, however, manage to fuse the two Latin notions of numen and genius with the Greek forms of the victorius general, creating a mystique surrounding his own figure. In the provinces, esp. in the East, temples were erected in honor of the emperor and of Rome. The apotheosis decreed by the Senate meant not only the construction of temples but also the creation of a priestly class to serve them and of appropriate festivals to honor them. One manifestation was the specific and honorific title of Divus given to all the emperors numbered among the gods after their death. Though a part of Augustus's monarchical revolution, to which he wanted to give a charismatic image, it nevertheless seems extraordinary when we reflect on the traditional Roman aversion to recognizing even the remote possibility of a man being Divus (see Seneca, Divi Claudii apocolocyntosis). Drusus's gesture in dedicating an ara Romae et Augusti at *Lyons on 1 August 12 BC has more the flavor of a good omen than of emperor-worship and was in fact followed by the expedition to conquer Germany to the Elbe (12-9 BC). Apotheosis was at its most intense in the 3rd c., together with the idea that the emperor personifies and represents the divinity on earth. With the gradual establishment of Christianity it declined, disappearing completely with *Gratian. The basic idea survived, however, in the notion of a sovereignty that separated and distanced king from people.

Herodian (History of the Empire from the Death of Marcus) describes the apotheosis of Septimius Severus (IV, 2); K. Prümm, Apotheosis: LTK 1, 766-767; E. Breccia, Apoteosi: EI 3,716-719; N. Turchi, Apoteosi: EC I, 1699-1700; L. Koep (A. Hermann), Consecratio II: RAC III, 284-294; M. Adriani, Deificazione: Enc. d. Relig. 2,619-622; R. Bloch, La religione romana, Bari 1976, 198-199.

E. Peretto

APRINGIUS of Beja (mid-6th c.). Spanish exegete, author of an unoriginal Commentary on the Apocalypse. Influenced by *Tyconius, the commentary tends to lighten the eschatological tension of the Johannine text, referring it to the whole time of the church, not just the last days. Compared with other authors of this tendency, the anti-Roman animus of the Apocalypse is not entirely removed: the woman sitting on the beast is *Rome, and the fall of Babylon is the fall of Rome. On the other hand, the *millenarian points are eliminated: the first resurrection of the righteous is that of *baptism per fidem, and the thousand years of this resurrection signify the entire time of the church.

CPL 1093. Díaz 14; PLS 4,1221-1248; DHGE 3,1072; M. Férotin, Apringius de Beja, Paris 1900; A. del Campo Hernández (ed.), Comentario al Apocalipsis de Apringio de Beja, Estella (Navarra) 1991; J. van Banning, Bemerkungen zur Apringius von Beja-Forschung: Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 3 (1999) 113-119; W.C. Weinrich, tr. - ed., Latin Commentaries on Revelation, Downers Grove 2011, 23-62.

M. Simonetti

AQUARIANS. The use of water instead of wine in the Eucharist is mentioned in apocryphal texts (A. Petr. c. Sim. II,1; A. Thom. 120.152.158); Filaster (Haer. 77; Aug., Haer. 64) calls those who celebrate the Eucharist in this way aquarii. *Irenaeus attributes this practice to the *Ebionites and interprets it theologically: it derives from a refusal to believe in the union of God and man in Christ, hence they continue to wait for the Son of Man and believe they are still in the condition of the "old Adam" (Adv. haer. V,13). For *Clement the aquarii are the *Encratites (Paed. II,2,32; Strom. I,19). *Cyprian condemns the celebration of the Eucharist with water without identifying its practitioners (Ep. 63); *Theodoret (Haer. I, 20) knows them as disciples of *Tatian under the name "Hydroparastatae" or "Encratites" (see also Epiph., Haer. 30,16). Identified with the *Manichees (Leo the Gr., Serm. 42,4), they are condemned by various laws (CTh XVI,V,7.9.11.65).

RAC 1,574-575; DACL 1,2622; 1,2648-2654; C. Bareille, Aquariens: DTC 1,1724-1725; P. Lebeau, Le vin nouveau du Royaume, Paris-Bruges 1966; W.H. Bates, St. Cyprian and the "Aquarians": SP 15,1 (1984) 511-514; C. Tampwo Maleya, L'acqua come materia eucaristica in san Cipriano: Ricerche Teologiche 9 (1998) 373-386 (see REAug 45 [1999] 414).

F. Cocchini

AQUILA, Acts of. A brief 11th-12th-c. *apocrypha with no great historical or literary value. The first part is composed of biblical data; the second recounts the travels and *martyrdom of Aquila.

BHG 162; BS 1,326-328; LCIK 5,239; J. Ebersolt, Les Actes de Jacques et les Actes d'Aquilas, Paris 1902, 47-55; Slavic text: Codex apocryphus e manuscriptis Ucraino-Russicis collectus, I. Franko, 1-5, Lvovi 1896ff., 3, 313f.; Polish tr.: R. Rumianek: Studia Thelogica Varsav. 22 (1984) 259-266.

M. Starowieyski

AQUILEIA

I. Origins of Christianity - II. Council.

I. Origins of Christianity. Tradition indicates St. *Mark as the founder of the church of Aquileia; he is said to have consecrated its first bishop, Hermacoras, *martyred with the deacon Fortunatus. This information is first noted—faintly—only with Paul the Deacon (786) and is developed in the Passio sanctorum martyrum Hermagorae et Fortunati, an echo of which is in the acts of the Council of Mantua of 827. This tradition, unknown to the writers of Christian antiquity (*Chromatius, *Jerome, *Rufinus, *Venantius Fortunatus), can be explained by Aquileia's undoubted liturgical links with the church of *Alexandria in *Egypt (of which St. Mark was considered the founder), favored by strong commercial relations. Although a protobishop, Hermacoras's name—which was handed down to us in the late episcopal catalogs (11th c.), of which, unfortunately, we do not know the sources—can be accepted along with other names, like those of his two successors Hilary and Chrysogonus (whose names attest to a notable presence of Easterners in Aquileia). In any case, if we consider the question of early Aquileian Christianity qualitatively and focus on the spiritual level, the Aquileian Creed passed down to us by Rufinus seems to testify, precisely by its peculiarities, an especially notable *Jewish Christian conceptual inspiration, which would place it chronologically in the very beginnings of evangelization. The known martyrs are recognized in their *relics—Cantius, Cantianus and Cantianilla—or in other evidence, such as Protus, Chrysogonus, Hilary and *Tatian. The cult of Felix and Fortunatus is attested by Bishop Chromatius (Sermo VII) and Venantius Fortunatus (Carmina VIII, 3). *Theodore was the fifth bishop among those listed in the episcopal catalogs; his name is in two epigraphs in the oldest church buildings known in Aquileia (and in the Po Valley) and is among the bishops who subscribed to the acts of the Council of *Arles (314). The church must be ascribed to a similar date: 37.4 × 67.5 meters, it contains three rooms arranged in a U-shape (one for instruction, the parallel one for worship and one connecting them—a consignatorium?); there are also a baptistery and other rooms (living quarters?). The two parallel rooms have an exceptional mosaic floor, in which the forms of a culture founded on sculptural and color values (various animal and plant decorations) coexisted with the *Constantinian taste for lively, but formally rigid, narrative (portraits, the story of Jonah, marine background). The mosaic is nearly intact in the S basilica (more than 700 sq. m.), but only partly in the N. Built over the Theodorian basilicas, which arose near the walls of functional buildings near the city wall (and over a noble Roman domus), were others: the "post-Theodorian" basilica, mid 4th c., tripartite (31 × 72 m.), with geometrical mosaic, baptistery (hexagonal stellar font) and atrium, over the area of the N basilica and supposed consignatorium (the S basilica remained in use and perhaps held the Council of 381); the "Chromatian" basilica, early 5th c., 29 × 65 m., over the S basilica, with octagonal baptistery on the axis. Over it (after a post-Attilan restoration) are the Carolingian basilica and that of the patriarch Poppo (1031). Other suburban basilicas are: to the NE, that of Monastero (early 5th c.), with an almost intact geometrical mosaic floor (19 × 58 m.) with the inscriptions of many Eastern donors; it also shows successive early Christian and early medieval phases (and now houses the Early Christian Museum); that of the fondo Tullio, perhaps the Apostoleion, cross-shaped with a large ambulatory around the apse, and a floor mosaic with 12 lambs among vine volutes, located beside the Via Giulia Augusta, as was that over the tomb of Sts. Felix and Fortunatus, demolished in the late 18th c. (the first cemetery of the Aquileian church?)

Around these basilicas were *cemeteries, not yet properly investigated, containing numerous 4th- and 5th-c. epigraphs (the oldest from 336). Also noteworthy are the octagonal chapel recognized on the spot where St. Hilary was probably arrested, a trichorate cell near the port warehouses and the apsed rooms with mosaics of symbolic subjects (Good Shepherd, Good Shepherd in singular dress, fishing), thought to be private oratories. Besides inscriptions, often with delightful representational graffiti (esp. those with scenes of baptism and refrigerium), we should mention the following: a relief with the heads of Peter and Paul, various sarcophagus fragments (one with the traditio legis), a large circular bronze lampstand with two orders of arms (12 and 7) supported by bronze chains (a great hanging bronze christogram is now at Modena), a distinctive monogrammatic cross (now at Vienna), two silver spoons with chrismon, two gilt glasses, many typical lamps and figured Samian ware. Aquileia is complemented by S. Canzian d'Isonzo, on the Via Gemina, with remains of a 4th-c. rectangular memorial dedicated to St. Protus and elements of a 4th-6th-c. basilica over the tomb of the Cantian saints, martyred in 304.

K. v. Lanckoronski, Der Dom von Aquileia, Vienna 1906; var. aus., La basilica di Aquileia, Bologna 1933; M. Mirabella Roberti, Considerazioni sulle aule teodoriane di Aquileia, in Studi Aquileiesi offerti a G. Brusin, Padua 1953, 209-244; G. Brusin - P.L. Zovatto, Monumenti paleocristiani di Aquileia e di Grado, Udine 1957; S. Tavano, Aquileia cristiana, Udine 1972 (AAAd 3); G. Biasutti, Aquileia e la Chiesa di Alessandria: AAAd 12 (1977) 215-229; G. Cuscito, Cristianesimo antico ad Aquileia e in Istria, Trieste 1977; S. Tavano, Aquileia, guida dei monumenti cristiani, Udine 1977; var. aus., Da Aquileia a Venezia, Milan 1980; G. Cuscito, Cromazio di Aquileia (388–408) e l'età sua, Aquileia 1980; Id., Fede e politica ad Aquileia: dibattito teologico e centri di potere (secoli IV-VI), Udine 1987; Id., Martiri cristiani ad Aquileia e in Istria. Documenti archeologici e questioni agiografiche, Udine 1992; R. Bratz, Il cristianesimo aquileiese prima di Costantino fra Aquileia e Petovio, Udine 1999; var. aus., Aquileia romana e cristiana fra II e V secolo, Trieste 2000 (AAAd 47); var. aus., Aquileia e il suo patriarcato. Atti del Convegno Internazionale di Studio, Udine 2000; G. Cuscito, Orientalità del primo cristianesimo aquileiese. Problemi e ipotesi: VetChr 39 (2002) 223-233; Id., Il cristianesimo ad Aquileia dalle origini al ducato longobardo: AAAd 54 (2003).

M. Mirabella Roberti

II. Council. The plan to convoke a general council, attributable essentially to the initiative of the emperors at the end of 380, was modified a few months later because *Theodosius decided to hold a separate council of Eastern bishops at *Constantinople, and *Gratian accepted *Ambrose's proposal to hold a council for the West in the metropolis on the upper Adriatic because of its geographic location, and perhaps also because of Bishop *Valerian's vigorous stand for *orthodoxy after the ambiguous attitudes of his predecessor Fortunatus. Thus on 3 September 381, two months after the close of the first Council of Constantinople, 32 bishops met at Aquileia under Valerian's presidency to confirm the consubstantiality and coeternity of the Father and the Son, according to *Nicene faith, and to condemn the last followers of Illyrian *Arianism: the bishops *Palladius of Ratiaria (now Arcer, Bulgaria) and *Secundanius of Singidunum (Belgrade), and the presbyter Attalus, a follower of Julianus Valens, Arian bishop of Petovium who had failed to turn up at the council and continued to support the Arian party in N Italy. Since the accused claimed not to recognize Arius as the author of their faith, but to profess the original faith founded on the Scriptures, Ambrose judged it opportune to submit to them the letter Arius had written to his own bishop *Alexander of Alexandria ca. 322 which, softening as it did his earlier extremism, had been the manifesto of Arian doctrine. Thus the essence of the conciliar debate was the verification of Arius's statement solely on the basis of Scripture, to which both parties appealed as the supreme rule of faith. Ambrose demolished one by one all the texts cited by his opponents and adduced as counterproof passages affirming the eternity, immortality, uncreated wisdom and equality of Jesus Christ, considered in his divine nature, with the Father. The Arians did not yield to the evidence or disavow Arius, however, and had recourse to pretexts: they denied the assembly's competence to pass judgment on their faith and, if it was to be a trial rather than a council, demanded arbitration outside ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Ambrose indignantly rejected the proposal and, recognizing the futility of relying on a discussion of biblical texts, decided to end the debate and pronounce sentence: deposition from the episcopate. The conciliar acts, copied by Ambrose's orders, are punctuated by anathemas that, though adding nothing new to *christological and *trinitarian reflection, specify in terse formulas the doctrinal nucleus defended by the Nicenes. The weight of the accusation was sustained by Ambrose and aided by *Eusebius of Bologna, with interventions by others being rare; those of *Sabinus of Piacenza were nearly always procedural. The text of the debate has reached us through a small number of MSS dependent on the copy of a precious codex from the first half of the 5th c., Parisinus 8907, in whose margins are recorded Arian comments and observations, last edited by R. Gryson. Thanks to the incomparable evidence thus handed down, it must be recognized that the Council of Aquileia, unlike that of Constantinople I, which was indissolubly tied to the formula of the creed, left room for an open confrontation between the parties and, beyond its at times judicial appearance, was a timely moment of maturation on the doctrinal and organizational level.

PL 16, 16-939 = PL 62, 433-455; PL 16, 980-990 (the three synodals to the emperors); Scolies ariennes sur le concile d'Aquilée, intr., texte latin et notes par R. Gryson, SC 267, Paris 1980 (the council's Acts in appendix); M. Zelzer, CSEL 82/3 (crit. ed. of the Acts); var. aus., Il concilio di Aquileia del 381 nel XVI centenario, Udine 1980; var. aus., Atti del colloquio internazionale sul concilio di Aquileia del 381, Udine 1981 (AAAd 21); Y.M. Duval, La présentation arienne du concile d'Aquilée de 381: RHE 76 (1981) 317-331; G. Cuscito, Il concilio di Aquileia (381) e le sue fonti: AAAd 22 (1982) 189-253.

G. Cuscito

AQUINCUM. Town located in Pannonia Inferior, in Valeria Ripensis after *Diocletian. Under *Trajan the 2nd legion Adiutrix founded the castrum of Aquincum in the territory of Obuda, now a quarter of Budapest; it was later made a colonia by *Septimius Severus. *Valentinian II was proclaimed emperor (376) in its castrum militare. From the 5th to the 10th c. Aquincum was depopulated. The city's dominant religion was the cult of the *Sun/*Mithras. No Christian remains have beeen found from before *Constantine, and very few after the mid 4th c., almost all from cemeteries. More recently, six Christians buildings have been found in Aquincum: four early basilicas, two in the city, one in the military quarter (a private house transformed for Christian worship) and a basilica coemeterialis; also a trichora cell and a clergy house near one of the basilicas.

PLRE 2, 333; L. Nagy, Pannonia Sacra, Budapest 1938, 62-64; J. Szilágyi, Aquincum, Budapest 1956.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

ARABIA

I. Evangelization - II. Council - III. Language and literature - IV. Archaeology.

I. Evangelization. The term Arabia is vague: the first meaning of "Arabs" was "nomads." There was a *Syrian province called Beth Arabayé, centered on *Nisibis, which the Greeks called Arabia. Southern *Palestine, the area north of Mt. Sinai and east of *Damascus in Haurân bore the name "province of Arabia." Finally, Arabia Felix was Aden or Yemen, Eden or even "India Felix," according to *Eusebius of Caesarea, who placed *Bartholomew's *apostolate there, though there is no other evidence for this (HE V,10,3). Eusebius also mentions *Beryllus of *Bostra (VI, 20) and a synod of many bishops held at Bostra in Haurân (VI, 20), ca. 240. R. Devreesse has summarized what little is known about the arrival of Christianity in Arabia. Philippopolis, in Haurân (today Shahba), owes its name to the emperor *Philip the Arab (224–249), who seems to have been, if not Christian, at least favorable to Christianity. Pharân in the Sinai peninsula was already a *monastery in 330 according to *Jerome; *Ammonius's account seems apocryphal. In the Negev (a Nabataean kingdom centered on Petra until 106, then a Roman province), *Sozomen (HE VI, 38) relates the sending of a bishop Moses to the queen of Phoinikon and the conversion of the phylarch Zokom, recognized by Nöldeke as a name of the Ghassanids of Dagva'ma: this is to have occurred ca. 375–380 (see R. Devreesse, Le Christianisme dans la province d'Arabie: Vivre et Penser [1942] 112-113; Id., Le Christianisme dans la péninsule sinaïtique: RBi 49 [1940] 205-223; Id., Le Christianisme dans le sud Palestinien: RSR 20 [1940] 235-251). In the NE, Hîra was a bishopric from 410, and some, though not all, Arab princes were Christians (see G. Rothstein, Die Dynastie der Lahmiden in al Hira, Berlin 1899, 18-40 and 139-143). In S Arabia a bishop, *Theophilus the Indian, was sent by the emperor *Constantius to the cities of Yemen. He built churches at Cofar Aden and Hormuz. This mission seems to be confirmed by the disappearance of the names of the kings of Mârib from the pagan temple in 378 or 384. Malkîkarib or his father T'aran seems to have been the phylarch converted by Theophilus (J. Ryckmans, Le Christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique, in L'Oriente Cristiano nella storia della civiltà, Rome 1964, 413-454; Fr. Altheim's objections in Die Araber in der Alten Welt, v. 4, Berlin 1967, 306-317 are unconvincing). The entire history of Arabia until *Heraclius has been taken up again in an extremely interesting series of volumes, in which the political role of the Arab princes and their titles are rightly paralleled with the most illustrious dignitaries of *Byzantium (I. Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, Washington DC 1984; Id., Byz. and the Ar. in the Fifth Century, Washington DC 1995). This opus is today indispensable for any student of Christian Arabia, even if its theses on the 4th c. are not unanimously agreed upon; the bibliography is very thorough, and the epigraphical sources represent a leap forward.

M. van Esbroeck

II. Council. In Arabia Petraea (Ἀραβία, Arabia) a council was called between 246 and 250 (or 244–249) to correct some errors on the survival of the soul: Eusebius (HE VI, 37) says that, according to the arabici, as *Augustine later called them (De haer. 83), the soul dies with the body and returns to life at the resurrection (hypnopsychism). Meetings were held in which some bishops of Arabia took part: 14 according to the Libellus synodicus (unreliable). The meetings had little effect in convincing the arabici until the arrival of *Origen, who, according to Eusebius, dispelled the error with his doctrinal knowledge.

Eusebius, HE VI, 37; Augustine, De haer. 83; Nicephorus Call. V, 23; Mansi I, col. 790; Hfl-Lecl I, 1, 163-164; DHGE 3,1165-1166: Palazzini 1,78; see Origen, Dial. Cum Heracl.: SC 67, 76-110; see 17.19-21.37-46.

C. Nardi

III. Language and literature. Christian Arabic does not differ substantially from the koine of the Qur'an. The orthographical notations of the hamza never existed, and vocabulary was influenced by the original language. J. Blau wrote a Grammar of Christian Arabic (CSCO, 267, 276 and 279, Louvain 1966, 1967) based on 9th- and 10th-c. MSS. Arabic script, though derived from Nabataean, also resembles *Syriac; both derive from Aramaic. The inscriptions of Zebed (512) and Harrân (568) are both Christian (see A. Grohmann, Arabische Paläographie, v. 2, Vienna 1972, 7-34). I. Shahîd thinks that the letter sent ca. 520 by the inhabitants of Najrân, written in their language and translated into Syriac by an interpreter, was written in Arabic (see I. Shahîd, The Martyrs of Najrân: New Documents, Brussels 1971, 242-250). Adiyy ibn Zaid al-Ibâdi (d. 604) could read Arabic and was *Chosroes Aparwez's translator. Yaqût gives the text of the funerary inscription of Hind, daughter of Hârith ibn Amr (554–570). Ibn Qutaiba (d. 889) cites an excellent Arabic translation of Gen, apparently translated before him. Arabic MSS of the Bible are numerous in the 9th c.; their text has the division of pericopes characteristic of the pre-Byzantine rite. All these arguments make possible, but do not prove, the existence of a pre-Islamic Arabic version of the Bible, see J. Henninger, NZMW 17 (1961) 206-210. G. Graf's monumental work Geschichte der Christlichen arabischen Literatur, published in 4 vols. in Studi e Testi 118, 133, 146 and 147 from 1944–1951, remains the irreplaceable summary in the field of Christian Arabic literature, though it has been surpassed and improved on many points. The "Bulletin d'Arabe Chrétien," directed since 1976 by K. Samir, tries to extend its bibliography.

The wealth and quantity of Christian Arabic literature derive from its position in the development of four centuries of Christianity and in the transmission of the traditions of Greek science and philosophy, which it contributed to introducing, in several stages, into Arab-Muslim philosophy and science. The oldest MSS, which bear the colophons of Anthony of Baghdad, 885, translate Greek *ascetic and *hagiographical texts. They are in the archaic language, less touched by classicism than later writings. Other texts have been translated from Palestinian Aramaic, others from Syriac (up to a very late date), and finally a large number have been translated from *Coptic, when that language began to lose ground. Continuity was increased, in the Syriac field, by the Karshuni script, which wrote Arabic with Syriac characters to preserve the tradition, at least in the form of the alphabet. In studying the first translations, which include all the literary genres of the time, we note that more than once the Arabic has preserved details lost in our surviving Greek models. An example shows this well: *Cyril of Scythopolis's Life of St. *Cyriacus, a 6th-c. classic of Greek hagiography, has in its Arabic version a paragraph on the mission of a certain Thomas, sent by the bishop of *Jerusalem to *Ethiopia. This paragraph was censured in the Greek, at the time when Ethiopia was separated from official orthodoxy, but is in a 13th-c. Arabic codex. This Arabic text served as a model for a Georgian version in an 11th-c. MS. It follows that we must postulate numerous lost ancient Arabic MSS (see G. Garitte, La vie géorgienne de Saint Cyriaque et son modèle arabe: Bedi Kartlisa 28 [1971] 92-105).

Observations of this kind can be extended to hundreds of anonymous Christian Arabic texts from the early period. To this first layer of literature belong the biblical, patristic, canonical, apocryphal and pseudepigraphical writings reviewed in the 696 pages of Graf's first volume. The literature of translation was succeeded by autonomus activity in which several genres are represented. Among the *Melkites, patristics continued with Theodore Abu Qurra and an anti-Islamic apologetic literature, and with a series of chroniclers and historians: one of the most accurate was undoubtedly Yahya ibn Yahya of *Antioch, to whom all of the historians of the years 938–1027 refer. Particularly among the *Nestorians, the tradition continued that of Hina. Hunain ibn Ishaq (born 808), the most celebrated of the translators, translated the main Greek scientific works from the Syriac. He was surrounded by a pleiad of predecessors and imitators. The Jacobite Yahya ibn Adi (893–974) founded a school frequented by renowned Muslim philosophers and various Christians; his works fill pp. 239-249 of Graf's vol. II, and many of his works have been published today, by E. Platti, Samir Khalil Samir and others. The numerous works of Sidney H. Griffith on Theodore Abu Qurrah (The Reformation of Morals of Yahyā ibn ʿAdī, Provo, UT 2002, with Arabic text completely vocalized) have recently gained significant ground for students of the language. The controversial literature has been developed, esp. under the impetus of Samir Khalil Samir, with the magazine Islamocristiana as its outstanding organ. Monographs have also appeared, such as G.B. Marcuzzo, Le dialogue d'Abraham de Tibériade avec ʿAbd al-Rahmān al-Hašimī à Jérusalem vers 820, Rome 1986. On the Coptic side, until the 15th c. the mass of sometimes anonymous authors and commentaries is no less extensive. The history of the patriarchs of *Alexandria, commonly transmitted under the name of Severus (Sawirus) ibn al-Muqaffa, will always be the basis of all monographs on the Coptic church. G. Graf's last two volumes are dedicated to authors from the 15th to the 19th c., reviewing them systematically as Arabic-speaking Melkites, Maronites, Syrians, Copts and even Armenian Catholics. This literature is linked to the evolution of each church, reflecting its preoccupations, *liturgy, law and theological thought. It is not possible to enumerate here such a vast collection; it is enough to point out that Graf's index, which appeared in 1953, contains nearly 10,000 proper names.

J. Henninger, Arabische Bibelübersetzungen vom Frühmittelalter bis zum 19 Jahrhundert: NZMW 17 (1961) 201-224; R.G. Coquin, Langue et littérature arabes chrétiennes, in M. Albert et al., Christianismes orientaux, Paris 1993, 35-106; F. Sezgin, Geschichte des arabischen Schrifttums, I-IX, Leiden 1967-1984; D.V. Proverbio, Le versioni arabe dei Vangeli, in I Vangeli dei Popoli, ed. F. D'Aiuto et al., Vatican City 2000, 67-70; R.G. Hoyland, Arabia and the Arabs: From the Bronze Age to Coming of Islam, New York 2001.

M. van Esbroeck

IV. Archaeology. Archaeological research has made it clear that the *Byzantine period was the province's most active, with the presence of churches and *monasteries in cities, villages and on the eastern steppe. The mosaic floors found are related in some way to the mosaic school that flourished at Madaba. Moving from S to N, the first center after Arnon is Diban, famous for the discovery of the stele of Mesha. Prior to excavation a small church was visible on the W side of the hill, later destroyed to use its stones for new buildings. Excavations have brought to light a large three-aisled, single-apsed church on the site of the ancient Nabataean temple, with an oratory on the N side, also apsed. Another church is located at the S city gate: its baptistery, with square basin, is preserved. Christian architraves of houses are preserved, one with a cross inscribed in a circle. To the NW is Machaeron, the place of St. John the Baptist's beheading. No church has been found on the hill where the fortress is located, called Mishneqah; however, at the village at its E foot, Mukawer, there are three churches: one in the W sector of the ruins was built over a crypt and had a floor mosaic, done in 602; another was at the center of the village and the few remaining letters of the dedicatory inscription report the name of Malechios, bishop in the first half of the 7th c.; further N has been found an apsed chapel, which must have been part of a larger complex (Piccirillo, Le antichità: SBF 45 [1995] 293-318). Nearby to the SE, the village of Koriatha, inhabited in the first centuries by Jews, has the remains of a church.

E of Diban are the ruins of Umm al-Rasas which, thanks to excavations underway since 1986, has been definitively identified with the biblical town of Mephaath (Jos 13:18; 21:37; 1 Chr 6:64; Jer 48:21). Excavations of what had to be the Roman castrum recorded in the Notitia Dignitatum and the urban area to its N have brought to light some churches adorned with floor mosaics of notable quality. The most monumental ecclesiastical complex is that of St. Stephen. Composed of a series of sacred buildings, it is at the extreme N of the urban area and was developed from the 6th to the 9th c. At the center of the complex is the church dedicated to the Proto-Martyr; its floor mosaic represents nine cities of the Transjordan—including Kastron Mefa'a itself, eight cities of Palestine and twelve of the Nile delta (Piccirillo-Alliata, Umm al-Rasas I). Notable among the other excavated buildings (still in the quarter N of the castrum) is the Church of the Lions, whose mosaic has another representation of the city of Kastron Mefa'a; the Church of St. Paul and the nearby Chapel of the Peacocks; the Church of the Tabula Ansata with the contiguous Church of the Priest Wa'il near the NW corner of the city wall; and the twin churches within the castrum, built into the wall in the SE corner.

Halfway between Umm al-Rasas and Madaba is the village of Nitl, where an ecclesiastical complex has been excavated, in all probability linked to the Bani Ghassan, the Arab Christian tribe allied with the Byzantines who controlled this part of the Limes Arabicus (Piccirillo, The Church of Saint Sergius at Nitl: SBF 51 [2001] 267-284; Shahîd, The Sixth-Century Church Complex at Nitl: SBF 51 [2001] 285-292).

*Madaba has become a famous center mainly for the geographic mosaic that adorns the floor of the Church of St. George: the work was executed in the 6th c. and portrays the Promised Land seen by Moses from the top of Mt. Nebo. Excavations have delineated (1) the city's urban plan, with churches and other buildings, (2) the order of the bishops of Madaba, known almost solely by the inscriptions, and (3) the territorial extent of the diocese.

Mt. Nebo comprises two hills: one to the S called el-Mukhayat, on which arose the ancient city of Nebo; the other to the W, called Siyagha, from which Moses traditionally viewed the Promised Land. Both have churches with mosaics and inscriptions. Monastic buildings and churches have been found on the slopes of the mountain near the "springs of Moses" (Ayun Musa) and the spring Ayn al-Kanisah (see Saller-Schneider, Memorial of Moses; Saller-Bagatti, Nebo; Piccirillo-Alliata, Nebo New).

A village of the diocese of Madaba is Ma'in (Saller-Bagatti, Nebo, 227; Piccirillo, Madaba, 226-253; Piccirillo, Mosaics, 195-204), where the ruins of four churches have been found, with capitols of excellent quality (Vaccarini, I capitelli di Ma'in: SBF 39 [1989] 213-242). One of the churches preserves mosaics done in 719 containing representations of Palestinian cities. A xenion for pilgrims has also been found. The village of Abu Sarbut, where the ruins of three churches have been found, probably also belonged to the diocese of Madaba. In the same diocese was Zizia, a town where a church has recently been discovered with an unusual N-S orientation, in whose mosaic flooring one reads the dedicatory inscription from 559 (Piccirillo, La chiesa del Vescovo Giovanni a Ziziah - Madaba: SBF 51 [2001] 368-372).

Esbous/Esbounta, now Esban, has been explored in recent years, and three churches have been discovered with mosaic floors: one on the Acropolis and one at the N foot of the hill. In the latter was found a marble reliquary with silver theca still in situ. Also, part of this diocese must have been the village of Massuh, 3 km (1.9 mi) E of Esbous. Two churches have been found there: one on the E slope of the ruins that had two flooring levels in mosaic, another to the N more recently discovered (Piccirillo, Mosaics, 252-254; Piccirillo, Una nuova chiesa nel villaggio di Massuh - Madaba: SBF 50 [2000] 494-498).

Philadelphia-Amman: the city, the Ammonite capital Rabath Ammon, saw the death of many Christian martyrs (Bagatti, Antiche chiese di Filadelfia: SBF 23 [1973] 261-285). Traces of six churches remain: a church and a chapel on the Acropolis; one perhaps below—probably the cathedral—where the great Ommayade mosque is; a church dedicated to St. George (as shown by an inscription found among the ruins mentioning Bishop Polyeuctos). Another church was on the Gerasa Road, its plan known to past explorers but now destroyed, and probably dedicated to the martyr Aelianus (Saller-Bagatti, Nebo, 225f.). A funerary chapel has been found on the Jabal al-Akhdar.

Near ancient Philadelphia to the S is the village of Quweismeh, with two churches: one was three-aisled until an 8th-c. restoration, when it was made two-aisled; it has a floor mosaic with depictions of two churches and of animals, Greek inscriptions and a Syriac inscription, from which we know that the building was renovated in 717–718; the other church, only partially excavated, was dedicated to St. Cyriac (Piccirillo, Mosaics, 262-270). Still to the S, in the village of Yadudah, there was a church of which remains only the transcription of a Greek inscription dated 502–503. On the road going S another church has been excavated at Kh. al-Suq. To the W, at Suwayfiyeh, a small church has been found with grape harvest scenes on its mosaic floor and a mention of old Thomas. To the NW is Kh. al-Kursi, where there is a chapel with many mosaics. At Khildah, N suburb of Amman, a church has been excavated with two aisles and two apses, the S apse with two flooring levels; inscriptions indicate that the church was dedicated to St. Varus, and that the upper mosaic was done in 687. In the town of Jubeiha, near the university, a church was found. Also at Yajuz, a town approx. 10 kms NE of Amman, two churches have been found, one of which was dedicated to St. Theodore.

Further N, in Gerasa, more than any other city, it is possible to follow the development of the Christian community and the installation of churches in its urban zone (Piccirillo, Arabia, 115-135). Eighteen churches have been found. The cathedral is datable to the 5th c. The fountain there is where *Epiphanius of Salamis's story probably should be located, according to which every year water is changed into wine in memory of the miracle at Cana. Nearby is the Church of St. Theodore, and the Church of the Prophets, Apostles and Martyrs, likewise datable to the 5th c. The 6th c., and esp. *Justinian's reign, was a period of renewed splendor for the entire province of Arabia.; many of Gerasa's ecclesiastical buildings are from that period. Particularly noteworthy are the three Churches of St. George, St. John the Baptist, and Sts. *Cosmas and Damian, built side by side between 529–533. In the central-plan church dedicated to the Baptist, the mosaic floor has, among other things, figures of donors and a representation of the months. Still in the first half of the 6th c., Bishop Paul built the Church of *Procopius and that of Sts. Peter and Paul, and even had a *synagogue transformed into a church. The building activity continued throughout the 6th c. and into the first decades of the 7th; the church built by Bishop Genesius is from 611. Beyond the N gate of the city, a cemetery with an octogonal-plan church has recently been discovered (Saller-Bagatti, Nebo, 225; 269-289; Piccirillo, Mosaics, 271-300; Michel, Les Églises, 224-274). NE of Gerasa rises the sanctuary of St. Elijah, or Mar Liyas, on a hill near the ruins of Lesteb/Tisbeh, thought to be the prophet's birthplace (Saller-Bagatti, Nebo, 223). Archaeological excavation has uncovered the Byzantine basilica already known to explorers of the region (Piccirillo, Arabia, 104).

E of Gerasa, along the route of the Via Nova Traiana, previously in the diocese of Bostra, is Khirbet al-Samra (Saller-Bagatti, Nebo, 225; Piccirillo, Mosaics, 304-309; Humbert - Desreumaux, Fouilles de Khirbet al-Samra, 27-62), where a number of cemeterial inscriptions have been found: some are in Christo-Palestinian Aramaic, others in Greek, and they give many names of inhabitants. Excavation of the ruins has brought to light eight churches, including those of St. John the Baptist, St. George and St. Peter. At Rihab, at least 15 churches built from 534 to 686 have been identified, dedicated to St. Sophia, St. Peter, St. Stephen, St. Basil (martyr of Scythopolis), St. Menas, St. Isaiah, St. Mary, St. Paul and St. Constantine, St. John the Baptist, St. Sergius, and St. George. In the inscriptions are found many names of inhabitants, both clergy and laypeople, and those of Polyeuctos, Theodore and George, 7th-c. metropolitans of Bosra. Halfway between Rihab and Kh. al-Samra is Khayan al-Mushref, where five churches have been found.

Still further N is Jaber (Saller-Bagatti, Nebo, 223), which has yielded architraves with crosses and an inscription from 531–532 that adds the name of a bishop, Agapius, to the list of bishops of the nearby city of Adraa (Mittmann, Beiträge, 190-194).

Not far away Umm al-Jimal, surrounded by walls, had 15 quite well-preserved churches (Saller-Bagatti, Nebo, 224; Michel, Les Églises, 166-182). Graffiti in the defensive tower echo the Bible, esp. the Psalms. Further E is Umm al-Quttain, in which seven churches are preserved.

All of these places are in Jordan, whereas the dioceses of Haurân are today in Syrian territory. For early Christianity the latter was the area of Kaukabe, recorded by St. *Epiphanius as the central see of the Hebrew Christians, both *Nazarenes and *Ebionites. Notable are the Christian remains reused in the architraves of Sahel el-Jaulan, and pillars used in the michrab of Sheikh Sa'ad (Bagatti, Ricerche: SBF 11 [1961] 292-295). In this area should be located the traditions surrounding Job, collected by Eusebius in the Onomastikon, passed down by Christian pilgrims from *Egeria and taken up again by Muslim sources. Even today in the village of al-Markaz there is a Maqam Ayyub, a small sanctuary containing a cenotaph in memory of Job (Piccirillo, Arabia, 111-112). The sources record various dioceses in the region: Ere, Neapolis, Eutimia, Neela, Canatha, Maximianopolis (today Shaqqa), Philippopolis (today Shahba), Dionysias (today Suweidah), Constantia, Zorava and Phaena. Due to lack of excavations, research has often stopped at the results of surface surveys done in the 19th c. The many Christian inscriptions were collected and studied initially by W.H. Waddington (Inscriptions Grecques et Latines de la Syrie, Paris 1870). Regarding Maximianopolis, Devreesse—based on an inscription from the year 71, which he believes to be crypto-Christian—holds that Christianity developed very early. In the region of Leja, W of Haurân, the best-known city is Zorava, today Ezra, where two churches are still in use: one dedicated to St. George, an octagonal apsed plan with four large niches in the corners, dated 515, and the other to St. Elijah, cruciform with a jutting apse (Lassus, Sanctuaires, 142, 148). Further N, Der Jauni has a church covered with arches and stone slabs (Lassus, Sanctuaires, 53), also dedicated to Elijah; at Phaena (today Mismiyeh) the Tycheion is the prototype of Syrian churches in a cruciform plan (Lassus, Sanctuaires, 143f.). Regarding Rima (today Rimet el-Lohf) to the SE, Devreesse records (Le Patriarcat d'Antioche, 240) an inscription with an acrostic ichthus accompanied by three crosses that suggests a quite ancient Christianity.

W.H. Waddington, Inscriptions Grecques et Latines de la Syrie, Paris 1870; H.C. Butler, Early Churches in Syria, Princeton 1929; S. Saller - H. Schneider, The Memorial of Moses on Mount Nebo, Jerusalem 1941-1947; R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Paris 1947; S. Saller - B. Bagatti, The Town of Nebo, Jerusalem 1949; B. Bagatti, Ricerche su alcuni antichi siti giudeo-cristiani: SBF 11 (1961) 292-295; Id., Le antiche chiese di Filadelfia-'Amman: SBF 23 (1973) 261-285; E. Testa, Il simbolismo dei giudeo-cristiani, Jerusalem 1962; S. Mittmann, Beiträge zur Siedlungs- und Territorial-Geschichte des nördlichen Ostjordanlandes, Wiesbaden 1970; G. Vaccarini, I capitelli di Ma'in: SBF 39 (1989) 213-242; M. Piccirillo, Chiese e mosaici della Giordania settentrionale, Jerusalem 1981; Id., Chiese e Mosaici di Madaba, Jerusalem-Milan 1989; Id., The Mosaics of Jordan, Amman 1993; Id., Le antichità cristiane del villaggio di Mekawer: SBF 45 (1995) 293-318; M. Piccirillo - E. Alliata (eds.), Umm al-Rasas - Mayfa'ah I. Gli scavi del complesso di Santo Stefano, Jerusalem 1994; J.-B. Humber - A. Desreumaux (eds.), Fouilles de Khirbet es-Samra en Jordanie, Turnhout 1998; M. Piccirillo - E. Alliata (eds.), Mount Nebo: New Archaeological Excavations 1967–1997, Jerusalem 1998; M. Piccirillo - E. Alliata (eds.), The Madaba Map Centenary 1897–1997, Jerusalem 1999; M. Piccirillo, Una nuova chiesa nel villaggio di Massuh - Madaba: SBF 50 (2000) 494-498; Id., The Church of Saint Sergius at Nitl: A Centre of the Christian Arabs in the Steppe at the Gates of Madaba: SBF 51 (2001) 267-284; Id., La chiesa del Vescovo Giovanni a Ziziah-Madaba: SBF 51 (2001) 368-372; I. Shahîd, The Sixth-Century Church Complex at Nitl, Jordan: The Ghassanid Dimension: SBF 51 (2001) 285-292; A. Michel, Les églises d'époque byzantine et umayyade de Jordanie (Provinces d'Arabie et de Palestine) V^e-VIII^e siècle. Typologie architecturale et aménagements liturgiques (avec catalogue des monuments), Turnhout 2001; M. Piccirillo, L'Arabia cristiana, Milan 2002; B. Hamarneh, Topografia cristiana ed insediamenti rurali nel territorio dell'odierna Giordania nelle epoche bizantina ed islamica V-IX sec., Vatican City 2003.

B. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

ARABIAN HERESY. *Augustine (Haer. 83) found this heresy in *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE VI,37), but not the name of its founder. Certain "Arabs" preached the doctrine of the real death of both body and soul, and the resurrection of both at the end of time. The heresy was propogated in Arabia from 244–249, when it was definitively condemned by a synod of the whole region, in which *Origen participated (Dial. 10,19-21; Eusebius, H.E. VI,37).

G. Bardy, Le "De Haeresibus" et ses sources: Miscellanea Agostiniana 2 (1931) 411; P. Nautin, Origène, Paris 1977, 94-96; B. Clausi, Dialogo con Eraclide, in Origene. Dizionario, ed. A. Monaci Castagno, Rome 2000, 111-114.

F. Cocchini

ARATOR (d. ca. 550). 6th-c. poet, born perhaps at *Milan, lived 490–550. What little we know of him is from some Dictiones of *Ennodius, *Cassiodorus's Variae, and from his own letters. He was first educated by his father, a well-educated man; after his father's death he completed his studies thanks to the patronage of Bishop *Lawrence of Milan, first under *Ennodius, then under Deuterius. When Ennodius was elected bishop of Pavia (ca. 513), Arator moved to *Ravenna, where he became close friends with his contemporary Parthenius and broadened his cultural horizons by reading Caesarius (Ep. to Parthenius vv. 39ff.), some Ambrosian hymns, the work of one Decentius (whom Ebert identifies with *Dracontius and Manitius with *Sedulius) and esp. some compositions of *Sidonius Apollinaris. The influence of other poets can also be detected in his work, such as *Prudentius, Claudian and paraphrastic poetry in general. After achieving considerable fame as a lawyer, in 526 he took part in a Dalmatian ambassadorial mission to *Theodoric, who was impressed with his skillful oratory (as was Theodoric's successor Athalaric), and he was called to court as comes domesticorum and comes privatorum. At some time during *Justinian's *Gothic war (535–554) he moved to *Rome, where he was ordained subdeacon by Pope *Vigilius, who commissioned him to compose and read publicly in S. Pietro in Vincoli the De actibus apostolorum, a poem in 2326 hexameters in two books. The reading was done over 40 days beginning on 13 April 544. The work, centered on the life of the apostles Peter and Paul, is preceded by two short letters in elegiac distichs addressed to Florianus and to Pope Vigilius; it ends with another letter in 51 distichs to his friend Parthenius. These letters—and esp. the one to Parthenius—are of considerable importance, as they explain the poetic intentions that led Arator to choose a theme with no parallels in paraphrastic poetry. Uncertain—as he says in the letter to Parthenius, vv. 69-78—whether to compose hymns after the manner of *Ambrose or a paraphrase of Genesis, Arator opted for Luke's Acts of the Apostles, whose theological substrate perhaps seemed to him to be the point of encounter between the OT and NT. He paraphrased its material faithfully in some places, while in other places he gave much room to *allegorical interpretation, following a precise poetic program, which he clarified in vv. 20-22 of the letter to Vigilius. Leaving out the epic element present in *Avitus's paraphrases and taking Sedulius's tendencies to their extreme consequences, Arator provided much room for the mystical-*allegorical element, which explains the poem's popularity in the Middle Ages, attested, e.g., by *Bede the Venerable and the anonymous 11th-c. author of a short biblical poem in old French dialect, which expressly cites Arator as its source.

Editions: PL 68, 63-252; A.P. McKirlay, CSEL 72; A.P. Orbán, Ein anonymer Aratorkommentar in Hs. London, Royal MS. 15A V: Editio princeps, Teil 1 (Arator, Ad Florianum 1 - Historia apostolica 1, 514), "Sacris Erudiri" 38 (1998-1999), 316-351; Id., Ein anonymer Aratorkommentar in Hs. London, Royal MS. 15A V: Editio princeps, Teil 2 (Arator, Historia apostolica 1, 515–2, 1250), "Sacris Erudiri" 40 (2001) 131-229.

Studies: A. Ansorge, De Amatore veterum poetarum latinorum imitatore, Breslau 1914; R. Anastasi, Dati biografici su Amatore in Ennodio: MSLC (1947) 145-152; A. Hudson-Williams: VChr (1953) 89-97; K. Thraede, Arator: JbAC 4 (1961) 187-196; F. Châtillon, Arator déclamateur antijuif: RMAL 19 (1963) 5-128; 197-216; 20 (1964) 185-225; S. Blomgren, Ad Aratorem et Fortunatum adnotationes: Eranos 72 (1974) 143-155; R.J. Schrader, Arator: Revaluation: CF 31 (1977) 64-77; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung, Munich 1975, 53-55; 72-74; 93-97; P.A. Deproost, L'apôtre Pierre dans une épopée du IVe siècle: l'Historia apostolica d'Arator [Collection des Études Augustiniennes. Série Antiquité 126], Paris 1990; J. Schwind, Arator-Studien, Göttingen 1990; R. Hillier, Arator on the Acts of the Apostles: A Baptismal Commentary, Oxford-New York 1993; J. Schwind, Sprachliche und exegetische Beobachtungen zu Arator, Stuttgart 1995; B. Bureau, *Lettre et sense mystique dans l'*Historia apostolica d'Arator. Exégèse et épopée [Collection des Études Augustiniennes. Série Antiquité 153], Paris 1997; P.A. Deproost, Ficta et facta. La condamnation du mensonge des "poètes" dans la poésie latine chrétienne: REAug 44 (1998) 101-121.

S. Costanza

ARBELA. Capital of Adiabene, today Irbil, in Iraq, 50 km (31 mi) NE of Mosul. The bishop first lived at Hazza, near Arbela, which under Papa (310–317) became the country's metropolitan see, taking the fifth place after the principal see of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, capital of the *Sassanid kingdom; Bishop John ([Iohannon] d. 343) and his successor Abraham (d. 345) were *martyred. The *catholicos extended his authority over a vast territory (Assyria). In the 6th c. *Paul of Nisibis (d. 571), *Nestorian exegete and theologian, founded a Christian school there. In the 9th c. the see of Hazza-Arbela lost its metropolitan role to Mosul (826/827). Arbela's bishops are attested to more or less continually until the 15th c. The oldest church recorded in the sources seems to be that of St. Hanania (6th c.), but information on it and other Christian buildings at Arbela is rather opaque.

J.-M. Fiey, Assyrie Chrétienne, Beirut 1965, 37-218; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis, CSCO 266, Louvain 1965, 170-172; J.-M. Fiey, Pour un Oriens Christianus Novus, Beirut 1993, 78-80.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ARBELA, Chronicle of. Original work or falsification composed by the orientalist Arbela Mingana, perhaps after the pattern of a medieval compilation, and published by him in 1907 under the title Ecclesiastical History of Msiha-Zha (6th c.), a work known to us only through Abdisho (16th c.). All of the many works based on this source must therefore be reconsidered (see also, e.g., M.G. Raschke, ANRW II, 9,2 [1976]).

J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310 (Sub. 36), Louvain 1970, 10; S.P. Brock, A Classified Bibliography, ad hoc and Ortiz 210-211 (for the other sources, see Persia); J.-M. Fiey, Auteur et date de la "Chronique d'Arbèles": OrSyr 12 (1967) 265-302; Patrologia V, 422-423; C. and F. Julien, Propositions pour la fin d'une controverse: OC 85 (2001) 41-83.

F. Rilliet

ARCADIUS, emperor (377–408). Eldest son of *Theodosius, educated by the *pagan philosopher Themistius and by the Christian *Arsenius. Appointed Augustus as a child (383), he ruled the empire in the East during Theodosius's campaign against *Eugenius (394). On his father's death he inherited the Eastern part of the empire (Illyria, *Thrace, *Pontus, *Asia, Egypt), and his younger brother, *Honorius, the West. From this point the empire, though nominally one, would remain definitively divided. *Alaric, king of the *Visigoths, constituted a major threat to Arcadius's kingdom, which he was able to allay temporarily by naming the barbarian leader magister militum of Illyricum. In religious matters, Arcadius continued the policies of Theodosius, aimed at affirming the *orthodoxy established at *Nicaea and *Constantinople. From some evidence we know that Arcadius wanted to reserve imperial judgment as a discretionary power over all ecclesiastical matters, attributing to himself the right to intervene, ultimately, even over conciliar decisions. In 398 he issued a constitution (CI 1, 4, 7) that also bore his brother Honorius's name, in which the sphere of application of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was restricted, and immediately afterward a constitution in which powers of legal intervention in the Jewish ethnarch were specified (CTh II, 1, 10). Arcadius died 1 May 408; his son *Theodosius II succeeded him.

J. Straub, Parens principum. Stilichos Reichspolitik und das Testament des Kaisers Theodosius: NClio 4 (1952) 94-115; E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, I, fr. ed. J.-R. Palanque, Amsterdam 1968, 219-252; J.H.W.G. Liebeschuetz, Barbarians and Bishops: Army, Church, and State in the Age of Arcadius and Chrysostom, Oxford 1990; A. Cameron - J. Long, Barbarians and Politics at the court of Arcadius, Berkeley 1993.

G. Pilara

ARCADIUS of Cyprus (d. ca. 640). *Archbishop of *Constantia (dates of his episcopacy unknown) on the island of *Cyprus; died ca. 640 (Van de Ven, La vie ancienne, 101-102). Involved in the first disputes regarding *monothelitism. Author of the Laudatio S. Georgii (BHG 684), handed down in many MSS, edited by Krumbacher-Ehrhard (who used only Paris. Coisl. 146), which, among other things, invokes the saint's intervention to free the church from Arab and Persian oppression. The laudatio of St. John Vladimir (BHG 2195) is an adaptation of this text, and the old Russian ἐγκώμιον of Nicetas, attributed to Arcadius, is a copy (simply replacing George's name with that of the *martyr Nicetas); the text can be read in cols. 1208-1213 of the volume for 14-24 September (St. Pétersburg 1869) of Velikija Minej âetij sobranyja vserossijskim metropolitam Makariem (Noret, Deux avatars, 166, 169). The attribution to Arcadius of the Vita Symeonis stylitae iunioris in monte Mirabili (BHG 1689), found by M. Papadopoulos-Kerameus in MS 108 of St. Sabas at *Jerusalem, is doubtful; the work is also contained in other MSS: see AB 14 (1895) 334. The βίος of the same Simeon derives from it, composed late 10th to early 11th c. by Nicephorus Uranos, magistrate of *Antioch. *John of Damascus, citing a fragment, attributes the Life to Arcadius (PG 94, 1393): doubts about the attribution remain, however, for chronological reasons.

CPG 7983-7984; PG 94, 1393-1396; K. Krumbacher, Der heilige Georg in der griechischen Überlieferung, Munich 1911, 78-81; P. Van de Ven, La vie ancienne de S. Siméon Stylite le Jeune, I, Brussels 1962; R. Aigrain: DHGE 3, 1494-1495; Beck, Kirche, 461-462, 577-578; H. Delehaye, Les saints Stylites, Brussels-Paris 1928, LXII-LXIV, 238-271; J. Noret, Deux avatars du panégyrique de S. Georges par Arcadius de Chypre: AB 92 (1974) 165-170; Patrologia V, 244.

A. Labate

ARCHAEOLOGY, CHRISTIAN
I. Definition and aims - II. History - III. Present situation and outlook.

I. Definition and aims. Christian archaeology as a historical science studies the monuments and material culture of early Christianity from its origins to the end of the ancient world (ca. 600). It reconstructs within the framework of ancient culture the life of Christian communities as expressed in the evidence of material culture. Christian archaeology is thus a discipline of its own within broader archaeological studies, and not a mere "tool of historical theology" (Kaufmann); nor is its main task to "provide church history with the materials of historical evidence" (Andresen). Like the other historical sciences, esp. that closest to it, i.e., classical archaeology, it must take the results of neighboring fields into account in its own research, esp. those of classical archaeology, ancient history, classical philology, Byzantine studies, Jewish antiquities, early church history, *liturgy and *patristics; in turn, Christian archaeology makes the material it has scientifically studied and examined available to these other fields. If Christian archaeology has attained the character of a modern historical discipline, this is the result of a long phase of evolution which began with the first archaeological investigations in the Christian field in the 16th c.; this characterization, however, is not entirely accepted, esp. by some Protestant and Catholic scholars of historical theology, who understand Christian archaeology as an auxiliary science of early church history and patrology, ignoring its art history dimension.

II. History. Christian archaeology had its beginnings in a specific historical situation: the European Renaissance and the resulting cultural and religious changes which gave a new direction to thought in general. The new historical interest that came into being, particularly the study of antiquity—including its artistic and monumental aspects—led to a rediscovery, initially hesitant and almost fortuitous, of the early Christian monuments of antiquity. Cyriac of Ancona, who bore the title of "antiquarius," copied Christian and other inscriptions with particular scientific interest during his trips to Greece and the Greek islands in 1435–1438 and 1444–1448. Andrea Fulvo, in the final chapter of his Antiquitates Urbis Romae (1525), described the city's early Christian churches, while Onofrio Panvinio (1529–1568) wrote a treastise on Christian antiquity (De ritu sepeliendi mortuos apud veteres christianos et de eorumdem coemeteriis, Louvain 1522). Significantly, of 43 *cemeteries listed from literary sources, Panvinio knew only three firsthand. This notwithstanding, his epitaph in S. Agostino, *Rome, could rightly praise him as vir ad omnes et Romanas et Ecclesiasticas Antiquitates e tenebris eruendas natus (a man born to rescue all antiquities, both Roman and Ecclesiastical, from darkness).

This interest in antiquities received new impetus and direction from the turmoil of the 16th-c. Reformation and Counter Reformation. Learned Protestants and humanists, in their rejection of the church's forms of worship, particularly condemned the cult of the saints and *relics, appealing to the way of life and teaching of the primitive church. Thus arose the first great works of ecclesiastical history, e.g., the Historia ecclesiastica secundum centurias of the "Studiosi et pii viri in urbe Magdeburgica" (1559ff.), in which early Christian monuments were cited polemically for the first time. Against this justification of Protestantism through an appeal to primitive Christianity, the Counter Reformation also appealed to the history of the primitive church; besides literary records, monuments now also acquired importance by reason of their undeniable objectivity as evidence of early Christian life and faith. The spiritual center of this tendency can be considered to be the Oratory of S. Maria in Vallicella, Rome, founded by St. Philip Neri, which produced the founder of ecclesiastical *historiography, Cesare Baronio (Baronius). In his monumental work Annales ecclesiastici (1588–1607), which responded to Protestant ecclesiastical historiography on the church's behalf (the original title was, significantly, Historia ecclesiastica controversa) and which became a fundamental work for future ecclesiastical historiography, Baronius made use of the monuments of early Christianity, not only citing them as proof, but reproducing them. Baronius also describes the sensational chance discovery of a catacomb on the Via Salaria with paintings and numerous inscriptions, which made a great stir at the time: though certainly not the first discovery of its kind, it came at a moment when the spiritual climate was ripe for its full appreciation. A Fleming, Philipp de Winghe (d. 1592), copied the catacomb's paintings before its destruction (Biblioteca Vallicelliana, codex 6), as did the Dominican Alfonso Ciacconio (Cod. Vat. Lat. 5409).

During the same period Philip Neri frequented the catacombs of St. *Sebastian, the only ones known to him, for spiritual exercise and *prayer. In the spiritual climate of the time, antiquarian interest in the early Christian monuments combined with religious and apologetic interest in the same monuments spurred by the Counter Reformation. In this spirit and influenced by the humanist Pompeo Ugonio and the Oratory, the Order of Malta's representative at Rome, Antonio Bosio, began exploration of the catacombs. He was the first to visit them systematically, particularly from 1590–1600, study them, take reliefs, prepare plans and copy paintings. His research, esp. the identification of individual cemeteries, presupposes a truly unique knowledge of the sources (index cards in the Oratory Library, Bibl. Vallicelliana, Rome). He set down the results of his research in Roma sotterranea, an extensive description of the catacombs (those already known and those discovered by him), as well as paintings, *sarcophagi, lamps, gold-glass and other objects found therein. The work, published posthumously in 1632, had a great effect on his contemporaries. The scientific exploration of the catacombs effectively began with him, and with it Christian archaeology became a scientific discipline.

Nevertheless, the theological-apologetic interest that had led to the rediscovery and study of the catacombs assumed a dominant role and determined the direction of research, placing the catacombs in a particular light that limited their evaluation and concentrated historical research on cemeteries and related monuments, adduced against Protestant scholars as proof of the continuity of the church's doctrine from the beginning until modern times. The resulting romantic vision of *martyrdom and the martyrs is unfavorably evident in imitators who were not up to the level of a Baronius or a Bosio, and the study of monuments came to a standstill until almost the end of the 17th c. The various editions of Bosio's Roma sotterranea are an index of the enormous interest aroused by this fundamental work (Lat. tr.: Rome 1650; reprinted Cologne 1659 and Paris 1671); the material prepared by these was now worked on by others, including Bosio's friend the Fleming Jan l'Hereux (Johannes Macarius), whose Hagioglypta sive picturae et sculpturae sacrae antiquiores, praesertim quae Romae reperiuntur, explicatae can be seen as a first study of Christian *iconography (publ. 1856 at Paris by R. Garrucci). Also in response to confessional disputes, to the discussion over sacred images and to the iconoclastic tendencies of the Reformation, we find the De picturis et imaginibus sacris liber unus tractans de vitandis circa eas abusibus et de earum significationibus of Johannes Molanus, professor at Louvain (Louvain 1570; [4]1771) and the Discorso delle immagini sacre e profane of Cardinal Gabriele Paleotti (Bologna; Lat. tr.: Ingolstadt 1794), as well as some treatises written by Protestant theologians as late as the 18th c. (among others Friedrich Sponheim d.J., d. 1701).

The extent to which the theological controversies harmed objective research is evident from the first systematic exposition of Christian archaeology, the Strasbourg theologian Balthasar Bebel's Antiquitates ecclesiasticae (Strasbourg 1679). This praiseworthy work takes no account of the basic results reached by Bosio in his study of the catacombs. The same is true of the work of another erudite Protestant, Joseph Bingham's Origines ecclesiasticae or the Antiquities of the Christian Church (London 1708–1722). But even at Rome the study of these monuments came to a halt. The excavations made in the catacombs during this period were not based on scientific methods but were carried out by private citizens or monasteries in search of martyrs and relics. The resulting destruction aroused such criticism that the popes Urban VIII, Alexander VII and Clement XI instituted the position of custodian of relics and cemeteries to look after the catacombs. The custodian Raffaele Fabretti published Greek and Latin inscriptions from the catacombs in volume VIII of his Inscriptionum antiquarum explicatio (Rome 1699; 1702). His successor Marcantonio Boldetti continued this study and discovered new cemeteries, and after more than thirty years of research published his Osservazioni sopra i cimiteri de' santi martiri ed antichi cristiani di Roma (Rome 1720). This was the first extensive collection of new material since Bosio, but without the latter's system or method, finds were not accurately described, nor their provenance indicated. Protestant critics (Acta eruditorum, Leipzig 1° Nov. 1722) rightly pointed out the prevalent apologetic tendency of the work, which tried to confirm the fides cipporum; indeed, the work's main intention was to answer criticisms, both Protestant and Catholic, of the search for relics and martyrs in the catacombs (see, e.g., H. Dodwell, De martyrum paucitate in primaevis Christianorum persecutionibus. Dissertationes Cyprianicae, Oxford 1686). Having to uphold the confessional dispute and justify the cult of the martyrs, the work was not so much a scientific analysis of the catacombs as a canonical treatise on the relics of the saints. At any rate Boldetti proposed to Pope Clement XI the setting up in the Vatican of a collection of Christian epigraphy, thus laying the foundation for a Christian archaeological museum; even minor collections of inscriptions from the catacombs (now in various Roman churches, including what remains of a collection in the atrium of S. Maria in Trastevere) are due to his initiative. In 1736 G.G. Bottari was charged by Clement XII with preparing a new edition of the Bosio's Roma sotterranea (Sculture e pitture sagre estratte dai cimiteri di Roma 1/3, Rome 1737–1754). The work, still influenced by the antiquarian tradition of the Roman Counter Reformation, presents Bosio's engravings accompanied by a text that contributes nothing to the knowledge of the catacombs.

Very useful, on the other hand, are some catalogs of finds from the turn of the 18th c., which tell us of objects now lost: Bartoli, Le antiche lucerne sepolcrali figurate raccolte dalle cave sotterranee e grotte di Roma (Rome 1691); Ciampini, Vetera monumenta in quibus praecipue musiva opera illustrantur (Rome 1690, 1699); Id., De sacris ædificiis a Constantino Magno constructis (Rome 1693); Buonarroti, Osservazioni sopra alcuni frammenti di vasi antichi di vetro ornati di figure, trovati ne' cimiteri di Roma (Florence 1716). Characterized by greater historical rigor were the works of L.A. Muratori (d. 1750): Novus thesaurus veterum inscriptionum (Milan 1739–1742); Antiquitates Italicae medii ævi (Milan 1738–1742). Nonetheless, the study of monuments lost its importance until the mid-19th c. Many works in the tradition of the French Encyclopaedia took early Christian monuments into account, e.g., C.O.F. Clarac, Musée de sculpture II (Paris 1841), in D. Raoul-Rochette, Sur l'origine . . . des types imitatifs qui constituent l'art du christianisme (Paris 1834) and Tableau des catacombes de Rome (Paris 1837). The detailed description of the city of Rome edited by C. Bunsen and E. Platner (Stuttgart 1830–1842) included early Christian basilicas and catacombs. During this period, however, no direct research was done on the Roman catacombs; in fact it was the catacombs of Naples which now attracted scholarly attention (C.F. Bellermann, Über die ältesten christlichen Begräbnisstätten und besonders die Katakomben Neapels, Hamburg 1839), and interest in Christian monuments was growing outside Rome (F. von Quast, Die altchristlichen Bauwerke von Ravenna, Berlin 1842), where until that time research had almost exclusively been concentrated, impelled by confessional controversies.

The reaction in Romanticism to the prevailing classicism in contemporary art brought a new appreciation of the Christian Middle Ages as opposed to Classical Antiquity. The monuments of early Christianity were consequently rediscovered, and their study was no longer strictly tied to theological aspects. In this context of a nascent science of art history in Germany, early Christian art was discovered and defined for the first time, e.g., by C.F. von Rumohr (1785–1843) and F. Kugler (1808–1858). From this new interest in Late Antique and early Christian art arose the first architectural studies (Valentini, La patriarcale basilica Lateranense, Rome 1832, 1834; Id., La basilica Liberiana, Rome 1839; Id., La basilica Vaticana, Rome 1845; H. Hübsch, Die altchristlichen Kirchen, Karlsruhe 1862; F. von Quast, Über Form, Einrichtung und Ausschmückung der ältesten christlichen Kirchen, Berlin 1853), paralleled by studies of medieval churches made in France, Germany and England. At the same time we see in these countries a spread of neo-Gothic art, followed in sacred art by neo-Romanesque and the imitation of early Christian architecture (see the lively debates on the reconstruction of the basilica of S. Paolo fuori le Mura at Rome after the fire of 1823: E. Pallottino, Revival paleocristiani (1764–1870). Architettura e restauro. L'interpretazione delle basiliche di Roma, Rome 1995).

Toward the mid-19th c. the study of the Roman catacombs received new impetus. The Jesuit father P. Marchi resumed systematic study of the catacombs, departing from Bosio's results and topographical method. His student was the young G.B. de Rossi (1822–1894), who applied a rigorous scientific method to the study of the catacombs, thus becoming not just the promoter of this methodology but also the founder of Christian archaeology as a modern historical science for the study of the monumental evidence of early Christianity. To him we owe the discovery in 1849 of the crypt of the popes in the catacombs of S. Callisto, which he had discovered some years earlier. For the first time all available factors—formation of terrain, geological structure, excavating technique, epigraphs, paintings, graffiti, etc.—were methodically used to obtain reliable data. From 1863 the results of his research were published rapidly and in exemplary fashion in the Bullettino di Archeologia Cristiana, founded for that puporse, and presented in the fundamental work Roma sotterranea (Rome 1864–1877), still valuable today. Thanks to de Rossi's basic research, Christian archaeology shared, in methodological approach and objectives, in the progress and enthusiasm that the historical sciences, esp. the study of antiquity, aroused in the 19th c.

The impetus he gave and the general reawakening of ancient studies and archaeology in this period favored the renewed scientific analysis of Christian monuments outside Rome, which up to that time had been the center of attention. F. Bulic began the important excavations of Manastirine/Salona in *Dalmatia, while in France E. Le Blant brought together in great corpora the *sarcophagi and early Christian inscriptions of *Gaul (Recueil des inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule, Paris 1856–1865 and 1892; L'épigraphie chrétienne en Gaule, Paris 1890; Études sur les sarcophages chrétiens antiques de la ville d'Arles, Paris 1888; Les sarcophages chrétiens de la Gaule, Paris 1886). Interest now turned to the Christian monuments of N *Africa and the East. Count M. de Vogüé published his monumental works, still indispensable today, on Les églises de la Terre Sainte, Paris 1860, and on the Christian monuments of *Syria (La Syrie centrale, Paris 1865–1877). P. Delattre and St. Gsell studied the monuments of *Carthage and Algeria. The German architect Salzenberg examined in 1854 the church architecture of the Eastern capital (Altchristliche Baudenkmale in Konstantinopel). The importance of early Christian art in the Eastern *Roman Empire was rightly emphasized by the Viennese scholar J. Strzygowski (1862–1941), who passionately maintained the superiority of the early Christian art of the pars orientis of the empire. Strzygowski thus initiated the hoary "East or Rome" controversy (1901), which died down only in the 1930s when it gave way to a more balanced view of the problems. The results of these studies are set down in works on the art of *Asia Minor (Kleinasien, ein Neuland der Kunstgeschichte, Leipzig 1903; Amida, with a contribution by G.L. Bell, The Churches and Monasteries of the Tur Abdin, Heidelberg 1919; Die Baukunst der Armenier und Europa, Vienna 1918) and on *Coptic art (Catalogue général XII, Musée Le Caire, Vienna 1904). The early Christian monuments of Asia Minor have also been explored by the English NT scholar W.M. Ramsay (Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, Glasgow 1895–1897).

Postclassical Greece now too began to be considered by historians: in 1936 G. Droysen, by the discovery of the *Hellenistic world and the overcoming of the classicist conception of historiography, opened the way to a new understanding of the final period of antiquity. This new approach is evident in A. Mommsen's Athenae Christianae (Leipzig 1863). But this tendency found its most important expression in two fundamental works by the Viennese school which, by stressing those aspects that concerned the history of art, led to a new evaluation of the art of *Late Antiquity, no longer seen as just a product of the decline of Classical Antiquity: F. Wickhoff, Wiener Genesis, Vienna 1895, and A. Riegel, Spätrömische Kunstindustrie, Vienna 1901.

Research after de Rossi, however, was not influenced by these innovative works, nor by the extension of studies to the Christian and Late Antique monuments of the Roman Empire as a whole. In this field, in fact, we find mainly works of an encyclopedic type, such as the Storia dell'arte cristiana nei primi otto secoli della chiesa of R. Garrucci (Prato 1873–1880), and later the large, excellent collections of J. Wilpert (Die römischen Mosaiken und Malereien der kirchlichen Bauten vom 4. bis zum 13. Jh., Freiburg 1916; Die Malereien der Katakomben Roms I-II, Freiburg 1903; I sarcofagi cristiani antichi, Freiburg 1929–1936). These works are still an indispensable collection of material, though their scientific analysis, which, esp. in the iconographic part, essentially comes down to an interpretation of the paintings—tinged with a certain apologetical tendency—could already be considered out of date at the time of publication.

It seems clear that its lack of respect for the results of the history of Late Antique art and its concentration on mainly iconographical questions of a theological-hermeneutical nature led archaeological research on the early Christian period into a state of sterile isolation. Because of the lack of a proper chronological structure and the failure to insert Christian monuments into the artistic and cultural history of Late Antiquity, these monuments lost their real value, esp. regarding their theological interpretation as evidence of the primitive church.

Research into the history of Late Antique art, which received a strong impetus esp. in the 1930s (e.g., Rodenwaldt, Delbrueck, L'Orange), provided a new basis for situating and evaluating early Christian monuments in terms of art history. It was thus that F. Gercke clarified the chronology of 3rd- and early 4th-c. Christian sarcophagi, by starting from Roman-pagan ones, while L'Orange's study of the relief decorations of the arch of *Constantine succeeded in attributing some Christian sarcophagi to the same workshop, thus making an important contribution to 4th-c. Christian plastic art. J. Kollwitz, in an excellent work, studied the Late Antique and early Christian sculpture of the Eastern empire in terms of art history.

Our picture of Christian art in antiquity is continually being modified, in part by excavations, which often bring to light evidence of the primitive church as part of a wider context. The first excavations aimed at finding a Christian monument were those made in 1835 and 1850 in the transept of S. Paolo fuori le Mura, Rome, in search of the apostle's tomb. Excavations in Trier cathedral in 1848–1858 also pertained to Christian archaeology, whereas activity at Rome remained essentially limited to de Rossi's important exploration of the catacombs. Important contributions to the knowledge of early Christian art and architecture were provided by the French excavation campaigns in N Africa (Delattre, Gauckler, Gsell), Egypt (Cledat, Quibell, Kaufmann), Asia Minor (Ephesus by Heberdey; Korykos and Meriamlik by Guyer, Herzfeld) and in the Adriatic region (Salona by Bulic; Aquileia by Swoboda, Niemann, etc.).

20th-c. excavations have produced an unexpected increase in archaeological materials, providing an important contribution to the study of Christian antiquity. Excavations have been made in nearly all the provinces of the Roman Empire: N Africa (Algeria, Tunisia and Libya), Palestine (Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Gerizim etc.), Syria (Antioch, Haurân, Gerasa, Qualat Seman etc., by Morey, Krenken, Naumann, Lassus, Tschalenko, Kraeling etc.), Asia Minor (Church of St. John of Ephesus by Keil, Hörmann; hippodrome, Hagia Sophia, Imperial Palace at Istanbul by Talbot Rice, Schneider, Brett), Spain (Tarragona), S France, the Rhineland, N Italy (Milan, Ravenna), Greece (Macedonia, Epirus, Thessaly, Attica by Orlandos, Soteriou, Lemerle, Pelekanides and others).

III. Present situation and outlook. Among the most important discoveries were those made during the excavations by Yale University and the Académie des Inscriptions in the 1920s and 30s at *Dura Europos, a Roman garrison town on the Euphrates. The ruins of a *synagogue were unearthed, as well as those of the only known example of a Christian church in a private house, which is also the oldest known Christian church building: both are from the first half of the 3rd c. The walls of the two buildings had extensive painted decorations (now preserved at Damascus and Yale) with OT and NT scenes; they are the oldest Jewish and Christian paintings known to us (C.H. Kraeling, Excav. at Dura Europos, Final Report VIII, 1, The Synagogue, New Haven 1956; C. Kraeling, Excav. at Dura Europos, Final Report VIII, 2, The Christian Building, New Haven 1967). The new problems flowing from this important discovery have resulted, esp. in the last decades, in debates (Weitzmann, Strauss, Gutmann, Brandenburg, Stichel) on the problem of the origin of early Christian art, its possible derivation from older Jewish art, the beginnings of ancient miniature painting (Geyer) and its role in the evolution of early Christian iconography.

Particularly important are the excavations done in the 1940s at the direction of Pius XII beneath the basilica of St. Peter in search of Peter's tomb, which the tradition located there; these excavations are clear evidence of the link of Christian archaeological research to that of classical archaeology. Parts of a Roman necropolis with rich sepulchral buildings were found (Von Hesber, Mielsch, Gärtner), and in the middle of these a simple construction of modest dimensions dating from AD 160. This evidently circumscribed the point at which the tradition of the Christian community of the second half of the 2nd c. located the tomb of the prince of the apostles: the explorations thus made accessible the evidence of a nearly 2000-year-old Christian cultic tradition that is also a moment of fundamental importance for universal history (B.M. Apollonj Ghetti, A. Ferrua, E. Josi, E. Kirschbaum, Esplorazioni sotto la confessione di S. Pietro in Vaticano, Vatican City 1951; Ward-Perkins, Toynbee; Thümmel). Other excavations carried out in the city of Rome (Krautheimer, Josi, Perrotti, Prandi, Deichmann, Tschira, Stettner, Brandenburg), esp. during the preparatory work for the Holy Year 2000 (Cecchelli, Guidobaldi, Pronti), have clarified the architectural history of early Christian churches and cemeteries; they also led to the discovery of a new cruciform basilica (Fiocchi Nicolai) and various previously unknown baptisteries (5th-6th c.) of urban churches (S. Cecilia, S. Marcello, S. Clemente, S. Croce etc.).

This improved knowledge of the architecture of the first Roman churches has led to new discussions and attempts at reconstruction of early church furnishings and *liturgical rites (DeBlaauw, Guidobaldi, Brandenburg). Knowledge of the catacombs and their painted decoration has been notably enriched by the discovery and consequent protection by the Pontifical Commission for Sacred Archaeology (which oversees the exploration and preservation of the Christian catacombs) of a private catacomb, almost completely painted, near Via Latina (A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City 1960; Tronzo; Camiruaga). Architectural research of classical archaeology has given new impetus to the study of the catacombs, which we have begun to explore and study as architectural monuments, and seeking to clarify their origins. Helpful in this sense are the research of L. Reekmann on the region of Lucina, Gaius and Eusebius in the catacomb of St. Callisto (1967 and 1988), F. Tolotti on the catacomb of St. Priscilla and Pretestato (1970, 1977, 1980), Fasola in the catacomb of St. Thecla (1970), Pergola in the catacomb of Domitilla (1985/86) and Guyon in the catacomb of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus (1987). The results of these and numerous other studies, conducted with modern archaeological criteria in the subterranean cemeteries and on the venerated tombs of the martyrs, provide a new framework regarding the origin of the catacombs (Brandenburg, Reekmans), their development and function (V.F. Nicolai, F. Bisconti, D. Mazzoleni, Le catacombe cristiane di Roma. Origini, sviluppo, apparati decorativi, documentazione epigrafica, Regensburg 1998) and their decoration (A. Nestori, Repertorio topografico delle pitture delle catacombe romane, Vatican City 1975; Deckers, Mietke, Weiland). The explorations and excavations carried out in the Neapolitan catacomb of St. *Januarius (It. Gennaro) by U. Fasola have brought surprising results and substantially increased the pictorial and mosaic heritage of the catacombs (1975). These studies have made an essential contribution to clarifying the history of the cult of the martyrs, to which individual works based largely on archaeological material (see V. Saxer) are also dedicated.

The enormous growth of material through the explorations and excavations at Rome and in the regions of the Roman Empire now permit a comprehensive view of the development of Christian art, its related iconography and the material culture of the primitive church; but it urgently needs collection and systemization. (A very useful summary is given by Testini's manual and esp. by his Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani [1966].) Nearly a century ago Kautzsch had already attempted to clarify the evolution of Late Antique capitals by a systematic study (Kapitellstudien, Berlin 1936). In the 1930s R. Krautheimer and his collaborators began a systematic architectural study of Rome's early Christian churches (Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae, Vatican City 1937–1977). Another work by R. Krautheimer (Early Christian Architecture, Harmondsworth 1975) is the first attempt at a systematic exposition of early Christian architecture. The available material is enormous, all the more so since a collection "in corpus" of Christian church buildings in the individual regions of the empire (e.g., Syria: Tchalenko, Lassus; Algeria: Christern; Egypt: Grossmann; Aquileia, Noricum: Menis) exists only in outline. The same is true for mosaic floor art, whose survey by regions has long been postulated by the science, even though the whole of the material is impossible to survey because of its immense size, which increases annually (e.g., Greece: Spiro, Pelekanides, Atzaka; Syria-Lebanon: Donceel-Voute; Jordan: Piccirillo; Cyprus: Michaelides; Israel: Ovadiah; Rome: Guidobaldi; Ravenna: Farioli; burial mosaics: Duval). Early Christian sarcophagi have been partially published in new regional collections (Spain: Sotomayor; Ravenna: Kollwitz, Herdejürgen) and are also comprehensively collected in the Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage (I, Rom/Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967; II, Italien, Dalmatien, Museen der Welt, Mainz 1998; III, Frankreich, Algerien, Tunesien, Mainz 2003; IV, Konstantinopel, Griechenland, Kleinasien, Syrien, Mainz 2004; G. Koch, Frühchristliche Sarkophage. Handbuch der Archäologie, Munich 2000). Renewing an earlier collection of Christian inscriptions by de Rossi and Silvagni, A. Ferrua published Inscriptiones Christianae urbis Romae, Vatican City 1956–1980. Regional collections have been published in recent decades for, among others, Greece (Bees, Bandy), Syria (Jalambert, Mouterde), Africa (Février, Duval etc.), Spain (Vives), the Rhineland and Gaul (Gose, Boppert, Gauthier etc.). Some classes of minor arts have also been published (works in ivory: Volbach; goldglass: Morey, Engemann, Pillinger), while the enormous quantity of lamps is being slowly made public in catalogs of collections and excavations. The study of Late Antique pottery has also made tremendous progress in recent decades, providing useful data on Late Antique centers of production and commerce and on the history of settlements (through dating of the pottery), as well as providing an indispensable method for the dating of stratigraphic excavations (Hayes, Salomonsen, Mackensen and others). The study of architectural ornaments (capitals, bases, etc.), in the wake of Kautzsch's work, is setting itself similar tasks; the modification of forms, methods of manufacture and production in specific centers, the preference for marble from Eastern quarries in Late Antiquity and the frequent reuse of elements of ancient architectural decoration (remains) in new architectural contexts, esp. in churches (Pensabene, Brandenburg), give an idea of the passage from the ancient world to the Medieval and *Byzantine world (Deichmann, Sodini, Herrmann, Zollt, Strube, Pensabene).

Dedicated to this problem of the passage from pagan antiquity to the Christian Middle Ages—a central problem of modern research—are not only some comprehensive studies, e.g., that of E. Kitzinger, Byzantine Art in the Making, London 1977, but also particular studies conducted from new perspectives, such as (1) town-planning in the cities of the Late Antique city period and their transformation into Christian cities (Février, Duval, Reekmans; R. Krautheimer, Rome, Profile of a City, Princeton 1980 etc.), (2) the problem of the continuity, or lack of it, of urban life and the urban infrastructure until the early Middle Ages, (3) the decentralization of ancient urban town planning and the new centers of Christian worship (N. Duval, Les premiers monuments chrétiens de la France, Paris 1995–1996) and (4) the change of burial practices (burial in cities and in places of worship) (Harris, Ward-Perkins, Paroli, Delogou, Meneghini, Santangeli Valenzani and others). Further examples are the recent excavations at Rome (Imperial Forum, Crypta Balbi, etc.); the origin of centers of pilgrimage and monasteries as nuclei of Christian settlement (Tchalenko, Reekmans, Christern, Weitzmann, Grossmann, Korol, Lehmann and others); studies indicative of compact areas of settlement with their structural implications of economy and settlement, the development of religious centers, church buildings and secular architecture (Syria: Tchalenko, Villages antiques de la Syrie du Nord, Paris 1953–1958; Strube, Ulbert); the in-depth study of the monuments of a Christian city (F.W. Deichmann, Ravenna, Baden-Baden-Wiesbaden 1958–1974; T. Ulbert, G. Brands, Resafa I-VI, Mainz 1986–2002) or territory (province) as, e.g., Raetia (W. Sydow, Kirchenarchäologie in Tirol und Vorarlberg. Die Kirchengrabungen als Quellen für Kirchenund Landesgeschichte vom 5. bis in das 12. Jh., Vienna 2001). These examples show the process of Christianization of the cities and give an overall view of ecclesial organization almost entirely missing in the written sources.

These studies, which have made an essential contribution to the understanding of Christian antiquity and the beginnings of medieval Christendom, are characterized by the indispensable interweaving of Christian archaeology with the study of Late Antiquity. This mutual penetration, now typical of modern research that applies modern methods of excavation and research (architectural reliefs, photogrammetry, dendrochronology, etc.; Sforz, Cramer, Brandenburg), allows us to reconstruct the transitional phases of the ancient world and to identify the role played by Christianity as the dominant force in ancient society from the 4th c. on. This new, modern approach to Christian archaeology is demonstrated by a variety of great displays that present the results of investigations into Late Antique and Christian culture in exhaustive catalogs (Age of Spirituality, Late Antique and Early Christian Art, New York 1977–1978; Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, Frankfurt 1983–1984; Aurea Roma, dalla città pagana alla città cristiana, Rome 2000; Roma dall'antichità al medioevo. Archeologia e storia, Mus. Naz. Rom. Crypta Balbi, Milan 2001; Christiana loca. Lo spazio cristiano nella Roma del primo millennio, Rome 2002). These studies also show how Christian archaeology has changed from its beginnings in theological (Kontroverstheologie) and apologetic controversy to become a modern historical science, using archaeological discoveries to delineate a history of art and culture in the final phase of the ancient era. At the same time this material is put at the disposal of the theological and historical sciences, which use it to reconstruct the history of the primitive church, its institutions and forms of worship, as well as the beginnings of medieval Christian Europe.

Manuals—history of Christian archaeology: F.X. Kraus, Über Begriff, Umfang, Geschichte der Christlichen Archäologie, Freiburg 1879; O. Marucchi, Eléments d'Archéologie Chrétienne, Rome ²1906; H. Leclercq, Manuel d'Archéologie Chrétienne, Paris 1907; C.M. Kaufmann, Handbuch der Christlichen Archäologie, Freiburg ³1922, 3-48; V. Schultze, Grundriss der Christlichen Archäologie, Gütersloh ²1934, 1-3; F.W. Deichmann, Ausgrabungen im Raum dem Alten Kirche: RGG³ 1 (1957) 762-765; K. Wessel, Archäologie, Christliche: RGG³ 1 (1957) 585-587; E. Coche de la Ferté, A.C.: EAA 1 (1958) 557-561; P. Testini, Armellini, Mariano: DBI 4 (1962) 233-234; G. Soteriou, Christianike kai Byzantine Archaiologia, Athens 1962; A. Pincherle, Baronio, Cesare: DBI 6 (1964) 470-478; E. Schaefer, Kunst, II Christliche Kunst (Topographie, Museen): Lexikon d. Alten Welt, Zürich 1965, 1641-1644; N. Parise, Bosio, Antonio: DBI 13 (1971) 257-259; G. Pignatelli, Bottari, Giovanni Gaetano: DBI 13 (1971) 409-416; S. Mazzarino, L'impero romano, I, Bari 1973, 268-269; A. Effenberger, Frühchristliche Kunst und Kultur, Berlin 1986; G. Koch, Frühchristliche Kunst. Einführung, Stuttgart 1995; F.W. Deichmann, Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1993; H. Brandenburg, Paleocristiana, Arte: EAA suppl. IV (Rome 1994) 210-215.

Journals and publications with bibliography and accounts: American Journal of Archaeology; Annales du Service des Antiquités de Syrie; Archaeological Reports; Archeology Medievale; Acts Congressi Internazionali di Archeology Cristiana; Boreas (Münster); Bulletin de l'association internationale pour l'étude de la mosaïque antique (AIEMA); Bulletin Correspondance Hellénique; Byzantinische Zeitschrift; Byzantion; Cahiers Archéologiques; Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate and Byzantine (Ravenna 1955ff.); Deltion tes Christianikes Archaiologikes Hetaireias; Dumbarton Oaks Papers; Ephemeris Archaiologiki; Fasti Archaeologici; Gesta; Israel Exploration Journal; Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum (JbAChr); Journal of Early Christian Studies; Journal of Roman Archaeology; Karthago; Mitteilungen zur Christlichen Archäologie (Vienna); Mitteilungen zur Spätantiken Archäologie und Byzantinischen Kunstgeschichte (Munich); Oriens Christianus; Palestine Exploration Journal; Praktika tes en Athenais Archaiologikes Hetairias; Qadmoniot; Revue Biblique; Revue d'Histoire Ecclésiastique; RivAC; Römische Quartalsschrift für christliche Altertumskunde; Syria; Theologische Literaturzeitung; Theologische Rundschau; Vetera Christianorum; Vigiliae Christianae; Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum; Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche.

Encyclopedias: Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et liturgie (DACL); Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastique (DHGE); Enciclopedia dell'Arte Antica, Classica and Orientale (EAA); Enciclopedia d'arte medievale (EAM); Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum (EACh); Reallexikon zur Byzantinischen Kunst (RBK).

H. Brandenburg

ARCHAEUS the African (2nd c.). Among the many literary finds of Cardinal Angelo Mai published at Rome in the 10 volumes of his Spicilegium Romanum from 1839–1844 is a fragment that he attributes to Archaeus, identified as bishop of Leptis in *Africa in the second half of the 2nd c. The text (Spic. Rom. III, Rome 1840, 707), taken from an Arabic codex, is a clear exaltation of Sunday as the day of the Lord's *resurrection and therefore the only day on which Christians can and must celebrate Easter. H. Jordan, however, has made a convincing claim for its having been written by *Irenaeus of Lyons.

PG 5, 1489-1490; CPL 2275; ZNTW (1912) 157-160.

V. Loi - B. Amata

ARCHBISHOP (ἀρχιεπίσκοπος). Title arising in the 4th c., used to designate the bishops of the great sees (*Alexandria, *Antioch, *Constantinople, *Jerusalem and *Rome) that would later constitute the five *patriarchates. In some cases, however, it was also applied to metropolitans and to bishops of important episcopal sees (*Ephesus, *Caesarea in Palestine, *Thessalonica, *Seleucia-Ctesiphon and so on). The term had no particular legal significance. The Council of Constantinople of 869 (can. 19) distinguishes archbishops from *metropolitans. In the West the term spread slowly, in general not indicating a precise hierarchy. *Isidore of Seville divides bishops into four categories: bishops, metropolitans, archbishops and patriarchs. The archbishop was called the princeps episcoporum or "chief of the bishiops" (Etym. 7, 12,10); thus he praesidet tam metropolitanis quam episcopis ceteris (ibid., 7, 12,6); that is, "he presides over both metropolitans and the rest of the bishops," but the reality was often different. Only later did the term become a synonym for metropolitan. For the ancient period, the term archbishop is commonly used to indicate the metropolitan.

DACL 1,2731f.; DDC 1,927-934; ODB 1,155-156; Lampe 237; 238f. (archiereus); RAC 1,602-604; LTK³ 4,849f.; Coptic Encyclopedia 1,160f.; Nyermayer, 75; C.H. Turner, Metropolitans and Their Jurisdiction in Primitive Canon Law, in Studies in Early Church History, Oxford 1912, 71-96; E. Herman, Appunti sul diritto metropolitico nella Chiesa bizantina: OCP 13 (1947) 522-550; N. Tomadakis, I titoli "vescovo, arcivescovo e proedro" della Chiesa Apostolica Cretese nei testi agiografici: OCP 21 (1955) 321-326; H. Grotz, Die Hauptkirchen des Ostens von den Anfängen bis zum Konzil von Nikaia (325), OCA 169, Rome 1964; G. Orioli, Gli arcivescovi maggiori, origine ed evoluzione storica fino al secolo settimo: Apollinaris 58 (1985) 615-627; L. Örsy, The Development of the Concept of "Protos" in the Ancient Church: Kanon 9 (1989) 83-97.

A. Di Berardino

ARCHDEACON (ἀρχιδιάκονος). The title and exact function were coined in the 4th c. Optatus of Milevis first used the term to indicate *Caecilian's office at *Carthage before his episcopate (De schism. Donat. 1,16: PL 9, 916); a few decades later *Athanasius is called archdeacon of *Alexandria (Gelasius of C., HE 2,7,44: PG 85, 1244A). The archdeacon was the senior deacon, but since his office was of considerable importance, he was not elected by the other deacons but appointed by the bishop, regardless of his age (Anatolius of CP, Ep. 132,2 [among the letters of *Leo the Gr.]; Theod., HE 1,26,3; Soz., HE 6,30; 8,9; Pall., Vita Chr. 2). Both the term and the institution of the archdeacon appeared and developed in the course of the 4th and 5th c., in both East and West. While the number of deacons varied in each church—*Rome remained faithful to the number seven—there was only one archdeacon: "Every church has one bishop, one archpriest, one archdeacon" (*Jerome, Ep. 125,15). When the bishop wanted to get rid of him, sub honoris specie, he promoted him to the presbyterate (Jerome, Comm. ad Ez. 14,48: PL 25, 484; Leo the Gr., Ep. 111,2). The archdeacon had a *liturgical role: at Alexandria he read the gospel; at *Constantinople he could delegate another to do so (Soz., HE 7,19,6). He was the bishop's closest collaborator (Const. apost. 2,57,16; Pall., Vita Chr. 2: PG 47, 9); for this reason, besides being head of the deacons, he was responsible for the ecclesiastica negotia (see Leo the Gr., Ep. 112,1), indeed, of the dispensationem totius causae et curiae (Leo the Gr., Ep. 111,2), and esp. the organization of all of the community's charitable work (Counc. of Carth., 398, can. 17; Isid. of P., Ep. 1,29: PG 78, 200C; Statuta Ec. ant. 7, ed. Munier; Gelas., Epist. Fr.: PL 59, 100). He oversaw discipline (Optatus of M.: De sch. don. 1,16; Leo the Gr., Ep. 111,2); controlled ordinations and looked after young clergy (Statuta Ec. ant. 94, ed. Munier); stood in for the bishop in his absence (Counc. of Chal. ACO II, 1,2 p. 42, 8); and could represent him even in councils, where he could also speak (Mansi VI, 568; 569; 616; . . . VII, 404; 433). For this reason—esp. at Rome—he was often the bishop's successor.

DACL 2733-2736; DDC 1,948-1004; EC 4,1538-1544 (deacon and archdeacon); J. Bingham, Origines Ecclesiasticae, 1778, II 287-301; LTK³ 4,178-181; LTK³ 1,947f.; Lampe, 237; Coptic Encyclopedia 1,191; Diehl, Indice 321; Du Cange 1,364-365; Nyermayer, 75.

A. Di Berardino

ARCHDEACON, ROMAN. To an anonymous Roman archdeacon (5th c.), perhaps of African origin, are attributed the Postulationes III de reconciliandis peccatoribus. These are *liturgical addresses in which, on the occasion of the reconciliation celebrated on Holy Thursday, the orator asks the bishop and the Roman faithful to readmit the *penitents. Two other discourses on the same argument are attributed to the same author (CPPM 1402 and 1403). The rite, probably very simple, is unknown.

CPL 238; CPPM 1,1401; F. Heylen (1957); CCL 9, 349-363 (with a preface by the translator); Patrologia III, 536; LACL 57.

B. Studer

ARCHELAUS of Carcara (3rd c.). Bishop of Carcara (Mesopotamia), second half 3rd c. Protagonist of a victorious debate with *Mani at the time of the emperor Probus (AD 277), reported in the form of two successive dialogues in the so-called Acts of Archelaus, which have reached us in *Latin translation and of which some Greek fragments remain in *Epiphanius of Salamis (Haer. 66,6-7; 25-31). *Jerome (Vir. ill. 72) attributes the work to Archelaus himself, who is supposed to have written it in *Syriac. In fact its author was *Hegemonius, as we see from the evidence of *Heraclian of Chalcedon, cited by *Photius (Bibl. 85), and from the subscription of a MS of the Latin version. The acts are from the mid-4th c.

CPG II, 3570.

E. Prinzivalli

ARCHIDAMUS (4th c.). Roman priest who, with the priest *Philoxenus and the deacon *Pontius, represented *Julius I at the Council of *Serdica (343) (Mansi III, 66).

DHGE 3, 1548.

E. Prinzivalli

ARCHIMANDRITE. From the Greek archos and mandra, lit. "head of the sheepfold," in a spiritual sense the head of a group of *monks, the *monastery being "a spiritual flock" (PG 79, 496D). The superior of one or more monasteries. Could be a *presbyter, a *deacon or sometimes a simple monk. Among the oldest testimonies are (1) the letter sent to *Epiphanius by "Acacius presbyter and Paul presbyter, archimandrites" (Epiphanius, Adv. Haer., Ep.: PG 41, 156B); (2) *Nilus, who corresponded with 13 archimandrites; and (3) *Palladius in Historia Lausiaca (ca. 410). Various letters of *Isidore of Pelusium (d. 440) are addressed to an archimandrite. The term originated in Syrian monasticism and was common in Greek-speaking circles. The archimandrite was always an ordinary superior of a community but sometimes ranked higher than the proestos or the *hegumen. According to time and place the term could also indicate different functions in the monastery and could also be synonymous with *abbot or hegumen, or indicate the title of an office conferred by the bishop or patriarch on an unmarried presbyter (Mansi 7,61C-64C). There were many archimandrites at *Constantinople (Cyril Al., Ep. 2: PG 64, 229; Mansi 4,1428B); the condemnation of the archimandrite *Eutyches, on 22 November 448, was subscribed to by 23 archimandrites (Mansi 6,752); Pope *Leo addressed a letter to 17 monks, called archimandrites (Mansi 6,88); archimandrites were also present at ecumenical councils (Mansi 4,1101; 5,1232; 6,617D, 621C etc.).

DACL 1,2739-2761; DIP 1,789-790; ThLL 2,462; ODB 1,156; Coptic Encyclopedia 1,192-194; Nyermayer, 75f.

A. Di Berardino

ARCHONTICS. (Archontici). According to *Augustine, De haer. 20: "The Archontics take their names from the archons; they hold that the universe that God created is the work of the archons. They also practice a certain immorality. They deny the resurrection of the flesh." In fact, the Archontics (Gk. Ἀρχοντικοί, Lat. Archontici, Archontiaci) were a 4th-c. *gnostic sect, widespread in *Palestine and *Armenia, which took its name from the seven archons, lords of the seven planetary spheres. *Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, is the principal source of information on the arcontici (Pan. 40,2; Anaceph. 40), based on his firsthand knowledge of the sect. The other Greek (e.g., Theodor., Haer. fab. comp. 1,16: PG 83, 360D-361D), Latin (as, e.g., the cited passage from Augustine, as well as his comments in Praed. 20) and *Syriac sources (such as Theodore bar Koni, Lib. Schol. 11) are all dependent on him. According to Epiphanius, the Archontics were founded by a Palestinian priest, Peter of Cabarbaricha, who, deposed from the priesthood during the *Arian controversy (mid-4th c.), took refuge in an *Ebionite community. Around 360, already advanced in age, he lived an eremitic life in poverty in a cave near *Jerusalem, where he transmitted his doctrines to Eutactus (no better known than he was), who spread them in Armenia. Epiphanius, consecrated bishop in ca. 365, excommunicated Peter. Among the sacred writings of the Archontics (lost) were, according to Epiph., Pan. 40,2,1.3, the small and large Symphonia, perhaps a "harmony" of the celestial spheres or a work dedicated to the goddess Symphonia who reigns above the planets; books attributed to Seth which relate the Archontics to the gnosis of the Sethians, who considered themselves descendants of Eve's third son, Seth, and professed a rigid dualism between the lower world, the kingdom of evil and the work of a demiurge, and the higher, to which only the souls—and not the bodies—of a few can ascend through knowledge.

Other writings of the Archontics were the so-called allogeneis books, probably similar to writings like the treatise of *Nag Hammadi titled Allogenes (NHC XI, 3, see Allogenes, tr. J.D. Turner - O.S. Wintermute, in The Nag Hammadi Library, ed. J.M. Robinson, San Francisco ²1990); the Ἀναβατικὸν Ἠσαΐα (Pan. 40,2,2), which, like the Ascension of Isaiah*, describes a celestial journey, that of the soul after death; and the visions of Martias and Marsianus, two prophets caught up into heaven, also mentioned in other sources. The Archontic system has traits in common with the Sethians described by Epiphanius in Pan. 39 and, more generally, with the treatises of Nag Hammadi connected with "Sethian gnosis." At the summit of the divine world are the Father of All—the good God, ineffable and incomprehensible power—and the Luminous Mother. The heavens are divided into an ogdoad (eight) and a hebdomad (seven): the eighth is the seat of the Mother, while the seven heavens are the dominion of the seven archons, who are helped by their creatures the angels, caretakers of souls, and ruled by the sovereign or tyrant of the seventh heaven, Sabaoth, God of the Jews. This latter is not good like the supreme God, but neither is he evil like his own son, the devil or Satan, who, fallen to earth, now exercises his power there. According to Epiphanius's summary, the Archontics held that the demon, in rebellion against paternal authority, united with Eve and generated Abel and Cain, and from them humanity. After Cain killed Abel, Eve united with Adam, generating Seth. To prevent Seth also from being killed by Cain, the Luminous Mother caught him up to the divine world, from where he later descended to announce the cult of the ineffable power and to reveal the inferiority of the demiurge and his archons. In this way, Seth founded the race of the elect, which extended as far as Jesus, considered by the Archontics to be Seth's incarnation. Souls must tend to the attainment of knowledge (gnosis) to escape the evil power of Sabaoth.

Everything turns on knowledge: thus the soul of the gnostic, which has recognized its true spiritual origin, is capable, after death, of crossing the 7 archontic spheres unharmed, thanks to passwords (ἀπολογίαι) that let him avoid being engulfed by the various archons, thus returning for eternity to the heavenly homeland. The Archontics practiced a life of rigorous *ascesis, *fasting frequently and keeping to poverty; consistent with their theoretical dualism, they denied the resurrection of the body, but not of the soul, and condemned the *sacraments (μυστήρια), esp. *baptism, which they considered to be introduced by the tyrant Sabaoth to imprison souls. It seems that the Archontics were also linked to the sect of the *Ophites, thus named because they saw in the serpent (ὄφις) the possessor of knowledge (gnosis). The Ophites' mythology seems to have been very complex, with a marked dualism: in his perennial battle with Darkness, the divine Light, during his descent, ends by being imprisoned in matter, from which he wants to escape; the divine Redeemer is Christ, seemingly not identified with Jesus of Nazareth. Dualism, the themes of light and knowledge, and the hierarchy of reality characterize both tendencies.

A. Resch (ed.), Agrapha. Aussercanonische Schriftfragmente. Gesammelt und untersucht und in zweiter völlig neubearbeiteter durch alttestamentliche Agrapha, Leipzig ²1906, 380-384, the Preghiera di Giuseppe (Logia 2, 3a) derives from one of the Archontic sects; see ibid. 295ff., on Logion 2. A. von Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, I, 2, Leipzig 1958 (repr.), 845-865. H.Ch. Puech, Fragments retrouvés de l'Apocalypse d'Allogène, in Mélanges Cumont, Brussels 1936, 935-962; Id., art. Archontiker, RAC 1,633-643; A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica e suoi riflessi nella liturgia e nei monumenti, Bari 1973 (Quaderni di VetChr 7); F.T. Fallon, The Enthronement of Sabaoth: Jewish Elements in Gnostic Creation Myths, Leiden 1978 (Nag Hammadi Studies 10); G. Filoramo, Luce e gnosi, Rome 1980 (SEA 15); S. Pétrement, Le Dieu séparé: les origines du gnosticisme, Paris 1984; H.A. Green, The Economic and Social Origins of Gnosticism, Atlanta, GA 1985 (Society of Biblical Literature Dissertations 77); I.S. Gilhus, The Nature of the Archons, Wiesbaden 1985; G. Filoramo, L'Attesa della fine: storia della gnosi, Rome-Bari 1987, with bibl. 291-304; K.L. King, Images of the Feminine in Gnosticism, Philadelphia 1988; G. Filoramo, La Grande Madre e la Gnosi, in Il risveglio della gnosi ovvero diventare Dio, Rome-Bari 1992, 113-121 (art. of 1989); W. Wink, Cracking the Gnostic Code: The Powers in Gnosticism, Atlanta 1993 (Society of Biblical Literature Monographs 46); Apocalittica e gnosticismo: atti del Colloquio internazionale, Roma, 18-19 giugno 1993, ed. M.V. Cerutti, Rome 1995; W.A. Löhr, Basilides und seine Schule, Tübingen 1996 (Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 83), with bibl. 338-382; G. Casadio, Vie gnostiche all'immortalità, Brescia 1997 (Letteratura cristiana antica 4); Marsanès (NH X), ed. tr. W.P. Funk - P.H. Poirier - J.D. Turner, Québec-Louvain-Paris 2000 (Bibliothèque copte de Nag Hammadi. Études 27); Gnosticism and Later Platonism, eds. J.D. Turner - R. Majercik, Atlanta 2000 (SBL symposium series 12).

On the connections of the Archontics with the Ophites, and esp. with the Sethians: H. te Velde, Seth, God of Confusion: A Study of His Role in Egyptian Mythology and Religion, Leiden 1967 (Probleme der Ägyptologie 6); A.F.J. Klijn, Seth in Jewish, Christian and Gnostic Literature, Leiden 1977 (NTSuppl 46); G.W. McRae, Seth in Gnostic Texts and Traditions, SBL 177 Seminar Papers, Missoula 1977, 17-24; B.A. Pearson, Egyptian Seth and Gnostic Seth, SBL 1977 Seminar Papers, Missoula 1977, 25-43; The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, II, Sethian Gnosticism, ed. B. Layton, Leiden 1981; J.D. Kaëstli, L'interprétation du serpent de Genèse 3 dans quelques textes gnostiques et la question de la gnose "ophite," in Gnosticisme et monde hellénistique, eds. J. Ries

- Y. Janssens - J.M. Sevrin, Louvain 1982, 116-130; Le deuxième traité du Grand Seth: NH VII, 2, ed. tr. L. Painchaud, Québec 1982 (Bibliothèque copte de Nag Hammadi, Textes 6); J.-M. Sevrin, Le dossier baptismal séthien: études sur la sacramentaire gnostique, Québec 1986 (Bibliothèque copte de Nag Hammadi, Études 2); J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism: A Literary History, in W. Hedrick - R. Hodgson, Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism and Early Christianity, Peabody, MA 1986, 55-86; G. Casadio, Antropologia gnostica e antropologia orfica nella notizia di Ippolito sui Sethiani, in Sangue e antropologia nella teologia, ed. F. Vattioni, III, Rome 1989, 1295-1350; S.T. Carroll, The Apocalypse of Adam and the Pre-Christian Gnosticism, VC 44 (1990) 263-279; Gnostic Dualism in Asia Minor During the First Centuries A.D., I, publ. J.C. Gieben 1993 (The Light and the Dark: A Cultural History of Dualism 8), ch. IV: Seth's Progeny; ch. V: The Serpent and Its Retinue: The Ophites and Related Sects; M. Broze, Les aventures d'Horus et Seth dans le papyrus Chester Beatty I: mythe et roman en Égypte ancienne, Louvain 1996 (Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta 76); G. Hanratty, Studies in Gnosticism and in the Philosophy of Religion, Dublin 1997; H.W. Attridge, Valentinian and Sethian Apocalyptic Tradition, JECS 8 (2000) 173-211; J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism and the Platonic Tradition, Québec-Louvain-Paris 2001 (Bibliothèque copte de Nag Hammadi, Études 6), with bibl. 761-788.

On the Ascension of Isaiah, cited as Ἀναβατικὸν Ἠσαΐου by Origen, Ep. ad Africanum, Epiphanius, Haer. XL 2, LXVII 3, Jerome, In Esaiam, LXIV 4 and others in Fabricius, Cod. Vet. Test., I, 1086ff., and variously dated from the mid 1st to the early 3rd c., discovered and published by Lawrence in 1819, see the editions The Amherst Papyri, Being an Account of the Greek Papyri in the Collection of the Right Hon. Lord Amherst of Hackney . . . at Didlington Hall, Norfolk, by B.P. Grenfell - A.S. Hunt, I-II, London 1900-1901, and esp. Ascensio Isaiae, I, testi in etiopico, greco, copto, latino e slavo antico con tr. it. di P. Bettiolo et al.; II, commenti di E. Norelli, Turnhout 1995 (CC, Apocrypha 7-8).

I. Ramelli

ARCHPRIEST. Initially the senior *presbyter, without any specific authority; with the growth of the presbyterium his function became that of head of the presbyters, and he filled in for the bishop in ordinary pastoral activities when the latter was absent (whereas the *archdeacon filled in for administrative and financial matters). There was one archpriest for every local church: "Every church has one bishop, one archpriest, one archdeacon" (Jerome, Ep. 125,15). In Merovingian *Gaul, however, there were the archipresbyteri vicari (of the village) (see Council of *Tours, 567, can. 20), priests in charge of parishes with other clergy.

DDC 1,1004-1026; Nyermayer, 76.

A. Di Berardino

ARETHAS (6th c.). The city of Nagran was conquered in 523 by Du Nuwas, king of the Jewish *Himyarites, who massacred those inhabitants who would not renounce Christianity. Among them was Al-Harith, whom Greco-Latin texts call Arethas. Du Nuwas related a summary of the events in a letter to the king of the Arab Himyarites. Present at its reading were bishops George of Rusafah and Simeon of Bet-Arsham; the latter wrote a letter (BHO 99), the former a passion (BHO 105), to pass on what they had learned. The original *Syriac of the passion was translated into Greek (BHG 166-167) and *Latin (BHL 671). The Latin version was made at *Naples, where it seems there was a church in honor of the *martyr, renamed Santa Reta in the 17th c.

Vies des SS., Paris 1952, 10, 810; DHGE 3, 1650-1653; LTK 1,892; BS 2,401-403; J. Ryckmans, La Persécution des chrétiens himyarites, Istanbul 1956, 18ff.; BBKL 1,207-208; LTK 1, 832.

V. Saxer

ARGUMENTATION, PATRISTIC. Ever since later Christian generations began to look back at the primitive community (see 1 Cor 11:23; 15:3), Christian life has been guided by *tradition, the normative principle inherited from *Judaism and reinterpreted in the light of the religious and cultural traditions of Greco-Roman antiquity. Defended ca. 200 under the aspect of *apostolocity (*Irenaeus, *Tertullian) (see TRE 3 [1979] 445-466), the ecclesiastical tradition was gradually associated with individual leaders endowed with authority: *presbyters (Irenaeus), bishops considered to be fathers of the faith, "ecclesiastical fathers" (*Eusebius of Caesarea) and especially with the members of synods, above all the "318 fathers" of *Nicaea (see Sieben, Konzilsidee). Thus during the 4th c., principally in the context of the *Arian controversy (see Simonetti, Tetz), there developed what is called patristic argumentation, i.e., the theological method which rested on the authority of the Fathers, not only through a general appeal to their ancient faith, in conformity with the Scriptures and the apostolic tradition, but also from memory citing precise passages, of greater or lesser length, with the name of the respective author and work (even down to book and chapter). This new form of theological proof obviously resembles that of the by-now-familiar scriptural testimonia, found from the apologists on, especially in various tractatus adversus Iudaeos (*Justin, Tertullian, *Cyprian). There is no doubt, however, that the development of patristic argumentation was influenced not just by the Jewish traditions but also by the classical culture of its promoters: by literary commentaries on renowned authors, by the philosophers' custom of transmitting the heritage of the great teachers in anthologies, and by jurisprudence which interpreted laws by appealing to the authority of famous jurists of the past (Chadwick). Particularly noteworthy is the familiarity of Christian authors with ancient methods of intepretation of literary, philosophical and legal texts: they explained the texts or discussed the quaestiones they generated, not only secundum rationem but also secundum auctoritatem (see Lütcke, in AugL I,498-510, with Cicero, Topica 73; 77f.).

The evolution of patristic argumentation was marked above all by three theologians: *Basil of Caesarea (d. 379), *Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) and *Augustine (d. 430). Basil, in order to defend the divinity of the Holy Spirit against the pneumatomachi, argued first on the authority of the Nicene faith, then on *baptismal faith and *liturgical practices—and finally on the ancient evidence of individual authors. Attributing to these latter the unwritten tradition—an expressly justified concept—Basil calls them "witnesses and defenders of this word" (σύν in the *doxology), the "old saints" and "our fathers," and characterizes their doctrine as a "paternal inheritance" (Spir. Sanct. 29,71). He lists some of them, citing specific passages (*Dionysius of Alexandria, *Clement of Rome, Irenaeus, Eusebius of Caesarea, *Origen, *Julius Africanus, *Athenagoras [?]), while others he mentions only by name (*Gregory the Great, i.e., the Thaumaturge, particularly esteemed, our *Firmilian, *Meletius [Spir. Sanct. 29,72ff.]). Thus Basil may be considered the first to have developed patristic argumentation (Pruche), and not without a certain methodological reflection. In a similarly polemical context, Cyril of Alexandria began, ca. 428, to develop patristic argumentation with a view to a right interpretation of the faith of Nicaea. Given that the authority of this council was recognized by everyone of his time (see Sieben), he defended his *christological position, more or less centered on the contested term θεοτόκος, by interpreting the second article of Nicaea on Jesus Christ our Lord, true God and truly incarnate for our salvation, in line with its great defenders such as *Athanasius, doing so in his letter to the Egyptian *monks, in his Apologies against the Easterners, in the documentation he sent to *Rome and in his letter to *Andrew of Samosata (see Nacke). In these documents, Cyril expresses his concept of "Fathers": they include the defenders of Nicaea, but in a wider sense they include all bishops, known for their life and doctrine, who in the end died in the Lord. He himself is convinced that he lives in the succession of these holy doctors (see also *Theodoret, Ep. 89). Probably under his influence, the Council of *Ephesus (431) supplemented its synodal argumentation with patristic argumentation, evaluating the disputed arguments of Cyril and *Nestorius not only compared with the Nicene faith but also with the sententiae Patrum (see Vincent of L., Comm. 30f., and the acts of the council). Clearly this authoritative use of patristic argumentation was decisive for posterity. In any event, after the council this method was accepted by both Alexandria and *Antioch (Richard), as well as in the West (*Leo the Great). Whether in support of or disputing the conformity of Cyril's Christology with *Chalcedonian faith, theologians proposed *florilegia from both *monophysites and *dyophysites, also critically examining the authenticity and pertinence of the testimonia presented by their adversaries (Studer, in Stor. Teol. I,585ff.).

In the West patristic argumentation appeared above all in Augustine's literary work. He had already used it prior to the Council of Ephesus, though to a different purpose: in the *Donatist controversy, he was obliged to discuss the authority of *Cyprian, invoked by the Donatists along with that of the *African synods (see BA 28,68, bibl.). While he shared his adversaries' esteem for the most eminent witnesses of the African tradition, he did not fail to emphasize their inferiority with respect to the divine authority of Sacred Scripture. When, after the condemnation of the Donatists in 411, new difficulties provoked by *Celestius and *Pelagius disturbed the church of *Carthage, in the third book of his first anti-Pelagian writing Augustine defended African baptismal practice, appealing not only to the Bible but again to Cyprian, who spoke with certainty, "departing from the ancient and indubitable rule of faith" (Pecc. mer. III, 5,10f., with Ep. 64). To confirm his *exegesis of Rom 5:12-18, Augustine also referred to two texts of *Jerome, "so renowned for fame and dedication in ecclesiastical letters" (Pecc. mer. III 6,12–7,13). He did not, however, simply base his conclusions on the judgment of this or that author as though they had canonical authority but rather demonstrated that the exegetes themselves had constantly kept the church's faith (see Serm. 294,20,19). At about the same time, Augustine discussed in two letters the problem of the vision of God (Ep. 47f.). In the first he confirmed his interpretation of the biblical texts using the judgment of two men with excellent biblical knowledge: *Ambrose, whose texts he discusses at length (see esp. Ep. 147,6,17f.), and Jerome, of whom he only cites two brief passages (Ep. 147,23.53). In the second letter Augustine does not discuss biblical passages at length, instead giving much space to patristic argumentation, presenting a florilegium of eleven texts, taken from four Latin and Greek ecclesiastical authors: Ambrose, Jerome, Athanasius and Gregory (?) (Ep. 148,2,6-4,14). In 415 Augustine took a position against the work De natura, composed by Pelagius before 414 and sent to Augustine by two friends. The Breton monk added a patristic florilegium to the biblical testimonia in defense of his opinion (see Nat. Gr. 61,71), a procedure which Augustine did not reject, but criticized, seeing the texts as testimonia media, i.e., ambiguous (Nat. Gr. 61,71). For their correct evaluation they must be compared with clear biblical passages—which are always the most authoritative—or with the context of the patristic testimonia (Nat. Gr. 61,71-67,81, see esp. Nat. Gr. 67,80f., with the discussion of Augustine's own texts—see also Ep. 180,3; 5). Moreover, Augustine would later have to admit that he was deceived by a text attributed to Pope *Sixtus (see Retract. II,42). After the promulgation of *Zosimus's tractoria, Augustine composed, in the summer months of 418, the Grat. Chr. et pecc. orig., concluding both books with patristic argumentation. In the first book he cites Ambrose (I 42,46-50,55), whom Pelagius himself recognized as a testimony to Roman faith (I 43,47), though Augustine interpreted Ambrose more accurately, based on the context and on clearer Ambrosian texts (see I 47,52–49,54). In the second book, in which he defends the much-debated doctrine of the tradux peccati, Augustine again used texts of Ambrose (II 41,47f.). Similarly, in the C. Ep. Pel., Augustine defends the Roman church, attacked by the Pelagians, this time citing not only Ambrose (IV 11,29-31) but many texts of Cyprian, also one of Pelagius's teachers (IV 8,21-10,28, see esp. IV 8,21: notissimum . . . ipse . . . Pelagius cum debito certe honore commemorat, ubi Testimoniorum librum scribens eum se asserit imitari [Even . . . Pelagius . . . himself mentions (the most blessed Cyprian) with the honor that is certainly due him . . . when, writing a book of testimonies he asserts that he is imitating him]—see also Nupt. et conc. II 39,51). In Augustine's works written after 421 against *Julian of Eclanum, he takes up patristic argumentation not so much to defend the traditions of Carthage and Rome but to refute the accusation of being a *Manichean and an innovator (BA 23,776f.). While Julian tends to reduce the authority of the ecclesiastical writers to that of men distinguished by ratio, eruditio and libertas (C. Iul. II,36ff.), Augustine was careful to cite authors of different eras and regions as scriptores et tractatores who, from within the community of the church, had always proposed authentic biblical doctrine (see C. Iul. I 3,5; I 7,32ff.; II 10,33-37 [basic text]; C. Iul. imp. I,6; IV,122: discussion on the authority of Cyprian and Ambrose).

Augustine thus made use of patristic argumentation from the beginning of the 5th c. There is little value, however, in identifying later phases of an increasingly perfected patristic method: given that Augustine constantly argued ad hominem, it is more useful to give attention to the historical circumstances of his recourse to the Fathers. In any case, he always held to the principle of the higher authority of Sacred Scripture vis-à-vis all human authorities (see Pecc. mer. III 7,14; Nat. Gr. 61,71). Moreover, his reason for appealing to the authority of the ecclesiastical writers was twofold. On the one hand, Augustine wanted to uphold the traditions of Carthage and Rome, and he thus had recourse above all to Cyprian and Ambrose. On the other hand, he sought to confirm his interpretation of the biblical texts under discussion (esp. Rom and Gal), with Jerome being his principal witness on this level (see Pecc. mer. III 6,12; C. Iul. II 10,33). He thus refuted the patristic testimonia alleged by Pelagius and Julian, and added other testimonia in favor of his position. To strengthen his argument, he referred to authors who lived prior to the controversy and were thus unprejudiced witnesses (see C. Iul. II 10,33). He also discussed writers (esp. Eastern) because they had been cited by his adversaries. It is especially noteworthy that his critique—attention to the author of a cited work, to the consensus of writers (see Maschio), to the context of the testimonia, to the clearest passages—resembles his biblical hermeneutic, expounded in Doct. chr. (see Ep. 148,4,15; Grat. Chr. et pecc. orig. 49,54; C. Iul. I 7,34; II 10,33f.). Nevertheless, Augustine never presented a theory of patristic argumentation, though he in a certain sense summed up his ideas by calling the saints and famous bishops of God Ecclesiae catholicae filii discendo, patres docendo (C. Iul. imp. IV,112). Two other things are clear. First, Augustine was moved to recourse to Christian writers especially by Pelagius, who in De natura had applied the term testimonium, used by Cyprian, to patristic proofs (see BA 23,824f.). Second, Augustine was always disposed to learn from others (see Retract. I 23,1; Trin. I 4,7; C. Iul. VI 23,70). That patristic argumentation was quite common, at least by 415, is also confirmed by the fact that Augustine developed this method at the same time when, in the composition of his apology De civitate Dei, he felt the need to present his knowledge of profane authors (see Lütcke, Auctoritas, 39-46). Under Augustine's influence, but also that of Greek *theology and in particular of the general classicist climate of the time (see Jerome; Pelagius), patristic argumentation continued to spread in the West (see *Prosper of Aquitaine; *John Cassian). Indeed, it found its first theorist in *Vincent of Lérins who, following Augustine's principles, established as a criterion of *orthodoxy the consensio ecclesiae antiquae et universalis (see Sieben, Konzilsidee, 154) and who, in view of the antiquitas that he preferred to the consensio universalis emphasized by Augustine, mentions especially the evidence of the Fathers (Comm. 30f.; see Excerpta I,1: PLS 3,25; Decretum Gelasianum* 4,3).

Finally, from the 5th c., patristic argumentation developed both in the East, along with the reception of the Nicene faith, and in the West, especially in the Pelagian controversy, in which the traditions of the churches of Carthage and of Rome were in question, as well as the correct interpretation of the biblical texts under discussion. Criticism of patristic texts, like that of biblical texts, was further reinforced after the Council of *Chalcedon. On the other hand, esteem for patristic theology increasingly centered in the East on the acceptance of Cyril of Alexandria, and in the West on the reception, somewhat critical, of Augustinian theology (see Studer, in Stor. Teol. I,584-590). In this sense both *Byzantine and Latin theology would become patristic (against Graumann, 13).

M. Tetz, Zum Streit zwischen Orthodoxie und Häresie an der Wende des 4. zum 5. Jh.: Anfänge des expliziten Väterbeweises: Evang. Theol. 21 (1961) 354-368; E. Nacke, Das Zeugnis der Väter in der theologischen Beweisführung Cyrills von A. nach seinen Briefen und antinestorianischen Schriften, Diss. Münster 1965; W.D. Connor, St. Vincent of Lerin and St. Augustine, Diss. Gregoriana, Rome 1964; H. Jaeger, La preuve judiciaire d'après la Tradition rabbinique et patristique, Recueils de la Société Jean Bodin, Brussels 1964, 514-594; B. Pruche, Basile de C., Sur le Saint-Esprit: SC 17bis, Paris 1968; H. Chadwick, Florilegium: RAC 7 (1969) 1131-1160; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius (Stuttgart 1975), 275-278; J. Fellermayr, Tradition und Sukzession im Licht des römisch-antiken Erbdenkens, Munich 1979; H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979: G. Blum, in TRE 3 (1978) 445-466; G. Maschio, L'argomentazione patristica di s. Agostino nella prima fase della controversia pelagiana: Augustinianum 26 (1986) 459-479; E. Dassmann, Ambrosius: AugL I/1-2 (1986) 270-285; B. Studer, in Storia Teologia I (1993) 458-461; 583-598; K.H. Lütcke, Auctoritas: AugL I/4 (1990) 498-510; E. Dassmann, Cyprianus: AugL II/2 (1996) 196-211; St.G. Hall, in TRE 33 (2002) 97-106; B. Neuschäfer, Florilegium: LACL[2] 270f.; T. Graumann, Die Kirche der Väter: Vätertheologie und Väterbeweis in den Kirchen des Ostens bis zum Konzil von Ephesus (431), Tübingen 2002 (bibl.). See also the respective notes in NBA 17-19 and in BA 21-24.

B. Studer

ARIOMANITAE (Ἀρειομανῖται). Name disparagingly applied to the *Arians from the start of the controversy by *Eustathius, *Alexander and then by *Athanasius (PG 25, 488; 26, 940C) and others. The term was based on the affinity between Areios and Ares, the god of war and homicidal rage: from areimanēs (possessed by Ares's frenzy) was coined areiomanitēs (possessed by Arius's frenzy).

See Lampe 224.

M. Simonetti

ARISTEAS, Letter of. Jewish document intending to explain how the Law was translated from Hebrew to Greek by 72 sages of *Jerusalem, summoned to the Museum of *Alexandria by Ptolemy Philadelphus in the mid-3rd c. BC. The author tries to lend a sacred character to a simple Greek translation of the Pentateuch, made for the internal needs of the Alexandrian community and for propaganda among the *pagans; his objective was to convince the Jews to accept Greek culture. In the letter *Hellenistic culture is presented as *monotheistic, with no effort to point out its moral and religious depravity. *Judaism, however, is presented as a monotheistic philosophy without historical and national dimensions: the Torah should be written in a universal language, Greek. Some accept the historical basis of the legend and attribute the translation to the initiative of the first monarch, to allow Greek officials a means of access to the legislation proper to the Jewish ethnic group. The letter, however, contains obvious anachronisms which show the historical background to be fictitious. Its composition must be put between the period of the presumed sponsor, Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–247 BC) and Flavius Josephus (AD 37–110?); the latter paraphrases the text. The author presents himself as a pagan Greek but in fact was a Hellenized Jew. The legend was enriched over time with elements aimed at stressing the inspired character of the Septuagint. The one fantastic part of Aristeas's account is that the translation was done in 72 days. *Philo (Vit. Mos. II, 37) sees divine inspiration in the miraculous agreement among the translators. At the end of the 2nd c. the bishop of Lyons, St. *Irenaeus (Haer. III, 21,2; see Eus., HE V, 8, 11), emphasizes the same purported miracle, despite the precautions taken by Ptolemy to prevent the translators from consulting one another. The Scriptures were thus translated, according to him, under divine inspiration (Haer. II, 21,4). *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. I, 148) specifies that the Seventy translated the Law and the Prophets. He claims to know that the translators were kept separate from one another and considers the work a sort of prophecy in Greek. According to *Julius Africanus (Ep. ad Origenem: PG 11, 45A), the translation included the whole OT. *Cyril of Jerusalem (Cath. IV, 34) also emphasizes the agreement among the translators, who were kept apart, to affirm as well that the translation was done under the inspiration of the *Holy Spirit. *Epiphanius (Mens. 3: PG 43, 242) attests to the whole legend in its final development. *Jerome rails against the various elements added to the account of Aristeas and Josephus (Praef. in Pent.: PL 28, 150-152), insisting that the translation included only the Pentateuch (Quaest. in Gen.: PL 23, 985; Comm. in Ezech. 5,12: PL 25, 57C; Comm. in Michaeam 2: PL 25, 1227D). All this notwithstanding, he respected the Greek translation, which he considers infallible through the assistance of the Holy Spirit, and does not doubt Aristeas's account. The explanation proposed by the author (Arist. 143-169) regarding some of the Jewish law's dietary precepts (Lev 11) is one of the first examples of *allegorical *exegesis in Judaism. The author selects precepts which, understood symbolically, allow him to introduce an exhortation to justice and an admonition against abuse of power. The Letter thus strips the theme of justice of its traditional prophetic quality to clothe it anew in moralizing popular philosophy. By the simple introduction of the idea of a sovereign God, his message became acceptable to both Jews and Greeks.

R. Tramontano, La lettera di Aristea a Filocrate, Naples 1931 (text and tr.); A. Pellettier, Lettre d'Aristée à Philocrate, SC 89, Paris 1962; G. Delling, Bibliographie zur jüdisch-hellenistischen und intertestamentarischen Literatur (1900–1965), TU 106, Berlin 1969, [2]1975; A. Kasher, The Jews in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt: The Struggle for Equal Rights, Tübingen 1985; N. Fernández Marcos, El "sentido profundo" de las prescripciones dietéticas judías (Carta de Aristeas, 143-169), in D. Muñoz León (ed.), Salvación en la Palabra. Tárgum - Derash - Berith. En memoria de prof. A. Díez Macho, Madrid 1986, 553-562; D.L. Balch, Attitudes Toward Foreigners in 2 Maccabees, Eupolemus, Esther, Aristeas, and Luke-Acts, in A.J. Malherbe - F.W. Norris - J.W. Thompson (eds.), The Early Church and Its Context: Essays in Honor of E. Ferguson, Leiden 1998, 22-47.

R. Trevijano

ARISTIDES (2nd c.). With *Quadratus, Aristides is among the earliest *apologists. The sources call him an Athenian. His Apologia is addressed to *Hadrian (117–138) or to *Antoninus Pius (138–161) in the first years of his reign. The work, as we can reconstruct it today, is divided into 17 chapters. After stating the case for *monotheism and speaking of God as creator and preserver of the universe, Aristides divides humanity into four categories, based on their religion—barbarians, Greeks, Jews and Christians—the comparison of which allows him to criticize the polytheism and fetishism of the barbarians, disapprove of the absurdities of Greek *mythology, charge the Jews with exteriority and certain superstitious customs (though approving their idea of God), and finally highlight the true knowledge of the divine nature possessed by Christians and show the purity of their behavior. The Apologia, mentioned by *Eusebius of Caesarea (see HE IV, 3,3; Chron. ad an. Abr. 2140-2142 = 124-126 AD), survives (1) in an *Armenian fragment (containing the first two chapters) discovered by the Mechitarists of Venice in 1878, (2) in a *Syriac version of the entire text discovered by J. Rendel Harris in 1889, and (3) in two Greek papyrus fragments published in 1922 and 1923 (containing chs. 5,3–6,1 and 15,6–16,1). The Syriac version allowed us to ascertain that we already possessed the Greek text, in a free revision, in chs. 26 and 27 of the *Life of Barlaam and Joseph, a pious romance attributed by the manuscript tradition to *John of Damascus (ca. 675–749?). Chapters 15 and 16 of Aristides's Apologia have been compared, with some justification, to chs. 5 and 6 of the *Letter to Diognetus. Recent studies have shed light on certain lines of the textual tradition little studied until now (in particular that of the papyri) and highlighted the use made of the Apologia by some later writers (esp. by Epiphanius).

For Syriac and Greek texts: J.R. Harris - J.A. Robinson, TSt 1,1, Cambridge [2]1893. For papyrus fragments: B.P. Grenfell - A.S. Hunt, The Oxyr. Papyri, XV, London 1922; H.J.M. Milne: JTS 25 (1924) 73-77. On the inauthenticity of the homily on Lk 23:42f. (see J.B. Pitra, Anal. Sacra, IV, Paris 1883, 6-11 and 282-286) cited under Aristides's name, together with an equally spurious fragment ex epistula Aristidis, see P. Pape, TU 12,2, Leipzig 1894. Translations: Eng.: D.M. Kay, ANF 9, 263-279; It.: C. Vona, Rome 1950; C. Burini, Rome 1986; C. Alpigiano, Florence 1988; Sp.: D. Ruiz Bueno, BAC 116, Madrid 1954; Ger.: R. Raabe, TU 9,1, Leipzig 1892; J. Schönfelder: ThQ 74 (1892) 531-557; K. Julius, BKV 12, Kempten 1913;. L. Alfonsi, La teologia della storia nell'Apologia di Aristide: Augustinianum 16 (1976) 37-40. Further bibliography in Quasten I, 171f.; B. Altaner - A. Stuiber, Patrologie, Freiburg i.B. 1978, 64f.; H.J. Desterle, Zur Apologie des Aristides: ZDMG 130 (1980) 15-23; C. Alpigiano, L'Apologia di Aristide e la tradizione papiracea: Civiltà classica and cristiana 7 (1986) 333-357; K.G. Essig, Erwägungen zum geschichtlichen Ort der Apologie des Aristides: ZKG 97 (1986) 163-188; R. Van den Broek, Eugnostos and Aristides on the Ineffable God: Knowledge of God in the Graeco-Roman World, Leiden 1988, 202-218; C. Scholten: LTK[3] 1, 973; J. Dummer, Epiphanius von Constantia un die Apologie des Aristides: eine quellenkritische Untersuchung: Philologus 138/2 (1994) 267-287; H.R. Drobner, Patrologia, It. tr., Casale Monferrato 1998, 127f.

P. Siniscalco

ARISTION (1st-2nd c.), "Disciple of the Lord," according to *Papias in the prologue to his Explanations of the Lord's Sayings (see Eus., HE III 39,4; see also *Jerome, Vir. ill. 18). The interpretation of the titles and functions of the various people listed by Papias as sources of his work, however, is disputed, although we know that Aristion was frequently mentioned in it (see Eus., HE III 39,7). Papias may have thought that Aristion was still alive: the prologue speaks of him and of the *presbyter John in the present, but of others in the past. In Eusebius's citations and paraphrases of Papias, Aristion's name is always associated with John's (HE III 39,4.5.7.14). It is doubtful that Aristion was the homonymous first bishop of Smyrna mentioned in Apos. Con. VII 46,8. The Roman Martyrology records Aristion on 22 February as the bishop of Salamis in Cyprus. Isolated and unconfirmed early evidence attributes to Aristion the account of the miracle of Joseph Barsabbas the Just cited by Papias (see Eus., HE III 39,9) and the ending of *Mark's gospel (Mk 16:9-20): recent attributions to Aristion of the Johannine pericope on adultery (Jn 8:1-10) or the letter to the Hebrews are both hypothetical and unfounded.

DBS 1, 619-621; DBS 6, 1104-1009 (Papias); EC 1, 1908-1909; BS 2, 421-424; LTK³ 1, 973; ODC³, 101; J. Chapman, Aristion, Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, RBen 22 (1905) 50-64; J.F. Bligh, The Prologue of Papias: ThS 13 (1952) 234-240; U.H.J. Körtner, Papias von Hierapolis, Göttingen 1983, 122-129.

F. Scorza Barcellona

ARISTO of Pella (2nd c.). Christian writer active in the mid 2nd c. *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE IV 6,3) cites him as a source for his account of the repression of the Jewish revolt led by Bar Kokhba (AD 132–135) and the consequent interdiction of *Jerusalem imposed by *Hadrian on the Jews. In the 6th c. *John of Scythopolis, in a scholium to ps.-*Dionysius (Myst. 1,3; see CPG 6852), cites a Dialogue [dialexis] between Papiscus and Jason, in which mention is made of the "seven heavens"; he attributes it to Aristo, in contrast with *Clement of Alexandria, who attributed it to St. *Luke. The reliability of John of Scythopolis's attribution has been and is still debated, since the work, lost to us, is known as an anonymous writing in the testimonies of the *pagan *Celsus and *Origen (see Contra Cels. IV 52-53), who calls it a Dispute (antilogia), and of the Christian *Celsus, who translated the work into *Latin perhaps in the 3rd c., probably in *Africa. Among the ps.-Cyprianine writings there is a letter in which Celsus dedicated his translation to a bishop Vigilius (see CPL 67): the translated work is called a scriptura concertationis (Ad Vig. 8). Jerome, who read the work in the original Greek version and cites it as an altercatio, also did not know how to attribute authorship (Quaest. Hebr. Gen. 1,1; Comm. in Gal. 3,14). The work can be located at the origins of Christian anti-Jewish apologetic literature, which particularly made use of the forms of dialogue. According to the evidence of the work's translator, Celsus, the debate ended with the complete victory of Jason, a "Jewish Christian," over Papiscus, a "Jew of *Alexandria," who was then converted and baptized. Against the disparaging criticism of the pagan Celsus, Origen acknowledged the scant value of the exegetical argumentation adopted in the dispute, but he also appreciated the Jew's proud consciousness of the dignity of his convictions. The subject of the dispute was esp. the applicability of the OT prophecies about Christ to Jesus. Jerome was interested in the work because, with regard to Gen 1:1 and Deut 21:23, it provided further evidence of the difference of the Greek versions from the Hebrew biblical text. In support of the work's anonymity, the hypothesis has been put forward that it reproduces the rapid transcription of a public discussion that perhaps occurred at Alexandria. The main argument in favor of a coincidence of the dispute with Aristo's work referred to by Eusebius is based on the reuse of the historical data of the sending away of the Jews from *Jerusalem in anti-Jewish polemical works (see Tert., Ad Iud. 13,3-4), according to an apologetic and polemical model that Aristo would in fact have already experimented with. An alternative to this hypothesis is the proposal that recognizes in the source cited by Eusebius the author of a historical work; this is also suggested by Late Antique and Medieval evidence, such as *Moses of Khorene, Hist. Arm. 2,60, and Nicephorus Callistus, Eccl. Hist. 3,24, although they depend on Eusebius. The information referred by the Chronicon Paschale* to the year 134, according to which Aristo submitted an apology to Hadrian, is probably the result of a contamination of Eusebius's information regarding Aristo and Eusebius, HE IV 3,3.

CPG 1101; E. Schürer, Storia del popolo giudaico al tempo di Gesù Cristo (175 a.C.–135 d.C.) I, Brescia 1985, 68-71 (orig. ed.: Edinburgh 1973); H. Schreckenberg, Die christlichen Adversus-Judaeos-Texte und ihr literarisches und historisches Umfeld (1.-11. Jh.), Frankfurt a. Main - Bern ⁴1999, 180; J. Wehnert, Die Auswanderung der Jerusalemer Christen nach Pella - historisches Faktum oder theologische Konstruktion?: ZKG 102 (1991/2) 231-255 (esp. 254-255); G. Otranto, La "Disputa tra Giasone e Papisco sul Cristo" falsamente attribuita ad Aristone di Pella: VetChr 33 (1996) 337-351.

V. Zangara

ARISTOLAUS the Tribune (5th c.). In 432 sent by the emperor *Theodosius II to bishops *John of Antioch and *Cyril of Alexandria in an attempt to overcome the differences that had come about in the Eastern church following the declaration of *Nestorius as a *heretic.

CPG 5359-5360, 6333, 8810-8812; PG 77, 323-326, 1457-1461; PG 84, 656-658, 806-807, 835-836; ACO I,4, 92, 206, 230; PLRE II, 146-147.

P. Marone

ARISTOTELIANISM. Aristotle did not enjoy the same veneration among the Greek fathers as did *Plato (see A.J. Festugière, Aristote dans la littérature grecque chrétienne, in L'idéal religieux des grecs et l'Évangile, Paris 1932, 222-223; J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique, Tournai 1961, 123). Though some Christian authors did accept some elements of the Aristotelian-Peripatetic *philosophy, a number of its points appeared unacceptable to early Christianity: (1) the exclusion of divine *providence from the lowest part of the universe (see E. Zeller, Die Philos. der Griechen II, 2, Leipzig [3]1879, 468 n. 1, Diogenes Laertius V 32, De mundo 397b-30-398b 6); (2) the tendency to make happiness partly depedent on external goods (Et. Nic. 1099a 31-32); (3) the doctrine that the fifth element, ether, was God's body, while God himself was practically identical with the anima mundi that moves the universe (Sulla filosofia, fr. 26 Walzer; see G. Lazzati, L'Aristotele perduto e gli scrittori cristiani, Milan 1938, 69-73; Daniélou, op. cit., 123); (4) the doctrine that the universe is coeternal with God (De caelo, II 283b 26-30, Philo, De aet. m. 10, see E. Zeller, Die Lehre des Aristoteles von der Ewigkeit der Welt, Vortr. und Abh. III, Leipzig 1884, 1-36); and (4) the propensity to assert the mortality of the human *soul, considered as the mere ἐντελέχεια of the body, from which it could not be separated, and to reserve immortality to the νοῦς alone (De an. II, 412a 27-28, 412b 5-6, 413a 3-5; III 430a 17-18, 22-25; in his youthful dialogue Eudemus [fr. 6 Ross = fr. 33 Bekker, V, 1480a], Aristotle had favored the immortality of the soul). The Greek fathers' knowledge of the Aristotelian-Peripatetic philosophy was derived partly from the syncretistic Platonism of the first two centuries AD or from *Neoplatonism (also syncretistic), partly from doxographical collections or scholastic compendiums and partly from direct reading of at least some of the texts of Aristotle or later exponents of his school.

*Tatian charges Aristotle with confining divine providence to the world above the lunar sphere, and with the two doctrines of the happiness and mortality of the human soul (Apol. 2: Schwartz p. 2,23-25; 3,4-10; Apol. 25: p. 27,2-3), and he points out that the Greek philosophers often contradict themselves (Apol. 25: Schwartz p. 27,5). *Athenagoras criticizes the Aristotelian conception of God as a being composed of ether and of a rational faculty which is the anima mundi and cause of the universe's movement (Apol. 6: Schwartz p. 7,14-20; see Daniélou, op. cit., 123), and rejects Aristotle's idea of providence (Apol. 25: Schwartz p. 33, 25-26). Describing his own wanderings through the various Greek philosophical schools, *Justin Martyr says that one of his teachers was a Peripatetic (Dial. 2: Otto II 8,25–10,4); in the same dialogue (ch. 5: Otto II 24,12) he rejects the conception of an eternal and ungenerated universe, characteristic not just of those Platonists who did not interpret the Timaeus to the letter but also of the Peripatetics; and in Apol. I 28 (Otto I 198,2-7) he charges with impiety anyone who denies the manifestation of divine providence toward humanity. That all of these criticisms of Aristotelian philosophy by the apologists are derived from "*Middle Platonism" is proven by their presence in Atticus (fr. 2,2 Des Places and 2,3 on happiness; fr. 7,12-13 on the mortality of the soul; fr. 5 on the ether; fr. 3,9 on providence; fr. 4,7 on the eternity of the universe). On Justin Martyr's attitude to the Peripatetic school and his dependence on Middle Platonism, see C. Andresen, Justin und der mittlere Platonismus: ZNW 44 (1952-1953) 160-161.

The author of the Cohortatio ad graecos, wrongly attributed to Justin Martyr but probably 3rd c. (see Quasten I, 183), knows Aristotelian philosophy well: in chs. 5 and 36 (Otto I 26,1-18; 102,1-4) he cites and rejects the doctrine that God has his seat in the fifth element, the ether (see Athenag., Apol. 6: Otto I 7,14f.); at the end of ch. 6 (Otto I 30,3-4) he rejects the doctrine of the soul as ἐντελέχεια of the body; at the beginning of ch. 7 (Otto I 30,7-8) he accuses both Plato and Aristotle of contradicting themselves (see Tat., Apol. 25: Schwartz 27,5); and in chs. 35 and 36 (I 98,6-7; 102,4-5; 102,8) he criticizes the stylistic elegance of the ancient philosophers. Credit is due to L. Alfonsi (Traces du jeune Aristote dans la Cohortatio ad gentiles faussement attribuée à Justin: VChr 2 [1948] 65-88) for showing that the Aristotle attacked in the Cohortatio is largely the young Aristotle of On Philosophy and the Protrepticus; the contradictions he fell into would be evident in On Philosophy (fr. 26 Walzer) and, more generally, in the difference between the λόγοι ἐσωτερικοί and the λόγοι ἐξωτερικοί (Alfonsi, op. cit., 66-67); the charge of affected style would also refer to his youthful dialogues (ibid., 68-69; Daniélou, op. cit., 124, refers to Alfonsi).

Another work falsely attributed to Justin Martyr is the Confutatio quorumdam Aristotelis dogmatum (PG 6, 1492-1564)—65 chapters refuting various Aristotelian theses taken from the Physica and De caelo. In each chapter the criticism is preceded by a citation of the Aristotelian passage to be refuted. The author shows a direct knowledge of both works. The brief account of Aristotelian philosophy given by *Hermias, Irrisio gent. philos. 11 (Diels, Dox. gr. 653,31–654,3) is clearly doxographical in origin, like the rest of his work. The two fundamental principles for Aristotle would be the active and the passive. While the active is identified with the ether, the passive—matter—is endowed with four qualities: dry, wet, hot and cold. Here we have the young Aristotle's conception of God as ether, already observed in Athenagoras and in the Cohortatio ad gentes (see also Alfonsi, op. cit., 71 and 79).

The same conception of God as ether recurs in the ps.-Clementine Recognitiones (VIII, 15): Aristoteles enim quintum introducit elementum quod acatonomaston, id est incompellabile nominavit, sine dubio illum indicans, qui in unum quattuor elementa coniungens mundum fecerit [For Aristotle also introduces a fifth element which he called akatonomaston, i.e., that which cannot be named, without a doubt indicating that One who made the world by joining the four elements into one] (p. 226,1-5 Rehm; Diels, Dox. gr. p. 251). S. Mariotti (Athens and Rome 8 [1940] 50-51) regards the words from sine dubio to mundum fecerit as an interpretative addition by the author of the Greek text translated into Latin by *Rufinus; but the presence of the same doctrine in Athenagoras, the Cohortatio ad gentes and Hermias casts doubt on this hypothesis (also skeptical is E. Bignone, Athens and Rome 8 [1940] 169-170).

In *Clement of Alexandria we can see a critical approach to Aristotle as well as the acceptance of motifs from his early work or some of his philosophical doctrines. Clement's criticisms are those of the apologists: Aristotle identifies the supreme God with the anima mundi and does not allow for divine providence in the sublunar sphere; his disciple Theophrastus also tends to identify God with the sky (Protr. 66,4: Stählin I, 58,28-31). The same criticism of the Aristotelian conception of providence is repeated in Strom. V 98,3 (Stählin II 385,19-20): Aristotle's represents a misunderstanding of Ps 35:6. The fact that the passage of Protr. 66,4 should be related to Cicero, De nat. deor. 113,33 (= Aristotle, On Philosophy fr. 26 Walzer) has already been noticed by H. Diels, Dox. gr., 131 (see also Alfonsi, VChr. 2 [1948] 71-72, Daniélou, op. cit., 125 and by S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 48 n. 1). Other points in which Aristotle's On Philosophy recognizably influences Clement have been noted by J. Daniélou, op. cit., 126-127.

As Quasten (I, 289) has noted, Clement's Protrepticus is part of the literary genre of "exhortations" inaugurated by the young Aristotle with his Protrepticus and continued in other similar works by Epicurus, Cleanthes, Chrysippus, Poseidonius and Cicero (in the 4th c. AD, Iamblichus would also write a Protrepticus).

That Clement kept Aristotle's Protrepticus in mind while composing his own is now beyond doubt after the research on the subject by E. Bignone, Nuove testimonianze e frammenti del Protreptico di Aristotele, RIFC n.s. 14 (1936) 230; G. Lazzati, L'Aristotele perduto, op. cit., 9-34; Q. Cataudella, Clemente Alessandrino. Protreptico ai Greci, Turin 1940, XXVI-XXXI; and J. Daniélou, op. cit., 124-125. The main proof of Clement's dependence on Aristotle is the account of the punishment inflicted by the Etruscan pirates on their prisoners, present in Clement, Protr. 7,4 (Stählin I 8,1-6) (see E. Bignone, L'Aristotele perduto e la formazione filosofica di Epicuro I, Florence 1936, p. 80 n. 1, RIFC n.s. 14 [1936] 230; and Cataudella, op. cit., XXVI-XXVII; this passage of Clement, with two analogous passages of Iamblichus and *Augustine, has been rightly recorded as fr. 10b of Aristotle's Protrepticus by R. Walzer, Aristotelis dialogorum fragmenta, Florence 1934, 44-45). For his part, S. Mariotti (Athens and Rome 8 [1940] 58-60) with good reason also extends the influence of Aristotle's Protrepticus to two passages of Clement's Paedagogus: Paed. I 28,1 (Stählin I 106,29-30), where the etymology of ἄνθρωπος ("man") is said to derive from φῶς ("light"), and Paed. III 99,2-3 (I 290,9-16).

As for Clement's acceptance of Aristotelian doctrines, we must note the following points: (1) The doctrine of virtue as μεσότης—also present in Philo and Middle Platonism—seems to be echoed in Paed. II 16,4 (I 166,2-4) (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 64-65). (2) In Strom. V 89,5 (II 385,5-8) Aristotle is mentioned with Plato and the *Stoics as maintaining the absence of quality and form in prime matter (see, e.g., Phys. I 191 a 10). (3) Conceiving, like Philo and the Middle Platonists, the supreme deity as a νοῦς (see S. Lilla, op. cit., 223-224), Clement agrees not only with the Plato of the Timaeus, Philebus and book X of the Laws but also with the Aristotle of Metaphysics, book Λ: in all probability Clement remained faithful to the teaching of Pantaenus—for whom God is a νοῦς since he possesses will (see fr. 48 Stählin, III, 224)—and *Ammonius Saccas, who sought to reconcile Plato with Aristotle (see S. Lilla, op. cit., 223-224). (4) In Strom. IV 155,2 (II 317,11) and V 73,3 (II 375, 18, 19), the divine νοῦς is called by Clement χώρα ἰδεῶν (see S. Lilla, op. cit., 201): this doctrine, though present in Philo (De Cher. 29), Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism, in the last analysis goes back to Aristotle, who in De an. III 429a 27-29 used similar terms regarding the thinking human νοῦς. (5) In Strom. VI 137,4 (II 501,22), God is defined not only as ἀπαθής but as ἀπροσδεής: the idea of God's impassibility and self-sufficiency goes back to Aristotle, Met. Λ 1073a 11, Et. Eud. 1244b 8-9 and 1249b 16, though it reappears in Philo (De spec. leg. II 38 and 174, De virt. 9) and Plotinus, Enn. VI, 9,6 (Bréhier VI[2] 179,17-18; 184,24-26). (6) In agreement with Aristotelian teaching, virtue is conceived of as the result of the combination of φύσις, μάθησις, and ἄσκησις or ἔθος (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 66-67, with relevant references to Clement, Aristotle, Philo and Middle Platonism). (7) The part of Aristotelian philosophy on which Clement drew most was undoubtedly the logic: the so-called book VIII of the Stromata is not an epitome of the original text written by Clement, as Zahn thought (Forsch. zur Gesch. des neutest. Kanons, III, Suppl. Clem., Erlangen 1884, 104-130) but a scholastic collection of logical-epistemological doctrines, both Peripatetic and Stoic (see I. von Arnim, De octavo Clementis Stromateorum libro, Rostock Progr. 1894), used by Clement himself at various points of the Stromata (see W. Ernst, De Clementis Alexandrini Stromatum libro octavo qui fertur, Diss. Göttingen 1910; S. Lilla, op. cit., 120 n. 3).

Clement uses this Peripatetic material to construct his doctrine of pistis understood as the acceptance both of the principle of a demonstration and its conclusions; apropos of this last type of pistis, Aristotle is explicitly named with approval in Strom. II 15,5 (II 120,25-26; see, e.g., Rhet. 1355a 5-6, Et. Nic. 1139b 33-34; on the whole complex question of pistis in Clement and its relation to Aristotelian epistemology, see S. Lilla, op. cit., 118-142). It was precisely the presence of copious Aristotelian logical material in the so-called eighth book of the Stromata that led H.J. Reinkens (De Clemente presbytero Alexandrino homine scriptore philosopho theologo, Wroclaw 1851, 300 and 309) to consider Clement an Aristotelian philosopher (a one-sided and unacceptable conclusion, however). Finally it must be said that the words of Strom. V 88,1 (II 384,4), καθάπερ Πλάτων καὶ Ἀριστοτέλης ὁμολογοῦσιν, regarding the divine origin of the human νοῦς, are in all probability an interpolation of some erudite scribe or reader (see S. Lilla, op. cit., 14 n. 1): as regards Aristotle, the interpolator must have had in mind a doxography based on De gen. an. B 736b 27-28.

*Origen, like Clement, rejects some Aristotelian doctrines and accepts others. Among Aristotelian and Peripatetic doctrines, he rejects the idea of providence (C. Cels. I 21 [Koetschau I 72,11-12], II 13 [I 142,8-9], III 75 [I 266,27-29]); the theory—present in De interpr. 16a 27-28—that names are not derived from the nature of the things they refer to (C. Cels. I 24 [I 74,12], V 45 [II 48,10-11]); the doctrine of ether as the fifth element (C. Cels. IV 56 [I 329,11-15]); the idea of human happiness (C. Cels. I 10 [I 63,8-10]); the failure to accept the Platonic ideas, which Aristotle called τερετίσματα (C. Cels. I 13 [I 66,6]); and the completely negative attitude toward magic, which Epicurus and Aristotle's followers called πρᾶγμα ἀσύστατον (C. Cels. I 24 [I 74,22-23]). In C. Cels. II 27 (I 156, 8-10) the Peripatetics, together with the Epicureans, are called "an accusation against philosophy" (on Origen's judgments on Aristotle, see also H. Crouzel, Origène et la philosophie, Paris 1962, 31-35). This tendency to associate Peripatetics and Epicureans originated with Middle Platonism, as is shown by its presence in *Atticus, fr. 3,7-9 des Places. Similarly criticisms of the doctrines of providence originate in Middle Platonism, as do those of the ether and human happiness, and the rejection of the Platonic ideas (see Atticus fr. 3,9 on providence; fr. 5 on the ether; fr. 2,2-3 on happiness; fr. 9 on the rejection of the Platonic ideas; see also H. Koch, Pronoia und Paideusis, Studien über Origenes und sein Verhältnis zum Platonismus, Berlin-Leipzig 1932, 268-274; Koch, 273, rightly notes that Atticus fr. 9,1, like Origen, C. Cels. I 13, cites the term τερετίσματα used by Aristotle An. post. 83a 33 to designate the Platonic ideas).

As for the presence of Aristotelian doctrines in Origen, the following points deserve particular attention: (1) For Origen, as for Clement, God is a mind: et mens ac fons (sc. Deus) (De princ. I 1,6 [21,13 Koetschau]; see above regarding Clement, n. 3). (2) Nonetheless Origen, like Plotinus, admits the possibility that God is above νοῦς (C. Cels. VII, 38 [II 188,11-12]). This possibility was also admitted by Aristotle (Περὶ εὐχῆς fr. 46 Rose [Bekker V, 483a 27]): ὁ θεὸς ἢ νοῦς ἐστιν ἢ ἐπέκεινά τι νοῦ (God is mind or something beyond mind). (3) Origen's God thinks himself (De princ. IV 4,8 [360,6-7]) just as does the God of Aristotle (Met. Λ 1072 b 19-20) and *Alexander of Aphrodisias (Mantissa 109,4-7). (4) Also for Origen, as for Clement, God is completely self-sufficient and without needs (Comm. in Jo XIII, 34 [259,20-21]; see above regarding Clement, n. 5. (5) Origen makes the Aristotelian doctrine his own—which would become fundamental in the theology of *Gregory of Nyssa—that what is infinite cannot be known (see Phys. I 178b 7, III 207a 25-26, Rhet. III 1048b 27-28): in order to demonstrate that God's power is not infinite—a conception opposed to that of Plotinus and ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite (see S. Lilla: JTS 31 [1980] 100 n. 3)—he says (De princ. II 9,1 [164,5-6]), "If the divine power [θεία δύναμις] were indeed infinite, it would not even be able to know istelf, since the infinite is incomprehensible by nature" (see IV, 4,8 [359,17]: "Indeed the infinite by its nature cannot be comprehended"). (6) The human mind has been joined to the body (De princ. 11,6 [22,13]; cf. C. Cels. III 80 [I 270,25-28]; Aristotle De gen. an. B 736b 27 28). (7) The human mind has an affinity with God (De princ. I 7 [24,18-19]; cf. Aristotle, De an. I 408b 29; Eth. Nic. X 1177a 13-15; De gen. an. B 736b 27-28 [but also see Plato, Tim. 41c 7; Philo, Quis rer. div. her. 64, De somn. I 34]). (8) The human mind does not need the body for its operations (De princ. I 1,6 [23,1; 24,14-16]). Aristotle had said that only νοῦς is completely detached from the body, has no relation to it, and must be distinguished from the rest of the soul (see esp. De an. II 413b 24-27, III 429a 24-25, 429b 5, 430a 17-18). (9) The human mind is immortal (C. Cels. III 80 [I 270,25-26]; De princ. IV 4,9 [363,4-5]; cf. De an. II 413b 27, III 430a 23). (10) The human mind uses the bodily members as instruments (De princ. II,6 [23,12]; on the body or its parts as instruments, see De gen. anim. 716a 24-25; De part. an. 642a 11; De an. II 412b 12). (11) Matter is the basis of bodies, which exist thanks to it (De princ. III,4 [109,22-23]; cf. IV, 4,7 [357,30-31]; the first of these two passages can be compared with Phys. I 192a 31; cf. also Met. Λ 1022a 18-19). (12) H. Koch, Pronoia und Paideusis, 255, observes that in Comm. in Io. I, 18 (22,14-20) Origen distinguishes τὸ ἐξ οὗ, i.e., matter, from τὸ καθ' ὅ, equivalent to εἶδος, in accordance with Aristotelian teaching. (13) As E. de Faye has noted (Origène, sa vie, son œuvre, sa pensée, I, Paris 1923, 218 n. 2), Origen in C. Cels. VI 62 (II 132, 16-17) gives a definition of φωνή which recalls the Aristotelian definition of the echo (see Probl. XI 901b 16-18, 904b 27-29). (14) According to H. Koch (op. cit., 175, 284-285, 289), Origen based his doctrine of free will on Aristotle's ethics, while also taking into account Middle Platonism, Epictetus and Alexander of Aphrodisias. (15) Finally we should mention (see also de Faye, op. cit., 218 n. 2) that in C. Cels. VII 3 (II 154,25-28) Origen says Aristotelian and Peripatetic doctrines can be used to refute the *oracles of the Greek religion (Koetschau, app. ad loc. rightly refers us to De mundo 395b 26-30). E. de Faye, op. cit., 218, holds that Origen knew directly at least Aristotle's De anima and Nicomachean Ethics; we should not forget that at the beginning of the 3rd c. Origen frequented Ammonius Saccas's school at Alexandria, where the study of Aristotle's works must have had great weight.

Clearly doxographical in origin is the information on Aristotelian philosophy given by *Hippolytus, *Epiphanius and *Theodoret. Hippolytus dedicates book I, ch. 20 (Wendland 24-25) and book VII, chs. 14-19 (Wendland 191-195) of his Refutatio omnium haeresium to Aristotle. Ch. 20 is a summary exposition of Aristotelian philosophy, very similar to that of Arius Didymus and Diogenes Laertius, as is shown by the similarities pointed out by Wendland (24 app.). Though not without appreciation (Aristotle raised philosophy to an art and was "more logical," 24,1-2), Hippolytus mentions two unacceptable doctrines, the mortality of the soul (24,15-17; 25,5) and the dependence of happiness on external goods (24,21-24). In book VII, chs. 14-19 he again expounds Aristotelian philosophy in order to show it as the source of the *heresy of *Basilides; he recalls the difference between the sublunar region, not governed by providence, and that above the moon, where order and providence reign (194,4-8), and calls obscure the Aristotelian doctrines of the soul and of God, respectively set forth in De anima and the Metaphysics.

Epiphanius's account of Aristotelian philosophy is found in Panarion 7,1-2 and in De fide 9,35 (see Diels, Dox. gr. 588,7 and 592,31). In Panarion 7,1-2 (Holl I, 186) the Peripatetics—associated with the Pythagoreans—are reproached with, among other things, the doctrines of the mortality of the soul (186,5) and of the identity between God, the sky and the stars (186,8-10): this latter was the young Aristotle's doctrine already noted by Athenagoras, in the Cohortatio, in Hermias, in the Recognitiones and in Clement. Recalled in De fide 9,35 (Holl III 508,4-9) are the two conceptions of the universe divided into supralunar and sublunar regions, and of the soul as ἐντελέχεια of the body (this latter passage coincides perfectly with Hippolytus, Ref. VII, 19: 194,4-8 and 194,23-195,1).

Theodoret names Aristotle in at least five places in his Graecarum affectionum curatio: book IV mentions the Aristotelian doctrine of the ether as the constitutive element of the stars and the celestial sphere (PG 83, 904 C 6-7, D 4-8) in a doxographical context, in which he reviews the cosmological theories of the Greek philosophers; a passage in book V

(PG 83, 993B4-5) mentions the doctrine of the mortality of the soul; also in book V (PG 83, 940C11–941A 3) he stresses the antithesis between Plato and Aristotle on the two questions of the mortality of the soul and divine providence (Aristotle is far inferior to Plato, PG 83, 940D4); book VI—dedicated to proving the existence of providence in human affairs—repeats the usual critique of the Aristotelian theory of providence (PG 83, 957A11–B3); finally, book XI gives a critique of the doctrine of happiness (PG 83, 1097C3-10).

*Eusebius of Caesarea refutes Aristotelian philosophy in book XV chs. 3-13 of his Praeparatio evangelica (VIII, 2: Mras 349-378), using long citations of Atticus, a work on the soul attributed to Plotinus and a work by Porphyry, also on the soul. As Festugière has shown (op. cit., 257-258), Eusebius criticizes the doctrines of happiness (chs. 3-4), providence (ch. 5), the eternity of the world (ch. 6), the ether (ch. 7), the nature of the heavenly bodies (ch. 8), the mortality of the soul (ch. 9), the soul as ἐντελέχεια of the body (chs. 10-11), the anima mundi (ch. 12) and the rejection of the Platonic ideas (ch. 13). The work most used in this refutation is that of Atticus (the writings attributed to Plotinus and Porphyry occupy only chs. 10 and 11: Mras 372-375): in fact, this section of the Praeparatio evangelica is our main source of knowledge of this Middle Platonist philosopher.

Regarding *Basil the Great, G. Lazzati (L'Aristotele perduto, op. cit., 34-43) considers his Discourse to the Young on the Utility of Greek Literature (ed. F. Boulenger, Paris 1935; PG 31, 564-589) to be influenced by Aristotle's Protrepticus: "protreptic" motifs—also present in Iamblichus's Protrepticus, in Pap. Ox. 666, and in Cicero's Hortensius, Tusculanae and De finibus—include its insistence on the vanity of material goods, the comparison between the procedure of dyers and the way to approach the study of sacred texts, the superiority of the soul with respect to the body, the polemic against Sardanapalus, and the soul's liberation from the prison of the body by philosophy. But Basil's dependence on Aristotle is evident above all in the famous nine Homilies on the Hexaemeron (ed. S. Giet, Paris 1968, SC 26 bis; PG 29, 4-208), which deal with questions of cosmology, geography and natural science (see Giet, op. cit., 61). Credit is due to K. Müllenhof, Aristoteles bei Basilius von Caesarea: Hermes 2 (1867) 252-258 and P. Plass, De Basilii et Ambrosii excerptis ad historiam animalium pertinentibus, Marpurgi Cattorum 1905, 21ff. for showing, by precise textual comparisons, the ample use Basil made esp. of Aristotle's Historia animalium and Meteorologica; Giet's notes to his edition of the Homilies on the Hexaemeron are also very instructive in this regard. Giet (61) also emphasizes the importance in Basil (see e.g. Hom. V 47E: Giet 314, 8, PG 29, 113A1-2) of the Aristotelian axiom "none of the works of nature exist by chance; everything obeys an end" (see De part. anim. I 645a 23-25).

Basil also makes use of Aristotle in his refutation of *Eunomius: against the latter's thesis, which saw the absence of generation regarding the Father as a consequence of his preexistence with respect to all things, and a proof of the difference between his substance and that of the Son, Basil observed that the lack of generation, precisely because it is an external, accessory consequence, cannot constitute part of the Father's intimate nature (C. Eunom. I,5: SC 299. 176,79-81, 178,89-91, 180,115-117; I,15: SC 299. 226,27-28). Basil's argument here is ultimately based on the Aristotelian doctrine that excludes accidents (συμβεβηκός) from substance (οὐσία) (Met. Δ, 1025a 30-32; see S. Lilla, L'Oriente greco, in Storia della Teologia, I, ed. E. Dal Covolo, Rome 1995, 270 with n. 32).

*Gregory of Nyssa's interest in Aristotle, undervalued by F. Diekamp (Die Gotteslehre des heiligen Gregor von Nyssa, I, Münster 1896, p. 34), is given its proper weight by K. Gronau (De Basilio Gregorio Nazianzeno Nyssenoque Platonis imitatoribus, Göttingen 1908, 2 n. 1). An examination of the apparatus fontium and index of authors in H. Langerbeck's Commentary on the Song of Songs (Gregorii Nysseni opera . . . ed. W. Jaeger, VI, Leiden 1960) gives an idea of the wealth of Aristotelian echoes present in his work. E. Mühlenberg (Die philosophische Bildung Gregors von Nyssa in den Büchern Contra Eunomium, in Écriture et culture philosophique dans la pensée de Grégoire de Nysse, Leiden 1971, 234, 236, 240) has brought out Gregory's use of Aristotelian logic in his arguments against Eunomius; other points in which Gregory's dependence on Aristotle is evident have been brought to light by S. Cavarnos (The Relation of Body and Soul in the Thought of Gregory of Nyssa, in Gregor von Nyssa und die Philosophie, Leiden 1976, 61-78) and M. Alexandre (L'exégèse de Gen. 1.1-2a dans l'In Hexaemeron de Grégoire de Nysse, ibid., 159-192). Here we cannot make an analytical examination of Gregory's In Hexaemeron and De hominis opificio, which would clearly show, similar to what has been observed regarding Basil, the extent of Gregory's dependence on Aristotle, as well as on Stoicism; we will merely call attention to some particularly significant points of Gregory's thought, of which his *trinitarian doctrine is an integral part.

(1) God is unknowable because he is infinite (see, e.g., Contra Eun. II, Jaeger II, 246,16-22; Quod non sint tres dii, Müller 52,15-20; on this basic doctrine of Gregory's theology, see E. Mühlenberg, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen 1966, in particular 102-103): unknowability as the effect of infinity is a typically Aristotelian doctrine (see Phys. I 187b 7, III 207a 25-26; Rhet. III 1048b 27-28). (2) Gregory's God is absolute beauty, loved by all beings (De an. et res.: PG 46, 97A 1-8; De virg, Cavarnos 289, 25-26, 296,14-20 [this last passage faithfully follows Plato, Sympos. 211a]: the identification of the supreme principle with the beautiful, loved and desired by all beings goes back to Aristotle (Met. Λ 1072a 25-28). (3) Gregory's God, like in Aristotle, Περὶ εὐχῆς fr. 46 Rose, is superior to νοῦς, In cant. cant. V (p. 157,15; see above, Origen n. 2 and Langerbeck, app. font., 157). (4) Gregory (see, e.g., In hexaem: PG 44, 77 D 9-12 ed. Alexandre, op. cit., 171) knows the Aristotelian distinction between δύναμις and ἐνέργεια (see, e.g., De an. II 412a 9-10; Phys. I 191b 28-29; Met. Θ 1049b 5 and the other passages cited by Alexandre, op. cit., 171; Alexandre rightly notes that the same distinction is found in Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism). (5) The well-known Aristotelian doctrine of virtue as a just mean—also present, as we have seen, in Philo, Middle Platonism and Clement—is found, e.g., in In eccl. hom. VI (PG 44, 697C 10-12), In cant. cant. hom. IX (PG 44, 972A 7-8; Langerbeck 284,5-6), De virg. 7 (PG 46, 353B 13-14; Cavarnos 282, 25-26): see also Gronau, op. cit., 2 n. 1. (6) the close connection, Aristotelian in origin, between matter and substrate (see above Origen n. 11) is found, e.g., in In Hexaem.: PG 44, 101A 14-15 (see Alexandre, op. cit., 182). (7) The soul is the cause of the life of the living being, De hom. opif.: PG 44, 236 D 8; cf. Aristotle, De an. 415b 8 (Cavarnos, op. cit., p. 65). (8): The Aristotelian distinction between vegetative, sensitive and intellectual life (see, e.g., De an. II 415a 17; Et. Nic. I 1098a 1-2) is also present in Gregory (De hom. opif.: PG 44, 144D 11–145A 9 (Cavarnos, op. cit., 73-74). (9) The definition of demonstration (Contr. Eun. I: Jaeger I 90,11-14) goes back in the last analysis to Aristotle: Jaeger, app., 90, refers to An. Post. I 71a 1; Met. Z 1029b 3-12 (but it should be noted that very similar definitions are found in the so-called book VIII of Clement's Stromata; cf. S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 132, with relative observations). On Gregory's dependence on Aristotle in his use of method, see also Mühlenberg, Die philos. Bildung, 234. (10) The pleasure experienced in learning increases still further the desire to learn (In cant. cant. I: 31,6-8): H. Langerbeck (app., 31) rightly refers to Aristotle, Eth. Nic. VII; 1153a 22-23. (11) The importance Gregory attributes to the προαίρεσις (In cant. cant. II [50,8-9]) is brought out by Langerbeck (app., 50) to Eth. Nic. III, 7: see above, Origen n. 15. (12) Gregory affirms the impossibility of virtue and vice coexisting simultaneously in the same subject (In cant. cant. IV [103,5-8]): Langerbeck (app., 103) refers to Met. Γ 1011b 15-22. (13) The doctrine of contraries, according to which the absence of a particular property results in the presence of its contrary, is found in Gregory, In cant. cant. IV (103, 13-14): on its Aristotelian origin (Met. Z 1032b 3) see Langerbeck, app., 103. (14) Virtue is voluntary, free and not subject to constraints (In cant. cant. V [160,17-161,1]): Langerbeck (app., 161) refers us to Eth. Nic. III 1113b 3-5; Et. Eud. II 1222b 14. (15) H. Langerbeck notes the respective dependence of In cant. cant. III (79,1-3) and IV (111, 7-10) on Hist. anim. 613a 14 and 609b 21ff.: see app. 79 and 111. (16) The difference between οὐσία and ὑπόστασις specified in the brief treastise passed down as Ep. 38 in Basil's correspondence, but in fact composed by Gregory of Nyssa, as shown by Hübner (Gregor von Nyssa als Verfasser der sog. Ep. 38 des Basilius, in Epektasis, Mélanges patristiques offerts au cardinal Jean Daniélou, Paris 1972, 463-490)—see esp. Ep. 38, 2-3: Courtonne I, 81,1–84,47—is to be referred to the Aristotelian-Peripatetic doctrine of the πρώτη and δευτέρα οὐσία present in Cat. 2a 11-19, 2b 7-10. While the abstract οὐσία neither increases nor decreases (Cat. 3b 33-39, 4a 1-3), is general in scope (Ep. 38, 2: Courtonne 81,1-4) and corresponds fully to the genus (γένος) of the δευτέρα οὐσία (Cat. 2a 16-17, 2b 7-8), the ὑπόστασις, which designates a quite specific reality (Ep. 38, 2: Courtonne 82, 17-19; Ep. 38, 3: Courtonne 82,8–83,12), is, in a certain sense, comparable to the species (eidos) of the δευτέρα οὐσία (Cat. 2a 14-16, 2b 7) but must be more properly referred to the πρώτη οὐσία, which represents the full expression of an individual reality (Cat. 2a 11-14—cf. Hübner, op. cit., 469-479, 484, taken up again by Lilla in Storia della Teologia, I, 285—where one nonetheless reads: "The ousia corresponds to the genus of the deutera ousía; the hypostasis, on the other hand, corresponds to the prōte ousia and to the species [εἶδος] of the deutera ousia"). According to Hübner, op. cit., 470, for this purpose Gregory must have used some scholastic manual of logic rather than Aristotle's text itself and perhaps even Porphyry's Isagoge. (17) Like Basil (see above), Gregory also denies that the Father's lack of generation pertains to his essence (Contra Eunom. I [214,21-25], II [405,3-4, 406,3-5], where Basil is cited explicitly [Contra Eunom. I, 15: SC 299.226, 27-28; see Lilla, op. cit., 293, n. 254]). Gregory also specifies that the association of the Father with the cause and the Son with the effect is an indicator, not of a difference of nature, but only of mode of existence: the substance (οὐσία) must be distinguished from the mode (πῶς) (Quod non sint tres dei 56, 1, 11-17, 19-22; see Lilla, op. cit., 293, n. 255). Here also we have a Peripatetic doctrine: the mode (πῶς) regards not the substance (οὐσία) but the accident (συμβεβηκός) (see Porphyry, Isag. 3,18-19; 17,11-12; 21,10 and above regarding Basil).

*Gregory of Nazianzus renews the usual criticisms against Aristotle regarding his views on providence, the soul and a "too human" morality (Or. 27: PG 36, 24C1-2, see Festugière, op. cit., 260); at the same time he applies to God the Aristotelian doctrine—already noted in Origen and Gregory of Nyssa—of unknowability as a direct effect of infinity (Or. 38,7: PG 36, 317B9-10, C13–D1). E. Bignone (RFIC n.s. 14 [1936] 227-230) sees in Or. 40 echoes of Aristotle's Protrepticus: he esp. calls attention to passages in ch. 5 (PG 36, 364C1-5) relating to the derivation of the term "man" from "light" (see above, on Clement's Paedagogus); in ch. 13 (PG 36, 376A1-8) regarding the superiority of the soul vis-à-vis the body; in ch. 17 (PG 36, 380CD) exhorting both young and old to baptism.

*Nemesius of Emesa, in ch. 2 of the De natura hominis (PG 40, 537A 6-8; Matthaei 68, 10-11), first mentions the Aristotelian definition of the soul as ἐντελέχεια of the body(De an. II 412a 27-28, b 5-6), together with other philosophers' opinions on the soul; then he repeats (PG 40, 560B11–564A5; Matthaei 92,11–96,1)what Aristotle says in De anima II, 1 (412a-413a), adding his own critical observations (564A6–565B; Matthaei 96,1–98,14) and rejecting the Aristotelian definition (565A9-10; Matthaei 98,5-7). In ch. 44 (797A1-6; Matthaei 348,5-9) he mentions and criticizes the Aristotelian conception of providence. In chs. 29-34 (Matthaei 263-288; PG 40, 717-741) his examination of the concepts of ἑκούσιον, ἀκούσιον, προαίρεσις, βούλευσις and δύναμις is conducted along the lines of Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics. A detailed examination is not possible here; a study of the sources of this work can be found in W. Jaeger, Nemesios von Emesa, Berlin 1914.

Ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite also shows traces of Aristotelian doctrines, handed down through Gregory of Nyssa or Neoplatonism: (1) Like Gregory of Nyssa he considers the unknowability of God to be directly dependent on his infinity (Div. nom. I, 1 [588A1-9]; I, 2, [588C10-12]): see S. Lilla, JTS n.s. 31 (1980) 101-103. (2) Also like Gregory of Nyssa he identifies God with absolute beauty, desired by all beings (Div. nom. IV, 10 [708A 6-7, 11-12]; IV, 4 [700B2-3,4-8]): see above, Gregory of Nyssa, n. 2. (3) In agreement with Aristotelian teaching (Met. A 994b 9, Λ 1072 a34-b2) he identifies the οὗ ἕνεκα with the final cause (τέλος) and the first principle (Div. nom. V, 10 [825B 2]. (4) In Div. nom. IV, 4 [697B 3-4, 146,14-15] he refers to the sky as not increasing nor diminishing and completely changeless (ἀναυξοῦς καὶ ἀμειώτου καὶ ὅλως ἀναλλοιώτου . . . οὐσίας: see Aristotle, De caelo 270a13-14, a33-35, b1-2). (5) An echo of the Aristotelian doctrine of contraries is in Div. nom. IV, 20 [720C 12-13]: see Aristotle, Met. Z 1032 b4-5.

*John Philoponus was a profound Aristotelian scholar, not limiting himself to commenting on his various works but accepting or rejecting various Aristotelian doctrines. It is thus worthwhile to distinguish: (1) Philoponus's activity as a commentator; (2) his unreserved acceptance of the Aristotelian-Peripatetic doctrine of the οὐσία and of the distinction between δύναμις and ἐνέργεια; and (3) his criticism of some theories of Aristotelian physics.

1. Among Philoponus's commentaries on Aristotle, we should mention those on the Categories, the Prior Analytics, the Posterior Analytics, book I of the Meteorologica, the De generatione et corruptione, the De anima and the Physica; we have information on a commentary on the Sophistici elenchi, whereas a commentary on the Metaphysica is spurious (see S. Lilla, in Patrologia V, 369-370).

2. Philoponus's *monophysitism and *tritheism, respectively, depend on the reception of the doctrine of the πρώτη and δευτέρα οὐσία and on its application—pushed to its ultimate limits—in the *christological and *trinitarian spheres. If it is true that the general δευτέραι οὐσίαι have only theoretical and abstract existence and can concretely exist only in the πρῶται οὐσίαι, which alone designate single individuals, it is likewise true that with respect to Christology, the most general φύσις—which corresponds to the δευτέρα οὐσία—can subsist only in the individual ὑπόστασις, corresponding to the πρώτη οὐσία. This means that the μία ὑπόστασις of the Son become man is practically identical to his μία φύσις. The μία φύσις of the Son become man is of course the result of the combination of two essences or natures (δευτέραι οὐσίαι or φύσεις), the divine and the human, which nonetheless subsist in it only as δυνάμει and not ἐνεργείᾳ, since they come together in Christ to form a single nature. (For more detail see Lilla, op. cit., 374-376, where the references to Philoponus's Arbiter and to Aristotle's Categories can be found.) Also because of the impossibility of the existence of the abtract δευτέρα οὐσία outside of the concrete, individual πρώτη οὐσία, the divine οὐσία can concretely exist only in the three divine hypostases which, precisely because divine, can be called "three gods" (for the various references, see Lilla, op. cit., 378-379).

3. Philoponus's physical theories at times anticipate Renaissance and modern theories, and depart specifically from a detailed criticism of Aristotle. Here we can only mention briefly the theories of the universe as not coeternal with God, impulse and movement, velocity in a vacuum, space as three-dimensional extension, natural motion, matter as created by God and from the beginning provided with three-dimensionality, the ether, the sun, and light (see esp. R. Sorabji, Philoponus and the Rejection of Aristotelian Science, Ithaca, NY 1987, 6-31, taken up and summarized by Lilla, op. cit., 373-374; additional bibliography in Lilla, op. cit., 384-386 §2b).

Appeals to Aristotelian doctrines were made in the 7th and 8th centuries by *Anastasius the Sinaite, *Maximus the Confessor, authors of patristic *florilegia and *John of Damascus. The Aristotelian doctrines are not drawn directly from Aristotle's writings but from commentaries, scholastic compendiums or earlier patristic authors (as, e.g., *Nemesius of Emesa).

Anastasius the Sinaite, in his Viae dux, makes extensive use of axioms that go back to Aristotle: we mention here only the definition of ὅρος (PG 89, 52C14-15), which is compared with Aristotle, Met. Δ 1039a 19-20; and the identity between φύσις, οὐσία, γένος and μορφή (PG 89, 57A2-3, see Met. Δ 1014b35-36, Λ 1070a9-11, De part. anim. B 646b1, De an. II 412a6-8). The terms κατάφασις and ἀπόφασις (PG 89, 80D, 81A) are also Aristotelian.

Aristotelian doctrines can also be found in Maximus the Confessor: the contraposition established between the function of νοῦς and that of αἴσθησις in Quaest. ad Thalass. 58 (PG 90, 596D) and Cent. IV (PG 90, 1304C) is compared with Aristotle, De an. III 429a16-18. The definitions of βούλησις (Ad Marinum: PG 91, 13B 2-3; see Aristotle, De an. III 433a 23-24) and προαίρεσις (Ad Marinum: PG 91, 16C-D; see Eth. Nic. III 1113a 9-11) are also Aristotelian, as is the equivalency between οὐσία and φύσις (Definit.: PG 91, 149B), already noted in Anastasius the Sinaite. Moral maxims attributed to Aristotle are cited in the Loci communes (see, e.g., PG 91, 817B1, 825D3-6, 872A9-11, 952B5-10). The patristic florilegium known as Doctrina patrum de incarnatione Verbi, composed in the 7th c. and attributed by its editor F. Diekamp, though only hypothetically, to Anastasius the Sinaite (Doctrina patrum de incarnatione Verbi, Münster 1907, LXXXVI-LXXXVII), has Aristotelian material in chs. 6 and 28: in ch. 6 (Diekamp 35-47) the equivalency between φύσις and οὐσία is asserted (see above regarding Anastasius the Sinaite); in ch. 28 (Diekamp 198-204) the Aristotelian concepts of δύναμις, ἐνέργεια, ἕξις and στέρησις are treated, based on the two Aristotelian commentators Elijah and Stephen.

In his Dialectica in 68 chapters (ed. B. Kotter, Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos I [PTS 7] Berlin 1969; PG 94, 521-676), *John of Damascus makes extensive use of Aristotelian doctrines, esp. those contained in the Categorie and De interpretatione. As G. Richter has shown (Die Dialektik des Johannes von Damaskos, Ettal 1964 [Studia patristica et byzantina 10], 235-242), we cannot speak of a direct knowledge of Aristotle: his most distant sources are the Aristotelian commentators of the Alexandrian school, in particular David, Elijah and Stephen of Alexandria (ibid., 236); his most direct sources are compendiums including Aristotelian material and compiled in a patristic milieu, such as the Doctrina patrum de incarnatione Verbi (ibid., 238). The Bodleian codex Auct. T. 1-6 contains an analogous collection of Aristotelian material, edited by Kotter in the appendix of the first volume of his edition of John of Damascus; its relation to John of Damascus's Dialectica, Nemesius of Emesa and Maximus the Confessor have been accurately studied by G. Richter, op. cit., 23-39.

In the succeeding centuries* Byzantine Aristotelianism underwent a number of revivals with *Photius, Michael Psellus, Michael of Ephesus, George Pachimera, George Scholarius and Leo Magentinus, but these authors are beyond the chronological limits of the present encyclopedia.

For specific bibliography pertaining to the individual arguments, see the references included in the article.

General works: J.L. Stocks, Aristotelianism, Oxford 1925; W. Jaeger, Aristoteles Grundlegung einer Geschichte seiner Entwicklung, Berlin 1955; W.D. Ross, Aristotle, London [5]1956; I. Düring - G.E.L. Owen (eds.), Aristotle and Plato in the Mid-Fourth Century, Göteborg 1960; I. Düring, Aristoteles: Darstellung und Interpretation seines Denkens, Heidelberg 1966; P. Moraux (ed.), Aristoteles in der neueren Forschung, Darmstadt 1968; Id., Der Aristotelismus bei den Griechen von Andronikos bis Alexander von Aphrodisias I, Berlin-New York 1973; II, 1984; III, 2001 (It. tr. with preface and introduction by G. Reale and Th. Szlezák, Milan 2000); J. Barnes, Aristotle: A Bibliography, Oxford 1977; R. Sorabji (ed.), Aristotle Transformed: The Ancient Commentators and Their Influence, Ithaca, NY 1990; C. Mueller-Goldingen, Aristoteles. Eine Einführung in sein philosophisches Werk, Hildesheim 2003.

S. Lilla

ARIUS – ARIANISM. Alexandrian, born ca. 260, Arius was for a time a disciple of *Lucian of Antioch, or at least in contact with him. At the time of *Peter of Alexandria (300–311) he initially adhered to the

*Melitian *schism, then returned to the Catholic Church. Around 320, as an influential priest in charge of the church of Baukalis, he began to spread his own ideas about the *Trinity, provoking controversy, the intervention of bishop *Alexander, a public debate and finally Arius's condemnation, endorsed some time later by a council of *Egyptian bishops. To this phase of his activities we can refer fragments of the Thalia (Banquet), an exposition of his doctrine in verse (and in prose?), and two letters to *Eusebius of Nicomedia and Alexander of Alexandria. (Some years later he also sent a profession of faith to *Constantine.) We know his doctrine from these texts and from those of his partisans (*Eusebius of Nicomedia, *Asterius the Sophist, etc.)

Arius's point of departure was the *Origenian trinitarian doctrine traditional to *Alexandria, which considered the Father, Son and Holy Spirit as three *hypostases (i.e., individual subsistent realities) distinct from and subordinate to one another, though participating in one divine nature. He stressed this *subordinationism radically, probably in reaction to *Sabellianism and certain overly materialistic conceptions of the Son's generation from the Father. According to Arius, the Father is a monad, absolutely transcendent in relation to the Son, who is distinctly inferior to him, other than him by nature and by hypostasis: God, yes, but of inferior rank, authority and glory. Whereas Origen, and Alexander after him, asserted the Son's coeternity with the Father—his source ontologically but not chronologically—Arius was convinced that for the Son to be coeternal with the Father he must, like him, be ungenerated. Since there cannot be two ungenerated beings, the Son, though existing before all times and all creation, came after the Father, from whom he derived his being: there was a time when the Son did not exist. Neither did Arius accept the Son's generation from the Father's substance (= nature), since this would imply the division of the divine monad: initially (in a letter to Eusebius) he claimed that the Son was created from nothing by the Father's work; later he avoided this expression as too scandalous, and spoke of the Father's generation of the Son, though he continued to think of this generation as a creation: the Son is the only creature (ktisma, poiēma) created directly by the Father, while the whole rest of creation is the direct work of the Son by the Father's will. Arius, who paid little attention to the Holy Spirit, supported his doctrine with a number of passages of Sacred Scripture which, in referring to the Son, use expressions such as make, create and the like (Pr 8:22; Acts 2:36; Col 1:15).

Condemned at Alexandria, Arius found supporters in the East outside Egypt in some bishops who had been Lucian's disciples, among them the influential Eusebius of Nicomedia, and in others like *Eusebius of Caesarea who, while not sharing Arius's radical subordiantionism, held an intermediate doctrinal position between him and Alexander. This led to a bitter controversy, which Constantine tried to end through his envoy *Ossius of Cordoba. This mediation failing, he summoned, perhaps on the advice of Ossius and Alexander, an ecumenical council at *Nicaea in Asia Minor in spring 325. Some months before, a local council at *Antioch presided over by Ossius condemned Eusebius of Caesarea and other partisans of Arius. At the Council of Nicaea, which was attended by more than 250 bishops, nearly all from the East, Arius's few supporters were overwhelmed by the coalition of moderate Origenians, led by Alexander, and *monarchians of the Asiatic tradition, led by *Marcellus of Ancyra and Eustathius of Antioch. A formula of faith was imposed in which the fundamental Arian positions were condemned and the Son was defined as homoousios ("of the same substance, consubstantial") with the Father. Almost everyone accepted and subscribed the profession, with the exception of Arius and two Libyan bishops, who were condemned and exiled to Illyria. Soon after, Eusebius of Nicomedia and *Theognis of Nicaea, who continued to support Arius's partisans, were deposed and exiled to *Gaul.

The Nicene *Creed stressed Christ's unity with the Father to the maximum degree: homoousios, given the many meanings of ousia,* could mean that the Son is not only of the same nature as the Father but also of the same hypostasis, a claim so contrary to the doctrine of the three hypostases prevalent in the East as to be considered Sabellian. The formula thus met the aspirations of monarchians like Marcellus and Eustathius halfway, but was not agreeable to many others, anti-Arian but also antimonarchian, who had subscribed only because of Constantine's pressure. This discontent favored the reaction of Arius's supporters, esp. when in ca. 328 Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicaea were recalled from exile and reinstated: Eusebius had influential support in the imperial family, and Constantine himself, convinced that religious peace could be assured only by a broad concentration of moderate elements, was as averse to some of Arius's more radical opponents as he had been to the radicalism of the Arians. Already in 327 a council at Antioch presided over by Eusebius of Caesarea had condemned and deposed Eustathius, for reasons not clear to us but certainly disciplinary rather than doctrinal. He was exiled to *Thrace, and we hear no more of him. Eusebius of Nicomedia's return from exile intensified this policy, which aimed to remove Arius's best-known opponents through deposition and exile under various accusations but without reopening the doctrinal question. Minor characters like *Asclepas of Gaza and *Lucius of Adrianople were attacked, along with *Athanasius of Alexandria, Alexander's successor since 328, and Marcellus of Ancyra. Athanasius, hard-pressed by the Melitian schismatics, fell prey to their collusion with the pro-Arians headed by the two Eusebiuses and, at the Council of *Tyre in 335, was condemned for violence against the Melitians; Constantine had him exiled to Gaul. Marcellus of Ancyra was accused of *heresy and condemned in 336 at *Constantinople because of his radical monarchianism, which was assailed by Eusebius of Caesarea. Arius, who had returned from exile some time before but had not been admitted to Alexandria, sent a general profession of faith to Constantine and was rehabilitated shortly after Athanasius's condemnation but died before reentering Alexandria. Constantine's death (337) and the division of the empire between *Constans (West) and *Constantius (East) fundamentally altered the political situation, with strong repercussions on the course of the controversy.

At first the bishops exiled in the West, including Athanasius and Marcellus, were authorized to reenter their sees; but Constantius took up a position in favor of Eusebius of Nicomedia and the anti-Nicene (rather than specifically pro-Arian) establishment then dominant, again forcing those bishops to leave their sees and take refuge in the West. Here *Rome, which under Constantine had been denied any chance to interfere in the conflict, sided with the exiles: in fact the Nicene Creed caused no difficulties at Rome, given the traditional Roman sympathies for monarchianism; Athanasius and Marcellus therefore easily convinced Pope *Julius that their Eastern adversaries were all genuine Arians. Accepting this simplistic presentation of the Eastern situation, in 341 a Roman council cleared Athanasius and Marcellus of all charges and accused the Easterners of being Arians. They responded with a council at Antioch later in the same year which rejected the imputation of Arianism, confirmed the condemnation of Arius's radical theses and approved a formally *orthodox formula of faith which ignored the Nicene homoousios, reaffirmed the doctrine of the three hypostases and strongly emphasized Christ's divinity.

This formula remained dominant in the East until 357, and Eusebius of Nicomedia assembled a wide front around it, ranging from a traditional Origenian-type orthodoxy to a disguised Arianism. The reaction against Roman encroachment, ill-tolerated in the East, also favored the designs of Eusebius of Nicomedia, who died soon after the Council of 341. The ecumenical Council of *Serdica (now Sofia in Bulgaria) in 343, which Julius had intended to reach an understanding, ended in complete failure, with Easterners and Westerners reciprocally *excommunicating each other; while the former confirmed the Antiochene creed of 341, the Westerners published a document of belief with clear monarchian tendencies, asserting a single hypostasis of Father and Son. A long formulation of faith (Ekthesis makrostichos) presented to Constans at *Milan in 345 by an Eastern delegation was not well received; and though in 346 Constantius, pressed by Constans, authorized Athanasius to return to Alexandria, where he was triumphantly received, the situation remained static both politically and doctrinally. It was reopened when, following the murder of Constans (350) and the defeat of the usurper Maximus (351), Constantius reunited the whole empire under himself and thought to unify it religiously as well as politically. Councils held at *Arles (353), Milan (355) and *Béziers (356) compelled the Western episcopate to condemn Athanasius, with the exception of a few bishops who were deposed and exiled (*Eusebius of Vercelli, *Lucifer of Cagliari, *Hilary of Poitiers and some others): even Pope *Liberius, who protested these decisions, was exiled to *Thrace; in early 356 Athanasius was forced to abandon Alexandria and find refuge among the *monks of the desert. Meanwhile, ca. 355, doctrinal activity was resumed: while Athanasius reintroduced the Nicene homoousios as a distinctive term of Catholic belief in Christ's perfect divinity and his equality and unity with the Father, *Aetius and then Eunomius, protected by *Eudoxius of Antioch, systematically proposed the thesis of radical Arianism, earning the name *anomoians since they considered the Son unlike (anomoios) the Father. In their judgment the Father, being ungenerated, is the only supreme God, while the Son, not participating in this prerogative, is extraneous to him by nature and radically inferior, a minor god created by the Father to provide for the creation of the world.

As a result of these events, in 357 *Valens of Mursa, Ursacius of Singidunum and *Germinius of Sirmium, pro-Arian Illyrian bishops and inspirers of Constantius's religious policy, met at *Sirmium with a few others and published a formula of faith that, without clearly asserting the anomoian theses, passed over them in silence and instead proscribed the use of homoousios (and of homoiousios,* a term then starting to be discussed), in a doctrinal context that stressed the Son's inferiority and thus denied his unity with the Father. This formula (blasphemia Sirmiensis) aroused violent reactions in both West and East. In fact many bishops, esp. those of Asia Minor, worried by the resurgence of radical Arianism in its anomoian dress, were already seeking a middle way between this doctrine and that of the Nicene homoousios, which they considered Sabellian. In spring 358 a small council at Ancyra published a long synodal letter under the names of *Basil of Ancyra, Marcellus's successor, and *George of Laodicea, affirming the Son to be coeternal with the Father, really generated by him and therefore fully God; they defined him as homoiousios, i.e., like the Father according to substance (ousia), thinking that this formula avoided the risk of Sabellianism which they saw in the homoousios, and safeguarded the full divinity of the Son. The homoiousian reaction had immediate success with Constantius, who was also worried by anomoian propaganda: a small council at Sirmium (358), where the emperor was then residing, sanctioned the Antiochene formula of 341, interpreted in the light of homoiousian theology, and deposed many pro-Arian bishops, including Eudoxius; for his part the emperor decided to summon a new ecumenical council to bring definitive peace to Christianity. After various uncertainties, this council was called for summer 359: the Westerners were to meet at *Rimini, the Easterners at Seleucia in Caria. Constantius, meanwhile, distanced himself even from Basil and supported a group of Eastern bishops, incl. *Mark of Arethusa and *Acacius of Caesarea, who sought a more neutral formula of faith around which to gather assent from various directions.

Thus at Sirmium, 22 May 359, a new formula of faith was published which was to serve as a basis for the work of the impending councils: the term ousia was proscribed and the Son defined in general terms as like the Father in everything and according to the Scriptures. (The defenders of this formula are known as *homoians, from homoios, "like.") The Council of *Seleucia opened on 27 September 359: after a few days of bitter discussion the homoiousians prevailed and again imposed the Antiochene formula of 341 on a homoian and pro-Arian minority led by Acacius and Eudoxius, who had proposed a formula like that of Sirmium a few months before.

The Council of Rimini, on the other hand, opened at the end of May with an initial preponderance of supporters of the Nicene homoousios, still greatly in vogue in the West. Despite this, long and confused events inspired by Valens and Ursacius and favored by the emperor resulted in the council approving a formula of faith that defined the Son as like the Father according to the Scriptures, and proscribed as unscriptural the use of ousia in doctrinal contexts. All of the bishops present at Rimini were forced to subscribe to this formula. It was confirmed by a new council held at Constantinople early in 360, which saw the deposition and exile of all the main homoiousian proponents and the triumph of Acacius and Eudoxius. Shortly thereafter Eudoxius was transferred to Constantinople and replaced at Antioch by *Meletius, a friend of Acacius. The radical Arians (anomoians) were also attacked in a show of the winning party wishing to distance itself from any extremism, whether Arian or anti-Arian. The imprecision of the formula of Rimini meant that it could be approved in part by everyone, but it took no account of the theological intrigue that had taken place on all sides during those years: its fortunes were tied to those of Constantius, and he died soon afterward, in 362.

Constantius's successor *Julian, being a *pagan, had no interest in the dispute, so he recalled all those whom Constantius had exiled for religious reasons. While this measure gave the anomoians freedom of action, it also gave it to the anti-Arians, both homoousian and homoiousian, the latter being much stronger than the former. In the West, where the Arians were very weak and the anti-Arians strong and united in observance of the Nicene faith, the reaction began in Gaul under Hilary's leadership and quickly prevailed everywhere, helped by the moderate measures taken against the many bishops who had yielded to pressure at Rimini: they were required only to subscribe to the Nicene formula and condemn Arianism.

*Valentinian I, emperor from 364, was not interested in the religious aspect of the controversy, which made it possible for the Arians to keep several positions they had already acquired. At Milan, e.g., the Arian *Auxentius remained bishop until his death (374), despite an attempt by Hilary to expel him (364): his successor, however, was the Nicene *Ambrose. Similarly, upon *Germinius of Sirmium's death (376), Ambrose imposed Anaemius, another Nicene, as his successor. At this time in the West the Arians controlled only a few Illyrian sees.

In the East things went differently, not so much because the Arians were stronger (though divided between moderates, with Eudoxius and *Euzoius, and radicals, with Eunomius), but above all because the anti-Arians were even more divided. In 362 Athanasius called a council at Alexandria which, as Hilary had done, approved moderate measures against the many who had yielded to the Arians through fear or political interests, and again proposed the Nicene homoousios as a formula of faith around which to unite all the anti-Arians. In 363 a small group of homoiousians and homoians, meeting at Antioch around Meletius, subscribed to the Nicene formula but interpreted homoousios in the sense of homoiousios. But the anti-Arians at Antioch were divided into two communities: a small group of Nicenes led by *Paulinus were opposed by a more numerous community with homoiousian or at least more moderate leanings, led by Meletius. He had connections with Acacius and circles still hostile to Athanasius, and despite the acceptance of the homoousios, he avoided any settlement with the Alexandrian bishop, who consequently entered into communion only with Paulinus's small Nicene community. This aggravated the schism of Antioch, since the West followed Athanasius's example and favored Paulinus, while the whole of the East except Egypt stood firm for Meletius.

The divisions among the anti-Arians were complicated by the rise, ca. 360, of the question of the Holy Spirit: the problems previously limited to the Father/Christ relationship were gradually extended to this as well. Homoousians and anomoians had no doubts: the former considered the Holy Spirit homoousion with the Father and the Son, God with them, equal in power and dignity; the latter considered the Holy Spirit inferior to both Father and Son, not God but a creature. The homoiousians, however, found themselves in difficulties: many of them did not consider the Holy Spirit to be God in the same way as the Father and the Son, but didn't know how to define it; others considered the Spirit only a creature: these were initially called pneumatomachi* and then *Macedonians from Macedonius, a homoiousian who was bishop of Constantinople ca. 360 and whose connection with the question of the Holy Spirit remains obscure. This politico-religious picture was further complicated by a number of personal questions. Faced with the situation, Valentinian's brother *Valens—who took command in the East in 364—partly influenced by Eudoxius, took a stand in favor of the moderate Arians and was merciless, with new depositions and exiles, toward homoousians and homoiousians: Meletius and Athanasius were both banished from their sees. The homoiousians, who at Lampsacus in 364 had reaffirmed the Antioch formula of 341 and were especially targeted by Valens's measures, sent a delegation to Rome to seek help and solidarity from Pope *Liberius, but he would not receive them into communion until they subscribed to the Nicene Creed (365/366). A council of homoiousians at Tyana in *Cappadocia in 366 ratified the delegation's actions, but a group of them disagreed: meeting at Antioch in Caria, they rejected the homoousios and once more reasserted the Creed of Antioch of 341.

This confused situation began to clarify between 370–378 thanks to the work of *Basil of Caesarea in Cappadocia. On the political level he sought to reunite all the Easterners around Meletius: for this he risked a falling out with the West, where Pope *Damasus and Ambrose supported Paulinus. On the doctrinal level he sought a conciliatory formula between the Nicene homoousios and the trinitarian doctrine of the three hypostases, assuming ousia ("substance") to mean the substance or divine nature common to the three subsistent and mutually distinct hypostases. Thus, one ousia and three hypostases: this formula, parallel to the Western formula of "one divine nature (or substance) in three persons," prevailed at the Council of Constantinople of 381, when the accession of the Nicenes *Gratian and *Theodosius I to the leadership of the empire resulted in the triumph everywhere of the Nicene faith, supplemented in the Creed of Constantinople by a clause on the divinity of the Holy Spirit and accepted in the East according to the Basilian interpretation. In the East, tenacious conventicles of Arians, though divided among themselves, remained active beyond the mid-5th c. but presented no real problem. In the West, however, where the Council of Aquileia of 381 seemed to have liquidated the remains of Arianism, it took on renewed vigor with the barbarian invasions. The Christian *Goth Ulfilas had spread the Christian faith among them in the form of radical Arianism, and they sought to preserve this faith as a distinctive mark of their nationality when they installed themselves as rulers of the West. At the same time, in the late 4th c. and the first decades of the 5th, we witness a flowering of Arian Latin literature and exegesis (Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum, Tractatus in Lucam etc.), tending to radicalism. The impact of the Arian invaders on the Catholics was particularly violent in the *Vandal invasion of Africa, where Catholics were persecuted, at times ferociously, under *Genseric (428–477), *Huneric (477–484) and Thrasamund (496–523); elsewhere the relationship was much less violent. But the final conversion of all the barbarians to Catholicism did not come about until the end of the 6th c. (and even later for the *Longobards).

CPG II, 2025-2042 (writings on Arius): H.G. Opitz, Urkunden zur Geschichte des arianischen Streites, Berlin 1934; G. Bardy, Recherches sur S. Lucien d'Antioche et son école, Paris 1936; E. Boularand, L'hérésie d'Arius et la foi de Nicée I-II, Paris 1972-1973; Alessandro e Ario: un esempio di conflitto tra fede e ideologia. Documenti della prima controversia ariana, It. tr. ed. E.

Bellini, Milan 1974; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; R. Lorenz, Arius judaizans? Untersuchungen zur dogmengeschichtlichen Einordnung des Arius, Göttingen 1979; M.L. West, The Metre of Arius' Thalia: JTS 33 (1982) 98-105; H.C. Brennecke, Hilarius von Poitiers und die Bischofsopposition gegen Konstantius, II, Untersuchungen zur dritten Phase des arianischen Streites (337–361), Berlin-New York 1984; M. Simonetti, Ancora sulla datazione della Thalia di Ario: SSR 4 (1984) 349-354; W.A. Löhr, Die Entstehung der homöischen und homöusianischen Kirchenparteien: Studien zur Synodalgeschichte des 4. Jahrhunderts, Bonn 1986; R. Williams, Arius: Heresy and Tradition, London 1987, ^{2}2001: contains an appendix surveying studies since 1987; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988; A. Martin, Les relations entre Arius et Melitios dans la tradition alexandrine. Une histoire polémique: JTS 40 (1989) 401-413; A.M. Ritter, Arius redivivus? Ein Jahrzwölf Arianismusforschung: Theologische Rundschau 55 (1990) 153-187, bibliography of recent works on Arius; B.M. Palumbo Stracca, Metro ionico per l'eresia di Ario: Orpheus n.s. 12 (1990) 65-83; L. Perrone, Da Nicea (325) a Calcedonia (451). I primi quattro concili ecumenici: istituzioni, dottrine, processi di ricezione, in G. Alberigo (ed.), Storia dei Concili Ecumenici, Brescia 1990, 19-45; K. Metzler, Ein Beitrag zur Rekonstruktion der "Thalia" des Arius (mit einer Neuedition wichtiger Bezeugnungen bei Athanasius), in K. Metzler - F. Simon, Ariana et Athanasiana: Studien zur Überlieferung und zu philologischen Problemen der Werke des Athanasius von Alexandrien, 1991, 11-45; A. Pardini, Citazioni letterali dalla ΘΑΛΕΙΑ in Atanasio, Ar. I,5-6: Orpheus n.s. 12 (1991) 411-428; M.R. Barnes - D.H. Williams (eds.), Arianism after Arius: Essays on the Development of the Fourth-Century Trinitarian Conflicts, Edinburgh 1993; R.D. Williams, Arius, Arianismus: LTK^{3} 1, 981-989; G.Ch. Stead, Arius in Modern Research: JTS 45 (1994) 24-36; M.F. Wiles, Archetypal Heresy: Arianism Through the Centuries, Oxford 1996; M. Simonetti, Teologia e cristologia dell'Egitto cristiano, in A. Camplani (ed.), L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo antica, Rome 1997, 11-38; H.C. Brennecke, Arius/Arianism: RGG^{4}, I, Tübingen 1998, 738-743; G.F. Hernández, El Sinodo de Alejandría (ca. 320) y sus consecuencias: Cathaginensia 14 (1998) 403-405; G.C. Stead, Philosophy in Origen and Arius: Origeniana Septima, Louvain 1999, 101-108; H. Strutwolf, Die Trinitätstheologie und Christologie des Euseb von Caesarea. Eine dogmengeschichtliche Untersuchung seiner Platonismusrezeption und Wirkungsgeschichte, Göttingen 1999; A. Camplani, Studi atanasiani: gli Athanasius Werke, le ricerche sulla Thalia e nuovi sussidi bibliografici: Adamantius 7 (2001) 115-131.

M. Simonetti

ARLES

I. The city - II. Christian origins - III. The church of Arles - IV. The primacy of Arles - V. Councils.

I. The city. Arles (Theline, Arelate, Arelatensis Urbs) was established at the crossing of the Rhone by the E-W road called Via Aurelia on the Italian side and Via Domitia on the Spanish side. The ancient and medieval town of Arles arose on a small limestone hill (23 m. above sea level) on the left bank of the main branch of the Rhone (the Grand Rhône). The oldest evidence concerning the town is from the 6th c. BC. From the 2nd c. BC, the Rhone's course seems to have been controlled (or split into a canal) in such a way as to allow the site to develop its double role as a maritime and river port. At Caesar's initiative, in 46 BC Nero Tiberius established a colony of veterans there; a surrounding wall was built at that time, now only minimally identified. Only the city center seems to have had an orthogonal urban plan, whereas later extensions included areas beyond the Rhone on the right bank in the Trinquetaille quarter (a medieval name). *Augustus made it a great commercial city, its importance confirmed by the associations of riverboatmen (nautae Druentici, utricularii corporati Arelatenses, nautae Atrici et Ovidis) and sailors (navicularii marini Arel.). This importance was ratified by *Constantine, who established a mint there in 313 (which continued in operation through the 5th c.) prior to that of Ostia, and by his successors; from 328 it was called *Constantina. From the late 4th c., certainly from 418, the see of the Praetorian Prefecture of the *Gauls was moved there from *Trier. Ausonius called it Arelate Gallula Roma. Arles later became *Visigoth (476–480), and *Ostrogoth with *Theodoric (508); it was besieged by the Franks, who conquered it only in 536, with the whole of Provence.

II. Christian origins. Legends of the evangelization of Arles arose in the 5th c., linked to the apostolate of St. *Trophimus, claimed by unreliable legends to be a disciple of St. Peter, and during the 11th c., in connection with the saints of Bethany (Mary Magdalene, Martha and Lazarus), a Life (BHL 5488/5492) of whom places Magdalene's tomb at Arles. These legends reflect later beliefs.

The reality is quite different. It is possible that Trophimus was the city's first bishop (first half 3rd c.) and that St. *Genesius was *martyred there 25 August 250. It is certain, on the other hand, that there were some *apostates at Arles during the persecution of *Decius (250), since Bishop *Marcian (the city's first trustworthily attested bishop, accused of *Novatianism by *Cyprian of Carthage) refused them reconciliation (Cypr., Ep. 68,1 and 5). The church of Arles enters history with him.

III. The church of Arles. The names of the bishops are known with gaps for the 4th c., and systematically from the 5th to 8th c. (beginning from Bishop *Patroclus [412–426]): the list was compiled by J.-R. Palanque. The importance of the local church is demonstrated by the wealth of literary sources and by urban and suburban archaeological evidence, including the famous *cemeteries of the Alyscamps and Trinquetaille, which have yielded the richest collection of Christian *sarcophagi in the West, after Rome. The city's first cathedral (4th c.), in the tower quarter called "of the Nuns" (des Mourgues), has been under excavation (2003). It was moved, probably by Bishop *Hilary (d. 449), near the law courts to the site of the present cathedral, now dedicated to St. Trophimus but originally established as the basilica beati ac primi martyris Stephani. The primitive cathedral was converted into a woman's *monastery by the celebrated bishop *Caesarius (500–543), who put his sister *Caesaria in charge of the community. Caesarius attached a monastic cell and a house for the sick to the new cathedral. The life of the Christian community has been reconstructed based on the sermons of St. Caesarius and monastic life based on the rules he drew up (Regula ss. virginum, 523; Recapitulatio, 534; Regula ad monachos, undated). Information on Christian worship and the saints is available from the same sermons, from the Passio s. Genesii (BHL 3304/5) and from the lives of Sts. Hilary (BHL 3882) and Caesarius (BHL 1508-1509). Including churches and monasteries, the sources attest eight Christian sanctuaries within the urban zone and four outside the walls.

IV. The primacy of Arles. Arles owed its eminent role among the churches of *Gaul to Constantine, who called a council there in 314 to put an end to the *Donatist problem in Africa. Bishops from the Gauls, Brittany, Spain, Italy, Dalmatia and Africa participated, also discussing the date of Easter, traditores, letters of ecclesiastical communion (litterae formatae), the ministry of deacons, excommunication and ordinations. Struggling with Vienne for the primacy of Viennensis, after the execution of the heresiarch *Priscillian, Arles also took a position in the Felician *schism within the Gallic church, which was ended not by the Council of *Nîmes (394) but by that of *Turin (398). Having failed to obtain the primacy, the bishop of Arles saw Pope *Zosimus (417) confer on him metropolitan rights over the old Narbonensis and a certain authority over the churches of Gaul. Subsequent popes did not renew the latter privilege, and Hilary (430–449) had difficulties with Rome because he wanted to retain it. It was renewed for St. Caesarius (502–542) by Pope *Symmachus, however, who conferred on him the pallium and the apostolic delegacy for Gaul, and the Roman dalmatic on his deacons (514)—privileges renewed by *Vigilius, *Pelagius and *Gregory the Great. With the Arab invasion (711–732) Arles began to decline, as it entered the Middle Ages.

DACL 1,2889-2916; L.A. Constans, Arles, Paris 1928; J. Hubert, La topographie religieuse d'Arles à l'époque paléochrétienne: CArch 2 (1947) 17-27; J.H. Beck, The Pastoral Care of Souls in South-East France During the Sixth Century, Rome 1950; F. Benoît, Topographie monastique d'Arles au VIe s., Étud. mérov-ing., Paris 1953, 13-17; var. aus., Villes épiscopales de Provence, Aix 1954; J.-R. Palanque, Le diocèse d'Aix-en-Provence, Paris 1975 (covers the history of the diocese until its suppression in 1790). An important monograph is included in the "Collection" of the Ecole Française de Rome, ed. M. Heijmans—a doctoral dissertation presented at the University of Aix-en-Provence in 1997: Duplex Arelas. Topographie historique de la ville d'Arles et de ses faubourgs de la fin du IIIe jusqu'au IXe siècle. We refer also to the most recently published texts, which contain the whole bibliography of the last few decades: P.-A. Février, Arles, Topographie Chrétienne des Cités de la Gaule, III, Provinces Ecclésiastiques de Vienne et d'Arles (Viennensis et Alpes Graiae et Poeninae), Paris 1986, 72-84; M. Heijmans, La topographie de la ville d'Arles durant l'antiquité tardive: Journal of Roman Archaeology 12 (1999) 142-167; J. Guyon - M. Heijmans (eds.), D'un monde à l'autre. Naissance d'une chrétienté en Provence (IVe-VIe siècle), Catalogue de l'exposition, Arles 2001; J. Guyon - A. Jegouzo, Les premiers chrétiens en Provence. Guide archéologique, Luçon 2001.

P. Pergola - V. Saxer

V. Councils. A great number of Western bishops, convened expressly by Emperor *Constantine, met at Arles on 1 August 314 under the presidency of Chrestus of *Syracuse to reexamine the *Donatist question. *Caecilian of Carthage and his accusers were present; the latter were unable to prove their accusations. The Council of Arles fully endorsed the decisions of the Council of *Rome of 313 (Hfl-Lecl 1,272), recognized Caecilian's innocence and condemned or deposed his accusers.

In addition to the Donatist question, this council ruled on various important disciplinary points. To facilitate the celebration of Easter on the same date, the council recommended that the pope fix a single date for all of Christendom (can. 1). Regarding the *baptism of *heretics, they preferred the Roman position to the African one formerly defended by *Cyprian in his controversy with Pope *Stephen I (can. 9) and then taken up by the Donatists. Against the latter, the council declared ordinations conferred by traditores to be valid (can. 14).

Other rulings regarded the duties of clergy, who were forbidden to change churches (cans. 2 and 21) under penalty of deposition; they were also forbidden to make loans at interest (can. 13).

The Fathers deposed traditor clerics (can. 14), forcibly reduced the pretensions of the Roman deacons (can. 18), and requested eucharistic hospitality for bishops on their way to Rome (can. 19). They made the presence of seven, or at least three, bishops mandatory for episcopal consecration (can. 20), and forbade deacons to celebrate the *Eucharist (can. 16).

Regarding the laity, Christians were forbidden to exercise the professions of charioteer (can. 4) or actor (can. 5), or to exercise municipal or public functions without the permission of the bishop (can. 7). Those who refused or deserted military service were threatened with excommunication (can. 3).

Finally, the Council of Arles specified the conditions for admission to the *catechumenate at the point of death (can. 6), and for the reconciliation of apostates (can. 22). It regulated the use of letters of communion (can. 10) and recommended young abandoned husbands not to remarry as long as the adulterous spouse was alive (can. 11).

Because of the variety of the questions addressed, this council provides an excellent view of the pastoral and disciplinary problems of the church on the morrow of the peace of Constantine. Many of the council's decisions were renewed by the Council of *Nicaea.

CCL 148,3-25; Turner: EOMIA 1, 371-416; Hfl-Lecl 1,275-298; Gaudemet, SC 241, 35-67; Palazzini 1,83; J. O'Donnell, The Canons of the First Council of Arles, 314 A.D., Washington 1961; A. Méhat, Le Concile d'Arles (314) et les Bagaudes: RSR 63 (1989) 47-70; F. Ruggiero, Su un aspetto della controversia donatista al I Concilio Arelatense: il Canone 3 e la Militia dei cristiani, in I Concili della Cristianità occidentale (secoli III-V). XXX incontro di studiosi dell'antiquity cristiana (Rome 3-5 May 2001), SEA 78, Rome 2002, 363-377; M. Paternoster, Il contributo del Concilio di Arles nello sviluppo della dottrina sul battesimo degli eretici, ibid., 379-391.

In 353, pressed by the emperor *Constantius, a large number of bishops met in council at Arles and subscribed the condemnation of *Athanasius. Only *Paulinus of Trier dissented.

CCL 148, 30; Hfl-Lecl 1, 869-870; Gaudemet, SC 241, 81-83; Palazzini 1, 83-84.

Several canonical collections entitled "II Council of Arles" hand down some 50 canons taken from various councils, specifically those of Arles (314), Nicaea (325), *Orange (441) and *Vaison (442). It is apparently a private collection composed between 442–506 for some bishops dependent on the *metropolitan of Arles.

CCL 148, 111-130; Hefl-Lecl 2, 460-476.

Between 449 and 461, a council presided over by Bishop Ravennius was celebrated at Arles to settle the dispute between the *monastery of *Lérins and Bishop Theodore of Fréjus.

CCL 148, 131-134; Hfl-Lecl 2, 886-887; Palazzini 1, 84-85.

In ca. 463, by the order of Pope *Hilarus, *Leontius of Arles called a council at Arles to examine the question of the irregular ordination for the bishopric of Die made by Archbishop Mamertus of Vienna.

Jaffé 556-559; Hfl-Lecl 2, 901-902; Palazzini 1, 85.

In ca. 470–475 some 30 bishops met at Arles under the presidency of Bishop Leontius and condemned the *predestinationist error professed by the priest *Lucidus.

CCL 148, 159-160; Hfl-Lecl 2, 908-911; E. Griffe II, 231; Palazzini 1, 85-86.

Ch. Munier - G. Pilara

ARMENIA

I. Christian origins - II. Architecture - III. Sculpture and painting.

I. Christian origins. The oldest Christian sources attribute the evangelization of Armenia more or less to the 2nd c., under the impetus of the dynasty of *Edessa: the apostle Thaddaeus—or rather *Addai, a Syrian disciple sent to Edessa to cure *Abgar—is said to have evangelized S Armenia, *Bartholomew the N: in any case, ca. 200, numerous Christian foyers are recorded in the region, as *Tertullian attests (Adv. Jud. 7,4). The first evangelizers thus came from *Syria, a fact that explains the derivation of part of the Armenian *liturgy from that of the Syrian, even to the use of the same terminology. The definitive conversion of Armenia, according to the first Armenian historians, was the work of St. *Gregory the Illuminator (Grigor Lousaworič, d. 325) during the reign of Tiridates III (252–330). Some useful information on this is contained in the Life of St. Gregory, of which we have numerous redactions—the most important are the so-called Armenian *Agathangelos and Greek Agathangelos; see G. Garitte, Documents: these sources, esp. the so-called Historia Agathangeli and Vita Gregorii, also provide precise information on the Armenian baptismal liturgy which, as Winkler has recently clarified (The Oldest Armenian Sources, 38-41) was partly modeled on the *Syriac liturgy.

Later *Caesarea of *Cappadocia, the city where Gregory settled after having been ordained bishop by *Leontius there, became the major pole of attaction of the Armenian church, whose bishops long continued to be appointed by its metropolitan: *Nersetes, e.g., was ordained by the famous *Eusebius, with magnificent ceremonies (see *Faustus of Byzantium, Bibliothèque Historique IV, 4, in V. Langlois, Collection, I, 238ff.), and organized the Armenian church on the model of the Cappadocian. This period coincides with the division of the country (387) between Romans and *Sassanids, and broadly with the episcopate of St. *Sahak the Great (d. 439), a relative of St. Gregory the Illuminator. During the same period—ca. the beginning of the 5th c.—the Armenian alphabet was created by *Mesrob, showing an influence of Persian, Greek, Syriac, Hebrew etc., a fact which reflects the region's geopolitical situation, contested between Parthians and Romans, Romans and Sassanids, Byzantines and Arabs. The influence of all of these peoples emerges from an analysis of Armenian artistic culture: the impact of these multiple linguistic contributions led gradually, and with a precise logic, to the full formulation of a genuinely Armenian artistic language, well differentiated from the contemporaneous *Byzantine culture. This can be partly imputed to the situation of the Armenian church, separated from the Byzantine by its declared opposition to the Council of *Chalcedon, made official from 491 (Council of *Vagharshapat) and confirmed by the Council of *Dvin in 527 (date disputed). The situation started to change in the 7th c., esp. from the time of *Heraclius, a period which saw a temporary rapprochement with the Greek church: under Arab rule there were numerous attempts at reconciliation, all short-lived. At the same time Armenia saw a multiplication of *heresies, including the so-called *Paulician, which may have exercised an influence on *baptism in Armenia. The difficult period ended in the 9th c. with the accession of the Bagratid dynasty: although relations between the Armenian and Greek churches were still difficult, medieval Armenia was born out of this context.

II. Architecture. In this melting pot of cultures in continual osmosis, the unifying and distinguishing element—Armenian architecture—consisted of a powerful wall structure: a curtain of squared blocks filled with rubble composed of tufaceous material and mortar (also used for roofing), which conditioned specific choices, both theoretical and formal. The origin of this structure, once attributed to Syria—in fact the systems are antithetical—is local Urartian (see F. de' Maffei, Rapporti, 275-286). We should also point out that Armenian buildings have no substructure, but rise on a stepped platform. This constitutes a solid belt of foundations: an architecture thus conceived lacks the column as a load-bearing element, for obvious reasons; it is always replaced by the pillar. The dimensions of buildings were in general rather limited, defined by a compact disposition of masses, one of the peculiarities of Armenian architecture. The few openings provide little light; there is no matroneum or atrium. Even the narthex, a characteristic element of "early Christian" architecture, is unheard of in Armenian religious architecture; rather, in the Middle Ages there appears the gavit, a sort of small domed portico in front of the façade, limited to the entrance area, whose functions have not yet been sufficiently clarified.

The sources contain information on the oldest Armenian buildings: the martyria built on the place of *martyrdom of Sts. Gaiane and Rhipsime and a church, probably episcopal, at Vagharshapat, whose plan, according to Agathangelos, Christ suggested to Gregory the Illuminator in a dream (early 4th c.). Khatchatrian has dated to the second half of the 4th c. some funerary complexes divided into three elements—cells, hypogeum and stele—as, e.g., the mausoleum of Aghtz: a distant Syrian model has been identified with such complexes, though the Armenian solutions have worked out their own linguistic code which differs from that of the prototypes. Surviving evidence for this period is extremely rare: single-aisled buildings of limited dimensions, some of them published by Gandolfo (Chiese e cappelle armene); to such buildings at a later date, usually around the 6th c., a small apsed room was added along the S side (see village church of Garni), whose liturgical functions are still obscure—perhaps functions relating to baptism. Gandolfo has also specified that the common function of such churches was usually martyrial. The most important building of this period was undoubtedly the cathedral of Etchmiadzin—whose present version dates partly from the 5th c.; however, underneath remains have been found belonging to the original 4th-c. building—and with it the three-aisled church of Qassaq, despite the reconstruction carried out in the following century. The same considerations can be advanced for the Church of St. Sergius at Tekor, with three aisles and polygonal apse, whose primitive 4th-c. nucleus was modified several times over the centuries. Foundations attributed to the 5th c. are more common: among them a particular place is occupied by the Church of Ererouk on the Turkish border, three-aisled with apse enclosed in a straight wall and framed by pastophories. Built using the Armenian mural technique, in plan and elevation the basilica shows precise parallels with contemporary Syrian architecture, both in the presence of two rooms near the façade and the so-called Syrian band (which in Syria generally surrounds the entire building like a belt, while in Armenia it emphasizes the openings), and in the pilaster strips that punctuate the outside walls and the small tympanated doorways (see Qalb Loze in N Syria, ca. 460). The external porticos, however, belong to the Armenian tradition and are found, e.g., in the more or less contemporary buildings of Dvin cathedral and Tekor, three-aisled with one apse: this plan seems to have been prevalent in the 5th c., as we infer from the analysis of buildings of this period such as the basilica of Tsitsernavank, three-aisled with apse enclosed in a straight wall.

Toward the end of the 5th c. came the use of the oldest dome in Armenia, as the remains of the cathedral of Etchmiadzin tend to demonstrate, specifically the phase of Vahan Mamikonian (post-480); this new tendency in Armenian architecture found expression in the 6th c. with the domed basilicas of Ptghni and Aroutch. The dome, a structure peculiar to the Armenian tradition, is always set over a square bay (an element of probable Sassanid origin; see Sarvistan and Firuzabad) and, at least until the early 7th c., the transition from the square to the circle of the dome is marked by the use of Armenian squinch, Strzygowski's so-called trischernische, later replaced by the pendentive. In this period, besides buildings on the basilica plan, variously interpreted and often combined with a dome, a growing number of circular buildings appear, beginning in fact with the cathedral of Etchmiadzin, probably a tetraconch, a floor plan that was particularly popular in Armenia. The so-called domed basilicas of the 6th c. include that of Ptghni near Yerevan, one of the oldest and most complete examples of this type and the prototype of many 9th- and 10th-c. churches. The 6th c. still continued the archaic type of longitudinal three-aisled basilicas, though in limited numbers: e.g., the Tsiranavor (red) basilica of Achtarak, built probably by Catholicos Nersetes II (548–557), and the similar basilica of Eghvard, built by Catholicos Moses of Eghvard (574–603).

At the turn of the 6th and 7th c., the church of Odzoun represents an important step in the evolution of the domed basilica (its dome is set on an octagonal drum) and heralds the more mature buildings of the 7th c.: the greater antiquity of this building is given away partly by the lateral porticos, which no longer appear in buildings of the full 7th c. This was the golden age of Armenian artistic culture which, partly thanks to the pro-Greek *catholicos Nersetes III "the Builder" (641–661), reached high formal levels: at a time when Byzantium, constrained between Arabs and Slavs, was going through perhaps the darkest moment in its history, Armenia marked its apex, esp. in architectural production—more than ever independent of Byzantine tradition—which evolved by exploring and devoloping its own ancient traditions, in a primarily historical perspective and with a "modern" mentality. Armenian artistic culture, esp. its 7th-c. output, should thus be seen as a sort of historical island in the sea of the great crisis that the East and West were both going through at that moment, indeed, the very crisis that marked the transition from the ancient to the medieval world. It was in this period that Armenia's unique lingustic code was elaborated, a code that would constitute the background of medieval artistic manifestations after the crisis that afflicted the region—the scene of many battles between Arabs and Byzantines in the 8th and 9th c. The symbol of this happy period, characterized in architecture by a wide variety of floor plans (e.g., T'alinn cathedral, triconch with dome, the small Greek-cross buildings of Achtarak—the so-called Karmnavor church—St. Stephen at Lmbat etc., the tetraconchs of Mastara, Bagaran and Artik, numerous polygonal buildings and more domed basilicas like Aroutch and Bagavan), is the Church of Zvartnots at Vagharshapat, whose liturgical functions have recently been discussed by Kleinbauer (see Zvart'nots, 245-262), who pronounced it a theophanic, not sepulchral, martyrium of St. Gregory, which simultaneously functioned as the palace church of the Armenian catholicos. A tetraconch, with exedras opened by columns—except for the E exedra, surrounded by an ambulatory and with a rectangular room projecting E—the building rises on the spot where, according to legend, the angels (in Armenian Zvartnots, the "Watchful Forces") appeared to St. Gregory; built by Nersetes III, it is the point of arrival—and simultaneously the point of departure—of certain Armenian building experiments.

The tetraconchal floor plan was employed in Armenia, where it was particularly popular, from the late 5th c. for Etchmiadzin cathedral: it was probably derived from Syrian architecture, specifically that of N Syria, where this type of building was extremely common (see Apamea, Seleucia Pieria, Aleppo, Resafa, Homs, all episcopal churches). That this floor plan was imported is also demonstrated by the use of columns; for reasons of equilibrium, Armenian buildings always used the pillar: in this case, after repeated collapses the intercolumnar spaces were filled in with masonry. The building has rich bas-relief decorations, sculptures in the pendentives—which appear for the first time in Armenia—probably representing the builders of the church, numerous basket capitals (a Byzantine tradition) with Nersetes's monogram, inner and outer walls modulated by blind arcades on half-columns (probably a Sassanid motif). The construction of Zvartnots was probably an event of great historical importance, as indeed the sources (Sebeos and Stephen Asołik) attest, so much so that in the same years other similar buildings were begun, such as the churches of Ischchan in Tayk, Nersetes III's birthplace (of which only one conch remains, incorporated into a 10th-c. structure), Bana, dated to the 9th and 10th c. but recently assigned to the age of Nersetes III, Lekit in modern Azerbaijan, and perhaps the "ghost" building of Dvin: still later Zvartnots was the exact prototype for the Church of St. Gregory of Gagik at Ani (late 10th c., confirming the validity of the architectural formulas tried out in the 6th and 7th c., which became the presuppositions of the artistic language of medieval Armenia).

With the dearth of significant discoveries in the area of the artistic and architectural production of early Christian Armenia, the publication of volumes and essays—e.g., those edited by Paul Cuneo in 1988, which include a thorough listing of surviving Armenian monuments from the 4th to the 19th c.—has contributed to a deeper knowledge of Armenia's Late Antique and medieval art, in particular of its architecture and its typological and technical evolution. As is well known, the surviving pictorial evidence from the 4th to the 7th c. is truly sparse, and the sculpture is a function of architecture. In particular, in recent years the origin and development of the "classical" Armenian basilica has been studied—three-aisled with barrel ceiling, in brick—which represents the most homogeneous and peculiar group of the Armenian Christian architecture of the first period, from the Etchmiadzin cathedral of the first half of the 4th c. on. A peculiar element of these buildings, which determined specific solutions regarding the elevations and the internal space, is the barrel vault, partially resting on T-pillars and partially on the traverse arches, and marking the spatial articulation of the reservoirs. These primitive buildings had a single apse and no pastophories. Also recently confirmed is the typological and formal continuity between some basilicas and rectangular audience halls, with wooden ceilings supported by columns with monumental capitals which divide the space into three aisles—e.g., the hall of the palace of Dvin—whose models must be found in Sassanid culture. From the Urartian period, however, it is the local culture that played a primary role in the formation of early Christian Armenian architecture, both in the typologies adopted and with respect to certain technical and formal solutions. In the course of the second phase of the formative period (6th-7th c.), contemporaneous with the religious unification of the country, after the councils of *Dvin of 525 and 552, which sanctioned the independence of the Armenian church from the Byzantine, the central role of the domed church in its most important variants was reemphasized—free cross, tetraconchs, corolla, domed longitudinal plans. The other peculiar aspect of the period was the building of important civil residential (e.g., Aruć) and patriarchal complexes (at Dvin and Zvartnots), with plans of Sassanid origin.

III. Sculpture and painting. Sculpture is almost exclusively architectural and mostly confined to decorating window arches; motifs include vines, clusters, branches, palmettes and birds. The human figure sometimes appears in the decoration of some steles (see the double stele of Odzoun, 7th c.), in the surviving pendentives of Zvartnots and Dvin, in some capitals from Dvin showing the Virgin and child, and Christ between angels in a window arch opening onto the S wall of the church of Ptghni, with busts of Christ and saints. At Mren, the tympanum of the W door of the cathedral shows Christ between Sts. *Peter and *Paul and the donors, an *iconography very widespread in Armenia. All these are bas-reliefs, with the human figure usually summarily treated, but always vigorous and expressive.

Pictorial evidence of early Christian Armenia is very rare: there are remains of frescoes in the apse vault of the Church of St. Stephen at Lmbat (7th c.) and there are the apses of the contemporary churches of T'alinn, Mren and Talich, where sparse fragments of a theophanic vision painted in the background remain. The largest fragment is preserved at Lmbat, with Christ enthroned amid a tetramorph. Only two folios of miniatures are known from this period, with four full-page miniatures on recto and verso in the Etchmiadzin evangelary of 989 (Yerevan, Matedanaran 2374), depicting the announcement to Zechariah, the *Annunciation, the adoration of the *magi and the Baptism, attributed to the 7th c. based on exact comparisons with contemporary monumental painting (see Lmbat) and sculpture. Stylistically such images show a syncretism between an archaizing trend, recognizable in the details, and a predominant Eastern trend.

Regarding the scant pictorial evidence, noteworthy is Mathews's contribution on the four oldest miniatures of the Etchmiadzin evangelary (Mat. MS 2374, olim 229), confirming an early date (late 6th–early 7th c.) and the eclecticism of the models, which underscore the refinement of Armenian figurative culture in the period before Arab domination. With regard to sculpture, which was said at this time to be a function of architecture—which emphasized a further peculiarity with respect to Byzantium, i.e., the attention, from the beginning, to the external decoration of buildings—esp. noteworthy are some studies on a group of capitals, datable to around the 7th c., in the arcades of the tetraconch churches of Bana and Ishkhani (in present-day Turkey), some of which imitate the basket capital with ionic volutes, while others have stylized vegetative ornamentation, Iranian in origin: this is an autochthonous creation that falls outside of the classical orders.

V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie, Paris 1867 (2 vols.); G. Garitte, Documents pour l'étude du livre d'Agathange: ST 127, Vatican City 1946; A. Khatchatrian: RBK, s.v. Armenien, Stuttgart 1966; var. aus., Architettura medievale armena, Rome 1968; A. Khatchatrian, L'architecture arménienne du IVe au VIe siècle, Paris 1971; E.W. Kleinbauer, Zvart'nots and the Origins of Christian Architecture in Armenia: Art Bulletin 26 (1972) 245-262; A. Tchakmaktian, L'art décoratif de l'Arménie médiévale, Leningrad 1971; F. de' Maffei, Rapporti tra l'architettura armena e l'architettura urartea: CCAB 20 (1973) 275-286; F. Gandolfo, Chiese e cappelle armene a navata semplice dal IV al VII sec., Rome 1973; N. Thierry, La peinture médiévale arménienne: CCAB 20 (1973) 397-408; F. Gandolfo, Propil Kunst Gesch., Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, Armenien, Berlin 1977; var. aus., Ererouk, Documenti di Architettura armena 9, Milan 1977; G. Winkler, The Oldest Armenian Sources Concerning the Rite of Initiation: A Reflection on the Earliest Shape of Baptism in Armenia and Its Origins, Byzantine Studies Conference, Abstract of Papers, New York 1977, 38-41; M. Falla Castelfranchi, Armenia, aggiornamento all'Encicl. Univ. Arte, Rome 1978, 320-324; Id., I battisteri e la liturgia battesimale in Armenia dal IV all'VIII sec., in Baptisteria. Studi sui più noti battisteri dell'Oriente, Rome 1980, 84-96; F. Gandolfo, Le basiliche armene, IV-VII secolo, Rome 1982; T.F. Mathews, The Early Armenian Iconographic Program of the Ečmiadzin Gospel (Erevan Matedanaran MS 2374, olim 229), in East of Byzantium: Syria and Armenia in the Formative Period, eds. N. Garsoïan - T.F. Mathews - R.W. Thomson, Washington 1982, 199-212; F. Gandolfo - A. Zarina, Ptghni/Arudtch, Milan 1986; P. Donabédian, Le portail dans l'architecture arménienne du Haut Moyen Age: REArm 20 (1986-87) 337-380; P. Cuneo (ed.) et al., Architettura armena, dal quarto al diciannovesimo secolo, Rome 1988; D. Piguet Panayotova, Les chapiteaux de Zvart'noc': Atti del V Simposio Int.le di Arte armena, Venice 1988 (1992) 279-291; M. Hasratian, La coupole dans l'architecture arménienne aux IVe-Ve siècles, ibid., 197-213; D. Piguet Panayotova, Recherches sur les tétraconques à déambulatoire et leur décor en Transcaucasie au VIIe siècle: OC 73 (1989) 170-174; P. Cuneo, s.v. Armenia, architettura: EAM II, 478-486; M.A. Lala Comneno, s.v. Armenia, scultura: ibid., 486-488; P. Donabédian, Les thèmes bibliques dans la sculture arménienne préarabe: REArm 22 (1990-1991) 253-314; D. Piguet Panayotova, The Capitals of Iškhani: Akten des XII Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, II, Bonn 1991 (Münster-Vatican City 1995), 1107-1113; A. Kałantarian - N. Hagopian - A. Djamgocian - K. Ghafadarian, Armenische und Sasanidische Bautätigkeit in Dvin: Archäologische Mitteilungen aus Iran 25 (1992) 239-333: A. Kałantarian, Dvin. Histoire et archéologie de la ville médiévale, Neuchâtel-Paris 1996; M.A. Lala Comneno, s.v. Mren: EAM VIII, 602-603; V. Nersessian, A Bibliography of Articles on Armenian Studies in Western Journals, 1869–95, New York 1997; A. Zarian - A. Ter Minassian, Vałaršapat, Milan 1998; M.A. Lala Comneno, s.v. T'alin: EAM XI, 70; M.A. Lala Comneno, s.v. Zvart'noc': EAM XI, 860-861; N. Garsoïan, L'église arménienne et le grand schisme d'Orient, Louvain 1999; M. Bais, Albania Caucasica. Ethnos, storia, territorio attraverso le fonti greche, latine e armene, Milan 2001; K. Stopka, Armenia Christiana (IV-XV), Krakow 2002; A. Khazinedjian, L'Église arménienne dans l'Église universelle. De l'évangélisation au concile de Chalcédoine, Paris 2002.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ARMENIAN LANGUAGE and LITERATURE. Indo-European language, the first written literary and epigraphical evidence of which dates from the first half of the 5th c. Fragments of an earlier, even pre-Christian, oral epic literature have occasionally been transmitted by later historians.

Alphabet. After a failed attempt by Daniel the Monk (ca. 350?), the present alphabet, inspired by the Greek, was composed ca. 400 by St. *Mesrob.

Golden age (before 451?). Mesrob gathered around himself a group of disciples who probably translated some Greek fathers (*Cyril of Alexandria, *John Chrysostom, *Basil of Caesarea, *Eusebius of Emesa and *Severian of Gabala) and historical works, such as *Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicon and Ecclesiastical History; *Ephrem the Syrian and *Aphraates were translated from the *Syriac. The first examples of an original literature are from the same era: *Eznik's De Deo and *Koriun's Life of Mesrob. The Bible was also translated: the Armenian "vulgate" depends on Greek models, but at least for the gospels, there are traces of another version, perhaps older, derived from the Syriac Diatessaron*.

Silver age (2nd half 5th c.?). From this phase, in which the language gradually moved away from the "classical" models of the previous period, are the Histories of *Lazarus of Pharp, the so-called *Agathangelos and perhaps the first draft of *Moses of Khorene. Liturgical texts (Jerusalem Lectionaries, Anaphora of Basil) and canonical treatises were translated from the Greek, as well as ps.-Callisthenes, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Hesychius of Jerusalem (In Iob) and *Athanasius (Vita Antonii).

Hellenophile age (2nd half 6th c.). This age is characterized by the literalism of translations, applied rigorously esp. to philosophical or rhetorical texts (*Porphyry, *Aristotle, Dionysius Thrax) but also to other authors, such as *Irenaeus or *Philo. The reasons for the use of this translation technique are not clear, and its results must have often been incomprehensible to the Armenian reader (although there were "parallel" translations from the Syriac from roughly the same period). The fact that the most literal translations were of philosophical, rhetorical and scientific texts suggests a scholastic milieu, whose conventions were then applied to other types of translation. The philosophical translations are at the origin of an incipient Armenian philosophical school, in which *David the Philosopher stands out with his Commentary on Porphyry's Categories.

Theological thought. In the 2nd half of the 6th c. the Armenian church's anti-*Chalcedonianism was embodied in a polemical literature represented esp. by the treatise *On the Council of the Dyophysites and the letters of Vrthanes K'erdoł (550–617). Abraham of Albatanzi's correspondence tells us of the subsequent secession of the church of *Georgia. The dates of doctor *Elisaeus, though much disputed, must go back to the 6th c. At the start of the 7th c. the phantasiastae sect took root in Armenia, a *Eutychian group that denied the reality of Christ's *incarnation. John of Otzun's (*catholicos 718–729) treatise Adversus phantasiastas tells us about the group, which had already been attacked by the Seal of faith (ca. 630). 7th-c. authors include Sebaeos, author of a History of Heraclius, and the polymath *Ananias of Shirak (ca. 600–670), who composed some mathematical treatises, notable among them the Geography (Ashkharhatsoyts), passed down under the name of *Moses of Khorene.

The dates of many works traditionally attributed to the classical period are today contested: see *John Mandakuni, *Mambre Vercanol, doctor *Elisaeus and *Moses of Khorene. In the literary traditions of the East, Armenian was often used as an intermediary between Greek originals and Georgian versions. The Agathangelos and the Narratio de rebus Armeniae* were translated into Greek from Armenian originals. The Armenian migrations of the Middle Ages resulted in the differentiation of two dialects: Eastern (spoken in the Armenian Republic) and Western (in *Cilicia and the Western diaspora). The political vicissitudes of the Middle Ages caused the loss of considerable portions of the Armenian literary heritage.

Patrologia V, 575-607; K. Sarkissian, The Council of Chalcedon and the Armenian Church, London 1965; P. Grousset, Histoire de l'Arménie, Paris 1947; M. Abegjan, Istorija drevnearmjanskoj literatury I, Erevan 1948; H. Thorossian, Histoire de la littérature arménienne, Paris 1951; V. Inglisian, Die armenische Literatur, Armenisch und kaukasische Sprachen (Handbuch der Orientalistik I, 7), Leiden-Cologne 1963, 157-250; K. Sarkissian, A Brief Introduction to Armenian Christian Literature, London 1960; G. Bolognesi, La tradizione culturale armena nelle sue relazioni col mondo persiano e col mondo greco-romano, in La Persia e il mondo greco romano . . . , Rome 1966, 569-603; Ch. Renoux, La littérature arménienne, in M. Albert et al., Christianismes orientaux: introduction à l'étude des langues et des littératures (Initiations au christianisme ancien), Paris 1993, 107-166; R.W. Thomson, A Bibliography of Classical Armenian Literature to 1500 AD, Turnhout 1995; V.N. Nersessian, A Bibliography of Articles on Armenian Studies in Western Journals, 1869–1995 (Caucasus World), Richmond (Surrey) 1997.

Alphabet: C. Gugerotti, L'invenzione dell'alfabeto in Armenia: teologia della storia nella Vita di Maštoc' di Koriwn: C. Moreschini - G. Menestrina, La traduzione dei testi religiosi. Atti del convegno tenuto a Trento . . . 1993 (Religione and Cultura 6), Brescia 1994, 101-126; J.R. Russell, On the Origins and Invention of the Armenian Script: Muséon 107 (1994) 317-331.

Translations: G. Zarbhanalean, Matenadaran Haykakan t'argmanowt'eanc' naxneac' (Library of Armenian translations), Venice 1889; P. Sukias Somal, Quadro delle opere di vari autori anticamente tradotti in armeno, Venice 1825; S. Weber, Ausgewählte Schriften der armenischen Kirchenväter. III, Munich 1927; J. Muyldermans, Répertoire de pièces patristiques d'après le catalogue arménien de Venise: Muséon 47 (1934) 265-292; M. Morani, Situazioni e prospettive degli studi sulle versioni armene di testi greci con particolare riguardo agli storici, in M. Pavan - U. Cozzoli (eds.), L'eredità classica nelle lingue orientali (Acta Encyclopaedica 5), Rome 1986, 39-46; J.J.S. Weitenberg, The Language of Mesrop: l'arménien pour lui-même?, in Armenia and the Bible: Papers Presented to the International Symposium held at Heidelberg . . . 1990 (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 12), Atlanta 1993, 221-231; J.J.S. Weitenberg, Eusebius of Emesa and Armenian Translations, in J. Frishman - L. Van Rompay, The Book of Genesis in Jewish and Oriental Christian Interpretation: A Collection of Essays (Traditio Exegetica Graeca 5), Louvain 1997, 163-170; A. Ouzounian, Le discours rapporté en arménien classique (Bibliothèque des cahiers de l'Institut linguistique de Louvain 63), Louvain-la-Neuve 1992; L. Ter-Petrosian, Ancient Armenian Translations . . . , New York 1992, 1-46 (also in French); G. Bolognesi, Studi e ricerche sulle antiche traduzioni armene di testi greci (L'eredità classica nel mondo orientale. Serie monografica 1), Alexandria 2000; R. Sgarbi, Traduzioni armene di testi greci fra linguistica e filologia, in Autori classici in lingue del Vicino e Medio Oriente. Atti del VI, VII and VIII Seminario sul tema: "Recupero di testi classici attraverso recezioni in lingue del Vicino and Medio Oriente" (Milan, 5-6 October 1987; Naples, 5-6 December 1988; Bologna, 13-14 October 1989), ed. G. Fiaccadori . . . , Rome 2001, 115-122.

Bible: J.-P. Mahé, Traduction et exégèse: réflexions sur l'exemple arménien: Mélanges Antoine Guillaumont. Contributions à l'étude des christianismes orientaux (Cahiers d'orientalisme 20), Geneva 1988, 243-255; Ch. Burchard, Armenia and the Bible: Papers Presented to the International Symposium held at Heidelberg . . . 1990 (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 12), Atlanta 1993; V. Nersessian, The Bible in the Armenian Tradition, Los Angeles [London] 2001. OT: C.E. Cox, The Armenian Translation of Deuteronomy, Chicago 1981; S.P. Cowe, The Armenian Version of Daniel (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 9), Atlanta 1992; J.J.S. Weitenberg, Parallel Aligned Text and Bilingual Concordance of the Armenian and Greek Versions of the Book of Jonah, Amsterdam 1992; S.P. Cowe, Problematics of Edition of Armenian Biblical Texts, in H. Lehmann - J.J.S. Weitenberg, Armenian Texts: Tasks and Tools (Acta Jutlandica 69:1. Humanities Series 68), Aarhus 1993, 26-37. NT: S. Lyonnet, Les origines de la version arménienne et le Diatessaron, Rome 1950; L. Leloir, Citations du Nouveau Testament dans l'ancienne tradition arménienne. I, A-B: L'Évangile de Matthieu (CSCO 283-284/subs. 30-31), Louvain 1967; B.M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the New Testament . . . , Oxford 1977, 153-181; S. Ajamian - M.E. Stone, Text and Context: Studies in the Armenian New Testament: Papers Presented to the Conference on the Armenian New Testament May 22-28, 1992 (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 13), Atlanta 1994; G. Uluhogian, I Vangeli in Armenia, in I Vangeli dei Popoli. La Parola e l'immagine di Cristo nelle culture e nella storia, eds. F. D'Aiuto - G. Morello - A. Piazzoni, Vatican City 2000, 53-59.

Hellenophile school: Ch. Mercier, L'École hellénistique dans la littérature arménienne: REArm 13 (1978-79) 59-75; A. Terian, The Hellenizing School: Its Time, Place and Scope of Activities Reconsidered, in N.G. Garsoïan et al. (eds.), East of Byzantium: Syria and Armenia in the Formative Period, Washington 1982, 175-186; V. Calzolari - M. Nichanian, L'école hellénisante, in M. Nichanian, Âges et usages de la langue arménienne, Paris 1989, 110-142; J.J.S. Weitenberg, On the Interpretation of Postclassical Armenian Linguistic Data, in H. Lehmann - J.J.S. Weitenberg, Armenian Texts: Tasks and Tools (Acta Jutlandica 69:1. Humanities Series 68), Aarhus 1993, 65-74; J.J.S. Weitenberg, Linguistic Continuity in Armenian Hellenizing Texts: Muséon 110 (1997) 447-458; R. Sgarbi, Questioni di traduttologia armena in prospettiva interlinguistica, in La diffusione dell'eredità classica nell'età tardoantica e medievale. Il "Romanzo di Alessandro" e altri scritti. Atti del Seminario internazionale di studio (Rome-Naples, 25-27 September 1997), eds. R.B. Finazzi and A. Valvo (L'eredità classica nel mondo orientale 2), Alexandria 1998, 273-279.

V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie I-II, Paris 1869; G. Dédéyan, L'immigration arménienne en Cappadoce au XI^e siècle: Byzantion 45 (1975) 41-117; C. Mutafian, La Cilicie au carrefour des empires I-II (CEA 113), Paris 1988; H. Kaufhold, Die armenischen Übersetzungen byzantinischer Rechtsbücher I: Allgemeines; II: Die "Kurze Sammlung" ("Sententiae Syriacae") (Forschungen zur Byzantinischen Rechtsgeschichte 21), Frankfurt a. M. 1997; C. Hannick, La chronographie grecque de l'antiquité tardive et sa réception dans l'historiographie arménienne, in La diffusione dell'eredità classica nell'età tardoantica e medievale. Il "Romanzo di Alessandro" e altri scritti. Atti del Seminario internazionale di studio (Rome-Naples, 25-27 September 1997), eds. R.B. Finazzi - A. Valvo (L'eredità classica nel world orientale 2), Alexandria 1998, 143-155; W. Belardi, Lingua e scrittura alle origini della cultura armena cristiana: Rendiconti dell'Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei f. 9, 12 (2001) 181-220.

S.J. Voicu

ARMENIAN RITE. Akin to the old *Antiochene rite (ancestor of the present *Byzantine rite), the Armenian rite preserves original developments and influences from other sources (*Jerusalem, the *Syriac churches) from the *liturgy's formative period (4th-6th c.?); elements from Western liturgies were incorporated at the time of the crusades.

Eucharistic liturgy. Only one formulary is now in use, that of St. *Athanasius (so-called), but there are 10 more in the MSS, whose *anaphoras are similar to the Byzantine. Unleavened bread and wine unmixed with water are used, and Communion is distributed only under one species. Liturgical vestments are similar to the Byzantine, although priests regularly wear the coronet.

Liturgical year. Includes some noteworthy characteristics: there is no celebration of Christmas on 25 December; rather, it is celebrated on 6 January, i.e., joined to *Epiphany. (Consequently the circumcision of Jesus, the presentation in the temple and the Annunciation are all out of step with the other Christian churches.) Despite the existence of a synaxarion similar to that of Jerusalem, commemoration of the saints has no fixed dates, changing with the days of the week from year to year.

Ecclesiastical architecture. The general structure of churches is similar to the Byzantine, but the altar is on an elevated podium, and it is separated from the rest of the church not by an iconostasis (though this is found in some old churches) but by a veil. One type of altar is not imposed with absolute rigor; walls are generally sparsely decorated.

The sacrifice (matał) of a chicken or a lamb was preserved in the ritual (Maštoc') until recently, esp. in commemorations of the dead.

EC 1, 1976-1980; Ch. Renoux, Un bilan provisoire sur l'héritage grec du rite arménien: Muséon 116 (2003) 53-69; A.A. King, The Rites of Eastern Christendom II, Rome 1948, 521-646; A. Renoux, Le codex arménien Jérusalem 121 I-II (= PO 35,1 and 36,2), Turnhout 1969-1971; C. Renoux, Le lectionnaire de Jérusalem en Arménie: Le Čašoc' I-II (PO 44, 4; 48, 2), Turnhout 1989-1999; Y.V. Catergian [Gat'rčean] - Y.V. Dashian [Tašean], Srbazan Pataragamatoyc'k' Hayoc' . . . (Armenian Sacred Liturgies . . .), Vienna 1897; F.E. Brightmann, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Oxford 1896, 412-457; A. Hänggi - I. Pahl, Prex eucharistica. Textus e variis liturgiis antiquioribus selecti (Spicilegium Friburgense 12), Fribourg 1968, 319-346; A. Renoux, L'anaphore arménienne de saint Grégoire l'Illuminateur: Eucharisties d'Orient et d'Occident, II, Paris 1970, 83-108; F.C. Conybeare, Rituale Armenorum, Being the Administration of the Sacraments and the Breviary Rites of the Armenian Church . . . , Oxford 1950; N. Adontz, Les fêtes et les saints de l'Église arménienne: ROC 26 (s. 3, 6; 1927-28) 74-104 and 225-278; Ch. Renoux, "Les fêtes et les saints de l'Église arménienne" de N. Adontz: REArm 14 (1980) 287-305; G. Bayan, Le synaxaire arménien de Têr Israel (= PO 5, 6, 15, 16, 18, 19, 21), Paris 1910-1930; L.M. Froidevaux, Grigoris Aršarouni, Commentaire du lectionnaire (= Bibliotheca Armeniaca 1), St. Lazare 1975; G. Winkler, Das armenische Initiationsrituale. Entwicklungsgeschichtliche und liturgievergleichende Untersuchung der Quellen des 3. bis 10. Jahrhunderts (OCA 217), Rome 1982; Ch. Renoux, Office du matin et lectionnaire: REArm n.s. 23 (1992) 13-25; Ch. Renoux, Les commentaires liturgiques arméniens, in A.M. Triacca - A. Pistoia, Mystagogie: pensée liturgique d'aujourd'hui et liturgie ancienne. Conférences Saint-Serge. XXXIX^e semaine d'études liturgiques (Bibliotheca EphLit Subsidia 70), Rome 1993, 277-308; Ch. Renoux, Initiation chrétienne. 1. Rituels arméniens du baptême (Sources liturgiques 1), Paris 1997; C. Gugerotti, La liturgia armena delle ordinazioni e l'epoca ciliciana. Esiti rituali di una teologia di comunione tra Chiese (OCA 264), Rome 2001.

S.J. Voicu

ARNOBIUS of Sicca (3rd-4th c.). *Apologist. After many years as a teacher of *rhetoric at Sicca Venaria in *Numidia and an adversary of Christianity, and at an advanced age, Arnobius converted—probably in the first years of the 4th c., at the time of *Diocletian's persecution—and composed an apologetic work in seven books, the Adversus Nationes. *Jerome, who tells us something of him (see Chron. ad an. 2343; De vir. ill. 79 and 80; Ep. 58,10; 70,5), asserts that the composition of Arnobius's only surviving work was requested by his bishop as proof of the sincerity of his conversion. Died probably 327. The Adversus Nationes, passed down in a single 9th-c. codex, the Parisinus latinus 1661, begins by refuting the accusation—already known to *Tertullian (see Ad Nat. I, 9,3; Apolog. 40,1f.) and *Cyprian (see Ad Demetr. 2)—that the cause of every disaster to come upon the world was the Christians; it continues by rejecting the charge that they worship a man, and a crucified one at that. A fiery polemic then follows, in part directed at *pagan *philosophy (Arnobius rejects the *Platonic conception of the immortality of the soul—book II) and Greco-Roman religion, with its *anthropomorphism (book III), its improbable or shameful images of the gods (book IV), the ceremonies and fables of the mystery cults (book V), its temples, idols (book VI), and *sacrifices—in short its string of erroneous ideas or superstitions which show the limits of pagan thought on the deity, which Arnobius contrasts with the Christian notion and experience of it.

His high-flown style smacks of rhetorical tricks and scholastic influence, though it is occasionally effective because of its vehemence and vividness. Jerome, in a short, severe compendium on the style of Christian authors before him (Ep. 58), judges Arnobius rather negatively as uneven and confused, with no order or precision in his writings. Scholars have identified many of Arnobius's sources: among pagans he cites *Plato, *Aristotle, Sophocles, Posidippus, Varro and an extract of the Orphica; he alludes to Hermes Trismegistus (see Hermeticism); he seems to use the Chaldaean *oracles, the *magic papyri of the *liturgies of *Mithras, Zoroaster, Ostanes; also *Plotinus, Cicero and Lucretius. Regarding his conception of the deity and the divine, some critics have noted an Epicurean influence; others have recently explained it in terms of late 3rd-c. *African heterodoxy. As for Christian sources, the almost complete absence of scriptural citations is surprising, as is the lack of any explicit mention of ecclesiastical authors, though he seems to have used them: from *Clement of Alexandria to Tertullian and *Minucius Felix. (A common source has been supposed for the points of contact between Arnobius's work and *Lactantius's Divinae Institutiones.)

Some of Arnobius's doctrinal opinions have attracted the attention of historians by the fact that they do not correspond to the main lines of Christian *theology, even *Latin theology, which at that time was becoming more organized: God is conceived of as an absolutely transcendent being, without contact with creatures and incapable of anger (in contrast with Lactantius's De ira Dei); the pagan gods are not always denied but are thought of as inferior gods; nor are they identified with *demons, according to the widespread idea of earlier apologists. Arnobius says that the *human soul is corporeal, weak and inconstant, such that God cannot have been its creator; it is perhaps the work of a demiurge, inferior to God (whose character seems to be influenced by *gnosticism). Moreover, the human soul for Arnobius is corporeal and not by nature endowed with immortality, which it can nonetheless attain through knowledge of the true God (an idea already proposed, with different characteristics, by *Tatian or *Origen). On the whole, Arnobius's thought oscillates between conflicting positions, seems to be in search of itself, and is hard to systemize coherently and univocally. Certainly it reflects the disturbed and unquiet atmosphere of the late 3rd and early 4th c., and perhaps it attempts to reconcile pagan religious and philosophical elements with *orthodox and heterodox Christian elements in a vision that reflects its author's enigmatic personality.

The overarching characteristic of Arnobius's work is the anguished search for truth that pervades it and which expresses itself in the search for the truth about God, the truth about human nature and the truth about the cosmos. Impeding this search, however, are prejudices common to both ordinary people and the learned, calumnies against all that seems new, esp. regarding religion, and a visceral hatred of those who neither know nor want to know even the basic ideas of the emerging doctrine. Arnobius explains both the subjective criteria, essentially religious, that must motivate intellectual assent and the objective criteria capable of allowing one to overcome the stage of doubt in the conscious effort to construct a system of total truth. Insisting on the mediation of faith as a fundamental dimension of finding and adhering to truth, he is able not only to recover the values of the human ratio but also the dialectic significance of the relations that historically link humanity with the forces of nature (Nat. II, 46). Certainty, both subjective and objective can be reached even in the absence of absolutely convincing arguments: practically speaking, this implies action according to the precepts of a truth-risk, in which one assents precisely sine ratione (Nat. II, 78). To a blind faith in the philosophers, Arnobius counterposes a luminous faith in Christ.

In particular the concept of medietas seems to best express the thought of Arnobius: philosophus medius, a philosopher who chooses the middle way, knows the laws of his profession (rhetoric) and puts them to use as a theologian, as his new condition as a convert requires. He thus makes use of the mediocritas sermoni—a style neither too elevated nor too humble—and the examinatio momentorum parium—a balanced evaluation of the arguments for and against—to arrive at a theological judgment (Nat. VI, 8: ut mediocriter dicatur).

With the laws of logic and philosophical dialectic and recourse to the principles of evidence, contradiction, causality and, esp. regarding God, the apophatic way, Arnobius questions the pagan cultural inheritance and the *Stoic division of physics, ethics and logic (Nat. I, 2,7,8,18,20,65; II, 57; III, 29; IV, 15,19,27; V, 8,16,26,39; VII, 27). His convictions can be summed up in the axiom that only God is the highest being—summae qualitatis—and therefore only he belongs to the realm of necessity and certainty, whereas the rest (inferior gods and demons, if they exist, human beings, animate and inanimate creatures, if the latter also in some sense have perception) are mediae qualitatis, i.e., in an in-between state, thus belonging to the realm of the contingent, the relative and the doubtful, inasmuch as they receive being and existence, and perhaps immortality, from God (Nat. I, 28). In this sense Arnobius's work is a hymn to the true God, a pious homage, obsides pietatis, as Jerome significantly called it, and an invitation to accept his lordship.

Editions: CPL 93; PL 5, 718-1288; CSEL 4 (1875); Corpus Script. Latin. Paravianum 62 ([2]1953).

Translations: Ger.: F.A. v. Besnard, Landshut 1842; J. Alleker, Trier 1858; Eng.: G.E. MacCracken. ACW 7-8, Westminster, MD - London 1949; It.: R. Laurenti, Turin 1962.

L. Berkowitz, Index Arnobianus, Hildesheim 1967; P. Monceaux, Histoire litt. de l'Afrique chrétienne, 3, Paris 1905, 241-286; F. Gabarrou, Arnobe. Son œuvre, Paris 1921; E. Rapisarda, Arnobio, Catania 1945; G. Bardy: RAC 1, 709-711; P. Courcelle, Les sages de Porphyre et les "viri novi" d'Arnobe: REL 31 (1953) 257-271; P. Kraft, Beiträge zur Wirkungsgeschichte des Älteren Arnobius, Wiesbaden 1966; A. Sitte, Mythologische Quellen des Arnobius, Vienna 1970 (diss.); M. Jufresa, La divinidad y lo divino en Arnobio: BIEH 7,1 (1973) 61-64; H. Le Bonniec, Tradition de la culture classique. Arnobe témoin et juge des cultes païens: BAGB 1974, 201-222. Further bibliography in B. Altaner - A. Stuiber, Patrologie, Freiburg i.B. [8]1978, 183-185 and 584; E. Gareau, Le fondement de la vraie religion d'apres Arnobe: CEA 11 (1980) 13-23; O. Gigon, Arnobio. Cristianesimo e Mondo Classico, Rome 1982, 87-100; R. Laurenti, Il platonismo di Arnobio: Stud. Filos. 4 (1981) 3-54; B. Amata, Problemi di antropologia Arnobiana, Rome 1984; O.P. Nicholson, The date of Arnobius' Adversus gentes: SP 15 (=TU 128), Berlin 1984, 100-107; W. Schmid, Christus als Naturphilosoph bei Arnobius: Ausgewählte philologische Schriften, eds. H. Erbse - J. Kueppers, Berlin 1984, 562-583; A. Viciano, Retórica, filosofía y gramática en el Adversus Nationes de Arnobio de Sicca, Frankfurt a. M.- Bern 1993; F. Mora, Arnobio e i culti di mistero: analisi storica del V libro dell'Adversus Nationes, Rome 1994; M.B. Simmons, Arnobius of Sicca: Religious Conflict and Competition in the Age of Diocletian, Oxford 1995; Updated bibliography in Arnobius, Difesa della vera religione, ed. B. Amata, Rome 2000, 57-78.

P. Siniscalco - B. Amata

ARNOBIUS the Younger (d. after 455). There is no ancient mention of Arnobius, called the Younger to distinguish him from *Arnobius of Sicca; we know of him from works attributed to him in the manuscript tradition. According to this information, Arnobius was a *monk, perhaps *African, who lived at *Rome from ca. 430 until his death after 455. His first work seems to be the so-called Praedestinatus. The work—written under *Sixtus III in ca. 435 and which, according to Gori, is authentic (see, on the other hand, CPL 243)—contains three parts: a catalog of 90 *heresies in which the author, recognizing the Catholic faith of Rome, sets up his polemic against *Augustinianism; a predestinationist libellum containing the ideas on *grace and *predestination which at the time were known as Augustinian; and a refutation of the predestinationist heresy. Though he knows some of *Augustine's works, he depends primarily on *Pelagian sources and takes a middle road in rejecting early *heretical Pelagianism, though he defends the doctrine of *Julian of Eclanum. Also attributed to him are the Commentarii in Psalmos, a spiritual interpretation of the psalms, of great interest for the history of the Roman *liturgy, and esp. that of public *penitence; the Expositiunculae in Evangelium, a series of Scholia on the gospels of Mt, Lk and Jn; and the Liber ad Gregoriam, a consolatio to a Roman noblewoman in a difficult marriage. His most famous work was perhaps the Conflictus Arnobii cum Serapione, containing the transcript of a discussion on the agreement of Roman *christological traditions with those of *Alexandria, and a reflection by the author himself. It has two parts, the first dealing principally with *trinitarian faith, the second with esp. the *incarnation (Mary: *Sitte, Mythologische Quellen des Arnobius theotokos or anthropotokos?). Of particular interest is the patristic documentation supporting his positions. Since the author assumes *Chalcedonian faith, he must have written it after 451, thus in the time of *Leo I. Finally, it cannot be ruled out that Arnobius edited some *hagiographical legends, esp. the Acts of Sylvester.

CPL 239-243; Frede 193f. (bibl.); CCL 25; 25A; F. Gori, CP 14: Conflictus.—LTK[3] 1, 1020f.; RGG[4] 1 (1998) 790; LACL 64 (bibl.). - H. von Schubert, Der sog. Praedestinatus: TU 24,4, Leipzig 1903; G. Morin, Étude d'ensemble sur Arnobe le Jeune: RBen 8 (1911) 154-190; M. Monachesi, Arnobio il Giovane ed una sua possibilità agiografica: Boll. Stud. Stor. relig. 2 (1922) 66-125; H. Diepen, La pensée christologique d'Arnobe le Jeune: RThom 59 (1959) 535-564; S. Leanza, L'esegesi di Arnobio il Giovane al libro dei Salmi: VetChr 8 (1971) 223-239; C. Piffaré, Arnobio el Joven y la cristología del confl., Montserrat 1988; F. Gori, Il Praedestinatus di Arnobio il Giovane, Rome 1999 (bibl.).

B. Studer

ARSACIUS (d. 405). Patriarch of *Constantinople, brother of *Nectarius. After the deposition of *John Chrysostom he was imposed by the empress *Eudoxia as his successor, though already eighty years old (consecrated 27 June 404; according to Palladius he was bishop for 14 months). A creature of the imperial party and of weak character, he did not oppose the bloody persecution of Chrysostom's followers, who had refused him obedience (Soz., HE VIII, 23). Not even the imperial edict of 18 Nov. 404 (CTh XVI, 4,6), confirming his authority and threatening opposing bishops with exile, strengthened his position; the pope and the West never recognized him. Died 11 Nov. 405; succeeded by *Atticus.

DCB 1, 171-172; DHGE 4, 742.

E. Prinzivalli

ARSENIUS of Hypselis (d. after 335). Bishop of Hypselis (*Egypt), instrument of *John Arkaph, leader of the *Melitians, in the struggle against *Athanasius. In 333, exploiting the circumstance of Arsenius's flight from the confinement imposed on him by the Catholic bishop Plusianus of Lycopolis, the Melitians accused Athanasius of having killed him. Arsenius was hidden in a *monastery in the *Thebaid and then at *Tyre, but both times Athanasius managed to find him, thwarting the Melitians' effort to frame him and clearing up the affair, first before *Constantine's half-brother Dalmatius, and then at the Council of *Tyre (335). Arsenius himself was reconciled with Athanasius.

Socrates, HE I, 27-29; Sozomen, HE II, 23-25; Athanasius, Ap. c. Arian. 69; Simonetti 113-114.

E. Prinzivalli

ARSENIUS the Great (d. ca. 449). The barbarian invasion of 407 dealt a heavy blow to the primitive organization of the famous *monastic center of the desert of *Scete. Due to a combination of different circumstances, monastic life during the 5th c. became more *cenobitic. With Poemen, Arsenius is one of the most illustrious figures of this period of transition. Daniel, a young disciple of the elderly Arsenius, summed up his life in an apophthegm (PG 65, 105-108, Arsenius 42). It should be particularly emphasized that Arsenius was distinguished among his fellows both by social origin and by education (he had been tutor to *Arcadius and *Honorius at the court of *Byzantium) and in this sense is the typical example of "flight from the world" to the *desert to find God. According to a catechesis of Theodore the Studite, he began his stay at Scete as a disciple of John Colobos (PG 99, 853-854). It is very difficult to date the different periods of his life precisely. Of J.C. Guy's attempted chronology, we can ascertain his arrival at Scete at least ca. 394 and his death at 95, ca. 449. The alphabetical collection of Apophthegmata Patrum preserves a long series of 44 logia, or anecdotes, attributed to Arsenius (PG 65, 87-107), to which J.C. Guy has added a new part. G. Garitte found and published a Georgian version of a letter of Arsenius; there is no decisive argument against its authenticity. Arsenius is commemorated in the *Alexandrian *Coptic Synaxarium on 13 Basan (8 May in the Julian calendar).

CPG 5545-5554; BHG 167-169; J. Forget, Synaxarium Alexandrinum II (CSCO 90, Scriptores arabici, 13, versio), Louvain 1926, 117-118; G. Garitte, Une "Lettre de S. Arsène" en géorgien: Muséon 68 (1955) 259-278; J.C. Guy, Recherches sur la tradition grecque des Apophthegmata Patrum (Subs. hagiographica, 36), Brussels 1962, 20; Id., Le centre monastique de Scete au IV[e] et au début du V[e] siècle. Prosopographie et histoire, Thèse de doctorat dactylographiée, Rome 1963, 154-158; L. Regnault, Troisième recueil et tables, Solesmes 1976, 202-204; Id., Les Sentences des Pères du désert. Collection alphabétique, 1, Solesmes 1981, 23-26, 329; M. Van Parys, La lettre de Saint Arsène: Irénikon 54 (1981) 62-86.

J.-M. Sauget

ARTAXATA (Artashat). Ancient capital of *Armenia, on the River Arax, founded in 166 BC by Artashes and described by Strabo and Plutarch as a splendid city; *Nero renamed it Neroneia. It was destroyed by the Romans more than once and rebuilt by Trdat I (Tiridates). Here began Trdat III's (252–330) persecutions of *Gregory the Illuminator who, *Agathangelos records, was thrown into a pit in the castle of Artaxata (now the *monastery of Khor Virap). During this period the Arsacid king Chosroes II (331–338) moved his residence from Artaxata to *Dvin, a naturally more favorable position, and many inhabitants of the city emigrated there (see *Faustus of Byzantium, in Langlois, Collection, I, 216; and *Moses of Khorene, Ib. II, 136-137). In 449/450 a synod was held there in response to the Persian king Yazdegerd II, who had ordered his subjects to convert to Zoroastrianism (Garsoïan 126-127). 18 bishops participated from almost all of Armenia, including Roman Armenia.

V. Langlois, Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie, Paris 1867 (2 vols.); S. Der Nersessian, The Armenians, London 1969, 28-29; A. Khatchatrian, Inscriptions et histoire des églises arméniennes, Milan 1974, 30-31; Z. Khachatrian, Artaxata, Capitale dell'Armenia antica, II s. a.C.– IV s. d.C., in Ai piedi dell'Ararat: Artaxata e l'Armenia ellenistico-romana, ed. A. Invernizzi, Florence 1998, 95-158; N. Garsoïan, L'église arménienne et le grand schisme d'Orient, Louvain 1999.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ARTEMON (or Artemas) (3rd c.). *Adoptionist *heretic at *Rome, ca. 235. *Eusebius of Caesarea cites a fragment of an anonymous work against Artemon (HE V, 28) which had been attributed to *Hippolytus, an attribution now discarded thanks to P. Nautin. The Artemonites claimed that their doctrine—that Christ was a mere man—was the most ancient in the church and that the truth had been corrupted at the time of *Zephyrinus. They undertook textual criticism of Scripture based on rationalistic presuppositions. Their works are all lost.

R.H. Connolly, Eusebius HE V, 28: JTS 49 (1948) 73-79; P. Nautin, Le dossier d'Hippolyte et de Méliton, Paris 1953, 115-120.

E. Prinzivalli

ARTHEMIUS (d. 362). Prefect of *Egypt under *Constantius, favored the *Arians and was the secular arm of *George of Alexandria, the Arian bishop and antagonist of *Athanasius. He persecuted the *Catholics, esp. *monks. He also treated the *pagans fiercely, destroying their temples, including the *Serapeion. Accused by the *pagans before *Julian, he was beheaded and his goods confiscated (summer 362). Venerated as a saint by the Arians, his cult also became established among Catholics as a result of the acts written by the 9th-c. monk John of Rhodes (AASS oct. VIII, 856-885), on which Simeon Metaphrastes drew (PG 115, 1160-1212).

BS II, 488-490; R.W. Burgess, The Passio S. Artemii, Philostorgius, and the Dates of the Invention and Translations of the Relics of Sts Andrew and Luke: AB 121 (2003) 5-36.

E. Prinzivalli

ARTOTYRITAE. Our most precise information seems to be from *Augustine, who lists them after the Pepuziani or Quintilliani (Haer. 28), with whom he claims *Epiphanius confused them (Haer. 49). Their main peculiarity regarded worship: they offered bread and cheese, considering them the basic foods of early humans, who used only the fruits of the earth and of husbandry.

F. Cocchini

ASARBUS (d. 385). *Priscillianist condemned to death and executed at *Trier with Priscillian and others of his followers. The first of the Würzburg treatises cites him as coauthor of a libellus, with Tiberianus and others.

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976, 47, 144ff.; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1995, 78, 198 n. 138.

S. Zincone

ASCENSION. Acts 1:9-11 describes the ascension of Jesus 40 days after his *resurrection, on the Mount of Olives (Acts 1:3, 12). The church of the first centuries, which celebrated the death, resurrection and glorication of the Lord together at *Easter, did not have a feast of the ascension (see Ep. Barn. 15,9). The ascension as a specific feast of the return of Christ to the Father, fixed on the fortieth day after Easter, goes back to the late 4th c. In the East the first testimonies are (1) the Apostolic Constitutions,* which report, ca. 380, the first distinct celebration of the ascension on the fortieth day after Easter, whereas *Pentecost became the feast of the *Holy Spirit; (2) *Gregory of Nyssa in 388 (CPG 3178); and (3) *John Chrysostom 386–397 (CPG 4342). The first testimonies in the West are *Chromatius of Aquileia, before 408 (CCL 9A, 33-37), and *Filaster of Brescia, 380–390 (CCL 9, 304). *Augustine still calls the feast Quadragesima Ascensionis: his sermons (Serm. 261-265) attest to the liturgical usage of *Hippo, undoubtedly also that of *Carthage. The first evidence for *Jerusalem is the Armenian lectionary (417–ca. 438); for *Rome, *Leo I, 444–445 (CPL Tract. 73-74); the euchological formularies of the Sacramentarium Leonianum are the oldest in the Roman *liturgy. The *Visigothic Liber Commicus may preserve the primitive system of *Mass-readings of the Hispanic liturgy, which are: 2 Kgs 2:1-15; Acts 1:1-11; Lk 24:36-53. The last two readings are common to the *Byzantine liturgy. With the Carolingian reform the use of these two readings seems to have become general. In the 7th c. the feast was given a vigil, in the 11th c. an octave. Brescia: before 391; Aquileia: before 408; Jerusalem: ca. 450; Rome: before 461.

CPG vol. 5, 150-151; RAC 15, 218-219; LMA 5, 24-26; LCI 2, 268-276; RBK 2, 1224-1262; H. auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 1, Regensburg 1983; G. Schiller, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst 3, Gütersloh [2]1986, 141-164.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

ASCENSION of ISAIAH (apocryphal). The Ascension of Isaiah is a *Jewish Christian text (probably not Jewish), influenced by *apocalyptic; the existence of a Jewish legend is supposed, perhaps linked to *Qumran, and cited by Heb 11:37. The text was written in the late 1st and early 2nd c., probably in *Palestine (Judea) or at *Antioch. The original text was in Greek, but only fragments of it remain; the entire work exists in an *Ethiopian version and *Coptic versions, and fragmentarily in *Latin; the text was used by the Cathars. Alongside the Ascension of Isaiah there is a Greek legend that derives from a different version. The *apocrypha is divided into two parts: the first (chs. 1-5), a *hagiographical midrash (perhaps an elaboration of a Jewish legend), speaks of the death of the prophet Isaiah, cut in two by a wooden ax at the order of the wicked King Manasseh, incited by the prophet Bekira. The second part (chs. 6-11), Isaiah's vision, recounts his ascension to the seventh heaven, where he participates in the divine *liturgy and accompanies Christ (the Beloved) in his *descent—unrecognized by the spheres—to sheol; this fragment recounts the earthly life of Jesus (11,2-22). *Docetist tendencies are evident in the text. Jesus then ascends to heaven in full glory. The text has some *gnostic elements; the Son and the Spirit are subordinated to the Father. The text was known and used by the *fathers of the church.

CANT 315-316; BHG 957-958, see 958bff.; B. Bettiolo - A.G. Kossova - C. Leonardi - L. Perrone, CCAp 7-8, 1995: edition of all the texts and commentaries (It. tr.); E. Norelli, Turnhout 1993, Apocryphes 2 (Fr. tr.); M.A. Knibb, in Charlesworth 2, 143-146 (Eng. tr.); Erbetta 3, 175-208 (It. tr.); C.D.G. Müller, in Schneemelcher 2, 547-562 (Ger. tr.); S. Kur, in Starowieyski 3, 134-168; A.M. Denis, Introduction à la littérature religieuse judéo-hellénistique, 1-2, Turnhout 2000, I, 633-657; M. Pesce, Isaia, il Diletto e la Chiesa, Brescia 1983 (acts of the congress); A. Acerbi, Serra Lignea, Rome 1984; Id., L'Ascensione di Isaia, Milan 1989; E. Norelli, Ascensione di Isaia, Bologna 1994 (collection of articles).

M. Starowieyski

ASCESIS – ASCETIC

I. The term and Greek education - II. Eastern dualisms and Buddhist ascesis - III. Bible and Judaism - IV. Jesus - V. Paul - VI. The primitive church - VII. Monasticism.

I. The term and Greek education. The verb ἀσκεῖν refers to the training of an athlete or soldier; since the time of Herodotus and Xenophon it was also applied to *virtue. A long tradition, renewed by Epictetus, considered φύσις, μάθησις and ἄσκησις (natural gifts, abstract teaching and systematic exercise) as complementary, each playing its part in success. This humanistic aspect, focused on the human measure in education, is specific to *Hellenistic culture and quite different from the Jewish view of trust in God. Another very Greek aspect is the cult of the hero and thus the tendency to a forced ascesis, capable of forming a class of supermen. Among the Cynics, ascesis could tend to a paradoxical life, disdaining the convictions of the city. Even *Stoic ascesis and its aspiration to ἀπάθεια (elimination of the passions) could be pushed too far. Those in the *Platonic tradition could err through a certain contempt of the body.

II. Eastern dualisms and Buddhist ascesis. Persian rule in the East, Alexander's conquests as far as India, and active trade via land and sea may easily suggest an influence of Eastern asceticism on late Judaism or early Christianity, though our texts fail to reveal any. At the same time, radical *dualism and indifference to the appearances of the sensible world could not fail to be deeply criticized by a religion of *creation, *redemption and *resurrection, though incentives to *purification and spiritual life could play a positive role. There is not space here to examine, with the requisite nuance, the different Eastern forms of ascesis and their influence on the *Syrian, *Coptic and Greek worlds.

III. Bible and Judaism. Those who define ascesis as a pessimistic contempt of the world will find it neither in the OT nor the gospels. Such a definition, however, is far from accepted. The ideal of the *desert—of close intimacy with God—at the time of Hosea or the exodus or of the liberation from Babylonian captivity, along with that of the forty days of fasting and vision on Sinai or Horeb and the old Rechabite and Nazirite traditions, were suited to austerity and led to the secluded life of *Qumran or to *John the Baptist, the new Elijah.

IV. Jesus. If some texts contrast the Baptist's austerity with Jesus' familiarity with the table of sinners (Mt 11:18; Mk 2:16) or with certain women (Mk 15:41), other traditions emphasize his continuity with the witness of the Baptist and esp. the radical demands of the *kingdom (Mk 8:34). The ascetics of the early centuries could appeal to numerous logia, which in fact do not refer to "counsels" but to a choice that imposes itself—though without legalism (Mt 19:21)—and to the example of the *cross. The gospel context is strong enough to overcome any pessimism or dualism and to combat any pretense of being better than sinners or any masochism that could disturb the prospect of a life of freedom in brotherly love.

V. Paul. In his communities, esp. at Corinth, Paul encouraged the struggle of the Spirit against the *flesh, even to the subduing of the *body (1 Cor 9:27), putting himself forward as an example. His praise of *celibacy is, perhaps, more than antiquity recognized, a way of resisting an exaggerated ascetic tendency (1 Cor 7:2, 20, 25, 29). At any rate, Col 2:18-23 and 1 Tim 4:1-4; 5:14 provide a polemic against such a tendency.

VI. The primitive church. *Justin Martyr and *Athenagoras spoke of *virgins of both sexes who were the glory of the church; earlier 1 Clem. 38,2 and *Ignatius Pol. 5,2 were careful to put ascetics of this sort on guard against insubordination to the bishop or the community. The *Encratite movement tended to condemn marriage. The NT *apocrypha—the Gospel of the Egyptians, the Gospel of Thomas, and apocryphal Acts of the Apostles—make virginity or the breaking of conjugal ties the clearest point of the new morality. Extremist practices may have been foreign to the great church, but most of these texts well represented a popular *Catholicism. In Syria and *Egypt, however, certain practices that the West considered excessive were allowed. The *gnostics, then the *Manichees, at times had a rigorist doctrine, a pretence of great spirituality, but those who would become angels often become beasts. *Clement of Alexandria opposed the gnostics (esp. v. Strom. I and III), while *Origen established a theological interpretation of ascesis (for a summary see esp. Hom. Num. 27).

VII. Monasticism. The terminology of "ascesis" and its philosophical content entered early *monasticism in various ways. The philosophical tradition (esp. *Stoic) combined with scriptural interpretation beginning with *Philo of Alexandria, who interpreted the figure of Jacob as an "athlete" and "ascetic" who struggled against vice (Esau) to acquire virtue, and in the end receive the gift of apatheia and the new name Israel (Gen 32), interpreted ascesis etymologically in the sense of the contemplative life (one who sees God). This interpretation is taken up by Origen along with the Pauline struggle (see above) and is transmitted to early monasticism through various authors, including *Anthony, *Evagrius of Pontus and *John Cassian, for whom it becomes the binomial of practical/ascetical life (bios praktikos) and contemplative life (bios theoretikos). The terminology (askesis) also enters through *Athanasius's Vita Antonii (more than 40 times), whose influence on the formation of the monastic and *hagiographical tradition was considerable.

The arrival of monasticism disciplined Eastern ascesis and gave it an honorable place in the church, while leaving outside certain sects in which the scale of values was not discreetly respected. The prestige of this ascesis and of these forms of prayer characterized all Christian people. *Lent, abstinence from meat or other foods, continence within marriage, and severity of morals were essential to the strength and freedom of the church of the Fathers, and favored works of charity and the communion of hearts.

J. Bergman - A. Markert - J. Maier - J. Gribomont et al., Askese: TRE 4, 195-259; R. Arbesmann, Fasten: RAC 7, 447-524; H. Chadwick, Enkrateia: ibid. 5, 343-365; K.S. Frank, Askese und Mönchtum in der Alten Kirche, Darmstadt 1975; K. Niederwimmer, Askese und Mysterium, Göttingen 1975; var. aus., Etica sessuale e matrimonio nel cristianesimo delle origini, Milan 1976; A. Guillaumont, Aux origines du monachisme chrétien, Bellefontaine 1979; P. Hadot, Esercizi spirituali e filosofia antica, Biblioteca di cultura filosofica 50, Turin 1988; M. Sheridan, Jacob and Israel: A Contribution to the History of an Interpretation, in Mysterium Christi*: Symbolgegenwart und theologische Bedeutung. Festschrift für Basil Studer*, Studia Anselmiana 116, Rome 1995, 219-241.

J. Gribomont

ASCETERIUM. The term appears in *Athanasius's Vita Antonii (ch. 4) and generally indicates the place where the young *Anthony began his life of ἄσκησις. *Palladius (Hist. laus. 14,3) also seems to indicate a seat of hermits by this term. *Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 43,62), presenting *Basil of Caesarea's work, calls him the founder of two distinct things, asceteria and *monasteries. The term asceterium was created on the pattern of μοναστήριον, later becoming synonymous with it; it is used in this way by *Socrates (HE 3,23), *Nilus (Ep. 2,290) and *John of Damascus (De haer. 102), who speaks of *heretical monasteries. Asceterion seems to be inserted as a gloss on μοναστήριον in the text relating to art. 14 of the Council of *Chalcedon (Mansi 7,316f.). The term is now used only in literature.

DACL 11,1845. 1847; Lampe, ἀσκητήριον; DIP 1,917; M. Kroen, Das Mönchtum und die kulturelle Tradition des lateinischen Westens: Formen der Askese, Autorität und Organisation im frühen westlichen Zönobitentum (Quellen und Forschungen zur antiken Welt, 29), Freiburg (Breisgau) 1997.

M.G. Bianco

ASCITAE – ASCODRUGITAE. *Augustine (Haer. 62) derives their name from ἀσχός, "wineskin," since members of the sect considered themselves to be the new wineskins filled with the new wine spoken of in the gospel (Lk 5:38); they wandered everywhere "like Bacchantes," carrying an inflated wineskin. *Filaster attributes a similar practice (Haer. 75) to the Ascodrugitae, members of a sect that flourished in *Galatia; but their more exact name seems to be Tascodrugitae, given by *Epiphanius (Haer. 48,14), who likens them to *Cataphrygians, probably because of the closeness of their place of origin.

DCB I, 175-176; RAC I, 731-735; G. Bardy, Le "De Haeresibus" et ses sources: Miscellanea Agostiniana 2 (1931) 405 n. 2.

F. Cocchini

ASCLEPAS of Gaza (d. after 343). Opponent of *Arius; during the anti-*Nicene reaction after 325, he was deposed (charge unknown) in 327 in a council at *Antioch presided over by *Eusebius of Caesarea. Exiled, he returned to *Gaza in 337 after *Constantine's death and sought to reoccupy the see, provoking tumults and violence. Forced to again abandon it, he took refuge at *Rome; in 341 we find him at *Constantinople supporting Paul, the deposed local bishop, who tried to reenter the city after the death of *Eusebius of Nicomedia. In 343 he was at *Serdica, and the Westerners restored him. *Socrates (HE II, 23) and *Sozomen (HE III, 24) mention a return to Gaza in 346 on the occasion of *Athanasius's return to *Alexandria, perhaps the one in 337.

DHGE 4,901-902; Simonetti 585; G. Fernández, La deposición del obispo Asclepas de Gaza: Studia Historica. Historia Antigua 13-14 (1995-1996) 401-404.

M. Simonetti

ASCLEPIAS of Antioch (d. 218). Ninth bishop of *Antioch (Syria) from 211/212–218, succeeding *Serapion. Confessor of the faith during the persecution of *Severus. As bishop he was praised by *Alexander of Jerusalem, who may have been in prison (Eus., HE VI, 11,4-5). Succeeded by Philetus (Eus., HE VI, 21,2).

P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens des II^e et III^e siècles, Paris 1961, 114-117.

E. Prinzivalli

ASCLEPIODOTUS (or Asclepias). *Adoptionist at *Rome in the time of *Zephyrinus (198–217), disciple of *Theodotus of Byzantium (the Tanner). The anonymous anti-Artemonite (Eus., HE V, 28,8) recounts the attempted corruption by Asclepiodotus and *Theodotus the Banker of the confessor *Natalius, whom Zephyrinus finally pardoned.

E. Prinzivalli

ASCLEPIUS. *African bishop in 480. According to *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 74 [73]), he was bishop in territorio Baiensi (in *Numidia ?)—according to other codices Gabaensi, Vagensi. He wrote against *Arians and *Donatists and achieved great fame as an extempore preacher. Died mid-5th c.

P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, Paris 1912, IV, 101; PCBE 1, 195.

E. Romero Pose

ASHTISHAT. One of the oldest cities of Greater *Armenia, on the left bank of the Euphrates, NW of Lake Van and in the W part of the province of Taron, today the Turkish village of Derik. A *pagan center with many temples; sun-worship flourished there (Ashtishat = place of many gods). According to the sources, these temples were destroyed and the earliest Christian buildings constructed on their sites. *Agathangelos records that *Gregory the Illuminator himself, whose family was from Taron, brought *relics of St. John the Baptist and St. Athenogenes to Ashtishat, built a martyrium in their honor and at the same time ordered the destruction of many pagan temples. Ashtishat was very early on an episcopal see: a certain building activity is attributed to Bishop Daniel in the mid-4th c., mentioned by *Faustus of Byzantium; ca. 365, the catholicos Nersetes I (353–373) held there the first *Armenian synod, to establish order and uniformity in the churches and to set up charitable and assistance works. In 439 the catholicos of Armenia St. *Sahak the Great (Isaac), the last descendent of Gregory the Illuminator, was buried there.

A. Khatchatrian, Inscriptions et histoire des églises arméniennes, Milan 1974, 2-4; N. Garsoïan, L'église arménienne et le grand schisme d'Orient, Lovanii 1999; R.L. Mullen, The Expansion of Christianity. A Gazetteer of Its First Three Centuries, Leiden-Boston 2004, 137.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ASIA

I. Province - II. Diocese.

I. Province. The province of Asia, created on the territory of the old kingdom of the Attalids, included Hither Asia to the border of *Bithynia in the N and *Lycia in the S, and to *Galatia and the mountains of Pisidia in the E; it included Rhodes and the other small Aegean islands. Greek colonization went as far as the lower valleys of the major rivers, Hermus and Maeander; the dynasties that succeeded Alexander founded or refounded centers in the interior. The first organization of 129 BC gave way to the Sullan constitution of 84 BC, which divided Asia into 44 districts. Under *Augustus the province was governed by a proconsul, ordinarily for one year. The entire province was represented in a concilium (koinon), which organized the imperial cult. With more urban centers than any other province in the empire—most of them predating Roman rule (only a few were founded by *Tiberius and *Hadrian)—its prosperity was based on the general prosperity of numerous modest-sized cities, often divided by municipal rivalries. The title of provincial metropolis belonged to Pergamum but from the beginning was held by *Ephesus, seat of the governor, although he traveled to the various centers for administration. *Smyrna, Sardis and Cyzicus vied with Ephesus: some orations of the 2nd-c. rhetor of Prusa in Bithynia Dione, called Chrysostom, deride these rivalries, which were an object of scorn to the Romans, who often profited from quarrels between cities to consolidate their own power at the expense of local autonomy. At the end of the 3rd c. *Diocletian divided Asia into seven smaller provinces: Asia Proconsularis (capital: Ephesus), Hellespont (Cyzicus), Lydia (Sardis), Phrygia I (Laodicea), Phrygia II (Eukarpia), Caria (Aphrodisia) and Insularum provincia (with 53 islands).

II. Diocese. Diocletian's reorganization of the Roman provincial structure created smaller territorial units and divided the provinces among five dioceses: Asia, *Pontus, *Thrace, the East and *Egypt. Following the decision at the Council of *Constantinople of 381, these essentially bureaucratic and administrative divisions were recognized as ecclesiastical boundaries, superimposed on the old division of episcopal sees by province. The council also sanctioned Constantinople's hierarchical supremacy over the other metropolises, ensuring that the dioceses of Asia and Pontus would be subordinated to that of Thrace. The civil capital of the diocese of Asia remained at Ephesus, the capital of the old province, which now also exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the territory of 11 provinces: Asia I and II, Caria, Lycia, Pamphylia I and II, Lydia, Hellespont, Bithynia and Phrygia I and II. But, however important, Ephesus was not a powerful enough center of church life to be able to oppose Constantinople; while *Caesarea, already capital of *Cappadocia and now seat of the vicar of the diocese of Pontus, was not geographically central and suffered competition from *Ancyra, as well as from *Chalcedon, *Nicomedia and *Nicaea, all naturally favored by their closeness to the court. The Council of Chalcedon of 451 sanctioned a similar subordination of the dioceses of Asia and Pontus to that of Thrace: can. 28 established that the *metropolitans of Asia and Pontus, together with the bishops of their provinces, should ordain local bishops, but the metropolitans themselves should be ordained by the bishop of Constantinople. The various regions of the province and diocese of Asia were the first parts of the Roman Empire to be Christianized, from the time of the apostles; the process of *evangelization was varied, however, complicated by the extreme variety of peoples, traditions, greater or lesser degree of *Hellenization, and social and political differences: there was an enormous difference, e.g., between urban Christianity (in thoroughly Hellenized cities with a lively cultural and social life) and that in the rural areas of the interior (think of Phrygia). Christian origins must therefore be sought and verified from case to case according to specific local situations.

V. Chapot, La province Romaine d'Asie, Paris 1904; A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Empire, Oxford [2]1971, 28-94; A.D. Macro, The Cities of Asia Minor under the Roman Empire: ANRW II,7,2, Berlin-New York 1980, 658-697; Th. Pekáry, Kleinasien unter römischen Herrschaft: ANRW II,7,2 (1980) 596-657; S.R.F. Price, Ritual and Power in Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor, 1984. For the ecclesiastical aspects: G. Bardy, Asie: DHGE 2,941-1027; F. Blanchetière, Le Christianisme asiate aux IIe et IIIe siècle, Strabourg [2]1997; Fedalto 1,112ff.; S. Mitchell, Anatolia: Men, Land, Gods in Asia Minor, Oxford 1993.

M. Forlin Patrucco

ASIA MINOR (archaeology)
I. Diocese of Asia - II. Diocese of Pontus - III. Sculpture, painting and minor arts.

I. Diocese of Asia. A great enthusiasm for building animated the cities of the empire, not least those of the diocese of Asia which, in *Diocletian's division, comprised the provinces of Hellespont to the N, *Phrygia to the E, Pisidia and Lycaonia to the SE, Lycia and Pamphylia to the S, Caria to the SW, Lydia in the center and Asia proper to the W. Every civitas had its own bishopric, a rule confirmed by an edict of *Zeno (CI I, 3, 36, De episcopis . . . ca. 474–484) regarding certain questions of competence of the bishops of Tomis in Scythia and Leontopolis in Isauria. The two largest cities were, in the E, Ephesus, the old capital of the province of Asia, and *Constantinople, developed under *Constantine. *Ephesus naturally lost much of its importance with the creation of the "new *Rome," but though its authority and prestige diminished, it long remained a center of primary influence. We cannot doubt that immediately after the "edict" of *Constantine's peace, Ephesus and other important cities of Asia Minor built a cathedral and a bishop's residence (as happened, e.g., at *Aquileia). This ancient complex has not yet been identified, however. The great cathedral of Ephesus, made famous by the Council of 431, must have been built immediately after 380; of colossal dimensions, it was made—unusual for the time—by modifying part of a secular building, the apodyterium of the "port baths." Many elements, such as doorjambs and architraves, were reused, incl. probably the columns, which were all later removed. This suggests that Ephesus's commercial hegemony had suffered from the competition of *Constantinople, esp. leading to a reduction in the number of travelers and sailors for whom the baths, the largest in the city, were intended; hence the decision to liquidate them and use them for the grandiose new cathedral. The basilica (Forschungen, IV, 1 p. 16f.) had two aisles and a nave, twice their width, which ended in an apse, semicircular inside; each aisle ended in a straight wall, the same height as the triumphal arch, with a door giving access to an almost square room. According to Knoll (Forsch., fig. 3), the aisles were separated by columns (of which nothing has been found) linked by arches; there was no matroneum. But the church, as we shall see, did not occupy the whole extent of the very long apodyterium. The basilica must have had a wooden roof, except for the semidome of the apse and the presumed cross-vaults in the two side-rooms. It was preceded by a narthex and a colonnaded quadriportico with a semicircular W wall enlivened by niches. Later, when the city had shrunk enormously after the Arab conquest and sack, the building was divided into two separate churches, one after the other, the first domed, the second with pillars. The baptistery, reached from the N side of the quadriportico, was circular inside with twelve unequal sides outside; an ambulatory surrounded it, enclosing it in an almost square perimeter; inside, the pool was circular with ramps for descent and exit, typical in Asia Minor. Behind the apse area of the church were found (F. Fasolo, La basilica, 1-30) small private baths and a house with rooms around a hypostyle courtyard, presumably for clergy.

A second church (F. Miltner, Grabungen, p. 12f.) of more modest dimensions was excavated on the opposite side between the port of Magnesia and the so-called East Gymnasium; it followed a hypostyle, basilica plan, with the nave ending in a circular apse inside and a straight wall outside (typical of many basilicas in Asia Minor) with remains of synthronon. Still at Ephesus, there is a small single-aisled church, E of the square called Verulanum; it is a simple rectangular room ending in a semicircular apse.

Outside the walled city, along the slopes of the Panayil Dag, was an important *cemetery: the grotto of the Seven Sleepers, where, according to legend, seven young men fled to escape the persecution of the emperor *Decius (249–251) and awoke to find Christianity triumphant under *Theodosius II (423–450). A group of tombs, some going back to the 2nd c., are arranged around a large vaulted room, partly dug into the rock and partly constructed, with arcosolia: at one end of it was a square-plan church built between the mid 5th and 6th c. (Forschungen, IV, 2). To the E the vaulted room ended in a barrel-vault which faced a semicircular apse in the center and a rectangular niche to the S, both part of a straight wall. As a result of the veneration, other burial rooms with arcosolia and family mausoleums developed in the immediate vicinity. A recent proposal based on the style of the surviving pavement mosaics would date the complex to the time of *Theodosius I (379/80–395) (see W. Jobst, Zur Bestattungskirche den Sieben Schläfer in Ephesos: JÖAI 50 [1972–1975] Beiblatt 17-80). But the most famous building, some distance from the ruins of Ephesus, is the martyrium over the tomb of St. *John the Evangelist, on the hill of Ayasoluk: a vast cruciform edifice with six domes, already existing in the 5th c. (but perhaps even earlier, since it is mentioned by the late 4th-c. pilgrim *Egeria) but rebuilt by *Justinian and *Theodora in the mid 6th c.; striking ruins remain of it (see RBK s.v. Ephesos). The martyrium is at the center of a vast group of buildings, only partly excavated: among them is a vast octagonal baptistery with ambulatory, recently dated to the early 5th c., i.e., before Justinian's reconstruction (see M. Falla Castelfranchi, Il battistero di S. Giovanni ad Efeso [Ayasoluk], Actes du XV[e] Congrès International d'Études byzantines, Athénis [1981], 129-142), and a secreton mentioned in a Greek inscription (ibid.).

From the 4th c. on, the churches of the other cities of Asia Minor were generally hypostyle basilicas, since marble columns were abundant in the East due to the many state quarries and the ease of recovering material from earlier *pagan buildings. At the end of the 4th c. the changed political conditions of the empire forced urban alterations, in which many pagan buildings and public works were doubtless eliminated.

During the long period of pax romana, many cities of Asia Minor lived without military concerns and without walls, quietly dedicated to commerce and useful civic activities. At the end of the 4th c. the climate of insecurity created by the presence of the *Goths on the one side and the rebel Isaurians on the other obliged, as we see from the relevant law (CTh 16,1,34), the construction of city walls and local defenses, which sometimes involved the elimination of entire quarters, monuments and tombs. The large amounts of material generated by this demolition were largely made available to the religious authorities. Notable sacred buildings have been found in Pamphylia, a small region, but rich in agriculture and maritime commerce. The two main cities, *Side and Perga, have remains of important churches. Sacked by the Arabs, these centers were soon reduced to miserable villages and later abandoned, so their ruins can be excavated and studied without the impediment of modern buildings. The cathedral of Side (A.M. Mansel, Ausgrabungen, 50-57) had five aisles and a transept, the nave ending in an apse, semicircular within and three-sided without; attached on the N side was the baptistery, almost a freestanding pavilion, square and apsed like its pool, which had steps and side basins. It was flanked by two symmetrical rectangular rooms with niches: the three rooms were preceded by a rectangular atrium apsed at each end. On the opposite side was the bishop's residence: its various rooms included a small private chapel for the bishop and a large triconch room. Later the church was reduced to three aisles.

This phenomenon of reduction is common to nearly all the basilicas of Asia Minor; after the first sack by the Arabs, the depopulated cities were rebuilt on a smaller scale, and the churches too were adapted to the new requirements. At Side are the remains of a grandiose urban hypostyle church built in the 6th c., when Justinian destroyed all the remaining great pagan sanctuaries. On the S point of the gulf were two twin peripteral temples, partly demolished. Some of the columns are preserved in situ in the atrium; others were transferred to the adjacent basilica, which had three aisles and an apse, semicircular inside and polygonal outside. The side aisles ended in a plain wall, to which two chapels or pastophories were attached. The atrium, whose two side walls are curiously embellished with niches both inside and outside, was never finished. This likely long interruption of the work was due to the consequences of Islamic expansion (A.M. Mansel, Die Ruinen, 163-164). Other unexcavated basilicas at Side include a three-aisled church with a single apse and transept (A.M. Mansel, Die Ruinen, 165).

The other Pamphylian metropolis, Perga, has ruins, noted by Rott (Kleinasiatische, 48-53), of two basilicas: one perhaps the cathedral, with five hypostyle aisles, nonprojecting transept, apse between two pastophories, and small quadrangle; the other had three aisles with a cross-transept, two pastophories at the sides of the apse. The second had "wraparound" aisles and a vast atrium. On the hill outside the walls, Prof. Mansel's Turkish archaeological mission excavated the remains of a 6th-c. building with the characteristics of a martyrium: a vast domed room attached to an apsed chapel. Remains of hypostyle basilicas are found in Pisidia at Sagalassos, a city famous for Alexander the Great's assault, but a mountain center that obviously could not vaunt the opulence of the Pamphylian metropolises. The churches, published by Lanckoronski (Die Städte, 150-152), had three aisles and projecting central apses, one polygonal (ibid., fig. 126), the other semicircular with projecting transept (ibid., fig. 123). Miletus preserves two basilica complexes, quite modest considering the importance of the Greek and Roman city: its importance probably led to its being severely sacked in the 3rd and 4th c. The first excavations (Th. Wiegand, Südmarkt, pl. 25) uncovered a basilica preceded by a 3rd-c. propylaea and a quadriportico. It had three aisles, separated by columns and monolithic pillars with core and half-columns; the nave ended in an apse, and the aisles in large doors led to an ambulatory. The quadriportico had a long corridor at one side ending in a round chapel with five niches built into the thickness of the wall. N of the quadriportico was a square domed baptistery with a corridor on three sides.

This 6th-c. complex was in the center of the city, in a corner of the S agora, next to the nymphaeum (G. Kleiner, Die Ruinen, 135-137). Early in the 7th c. a second basilica was dedicated to St. Michael (the cult of the angels developed from the 5th c.; on Miletus, see esp. W. Müller-Wienci, Die "Grossekirche" [sog. Bischofskirche] in Milet, IstMitt 23-24 [1973–1974] 131-134; O. Feid, Zur kunstgeschichtlichen Stellung den "Grossenkirche," ibid., 135-137; var. aus., Milet 1973–1975, IstMitt 27-28 [1977–1978] 93-125); it had three aisles, architraved columns, an apse and pastophory with straight end-wall (G. Kleiner, Die Ruinen, 137). Despite its modest dimensions, it is interesting to make out the presence of the synthronon in the apse and the ambo in the center of the church. It was preceded by a narthex and very likely a quadriportico. N of the basilica rose a presumed bishop's residence; S was a square baptistery with circular pool (G.K. Kleiner, Grabungen, 121-122; M.J. Mellink, Archaeology, 1-343). Finally, an enigmatic building, a circle inscribed in a square, with eight columns inside and four small niches and a domed central covering (G.K. Kleiner, Die Ruinen, 138-139).

Phrygian Hierapolis was undoubtedly rich in Christian buildings (D. de Bernardi Ferrero, Le chiese di Hierapolis dopo gli scavi: CCAB 30 [1983] 87-92). Most important is the cathedral with attached baptistery in the N zone inside the late 4th-c. city walls—a basilica with matronea over the aisles. The nave ended in an apse, curved inside and polygonal outside, and the aisles originally ended in straight walls (apsidioles were added later). It was preceded by a narthex with an atrium in front, hypostyle only on two sides with columns aligned with those inside. S of the narthex was the baptistery with annexes and a circular pool with steps and adjacent basins, originally built probably late 4th or early 5th c. At an unspecified time the cathedral was reduced to a nave with two small side-chapels and the baptistery transformed into an apsed chapel without a baptismal pool (P. Verzone, Hierapolis, C.N.R., 460-464). Above the theater was a basilica with a similar plan but more modest proportions: no quadriportico, an externally straight apse with side pastophories, hypostyle matronea; it was later given pillars instead of columns and finally reduced to a single nave. Its hypostyle structure indicates a 5th-c. date (ibid., 466-468). S of the Arch of Frontinus (ibid.), touching the N wall of the "plateia," a small chapel with one apsed nave was built, almost as if to defend the city. Two more churches, not yet excavated, can be seen among the ruins: a chapel NE of the city and a three-aisled church SE of the theater (ibid.). Grandiose basilicas and baptisteries rose in the great episcopal centers; the cult of the martyrs led to the building of martyria and cemeterial churches outside the city walls. Some of these worship centers were instituted by laws (CTh 9, 17,6-7; CI 1,2,3; 3,44,14). The oldest buildings, dating from the late 4th c., had monumental dimensions: crowds of pilgrims rested under the porticos on feast days and took part in agapes and commemorative functions. Hence these buildings assumed a particular structure, generally a central plan covered by a dome, an arrangement singularly suggestive for Christians because of the celestial symbolism of the dome.

The two main martyria of Asia Minor were naturally those in honor of the two apostles, who were also considered the protectors of the Byzantine Empire. At Ephesus the martyrium of St. John arose ca. the late 4th c. on the hill overlooking the temple of Artemis of the Ephesians, the greatest pagan sanctuary of Asia. Of the primitive sanctuary, largely revealed by the excavations of the Austrian mission, we recognize a building with a central nucleus, square-planned and domed, and four arms in the form of a *cross; each arm had three aisles and some had external porticos, as foundations and pavement mosaics show (J. Keil, Forschungen, IV, 3). Soon afterward a large octagonal baptistery with circular pool was added to the N. The main building was later rebuilt with much larger dimensions, but keeping the primitive cross-shaped votive chapel. A great three-aisled basilica with projecting transept arms was planned, but the nave of this phase was never built and the whole was then incorporated into a large vaulted structure built by Justinian (P. Verzone, Le fasi della basilica). The grandiose new building kept the walls of the transept and apse and, so as to create a massive structure with pillars and columns, reused great quantities of marble obtained by the demolition of the nearby temple of Artemis, as well as column shafts prepared for the hypostyle basilica. Justinian's building had six domes over the nave and transept, cross-vaults on the aisles and a matroneum.

At Hierapolis, the martyrium of St. Philip (Verzone, Le primitive disposizioni; D. Cottica, Unguentari tardo antichi), excavated by the Italian mission like all this city's buildings, was also built on a hill overlooking the city in the late 4th or early 5th c., seemingly on a plan sent by the imperial architects at Constantinople, as at Ephesus. The central nucleus consists of an octagon from which radiate eight rectangular chapels, in such a way that the pillars become visibly thicker toward the outside. The four chapels corresponding to the main axes are preceded by square areas with niches, in some of which were drinking fountains (cavities for lead pipes are still preserved in the walls). Beside these entrances were bays enclosing the stellar octagon in a square perimeter with sides of ca. 60 m. The chapels on the diagonal axes originally faced onto four triangular courtyards created by the inclusion of the octagon in the square. The eight chapels each opened into the octagon via three arches supported by pillars and two intermediate columns on each side with rough composite capitals in marble, the work of local sculptors (P. Verzone, Hierapolis, C.N.R., 448-457). Inside the thick pillars, made lighter by barrel-vaulted corridors communicating between the chapels, were more chapels, heptagonal with three apses. The radial chapels had mosaic floors; the octagonal room, one of marble slabs. This octagon was covered by a light wooden dome with lead plates on the outer surface and mosaic on the inner. For the date of this building see Otto Feld's scheme in Propyläen Kunstgeschichte, Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, Berlin 1977. A martyrium similar to the two of Asia Minor was the cruciform one at *Antioch with a central domed square, dedicated to St. *Babylas (J. Lassus, L'église cruciforme, 55ff.).

An analysis of the monuments from the late 5th and early 6th c. reveals two new developments: (1) the reuse of secular buildings and the transformation of pagan sanctuaries into churches, and (2) the prevalence of buildings with thick pillars and domes, evidently influenced by martyria.

Reuse of secular buildings. In the course of the 5th c. at Hierapolis, after the fire and abandonment of the martyrium on the hill, the calidarium of a large public bath was converted into a church by the construction of internal pillars and domes, considered more fitting for its new sacred function (P. Verzone, Hierapolis, C.N.R., 457-460). It was probably still dedicated to St. Philip. At any rate it had an apse and presbytery; the atrium was in a smaller room parallel to the calidarium. At Priene the first hypostyle cathedral was created in a room of the gymnasium (M. Schede, Die Ruinen von P., 108; P. Verzone, Cattedrale di Priene, 261-265) by adding two rows of columns. The city, then in decline, could not support the expense of a new building. Similarly at Assos in the Troad, a hypostyle church was set up inside the gymnasium, part of the courtyard becoming the quadriportico (J.T. Clarke - F.H. Bacon - R. Koldewey, Investigations at Assos, 185). Here, however, the archaic temple at the top of the rise was spared. In the agora at Pergamum a three-aisled church was built with a semicircular apse, narthex and quadriportico (late 4th or early 5th c.—W. Dörpfeld, Bauwerke, 33-35).

Transformation of temples. Famous pagan sanctuaries suffered various fates. The most famous of all, the Artemision of Ephesus, was razed to the ground, but others became churches and to this owe their preservation (F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Kirchen, 128-130). The temple of Aphrodite at Aphrodisias became a cathedral (L. Crema, Monumenti, cols. 179ff.; Die spätantike Stadt, see index), keeping nearly all its columns in situ and adding perimeter walls and a central apse flanked on both sides by a double room. Next to it was the bishop's residence, also with a fine trichorate room (K. Erim, Aphrodisias, TAD [1966] I, pp. 60-61; II, pp. 57-58; [1969], II, fig. 21). A 6th-c. painting of St. Michael has been discovered in the theater of Aphrodisias (R. Cormack, The Wall-Painting). The sanctuary of Aetani also became a church, but hardly anything of the changes involved in the transformation can be made out among the walls of the cella. Still in the 6th c., an important complex was created within the cella of the temple of Apollo at Didyma: it comprised a medium-sized hypostyle church with projecting polygonal apse and narthex, and a small square baptistery with three small niches (Th. Wiegand, Didyma, 29ff., pl. 58-80; atl. pl. 3-5). *Hadrian's great temple of Serapis at Pergamum became a three-aisled cathedral dedicated to St. Paul (L. Crema, Pergamo, 69ff.; O. Bayatli, Bergama, 46ff.).

Churches with pillars. At the center of Hierapolis in the first half of the 6th c. arose a longitudinal-plan church with pillars for strong piers and columns for light ones (P. Verzone, Hierapolis, C.N.R., 462-466); in front was a narthex and atrium; this was probably the new church dedicated to St. Philip when his cult was transferred to the city for security reasons. The churches of Philadelphia and Sardis must also have had pillars and ribbed vaults (G. Foss, Byz. Sardis). The mountainous region of Lycia had many modest-dimensioned pillared churches, nearly all of stone. They have been visited, but we possess only preliminary accounts of them (T.A.B. Spratt - E. Forbes, Travels, passim; R.M. Harrison, Churches L., 117-151). These basilica-plan pillared buildings have naves ending in an apse—semicircular inside and polygonal outside (Alakilise, Sura), or semicircular also outside (Arneai, the five churches of Andriake)—or in a triconch spanning the three aisles (Karabel, Abacahissar), and nearly always have a narthex in front. Rebuilt later, probably after the Arab invasions, they preserve decorative architectural elements (capitals, architraves, portals) typical of the 6th c. and of the Constantinople area (R.M. Harrison, Note on Sculpture, 187-197). Relatively recent excavations at Xanthos have revealed a three-aisled church with mosaic floor like that of St. John of Studios at Constantinople (E. Kalinka, Xanthos, 94; H. Metzger, Fouilles, 1970, 171; 1973, 119-120; Campagne 1974, 133-134; 1977, 64-65).

Important for the style and chronology of the churches of Lycaonia and Isauria are the Alahan Monastir complex and the church of Dag Pazari. Alahan was a monastic sanctuary consisting of two churches with a baptistery between, joined by a great portico. The first church is a hypostyle basilica with interesting sculptures of the Evangelists, the archangels and Christ in glory; church no. 3 was a domed church with transverse arches on the nave and aisles, and portals decorated with marvelous vine foliage and intertwining fish. The finely indented acanthus-leaf capitals are in the style of the late 5th-c. workshops of Proconnesus (P. Verzone, Alahan; G.H. Forsyth, Architectural, 218ff.). Here too, as in so many sites that suffered from the Arab invasion, church no. 1 was later reduced to a single nave: M. Gough excavated it, destroying the additions (Reports 1962, 173ff.; 1963, 105ff.; 1964, 185ff.; 1967, 37ff.; 1968, 159ff.). The small church of Dag Pazari has three aisles dominated by a square domed bay about 8 m. on each side, and with an apse semicircular inside and outside (M. Gough, Emperor Zeno, 203-209, figs. 3 and 4; G.H. Forsyth, op. cit., 233ff.). The walls are made of accurately squared stone blocks, and the capitals are similar to those of Alahan. The building clearly shows what the dominant building characteristics of the early 6th c. were, which is of value for dating other churches in the area.

The group traditionally known as Binbirkilise comprises religious buildings, nearly all of modest dimensions, divided among two centers: Madensehir and Degile, the latter a fortified acropolis. The most important three-aisled basilica is no. 1, at Madensehir (nave 27.50 x 6 m. [90.2 x 19.7 ft.]), divided by monolithic pillars with their original stone barrel-vaults and preceded by a two-storied narthex. The others are smaller basilicas of stone blocks, similar or simpler in form and of various ages, the more recent naturally having rougher masonry; current dating spreads them over the 6th to the 10th c.; those of Degile in particular postdate the sack of the lower city by the Arabs in the 8th c.; the epigraphist Ramsay (W.M. Ramsay - G.L. Bell, The Thousand and One Churches, 519-558) drew these conclusions not just from the style, which he regarded as rougher than that of the important churches of the plain or other artistically or culturally linked sites, but also because of the stone used, which did not allow fine cutting, and from a minute study of the epigraphy. The floor plans are varied: (1) basilicas with three aisles separated by pillars, vaulted roof, single usually horseshoe-shaped apse, horseshoe arcades and archivolts of windows (indicating relatively late date), narthex with two rooms at the ends (churches 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 15, 21, 29, 31, 34 and 42), sometimes projecting (no. 32); (2) Latin cross (nos. 11, 24, 37); (3) Greek cross (nos. 12 and 34); (4) polygonal (no. 10: 14 sides with ambulatory); and (6) single nave with apse. The dating of the churches of this group is controversial (J. Strzygowski, Kleinasien, passim; Ramsay - Bell, op. cit., passim; R. Lienhardt, Church n. 1, 300-303; P. Verzone, Turchia, cc. 204-205; R. Krautheimer, Early Architecture, pp. 123-124; S. Eyice, Karadag, pass.; M. Restle, Binbirkilise: RBK 1,690-719). Churches nos. 1, 6, 7 and 21 are the oldest and constitute a terminus post quem; but the whole group has no decorations to compare with those of Alahan and Dag Pazari.

II. Diocese of Pontus. The diocese of *Pontus comprised the province of *Bithynia to the W; Paphlagonia, Diospontus and Pontus Polemonianus to the N; *Galatia and *Cappadocia to the S; and Armenia Minor to the E (A.H.M. Jones, The Later Roman Empire, passim, and Mape II). *Gregory of Nyssa (Ep. 2,9) said that the region was rich in churches. In Cappadocia, the largest partly surviving church (probably 5th c.) is that of Kayseri (*Caesarea), of which a stretch of wall existed until a few years ago (A. Gabriel, Monuments, pl. XXVII, 1). Windows and doors were framed by a band of several contours vaguely recalling the decoration of *Qalat Seman. Caesarea, a thriving city, was razed by the Turks in the 11th c.; the ruins of a *monastery remain. Unfortunately the great ancient churches of this area were destroyed in the ebb and flow of Arabs and Byzantines from the 7th to the 12th c., and our evidence of them is limited to capitals and sporadic pieces (G. Jacopi, Commagene, 18) reused in mosques or preserved in local museums. Capitals, often of finely indented leaves like those of Alahan, Dag Pazari etc. (A. Gabriel, Monuments II, pls. L and LI), attest the existence in situ of great buildings of this type. Surviving churches, though, are small and must have belonged to sparsely populated centers; the sketchiness of decorative elements such as corbelled cornices, windows—often small—and horseshoe arches means they must be dated after the 7th c. (var. aus., Cappadoce, passim; M. Restle, Kappadokien: RBK 4,68-1115; Id., Studien, passim), i.e., beyond our period. The churches of Eski Andaval, near Nidğe, and some buildings in rock such as those of Maçan or St. John the Baptist at Čavuşin date to an early period. Monastic complexes of a later period also survive, dug out of rock, such as those at Uenasa and Zelve. The Ihlara Valley (Peristrema), untouched by the sacks of the 7th and 8th-c. Arab invasions, were an oasis of monasticism, which was widespread and flourishing there until the 14th c. There are still ca. 150 churches and various monasteries in the valley between the villages of Ihlara and Selime, a distance of 14 km (8.7 mi). Bithynia also escaped affliction by the Arabs. St. Sophia at *Nicaea (5th c., rebuilt several times from the 8th c.) had a basilica plan, three aisles separated by columns, projecting apse (three-sided externally) and narthex in front (N. Brunow, St. Sophie, 471-481). At Triglia (F.W. Hasluck, Bithynica, 285-290) the church of St. Stephen (rebuilt on an earlier one in the 8th c.) has deep-cut capitals, typical of the Constantinople era, betraying a 6th-c. origin. At *Ancyra, capital of *Galatia, we find a church installed ab antiquo in a pagan building; the cella of the well-known temple was transformed into a three-aisled basilica by adding a rectangular apse (G. Perrot - E. Guillaume - J. Delbet, Exploration, 296-297, pl. 12 and 14; D. Krencker - M. Schede, Den Tempel, pl. 21); the pronaus formed a pseudonarthex. The type of masonry in the apse, using material from the old building, is 5th c. (G. Foss, Ankara, 65; M. Restle, Ankyra, RBK 1,71-172), but the insertion of a basilica in an important pagan temple suggests 6th c., while the masonry of polychrome bands has a counterpart in Justinian's martyrium of St. John at Ephesus.

The church of Yürme, ancient Eudoxia, has five aisles divided by pillars and a rectangular apse (an evocation of the church of Ancyra?). The pillars, unlike those of Cappadocia, had the longer side set lengthwise, an indication of greater antiquity. Its attribution is to the 5th (J.W. Crowfoth, Notes, 91-94) or 6th c. (M.H. Ballance, Galatia, RBK 4,608-613).

The picture of the region thus far considered is just a sketch of a once-flourishing Christian civilization that vanished centuries ago. The important cities of the Byzantine era were mostly on the coast and were destroyed by the Arabs; only a part of them survives. Those in the interior, less important because of their smaller economic potential, were already of secondary importance, and the majority of them, e.g., Lycian Laodicea, have not been excavated or else have been built over and the old ruins buried under Islamic dwellings. Archaeological excavations will undoubtedly make a major contribution.

G. Perrot - E. Guillaume - J. Delbet, Exploration archéologique de la Galatie et de la Bithynie, d'une partie de la Mysie, de la Phrygie, de la Cappadoce et du Pont, I, Paris 1872; K.G. Lanckoronski, Die Städte Pamfilien und Pisidien, Vienna 1890-1892, 2 vols.; W.M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire Before A.D. 170, London-New York-Toronto 1892; W. Dörpfeld, Die Bauwerke im Bericht über die Arbeiten zu Pergamon 1900–1901, Athens 1902; J.T. Clarke - F.H. Bacon - R. Koldewey, Investigations at Assos, London-Cambridge-Leipzig 1902-1921; J. Strzygowski, Kleinasien, ein Neuland der Kunstgeschichte, Leipzig 1903; F.W. Haluck, Bithynica: ABSA 13 (1906-7) 285-298; H. Rott, Kleinasiatische Denkmäler aus Pisidien, Pamphylien, Kappadokien and Lykien, Leipzig 1908; T. Wiegand, Sechster vorläufiger Bericht über die von den Königlichen Museen in Milet u. Didyma unternommenen Ausgrabungen, ADAW 1908, 28-32; W.M. Ramsay - G. Bell, The Thousand and One Churches, London 1909; E. Kalinka, Xanthos: Tituli As. M., II, Vienna 1920, 94ff.; N. Brunow, L'église de Sainte Sophie à Nicée: EO 104 (1925) 471-481; A. Gabriel, Monuments turcs d'Anatolie, 2 vols., Paris 1931-34; Forschungen in Ephesos, IV, 1: E. Reisch - F. Knoll - J. Kell, Die Marienkirche, Vienna 1932; F. Miltner, Vorläufige Berichte über die Grabungen in Ephesos: JÖAI 28 (1933) 12-15; G. Jacopi, Dalla Paflagonia alla Commagene. Relazione sulla prima campagna esplorativa (1935), Rome 1936; D. Krencker - M. Schede, Der Tempel in Ankara, Berlin-Leipzig 1936; Forschungen in Ephesos, IV, 2: F. Miltner - H. Gerstinger - C. Praschniker, Das Coemeterium der Sieben Schläfer, Vienna 1937; G. Jacopi, Esplorazioni e studi in Paflagonia e Cappadocia. Relazione sulla seconda campagna esplorativa (1936), Rome 1937; J. Lassus, L'église cruciforme: Ant Or 2 (1938) 5ff.; L. Crema, Pergamo: Palladius 2 (1938) 69ff.; G. Jacopi - L. Crema, Gli scavi della Missione Archeologica Italiana ad Afrodisiade nel 1937: MAL 38 (1939) cols. 179ff.; F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Kirchen in antiken Heiligtümern: JDAI 54 (1939) 128-130; Th. Wiegand, Didyma, I, Berlin 1941; O. Bayatli, Bergama Tarihinde, n. p. 1951; Forschungen in Ephesos: G.A. Sotiriu - J. Keil - H. Hörmann - F. Miltner, Die Johanneskirche, Vienna 1951; A. Harnack, Missione e propagazione del Cristianesimo nei primi tre secoli, It. ed. [3]1954; F. Fasolo, La basilica del Concilio di Efeso. Con alcune note sull'architettura romana della valle del Meandro: Palladio n.s. 5 (1956) 1-30; P. Verzone, Un monumento dell'arte tardo-romana in Isauria, Alahan Monastir, Turin 1956; G.H. Forsyth, Architectural Notes on a Trip through Cilicia: DOP 11 (1957) 218ff.; M. Gough, Reports on Alahan Monastir: AS 12 (1962) 17-31; 13 (1963) 105ff.; 14 (1964) 185ff.; 17 (1967) 37ff.; 18 (1968) 159ff.; A.M. Mansel, Die Ruinen von Side, Berlin 1963; R.M. Harrison, Churches and Chapels of Central Lycia: AS 13 (1963) 117-151; A.H.M. Jones, The Later Roman Empire, Oxford 1964; M. Schede, Die Ruinen von Priene, Berlin 1964; R. Krautheimer, Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture, Harmondsworth 1965, [4]1986 (It. tr. Architettura paleocristiana e bizantina, Turin 1986); R. Lienhardt, The Great Basilica n. 1, at Bin Bir Kilise in Anatolia: JSAH 24 (1965) 4, 300-303; K. Enim, Aphrodisias 1965 Campaign: TAD 15, 1 (1966) 60-61; Id., Aphrodisias 1966 Campaign: TAD 15, 2 (1966) 57-58; Id., The ninth Campaign of excavations at Aphrodisias in Caria: TAD 18, 2 (1969) fig. 21; G. Kleiner, Die Ruinen von Milet, Berlin 1968; Id., Die Grabung in Milet im Herbst 1970: TAD 19, 1 (1970) 121-122; H. Metzger, Fouilles du Létoon et de Xanthos en 1970: TAD 19, 1 (1970) 171; Id., Fouilles de 1971 au Létoon et à Xanthos: TAD 20, 1 (1973) 119-120; Id., Campagne de 1972 au Létoon et à Xanthos: TAD 21, 2 (1974) 133-134; Id., Campagne de 1975 au Létoon et à Xanthos: TAD 24, 2 (1977) 64-65; var. aus., Arts de Cappadoce, Geneva-Paris-Munich 1950; S. Eyice, Karadağ (Binbirkilise) ve Karaman, Istanbul 1971; R.M. Harrison, A Note on Architectural Sculpture in Central Lycia: AS 22 (1972) 187-197; M. Gough, The Emperor Zeno and Some Cilician Churches: AS 22 (1972) 203-209, figs. 3 and 4; S. Hill, The Early Christian Church at Tomarza: DOP 29 (1975) 149-164; A.M. Mansel, Bericht über Ausgrabungen u. Untersuchungen in Pamphylien in den Jahren

1957-1972: AA 90 (1975) I, 50-57, Abb. 4; C. Foss, Late Antique and Byzantine Ankara: DOP 31 (1977) 61-65; P. Verzone, Hierapolis di Frigia nei lavori della Missione archeologica italiana: La ricerca scientifica 100, Q. C.N.R. 1978, 448-470; M.J. Mellink, Archaeology in Asia Minor: AJA 83 (1979) 243, ill. 2; J.W. Crowfoot, Notes upon Late Anatolian Art: ABSA 4 (1897-98); M. Restle, Studien zur frühbyzantinischen Architektur Kappadokiens, 2 vols., Vienna 1979; Id., Kappadokien: RBK 4,968-1115; Id., Binbirkilise: RBK 1,690-719; Id., Ankyra RBK 1,170-177; Id., Ephesos 2,164-198; Id., Kommagenes, Kilikien, Isauria: RBK 5,182-357; Id., Lykanonien: RBK 5,818-854; Id., Lykien: RBK 5,856-902; Id., Mysien und Hellespont: RBK 6,839-867; M. H. Ballance, Galatia: RBK 4, 608-615; P. Verzone, Le fasi della basilica giustinianea di S. Giovanni di Efeso, Rend. PARA 51/52 (1978/1979) 213-235; Id., Le primitive disposizioni del Martyrium di Hierapolis: Proceedings of the 10th Inter. Congress of Classical Archaeology, ed. E. Akurgal, Ancyra 1978, 1057-1062; Id., L'editto "cunctos populos" del 380 e la propagazione dei vescovadi in tutto l'impero, in Festschrift Deichmann, Bonn 1986, 149-162; C. Foss, Ephesus after Antiquity: A Late Antique, Byzantine and Turkish City, Cambridge 1979; A.D. Macro, The Cities of Asia Minor under the Roman Empire: ANRW II,7,2 (1980) 658-697; Th. Pekáry, Kleinasien unter römischen Herrschaft: ANRW II,7,2 (1980) 596-657; C. Foss, Ankyra: RAC 1985 Suppl. Lief. 3, 448-465; L. Rodley, Cave Monasteries of Byzantine Cappadocia, Cambridge 1985; J. Lafontaine-Dosogne, Histoire de l'art byzantin et chrétien d'Orient, Louvain-la-Neuve 1987; J.-P. Sodini, Les groupes épiscopaux de Turquie (à l'exception de la Cilicie), in Actes du XI^e Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, I, Rome 1989, 405-427; Costantinopoli e l'arte delle province orientali, eds. F. de' Maffei, C. Barsanti, A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, Rome 1990; V. Ruggieri, Byzantine Religious Architecture (582-867): Its History and Structural Elements, OCA 237, Rome 1991; S. Mitchell, Anatolia: Land, Men and Gods in Asia Minor, Oxford 1993; F.R. Trombley, Hellenic Religion and Christianization c. 370-529, 2 vols., Leiden 1993-1994; R. Cormack, The Wall-Painting of St. Michael in the Theater, Aphrodisias papers 2, R.R.R. Smith - K.T. Erim (eds.), Ann Arbor, MI 1991, 109-122; C. Foss, The Lycian Coast in the Byzantine Age: DOP 48 (1994) 1-52; Gary J. Johnson, Early-Christian Epitaphs from Anatolia, Atlanta 1995; V. Ruggieri, L'architettura religiosa nell'Impero Bizantino (fine VI-IX secolo), Soveria Mannelli 1995; H. Hellenkemper, Frühe christliche Walfahrtsstätten in Kleinasien, in Akten des XII. Intern. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, I, Münster 1995, 259-271; Arte profana e arte sacra a Bisanzio, eds. A. Iacobini - E. Zanini, Rome 1995; C. Foss, Cities, Fortresses, and Villages of Byzantine Asia Minor, Aldershot 1996; P. Guinea Díaz, Nicea, Estudio de una ciudad en la Bitinia Romana, Sevilla 1997; E. Zanini, Introduzione all'archeologia bizantina, Rome 1998; J. Durand, L'art byzantin, Paris 1999; D. Cottica, Unguentari tardo antichi dal "martyrion" di Hierapolis, Turchia: MEFRA 112 (2000) 999-1021; N. Thierry, La Cappadoce de l'antiquité au Moyen Âge, Turnhout 2002; Die spätantike Stadt und ihre Christianisierung, eds. G. Brands - H.-G. Severin, Wiesbaden 2003. See also the various volumes Tabula Imperii Byzantini, Vienna: Bd. 2: Kappadokia, Charsianon, Sebasteia und Lykandos, 1981; Bd. 4: Galatien und Lykaonien, 1984; Bd. 5: Kilikien und Isaurien, 1985; Phrygien und Pisidien, 1990; Bd. 9: Paphlagonien und Honorias, 1996; Bd. 10: Aigaion Pelagos (Die nördliche Ägäis), 1989; EAM 3,517-536; 4,222-229; EAA2 4,612-629; ODB (various entries).

D. De Bernardi Ferrero

III. Sculpture, painting and minor arts. The plastic work of Asia Minor in the Late Antique period is of great importance especially for sculpture in the round, since it was here that the idiom that would later characterize Byzantine sculpture proper was born and developed. The majority of the Late Antique sculptures now in the museums of Istanbul, Selçuk, Vienna, New York etc. came from the great metropolises like Ephesus and Aphrodisias, the best-known examples being the reliefs on the base of the obelisk of *Theodosius I and the head of *Arcadius (all probably executed by artists trained in Asia Minor), and the statue of *Valentinian II (Istanbul, Arch. Mus.) from the baths of Aphrodisias. In this new conception of the human figure, great importance is given to the face, esp. the eyes, while the body is hidden by the drapery, generally flattened. Gone are naturalistic observations: the idealized portrait and, in historical reliefs, the so-called moral perspective prevail. The praying figures in the so-called Rotunda of *Galerius at *Thessalonica (mid-5th c.) are in my opinion a clear transposition of this idiom into painting, emphasizing the acceptance of the idiom not just in Asia Minor and new Rome but also in important centers of the empire like Thessalonica in particular, geographically close to the capital and a historical link between East and West.

This idiom did not begin ex abrupto in Asia Minor in the 4th-5th c.: rather, Late Antique work represents the point of arrival of a process that matured in this area, signs of which can already be seen in 2nd-c. works and whose most important evolutionary steps can be traced. In my opinion, an exhibition at the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna (October 1981), part of the material excavated at Ephesus, allows us, by considering the pieces chronologically, to reconstruct the phases of this process, which came about by degrees, in a coherent diagram. An important moment in this process is probably the tetrarchical reliefs of Hadrian's temple at Ephesus (see B. Brenk, Die Datierung der Reliefs, 238-258), which anticipate certain "Theodosian" sculptures. Though sometimes assigned to the mid-4th c. (see A. Bammen - R. Fleischer - D. Knibbe, Führer durch Ephesos, 78ff.), I would accept the attribution of these reliefs to the period of the tetrarchy. The example of Ephesus was certainly not isolated, as is demonstrated by the surviving statues of Aphrodisias in particular and also of the other main centers of Asia Minor (see the catalogs of Y. Inan and E. Alföldi Rosenbaum of Roman and Byzantine portrait sculpture from Turkey).

Pieces belonging to the period between Theodosius I and Theodosius II provide precise terms of comparison which allow us to assign to this period certain portraits usually classified as Justinianean, e.g., the splendid female bust from Istanbul now in the Metropolitan Museum, which Harrison, at the 16th Int. Cong. of Byzantine Studies (R.M. Harrison, Anicia Juliana's Church of St. Polyeuktos: JÖByz 32 (1982) 435-442), arbitrarily identified with Princess Juliana Anicia (d. 527). In addition to stylistic data, the hairstyle, which lacks a diadem, differs from that of Anicia's portrait in the opening miniature of the so-called Vienna Dioscorides, or the so-called Theodora in the Musei Civici of Milan Castle. A heightened stylization, sometimes impaired by a low level of quality, separates the output of Asia Minor in the 4th and 5th c. from later, generally Justinianean, work, such as the Ephesus statues attributed to this period (see Y. Inan - E. Rosenbaum, Portrait Sculpture, pl. CLXXXV-VI) in which the hairstyle has become pure ornamentation, and the similar head from Çanakkale, now at Istanbul Arch. Mus.; in both cases the overall conception is prevalently decorative.

The output of architectural decoration, partly summarized—esp. as regards slabs decorated in bas-relief from the 9th to the 10th c.—by Ulbert, is also very rich and is part of the wider idiom of the Mediterranean koine (prevalent motifs: losenges, crosses, facing animals, plant motifs and so on). Some ambos of the 5th-6th c. have a certain interest, e.g., that of Priene, decorated with plant motifs, in a typology peculiar to Ionia and Caria (see O. Feld, Spätantike, 168). In this wide and varied picture it is possible to distinguish work belonging to the most important regional schools, such as Isauria and Cilicia, esp. in the period of the Isaurian emperor *Zeno (474–491). Both were characterized by the use of local stone—marble pieces are rare—decorated with plant and symbolic motifs, often aniconic. In these works the decoration generally occupies the whole surface, in a sort of horror vacui: see the altars and architectural decorations of Alahan Monastir and, to cite the most interesting examples, the cylindrical altar from Tomarza, now in Kayseri Arch. Mus. (see M. Restle, Studien, figs. 210 and 212, and p. 165). Similar decorations occur in the builders' yard of *Qalat Seman (N Syria), also from the time of Zeno, who was magister militum per Antiochiam before becoming emperor.

As for capitals in particular, Ionic impost capitals are very common, esp. in the great centers (see F.K. Yegül, Early Byzantine Capitals from Sardis, 265-274), while acanthus-leaf capitals are found esp. in the great 5th-c. foundations (e.g., the pre-Justinianean basilica of St. John at Ephesus, the martyrium of St. Philip at Hierapolis, Meriamlik etc.). Small local museums are important mines of material: there are superb little-known marble pieces in the museums of Afyon Karahisar, Iznik, Amasya and so on, to say nothing of the many museums of eastern Turkey. The work of these regions, though prevalently autochthonous (the idiom is different, as we have seen, around metropolises like Ephesus and Aphrodisias), is often informed by metropolitan tendencies, esp. if linked to "court" commissions (see, e.g., the capitals of Alahan Monastir, which transpose into local stone the type of the marble capitals of St. John of Studios, ca. 450). Even the idiom of the particular decorations of St. *Polyeuctos finds an echo in the regions of Asia Minor, e.g., in my opinion, some capitals of the so-called Čumanin Camii at Antalya in Lycia. In general we are faced with a varied and multivalent output, which, esp. in the course of the 5th c., touches the greatest heights: this century is in fact revealed to art-historical examination as a period of lively experimentalism in contrast with the "standardization" of the time of Justinian.

Work from the 7th and 8th c., the "dark" centuries of the Byzantine Empire, is, for historical and political reasons, extremely fragmentary. With the restoration of images and the rise to power of the Macedonian dynasty, we see in Asia Minor as well a certain artistic revival (though some situations were definitively compromised and the great centers of *Late Antiquity reduced to little more than villages), though it is far from the notable work of the proto-Byzantine period.

Painting and mosaics. Early Christian frescoes are rare in Asia Minor. The most interesting find is a burial chamber on the hill of Čaltepe near Izmir (see N. Firatli, An Early Byzantine Hypogeum, 919-932), excellently preserved: side walls decorated with plant and bird motifs alternating with panels imitating opus sectile; barrel vault painted with a coffer motif; main wall with a cantharus between two facing peacocks; and Constantine's monogram high up in a tympanum. These 4th-c. frescoes have points of contact with certain hypogea in Asia Minor (e.g. *Sardis and Izmit) and with that of Silistria (lower Moesia).

Mosaics, esp. pavement mosaics, abound in the great centers of Asia Minor such as Ephesus (see W. Jobst, Mosaiken), using the most traditional Late Antique motifs, i.e., geometrical, plant, emblemata etc. Early Byzantine churches generally prefer geometrical motifs: at Ephesus, the floor of the Seven Sleepers, recently assigned to the time of Theodosius I (see W. Jobst, Zur Bestattungskirche, 271ff.), and those of the Churches of St. John and St. Mary. The most interesting work is that of Cilicia, for historical-geographical reasons close to the Antio-chene artistic milieu (Cilicia depended on the *patriarchate of Antioch), esp. mosaics at *Mopsuestia, probably a *synagogue, with scenes from the life of Samson (see E. Kitzinger, Observations, 133-144), mosaic with Noah's Ark also at Mopsuestia (see H. Buschhausen, Die Deutung des Archenmosaik, 57ff.), that at Karlik (see M. Gough, The Peaceful Kingdom, 411-419), etc. This work, which often reveals deep symbolic meanings, extends over the 4th-6th c. (see L. Budde, Antike Mosaiken) and stylistically has particular points of contact with Antioch and sometimes with *Palestine. Wall mosaics are rather rare, at least judging from surviving works (apart from the splendid mosaics of the destroyed Church of the Dormition at Nicaea, attributed to Constantinopolitan artisans: date contested). In a room at Ephesus interesting mosaics in brightly colored glass stones were found with scenes of grape harvest and busts, including Bacchus and Ariadne (late 4th or early 5th c., see W. Jobst, Mosaiken, figs. 110-124, who has compared them, among others, with those of S. Costanza, Rome). Those in Christian buildings include scanty fragments in the diaconicon of the church of Dereağzi in Lycia, ca. 20 km (12 mi) NW of Myra, now in Antalya Arch. Mus., probably fragments of a *theophany inspired by Isaiah or *Ezekiel, with a wheel surrounded by flames (a scene that sometimes appears in early Cappadocian cycles and the oldest Georgian apses); also the remains of a figure, including sandaled feet and part of a tunic (predominant colors: green—in various shades—white, turquoise, yellow and red). Like the church itself—a building of great artistic interest—they are generally dated to the 9th c. (post-843); but having examined them closely at Antalya, I would bring them forward to the mid 6th, or at most 7th, c. on the basis of technical and stylistic considerations. The fragments show a grainy connective tissue and linear rendering of clothing as in numerous old Byzantine mosaics; in posticonoclast work the design is generally more precise and compact, as we can see by comparing these with the post-843 images of Hagia Sophia, Constantinople (or the late 8th-c. ones in Hagia Sophia, Thessalonica). A further fragment of wall mosaic, hardly legible, was found in the apse of a small room at Anemurium in *Cilicia, with remains of a Greek inscription (see Rosenbaum - Huber - Ourkan, Survey in Cilicia).

So-called minor arts. Of numerous silver liturgical objects, the most interesting pieces are probably the so-called Kumluca treasure from Lycia, now partly in Antalya Arch. Mus., partly in the United States (see N. Firatli, Trésor, 523-525). Plates decorated with a cross, chalices, perforated plates for candlesticks and a censer with scenes of Christ's life are perfectly preserved: made in the time of Justinian, whose monogram is impressed in several places, under Bishop *Eutychianus, mentioned in Greek inscriptions engraved on several pieces. The Isaurian silver reliquary from Çirga, now in Adana Arch. Mus., is older, depicting the local saints Conon and *Thecla and other saints, with busts of *Helena and *Constantine on either side of the cross (see H. Buschhausen, Spätrömische Metallscrinia, 190). The piece is dated to the 5th c. (see M. Gough, A Fifth Century Reliquiary, 244-250) and the 4th c. (Buschhausen). The 4th c. date seems to me more convincing, esp. since Helena's hairstyle is the same as that attested on coins, which seems improbable in the 5th c.

Judging from silver and bronze pieces in Turkish and foreign museums, the output of metal objects was abundant, esp. in the 4th-6th c., the most significant centuries of the artistic history of this area.

General works: Monumenta Asiae Minoris Antiqua, London 1928ff.; articles on the most important regions and centers so far published in RBK; Propyläen Kunstgeschichte: O. Feld, Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, Frankfurt-Berlin-Vienna 1977; G. Macchiarella, s.v. Bizantino, additional volume of the Enciclopedia Universale dell'Arte, Rome 1978; var. aus., Age of Spirituality, Washington 1979 (indexes relating to pieces from A. M.); entries in ODB.

Sculpture: N. Thierry, Notes sur l'un des bas-reliefs d'Alahan Monastir en Isaurie: CArch 13 (1963) 43-47; O. Feld, Bericht über eine Reise durch Kilikien: IstMitt 14 (1964) 88-107; J. Inan - E. Rosenbaum, Roman and Early Byzantine Portrait Sculpture in Asia Minor, London 1966; C. Mango, Isaurian Builders, in Polychronion (Festschrift F. Dölger), Heidelberg 1966, 358-365; B. Brenk, Die Datierung der Relief am Hadrianstempel in Ephesos und das Problem der Tetrarchischen Skulptur des Osten: IstMitt 18 (1968) 238-258; T. Ulbert, Studien zur dekorative Reliefplastik des östlichen Mittelmeerraumes: Miscellanea Byzantina Monacensia 10, Munich 1969; Id., Untersuchungen zu den Byzantinischen Reliefplatten des 6 bis 8 Jahrhunderts: IstMitt 19-20 (1969-1970) 339-357; P. Verzone, La cattedrale di Priene e le sue decorazioni: FR (1970) 261-275; W. Oberleitner, Zwei Spätantike Kaiserköpfe aus Ephesos: Jahrbuch der Kunsthistorischen Sammlungen in Vienna 69 (1973) 127-165; U. Peschlow, Fragmente eines Heiligensarkophags in Myra: IstMitt 23-24 (1973) 225-231; A. Bammen - R. Fleischen - D. Knibbe, Führer durch das Archäologische Museum in Selçuk Ephesos, Vienna 1974; W. Deichmann, Spätantike Bauplastik in Ephesos, Mélanges Mansel I, Ancyra 1974, 549-570; F.K. Yegül, Early Byzantine Capitals from Sardis: A Study on the Ionic Impost Type: DOP 28 (1974) 265-274; O. Feld, Christliche Denkmäler aus Milet und seiner Umgebung: IstMitt 25 (1975) 197-209; S. Hill, The Early Christian Church at Tomarza, Cappadocia: A Study Based on Photographs Taken in 1909 by G. Bell: DOP 29 (1975) 151-164; Y. Inan - E. Alföldi Rosenbaum, Römische und Frühbyzantinische Portraitplastik aus der Türkei, Neue Funde, Mainz 1979; M. Restle, Studien zur Frühbyzantinischen Architektur Kappadokiens, Vienna 1979; N. Firatli, La sculpture byzantine figurée au Musée archéologique d'Istanbul, Paris 1990; Hierapolis. Scavi e ricerche, 2 vols., ed. T. Ritti, Rome 1985; C. Mango, Byzantine Architecture, London [2]1986; Id., The Art of the Byzantine Empire 312-

1454: Sources and Documents, Toronto-London 1986; Hierapolis: scavi e ricerche, III, ed. G. Bejor, Rome 1991.

Materials and centers of production: E. Atalay, Antiker Marmorsteinbruch bei Ephesos: OJh 51 (1976-1977) 59-60; D. Monna - P. Pensabene, Marmi dell'Asia Minore, Rome 1977; N. Asgari, Roman and Early Byzantine Marble Quarries of Proconnesus: Acts X Congresso Int. Archeology Classica, Ancyra 1978, 467-480; A. Pralong, Trouvailles dans une carrière phrygienne inconnue: une inscription rupestre et un sarcophage "in situ": RA 2 (1980) 251-262; J.B. Wand-Perkins, Nicomedia and the Marble Trade: PBSR 48, n.s. (1980) 23-69; Arte profana e arte sacra a Bisanzio, eds. A. Iacobini - E. Zanini, Rome 1995; E. Concina, Le arti di Bisanzio: secoli VI-XV, Milan 2002.

Painting and mosaics: E. Rosenbaum - G. Huber - S. Ourkan, A Survey of Coastal Cities in Western Cilicia, Ancyra 1967; J. Morgenstern - R.E. Stone, The Church at Dereagzi: A Preliminary Report on the Mosaics of the Diaconicon: DOP 23 (1969-70) 383-393; L. Budde, Antike Mosaiken in Kilikien, 2 vols., Recklinghausen 1969, 1972; H. Buschhausen, Die Deutung des Archenmosaik in der Justinianischen Kirche von Mopsuestia, JÖByz 21 (1972) 57ff.; E. Kitzinger, Observations on the Samson Floor at Mopsuestia: DOP 27 (1972-1974) Bbl. 271ff.; N. Firatli, An Early Byzantine Hypogeum Discovered at Iznik: Mélanges Mansel II, Ancyra 1974, 919-932; M. Gough, The Peaceful Kingdom: An Early Christian Mosaic Pavement in Cilicia Campestris, ibid. I, 411-419; E. Kitzinger, A Fourth Century Mosaics Floor in Pisidian Antioch, ibid., 385-395; W. Jobst, Römische Mosaiken aus Ephesos I, Forschungen in Ephesos VIII, 2, Vienna 1977; S. Campbell, The Corpus of Mosaic Pavements in Turkey, 3, The Mosaics of Aphrodisias in Caria, Toronto (Ont.) 1991; L. Van de Put, The Architectural Decoration in Roman Asia Minor, Turnhout 1995; A.J. Wharton, Art of Empire: Painting and Architecture of the Byzantine Periphery: A Comparative Study of Four Provinces, London-Philadelphia 1988; Costantinopoli e l'arte delle province orientali, eds. F. de' Maffei - C. Barsanti - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, Rome 1990; M. Acheimastou-Potamianou, Byzantine Wall Painting, Athens 1994.

So-called minor arts: N. Firatli, Un trésor du VI^e trouvé à Kumluca en Lycie: Akten VII Int. Kongress für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City 1969, 523-525; H. Buschhausen, Die Spätrömischen Metallscrinia und frühchristlichen Reliquiare, Wiener Byzantinische Studien IX, Vienna 1971; Early Christian and Byzantine Art: Textiles, Metalwork, Frescoes, Manuscripts, Jewellery, Steatites, Stone Sculptures . . . from the Fourth to the Fourteenth Centuries, ed. R. Temple et al., Shaftesbury (Dorset)-London 1990; RBK 5,721-741.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

ASIATIC CULTURE. This term indicates the cultural facies characteristic of the Christianity of Roman Asia, but also branching out into other regions, in the 2nd and 3rd c. It characterizes a type of Christian culture different from, and in many aspects opposed to, that of *Alexandria. It lacked the compactness and homogeneity of Alexandrian culture: e.g., Alexandrian scriptural *exegesis systematically used the *allegorical method, whereas Asiatic exegetes were either literalist or allegorist or indeed both, according to the passage being interpreted. Alexandrian *trinitarian doctrine was the theology of the Logos, which stressed the Son's personality vis-à-vis the Father, while for the Asiatics, besides this doctrine (*Justin Martyr, *Theophilus), there was a strong *monarchian tendency, both *orthodox (*Irenaeus) and heterodox (*Noetus, the two *Theodotuses); the Alexandrians rigidly identified OT Wisdom with the Logos, while the Asiatics also attest an identification of Wisdom with the *Holy Spirit (Irenaeus, Theophilus). At the level of methodology and technique, Asiatic culture was less rigorous in research and less unified in direction.

But despite its lesser homogeneity, certain widespread characteristics gave Asiatic culture some common features that distinguished it from Alexandrian culture. A marked materialism prevailed among Asiatics that mixed at various levels popular influences, including those of Jewish origin, and intellectual influences, such as *Stoicism. Even a declared *Platonist like Justin had a *millenarian, i.e., materialist, *eschatology. This materialism was reflected in various areas, in opposition to the more rigid Alexandrian spiritualism of Platonic derivation. Thus, while the Alexandrians undervalued the human component of Christ vis-à-vis the divine, the Asiatics allowed it much more significance: as man, Christ is the image of God (Col 1:15) and the mediator between God and humanity (1 Tim 2:5). Whereas the Alexandrians viewed humanity platonically as a *soul with a *body, the Asiatics drew on *Aristotle's conception of human nature as a synthesis of soul and body; therefore, while the Alexandrians distinguished humanity as the image of God (Gen 1:27: soul) from the humanity made of clay (Gen 2:7: body), the Asiatics identified the two, to the extent that some of them (*Melito) conceived of God as having human features (*anthropomorphism). Asiatic eschatology was largely millenarian, whereas Alexandrian was antimillenarian. The whole relationship between God and human beings was conceived of more spiritually by the Alexandrians (a direct relationship of the Logos with the *human soul, *mystical tendencies, etc.). In a different context the *quartodeciman observance of *Easter was typically Asiatic in the strict sense, showing the influence of a Jewish element less prominent at Alexandria.

The cradle of this cultural tendency was Roman Asia, where Christian culture and literature flourished in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. alongside a similar flourishing of *pagan culture. Asiatic culture, however, spread immediately to culturally less-developed areas, such that the term "Asiatic" must be understood culturally rather than geographically: *Theophilus at Antioch and *Tertullian at Carthage are both "Asiatic."

During the 3rd c., Asiatic culture spread widely in the West. Typically Asiatic elements can be seen in *Lactantius, *Victorinus of Petovium, Potamius of Lisbon and in 5th-c. *Gaul. However, the Asiatics' best work had already been done by the end of the 2nd c. In the 3rd c. they encountered and were influenced by the Alexandrians, as can be seen in *Methodius of Olympus, in whom Platonic and *Origenian influences mix with typically Asiatic traits (materialist eschatology). The Council of *Nicaea (325) saw a momentary Asiatic doctrinal victory, owing to conflict among the Alexandrians (*Arius against *Alexander); but the anti-Nicene reaction that followed swept away the last real representatives of this ancient cultural tradition, *Eustathius of Antioch and *Marcellus of Ancyra. Only at Antioch did Asiatic influences continue to remain vital in both exegesis and *Christology, forming the soil that fed the flourishing of the Antiochene school in the late 4th c. and first decades of the 5th c.

M. Simonetti, Alle origini di una cultura cristiana in Gallia: La Gallia romana (Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei, quaderno 158), Rome 1973, 117-129; Id., Teologia alessandrina e teologia asiatica al concilio di Nicea: Augustinianum 13 (1973) 369-398; Id., Modelli culturali nella cristianità orientale del II-III secolo: De Tertullien aux Mozarabes, I: Antiquité tardive et Christianisme ancien (III^e-VI^e siècles), in Mélanges offerts à Jacques Fontaine, Paris 1992, 381-392.

M. Simonetti

ASSEMBLY. The first Christians, who were often on the move, preferred to define their meetings with a verb rather than a noun: συνάγειν, whence συναγωγή; the verbs συνέρχομαι, in Latin coire, convenire, congregare, sometimes qualified by ὁμοθυμαδόν, ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, in unum (Acts, *Paul, *Ignatius). The gathered people were called ἐκκλησία, transliterated into Latin as ecclesia, which at first meant the meeting, later also the place (domus ecclesiae). The Greeks preferred σύναξις (*Origen, *Cyril of Jerusalem). Though continuing to frequent the temple, the first believers held their meetings in the upper room of a private house. The meetings are described in Acts: "They devoted themselves to the preaching of the apostles and the fellowship, to the breaking of the bread and to the prayers" (2:42). To the elements of Jewish *synagogue meetings (readings, songs, prayers, perhaps a homily), Christians added the fractio panis, the *sacrament of the Lord who was invisibly present to those who gathered in his name. The meeting was sometimes still called συναγωγή (Jas 2:2; Ign., Pol. 4,2), but Christians preferred the term ecclesia, to indicate the community of a city: structured, hierarchical, with regular meetings to express its unity (1 Cor 11:17) and its permanent state of "being on the move." The church thus continued the OT liturgical assemblies, called qahal. The assembly visibly expressed the bond and unity of Christians, who, even when dispersed, formed "one heart and one soul," one body, as was symbolized by the one loaf made up of many grains (Didache 9,10). The assembly was so essential for Christians that the *pagan *Pliny the Younger could describe them as "people who meet on a set day, before dawn, to raise their hymn together to Christ as to a god" (Ep. X, 96). In the evening too "they meet again to take an ordinary, innocent meal" (ibid.). Pliny may also have been interested in the mixed character of the meetings, with no clear distinction between men and women. *Justin Martyr describes the various assemblies to the emperor more eloquently. First, how the *catechumen, having received *baptism, goes to join the "united brothers," who welcome him with the *kiss of peace. With baptism, he enters the assembly of the new covenant. Every Sunday, the day of the *resurrection, the brothers flock from city and countryside. To accentuate their unity, they send the eucharistic gifts to those who are absent through the deacons. The assembly itself has the elements described in Acts: biblical readings, a homily, collective prayer, the presider's prayer in the name of the assembly, who approve it with a resounding amen, and finally, Communion (1 Ap. 65 and 67). *Tertullian (Apol. 39) says that the assembly is vital for Christians: Corpus sumus . . . Coimus in coetum et congregationem. The emperor *Diocletian struck at the church's heart by suppressing the holy books and prohibiting liturgical gatherings. The local proconsul reproached *Saturninus for having celebrated the Lord's Supper. Asked why he had done it, the future martyr responded: "We cannot live without celebrating the Lord's Supper" (Acta Sat.).

Regarding the components and rhythm of the Christian assembly, the main characteristic was its being a movement toward a locus of encounter. At certain points during the celebration, the assembly changed the physical direction of their prayers. But more important than the place were the people. *Clement of Alexandria says that the church is not so much a place as "the assembly of the elect" (Strom. VII, 29,4). *Augustine too specifies that the beauty comes from the living stones, not from the architecture. The assembly gathers the faithful of a given geographical area, who represent the whole church, whatever their language, occupation, social position, sex or age might be. It was not a select group or an elite, but a multitude, bringing together the baptized—good, mediocre or bad. *Lactantius, comparing the Christians to the *pagans, says that they are spiritu fratres, religione conservi, not admitting the normal social distinctions (Div. inst. 5,16). It was a mixed multitude, as Augustine repeats—an assembly gathered to share in the word and the *bread, that it might radiantly "flourish in [active] charity." Out of this arose the social works (*agape, offerings, diaconia) inspired by the fraternity lived in the assembly. *Origen, in response to the pagan *Celsus, compared the peaceful, orderly Christian assemblies to tumultuous civic gatherings. He adds: "Every person endowed with reason will admire the one who had the will and power to cause the churches of God to arise in each city, which parallel the assemblies of the people in each city. Likewise, comparing the council of God with each city's political assembly, you could make clear that some members of the church's council are worthy, if there exists a city of God in the universe, to exercise their authority" (C. Cels. 3,30).

Whether held in the morning or evening, every day or once a week, with or without the *Eucharist, the assembly was convoked and directed by the hierarchy (Clem., 1 Clem. 40-41; Ign., Magn. 7,1; Phil. 4 and Tral. 3,1-3). It consisted of a biblical reading, often commented upon as did Origen at Caesarea, psalms and prayers (Tertull., Apol. 39,3-4; Didasc. 13; Trad. ap. 31,35). *Prayer was more effective for being commonly employed (Ign., Eph. 13,1; Orig., De or., 31,4): Origen explains this particular grace by the invisible presence of Christ, the angels and saints. The quality of the assembly was connected to its frequency (Heb 10:25). Ignatius (Eph. 5,3), the Didascalia* 12 (ed. Nau) and many Fathers exhort the faithful to assiduousness, lamenting neglect. Origen insists that the homily not be omitted (Gen. hom. 10,1; Ex. hom. 12,2). The meeting must generate unity: separate conversations, discrimination, and personal likes and dislikes should be avoided. Origen reproves the older faithful who look down on new converts (Comm. in Mt. XV, 26). Various texts report exhortations to not disturb liturgical meetings with chatter or other noise during the preaching, as, e.g., Origen: "Why do I bother about those who are absent? Even you who are present here in church are not attentive, but usually engage in mundane chitchat" (Gen. hom. 10,1). Sometimes when a large number were present, the preacher's voice could not be heard well, and the crowd would gather around him, standing. Applause was not uncommon when the listeners were pleased. On some occasions the popular consensus was also manifested by popular *acclamations. In some cases, although only in the first part of the *liturgy, pagans attended, as for instance we see in Augustine's discourse recently discovered by Dolbeau (Dolbeau 25: NBA 35/2, 566ff.). In a coercive measure, the emperor *Licinius required a separation between men and women: men could not participate in liturgical assemblies with women (*Eusebius, Vita Constantini 1,53,1). Gradually, however, especially in the East, the assemblies themselves established a spatial separation between men and women. The arrangement of the various categories of Christians in the worship space is also ancient: *catechumens, fideles, *penitents, *widows and *virgins, clergy. However, the assembly knew no organized separation of social classes: in theory, all were fratres. On domenica in albis the newly baptized officially entered the community; says Augustine: "With today's solemn rite your departure from these transennae takes place, which, as spiritual children, separated you from the other faithful" (Sermo 260/C,7); "Those who have been baptized in Christ and regenerated, after the solemn celebration of the sacraments, must mingle with the rest of the people of God" (Sermo 224,1).

From the 4th c. on liturgical structures became fixed, and East and West diverged from each other. Church buildings multiplied, often modeled on civil basilicas. The forms and texts of the great liturgies were fixed. Feasts of martyrs and pilgrimages were now added to the earlier meetings. We can distinguish between sacramental assemblies (baptism and Eucharist), of which the eucharistic celebration was the summit and most perfect form, and nonsacramental assemblies, which were no less liturgical and required the presence of the hierarchy. These latter always included sacred reading, singing, and prayers of the people and celebrant.

*Egeria punctuated the stages of her pilgrimage with liturgical meetings in the churches she visited, in company with priests, where three elements always recurred: biblical reading, psalmody and prayer (Itin. Eger. 10,33; 14,4; 20,14; 24,4, etc.). A theology of assembly was born in which meeting was seen as "an epiphany of the church" (J. Hild). Each synaxis released an evangelical, apostolic and missionary power. It was the place of dialogue between Christ and the church, i.e., Christ's body, the "two in one flesh," as Augustine loved to say in the Enarrationes (In ps. 85 etc.). Every assembly had *eschatalogical significance, as already announced in the *Apocalypse, and a concept expressed moreover in the hymn Caelestis urbs Jerusalem. As architecture and iconography demonstrate, it anticipated in the obscurity of faith the church of the new *Jerusalem.

H. Chirat, L'assemblée chrétienne à l'âge apostolique, Paris 1949; G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, Westminster 2001 (¹1945); C. Vagaggini, La preghiera nella Bibbia e nella tradizione patristica e medievale, Rome 1964; L. Bouyer, La vie de la liturgie, Paris 1956; A. Hamman, La prière, 2 vols., Paris 1959-1964 (It. tr.); var. aus., L'assemblée liturgique, Rome 1977; C. Andresen, Ubi tres, ecclesia est, licet laici, in Mélanges Krause, Berlin-New York 1982, 103-121; N. Adkin, A Problem in the Early Church: Noise During Sermon and Lesson: Mnemosyne 38 (1985) 161-163; A. Monaci Castagno, Origene predicatore, Milan 1988; A. Olivar, La predicación cristiana antigua, Barcelona 1991; N. Duval, Architecture et liturgie: REAug 42 (1996) 111-157; Preacher and Audience: Studies in Early Christian and Byzantine Homilies, eds. M. Cunningham - P. Allen, Leiden 1998; N. Duval, Les relations entre l'Afrique et l'Espagne dans le domaine liturgique: existe-t-il une explication commune pour les "Contre-Absides" et "Contre-choeurs"?: RivAC 76 (2000) 429-476 (extensive critique of the volume: C. Godoy Fernández, Arqueología y liturgia. Iglesias hispánicas [ss. IV al VIII], Barcelona 1995); La Maison Dieu, nn. 20 (1949); 40 (1954); 57 and 60 (1959); 193 (1993); 194 (1994); 215 (1998); Storia del cristianesimo I, 414-462; Itin. Eger.: CCL 175, 37-90.

A. Hamman

ASSUMPTION. A technical term indicating the glorification of the Virgin *Mary, body and soul, in heaven at the end of her earthly life. For Catholics, the assumption became a Marian dogma with Pius XII's definition (1 November 1950). Between the Councils of *Nicaea and *Ephesus the death of the Virgin was spoken of as a natural event. Timothy the priest (*Leontius of Constantinople's pseudonym) in the 5th c. was the first to speak of Mary's nonmortality (Hom. in Simeonem et Annam). The idea must not have been unique, since the priest *Hesychius, who died after 451 (Hom. de S. Maria Deipara), and his contemporary *Chrysippus (Or. in S. Mariam Deiparam) seem to allude to it. *Epiphanius, a collector not only of *heresies but of otherwise impossible-to-find information, reviewed in detail the situation current in his time in informed ecclesiastical circles: no one knew how Mary's earthly life ended (Haer., 78,24). This idea remained unchanged until the 6th c., after which date one notes the coupling of the empty tomb and the assumption into heaven of Mary's glorified body in some homilies, esp. *Byzantine. The *apocrypha had also stressed the importance of the correlation "empty tomb—assumption of Mary," elaborating certain facts transmitted only by them and proceeding to significant connections. The Transitus Mariae of ps.-Melito 17,1 (recension B) links Mary's resurrection to her virginity, in line with a current already found in the 2nd c. in the assumptionist prototype of Leucius, a disciple of *John the Evangelist against whom ps.-Melito argued in the 4th-5th c. The prototype exists in an *Ethiopian text titled Book of Exequies, and reflects a *Jewish Christian community of exemplary *orthodoxy, in line with the NT data. The text documents and verifies what theologians in the 1950s called the "subterranean historical tradition" of the assumption that seemed to come to an end at the beginning of the 3rd c. It presents the end of Mary's earthly life in the light of the paschal mystery, on the lines of the gospel. Its salient moments are Mary's death, understood as the separation of soul from body, the immediate glorification of her soul, the burial of her body at Gethsemane, the assumption and reanimation of her body in paradise and her participation in the glory of the Son, seated at his right hand.

Epiphanius, Panarion 78,24 (PG 42, 737); Timothy, Hom. in Sim. et Annam: PG 86, 1237-1252; Hesychius, Hom. de S. Maria Deip.: PG 93, 1464-1465; Chrysippus, Or. in S. Mariam Deip.: PO 19, 336-343; De Transitu Mariae Apocrypha Aethiopice: CSCO vols. 342-343; Erbetta I, 2, 407-649 (with bibl.); M. Jugie, La mort et l'Assomption de la S. Vierge, Étude historico-doctrinale: ST 114 (1944); B. Bagatti, Le origini della "tomba della Vergine" a Getsemani: RivBib 11 (1963) 38-52; Id., Le due redazioni del "Transitus Mariae": Marianum 32 (1970) 277-287; Id., Nuove scoperte alla tomba della Vergine a Getsemani: Lib. Annuus 22 (1972) 236-290; Id., Ricerche sulle tradizioni della morte della Vergine: Sac. Dottr. 18 (1973) 185-214; Id., La morte della Vergine nel testo di Leucio: Marianum 36 (1974) 456-459; Id., Ricerche sull'iconografia della Koimesis o Dormitio Mariae: Lib. Annuus 25 (1975) 225-253; Id., La morte e la sepoltura di Maria secondo i nuovi dati, in Acts VIII Conv. Bibl. Franc. It. Assisi 1977, 261-265; L. Cignelli, Il prototipo giudeo-cristiano degli apocrifi assunzionisti, in Studia Hier. in onore di P.B. Bagatti, Jerusalem 1975, 259-277; F. Manns, Le récit de la dormition de Marie (Vatican gr., 1982), Contribution à l'étude des origines de l'exégèse chrétienne (Franciscan Coll. Maior 33), Jerusalem 1989; S.C. Mimouni, Dormition et Assumption de Marie. Histoire des traditions anciennes (Théol. Hist. 098), Paris 1995.

E. Peretto

ASTERIUS of Amasea (bishop 378/395–400/431). Little is known of his life: young at the time of *Julian the Apostate, he was the pupil of a Scythian slave at *Antioch. Dependent literarily on the *Cappadocians, he also displays Antiochene influence. His surviving works (at least 16 homilies) are of good quality; his encomium of St. *Euphemia of *Chalcedon is noteworthy. Little inclined to dogmatic or exegetical speculation, most of his homilies are festive or moral. Manuscript tradition sometimes mixes him up with *Asterius the Sophist, occasionally with *Gregory of Nyssa. An encomium of St. *Basil of Caesarea (BHG 240) also goes under his name, but its authenticity is disputed.

CPG 3260-3265; PG 40, 164-389; BS 2, 514-516; Bardenhewer 3,

228-230; C. Datema, Asterius of Amasea, Homilies I-XIV: Text, Introduction and Notes, Leiden 1970; A. Bretz, Studien und Texte zu Asterius von Amasea (= TU 40,1), Leipzig 1914; E. Skard, Asterios von Amaseia und Asterios der Sophist: SO 20 (1940) 86-132; W. Speyer, Die Euphemia-Rede des Asterios von Amaseia. Eine Missionsschrift für gebildete Heiden: JbAC 14 (1971) 39-47; G.J.M. Bartelink, Textkritisches zur sechsten Homilie des Asterius von Amasea: Glotta 53 (1975) 242-244; C. Datema, Les homélies XV et XVI d'Astérius d'Amasée: SE 23 (1978-79) 63-93; M. Veronese, L'esegesi di Asterio di Amasea, in Origene e l'alessandrinismo cappadoce (III-IV secolo). Acts del V Convegno del Gruppo Italiano di ricerca su "Origene e la tradizione alessandrina" (Bari, 20-22 September 2000), eds. M. Girardi - M. Marin, Bari 2002, 299-331.

S.J. Voicu

ASTERIUS of Ansedunum. Bishop of Ansedunum (4th-5th c.), he figures in ms. Veron. 93 as the author of a libellus, still unpublished, titled Liber seu epistula ad Renatum monachum de fugiendo monialium colloquio et visitatione. G. Morin has published a few fragments. The work denounces the abuses arising from the cohabitation of virgins with monks and priests. The MS calls Asterius a disciple of *Jerome. The current state of research does not allow the determination of Asterius's identity with certainty; he is otherwise unknown, as is Ansedunum.

CPL 642.

E. Prinzivalli

ASTERIUS of Arabia (*Petra) (d. after 362), saint (10 June). Took part in the Council of *Serdica (343), during which he broke with the (Eastern) *Arians and joined the (Western) *Nicenes. *Constantius exiled him to Upper *Libya; recalled in 362, he took part in the *Alexandrian synod convoked by *Athanasius and was asked to carry the synodal letter to *Antioch (Tomus ad Antiochenos). But his mission to reunite that church failed because of the arrival of *Lucifer of Cagliari.

Fliche-Martin, Storia della Chiesa, III, Turin [3]1972, 249-251; EC 2,218; Simonetti, 170, 187, 360, 372; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie, Rome 1996, passim.

A. De Nicola

ASTERIUS the Sophist (4th c.). Native of *Cappadocia, pupil of *Lucian of Antioch, he supported *Arius from the first: with Arius he was the major theoretician of first-generation Arianism. We know that he had *apostatized during *Diocletian's persecution, and his opponents often brought this up against him. We know little of his movements during the Arian controversy, however; we last see him at the Council of *Antioch of 341. The fact that we have some of his homilies has caused some to think that in his last years he was elected bishop (of an unknown see). He wrote two works on the controversy: a Syntagmation, a summary of Arian doctrine, and a somewhat later work, dated right after the Council of *Nicaea. *Athanasius preserves fragments of the former, *Marcellus of Ancyra of the latter; while the former presents Arian doctrine in its radical form typical of Arius before Nicaea, the latter offers a more attenuated *subordinationism: here the Son is defined as the image, without difference from the Father in divinity, substance and power—an expression little compatible with early Arianism. *Philostorgius (HE II, 15) rebukes Asterius for moderating his initial Arianism. *Jerome (Vir. ill. 94) mentions Asterius's commentaries on the psalms, the gospels and Romans. There was no trace of these works until Richard and Skard ascribed 31 homilies to Asterius, 29 of them on the psalms (not all of certain authenticity, however), and fragments of a commentary, also on the psalms. W. Kinzig attributes these exegetical works to another person called Asterius the Homilist, an author active in the late 4th and early 5th c. at Antioch or nearby. On the whole, the *exegesis is traditional in its *christological reading of the OT text and seems deliberately to avoid doctrinal investigation, apart from generically *orthodox expressions (Christ generated from the Father ante saecula, etc.), evidence of a certain detachment in the late Asterius from the issues of the Arian controversy.

Editions: CPG II, 2815-2819; Quasten II, 196-200; G. Bardy, Astérius le Sophiste: RHE 22 (1926) 221-272; W. Kinzig, Asterios Homilet: LTK[3] 1,1101; Id., Asterios, Sophist: LTK[3] 1, 1102; Oxford Dict. of the Christian Church (1997), 118; W. Kinzig, Asterius der Homilet: LACL (1998) 56-57; Id., Asterius der Sophist (von Kappadozien): ibid., 57-58. Edizioni e traduzioni: M. Vinzent (ed.), Asterius von Kappadokien. Die theologischen Fragmente: Einleitung, kritischer Text, Übersetzung und Kommentar, Leiden-New York-Cologne 1993; W. Kinzig (ed.), Asterius, Homilie 31 (Richard), Neuedition, Übersetzung, Kommentar: VChr 50 (1996) 401-415; Id. (ed.), Psalmenhomilien/Asterius: eingeleitet, übersetzt und kommentiert, Stuttgart 2000, 2 vols.

Studies: G. Bardy, Astérius le Sophiste: RHE 22 (1926) 221-272; S. Giversen, Liber Asterii and the New Testament: Studia Theologica 19 (1965) 47-54; J. Duplacy, L'Homélie II d'Astérius le Sophiste, homélie de l'Octave Pascale?: Muséon 86 (1973) 275-282; G. Gelsi, Kirche, Synagoge und Taufe in den Psalmenhomilien des Asterios Sophistes, Vienna 1978; M.P. Ciccarese, Un retore esegeta: Asterio il Sofista nell'om. 13 sul Salmo 7: ASE 2 (1985) 59-69; M.F. Wiles - R.C. Gregg, Asterius: A New Chapter in the History of Arianism?, in R.C. Gregg (ed.), Arianism: Historical and Theological Reassessments, Philadelphia 1985, 111-151; M.P. Ciccarese, La composizione del "corpus" asteriano sui Salmi: ASE 3 (1986) 7-42; W. Kinzig, Erbin Kirche: die Auslegung von Psalm 5,1 in den Psalmenhomilien des Asterius und in der Alten Kirche, Heidelberg 1990; Id., In Search of Asterius: Studies on the Authorship of the Homilies on the Psalms, Göttingen 1990; Id., Asterius Sophista oder Asterius Ignotus? Eine Antwort: VChr 45 (1991) 388-398; Id., Bemerkungen zur Psalmenexegese des Asterius, in J. van Oort - U. Wickert (eds.), Christliche Exegese zwischen Nicaea und Chalcedon, Kampen 1992, 104-131; M. Vinzent, Gottes Wesen, Logos, Weisheit u. Kraft bei Asterius und Markell von Ankyra: VChr 47 (1993) 170-191; Id., Die Gegner im Schreiben Markells von Ankyra an Julius von Rom: ZKG 105 (1994) 285-328; Id., Ps. Athanasius, Contra Arianos IV. Eine Schrift gegen Asterius, Leiden 1996.

M. Simonetti

ASTERIUS TURCIUS RUFUS (d. after 494). Roman patrician and a Christian (2nd half 5th c.). From 476–483 his name was inscribed on a seat of the Flavian amphitheater. He was comes, praefectus Urbi and consul in 494. An educated, expert and passionate man of letters, during the year of his consulate he collated a manuscript of Virgil's Eclogues, which he published 21 April that year. Asterius included some of his own verses in this edition, which he says he completed despite the distraction of organizing the consular ludi. Shortly later (perhaps still in 494) Asterius published Sedulius's Carmen Paschale (CSEL 10, VII: [libri] recolliti adunatique sunt a Tuscio Rufo Asterio . . . editore librorum). The Christian poet, in an epigram dedicated to Asterius, praises the editor's work, cuius ope et cura the five books of his Carmen edita sunt populis.

Sedulius, Carmen Paschale: CSEL 10 (ed. J. Huemer), VII and 307; PLRE 2, Cambridge 1980 (J.R. Martindale), 173, Asterius 11; PCBE 2 (dir. C. Pietri and L. Pietri), L'Italie chrétienne (313-604), Rome 1999, 210, Asterius 13.

M. Spinelli

ASTROLOGY. Discipline which presumes to deduce foreknowledge of human destiny from observation of the movements and relative positions of the heavenly bodies. The concept of the divine nature of the celestial bodies, which gives astrology a specifically religious connotation, can be traced to the *Mesopotamian world and its notion of the relationship between some important divinities and the stars. In Greece it assumed a scientific character by the use of astronomical calculations using arithmetic and geometry. But the essence of astrology remains the certainty of the influence exercised on cosmic and human life by the heavenly bodies, in which divine personalities and wills operate. Besides *Mesopotamia ("Chaldean" astrology), astrology flourished in *Egypt, giving rise to a rich literature during the *Hellenistic period under the names of Nechepsos and Petosiris, or attributed to the revelation of the god Thoth, identified with the Greek *Hermes, called Trismegistus. The notion of the divinity of the celestial bodies is present in ancient Pythagorean circles and was formalized in the Epinomis, a late work of *Plato or of his disciple Philip of Opus. Prominent among authors of astrological works in Greek and Latin were Ptolemy (Tetrabiblos) and Manilius (Astronomicon). Many sources indicate the importance that astrologers and mathematicians had assumed in the Roman Empire in the first centuries AD. Many went to them to consult their "horoscope," i.e., a knowledge of the astral combinations which governed the person's life.

Christian writers sharply opposed and criticized the idea of astral influences determining human destiny—which was often expressed as a genuine fatalism—and the use of divination and *magic to know this destiny. *Tatian's Address to the Greeks argued fiercely against astral fatalism, which he saw as the most characteristic expression of the devil's dominion over humanity. *Ignatius of Antioch (Ep. ad Eph. 19) and later *Tertullian (De idol. 9) interpreted the gospel episode of the *magi to mean that, with the birth of Jesus, astrology had been defeated. Even the *gnostic Valentinians asserted that, with the new economy inaugurated by the Savior, destiny and the astral powers had lost all efficacy (Exc. Theod. 68-79). Yet despite the Fathers' polemic against astrological and divinatory practices, these penetrated even Christian circles. Their considerable spread among the more popular classes led to the intervention of the imperial authorities, who issued several decrees condemning such practices.

A. Bouché-Leclercq, L'Astrologie grecque, Paris 1899; F. Cumont, Astrology and Religion among the Greeks and the Romans, New York 1912; A.J. Festugière, La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, I. L'Astrologie et les sciences occultes, Paris [3]1950; R. Caballero (ed.), Homo Mathematicus. Actas del Congreso Internacional sobre astrólogos griegos y romanos (Benalmádena, 8-10 de octubre de 2001), Málaga 2002. The new magazine "MHNH. Revista Internacional de Investigación sobre Magia y Astrología Antiguas" (Málaga), vols. 1-3 (2000-2003), offers an updated overview of research on the theme of astrology; var. aus., Les Pères et l'astrologie, coll. Les Pères dans la foi, Paris 2003.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

ASYLUM, Right of. The concept of asylum (from the Greek ἄσυλος, "inviolable") as a recognized place of refuge in case of need derives both from a system of values and from religion. It implies the right of immunity for a refugee pursued for a crime by the authorities, receiving and protecting the person in a sacred place; it was this special quality of the place that guaranteed the safety of the one who took advantage of it. For this special quality to be respected by the civil or military authorities, however, it had to be accepted in conscience by all involved, and hence its transgression involved consequences of various kinds, as, e.g., the fear of committing sacrilege because of the sacredness of the place. The term asylum (asylon) was traditional among *pagans and was used by the pagan historian *Zosimus; it was used very rarely by Christians, who preferred the expression ad ecclesiam confugere or others like it (DACL 4,1556; ad domum ipsius fidei confugerant [Aug., Ep. 1,3: Divjak]; adiutorium in ipsa domo fidei requirebant (Aug., Ep. 250,1). Among the Jews (temple; city of refuge), Greeks, Egyptians and Romans some sanctuaries enjoyed the right of refuge, but there were also other ways to obtain protection: kneeling before certain persons, altars or deities, or before the emperor's statue. In this last case the sacredness and protection derived from the statue, which represented the emperor's majesty. *Tacitus speaks of a woman who had an image of *Tiberius in her hand and could thus engage in insults against a Roman senator; nothing was done to intervene for fear of committing sacrilege against the emperor (Annales 3,36). Only with *Theodosius was asylum at statues recognized, with the concession of 10 days of immunity; the practice was abolished by *Justinian (CTh 9,44,1 of 386: CI 1,25,1).

Closely connected with asylum was the practice of intercessio, which consisted in an intervention with the authorities by the bishops on behalf of someone in difficulty (as distinct from a simple recommendation, which also occurred frequently); this was born out of the Christian concept of forgiveness, in view of the reformation of the guilty party. Intercessio and asylum were different practices but were often connected; in fact, asylum normally included an intercessio with the authorities on behalf of the refugee.

The first known case of asylum among Christians is that of Felix of Cirta (Numidia), who, pursued by the imperial authorities for having written a libello against the emperor *Maxentius, took refuge with Bishop *Mensurius (before 312; see Y. Duval); the second is that of *Martin of Tours, ca. 326 (Sulpicius, Vita Martini 2,1-3). The Council of *Serdica of 343, which speaks of asylum in a church, in the same can. 7 also addresses intercessio, seeking to regulate the practice: "It happens often that certain people who merit mercy take refuge in a church; they have been condemned for their crimes, either to imprisonment or to confinement on an island, or punished for some other reason; they should not be denied help, but pardon must be asked for these people with the civil authorities without delay or hesitation." A person who took refuge in a church might also be innocent, in which case the period of protection was useful for proving their innocence. The first official request we know goes back to the Council of *Carthage of 27 April 399, in which two bishops, Epigonius and Vincent, were entrusted with the task of going to court to obtain a law that no one would dare to remove someone who had taken refuge in a church (confugientibus ad ecclesiam) (Munier, Concilia Africae, CCL 149, Turnhout 1974, 194,393). The intervention of the Council of Serdica, which sought to regulate a de facto practice of taking refuge in churches (saepe contingit), means that the practice had already arisen, and the intention of the intervention was to oblige bishops to take the refugee's fate to heart. The church, which for Christians already had a sacred character as a place of Christian worship, was now acquiring a sacred character in the common mentality, a character that also had to be respected by the civil and military authorities. The text does not specify whether the refugees were Christians or pagans: all could have recourse to the practice. The sacred character of the buildings was recognized by the imperial authorities only in 395 (CTh 16,2,29; see 16,2,31). Legally churches could be violated, since there was no law protecting them, and they sometimes were violated: we know of too many such cases. Churches therefore did not offer an absolute guarantee (see *Ammianus 26,3,3: the charioteer Hilarinus, who took refuge ad ritus Christiani sacrarium, was taken and decapitated; Ammianus 15,5: Silvanus the usurper, who took refuge in a church, was taken and killed). Generally the sources mention asylum to recount instances of its violation (*Stilicho, who had *Cresconius removed from a church). During the sack of *Rome of 410, *Alaric respected the right of asylum, even for pagans who had taken refuge in Roman churches (*Augustine, Civ. Dei 1,7; *Orosius 7,39,10). Augustine's insistence that taking refuge in a church was accepted and respected by both Romans and Barbarians indicates a change in mentality.

In 392 *Theodosius intervened on a number of occasions to limit intercessio and asylum. CTh 9,40,15 (13 March): he did not allow churchmen to impede the carrying out of sentences through appeal or removal of the condemned; CTh 11,36,31 (9 April): he did not allow intercessio by clergy for a condemned person or a confessed criminal; CTh 9,45,1 (18 October): public debtors were not allowed asylum in churches, nor could their debts be paid by bishops (the first law regulating the matter); CTh 9,45,2 (17 June 397): Jews were prohibited from feigning conversions so as to claim asylum; CTh

9,45,3 (27 June 398): slaves and debtors were deprived of the right of asylum, nor could their debts be paid by the church; CTh 9,45,2 (17 June 397): through *Eutropius's influence asylum was not granted for the crime of lese majesty, which could be understood broadly (see 9,14,3,2 of 4 September 397). Eutropius himself took refuge in a church a year later, and *John Chrysostom's intervention did not prevent his death. The first formal recognition of asylum in churches was in 419 (Sirmondiana 13). An allusion to this law can be found in Augustine (Ep. 22,3: Divjak, 420), who observes that, on the whole, it could only be used by a few: "So it happens that we, at most, can do very little to help and defend those who take refuge in a church." The right was regulated in more detail with the law of 23 March 431 (CTh 9,45,1) and that of 432 (CTh 9,45,5). The Codex Theodosianus reports only a passage from the law of 431, while other sources preserve it entirely (Mansi 5,437-445). Sometimes the limits within which asylum was effective were marked around the church (see DACL 4,1555f.). The Council of *Orange of 441 created some norms regarding asylum in churches (can. 5 and 6); in the East the emperor *Leo intervened (CI 1,12,6 of 466). At Constantinople *Justinian constituted a board to evaluate the situations of those who sought asylum in St. Sophia (slaves, debtors, those accused of homicide).

L. Wenger, Asylrecht: RAC 1,836-844; A.D. Manfredini, "Ad ecclesiam confugere," "ad statuas conferre," nell'età di Teodosio I: AARC 6 (1986) 39-58; G. Freyburger, Le droit d'asile à Rome: Les études class. 60 (1992) 139-151; A. Ducloux, Ad ecclesiam confugere. Naissance du droit d'asile dans les églises (IVe-milieu du Ve s.), Paris 1994; Y. Duval, Les Gesta apud Zenonophilum et la "paix de Maxence" (Gesta f 22b): Antiquité Tardive 3 (1995) 55-63; M. Dreher, Das Asyl in der Antike von seinen griechischen Ursprüngen bis zur christlichen Spätantike: Tyche 11 (1996) 79-96; K.J. Rigsby, Asylia. Territorial Inviolability in the Hellenistic World, Berkeley, CA 1997; R. Gamau, Ad statuam licet confugere. Untersuchungen zum Asylrecht im römischen Prinzipat, Frankfurt 1999 (see IURA 50 [1999] 251-265); L. Giordano, Gregorio Magno e il diritto di asilo: VetChr 37 (2000) 391-406; G. Görisch, Kirchenasyl und staatliches Recht, Berlin 2000; T. Baccini, Una nuova Bulla del Collegio degli Ekklesiekdikoi di S. Sofia: Byzantion 71 (2001) 263-266.

A. Di Berardino

ATARAXIA. *Plato clearly alluded to ataraxia in speaking of the confusion produced in the *soul by the *body (Fed. 66a and 66d, where the two terms ταράττειν and ταραχή appear) and of the consequent necessity for the philosopher who wants to contemplate *truth to distance himself from the body (Fed. 66a). With ἀπάθεια, with which it has much in common, ataraxia was the supreme ethical ideal of ancient *Stoicism (see, e.g., SVF III 449). *Aristotle similarly combined ataraxia with control of the passions (Eth. Nic. IV, 1125b 33-34: βούλεται γὰρ ὁ πρᾶος ἀτάραχος εἶναι καὶ μὴ ἄγεσθαι ὑπὸ τοῦ πάθους—"for the gentle person desires to be ἀτάραχος [at peace] and not to be led by his passions"). Epicurus also thought highly of ataraxia: see, e.g., Usener fr. 191 (cited by *Marcus Aurelius, In semetipsum IX 41,1) and Usener fr. 519 (cited by Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 24,10). The term, with the corresponding adjective ἀτάραχος, was revived by Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. In book II, discourse 2—titled περὶ ἀταραξίας (Schenkl 107-110)—Epictetus identifies ataraxia with the interior freedom of the philosopher, which no external event can destroy (Socrates is the living example of this); and the same concept is found in Marcus Aurelius, In semetipsum IX, 31 (Schenkl 116,25-26). The two terms ἀπάθεια and ἀταραξία are mentioned together in Epictetus, Diss. III 15,12 (250, 13-14), see Ench. 29,7 (Schenkl 444,33) and Diss. III 26, 13 (Schenkl 309,10); the two adjectives ἀπαθής and ἀτάραχος appear together in Diss. II 8,23 (126,25) and II 17,31 (163,8-9). Marcus Aurelius says that one who has no need of the external world is also ἀτάρακτος or ἀτάραχος (In semetipsum IV, 24 [38,23], IV, 37 [42, 10-11], VII, 16 [80,11-14]). *Clement of Alexandria also considers ataraxia as the end to which human ethics tends: in Paed. II 58,3 (Stählin I 192, 15-16) he relates it to the words εἰρήνη σοι of 3 Jn 15; in Strom. VI, 24,10 (II 441, 22) he cites with approval Epicurus's phrase δικαιοσύνης καρπὸς μέγιστος ἀταραξία ("the fruit of righteousness is great ἀταραξία [inner peace]") (Usener fr. 519); and in Strom. IV, 55,4 (II 273,31–274, 1), like Epictetus, he mentions together ἀπάθεια and ἀταραξία. *Origen celebrates ataraxia as one of the requirements of the *martyr (Exhort. ad martyr. IV [Koetschau 5,25–6,1]). *Plotinus shows that he knows the Stoic doctrine that makes right living consist in ataraxia (Enn. I, 4, 1 [I 80,28]).

M. Pohlenz, Die Stoa, Göttingen 1959, I, 331; II, 163 (It. tr. Florence 1967); Enciclopedia Filosofica I, Florence 1967, 557; M. Giusta, I logografi di etica, Turin 1967; Stoici antichi. Tutti i frammenti, ed. R. Radice, Milan 1998 (see index).

S. Lilla

ATARBIUS (d. ca. 381). Bishop of *Neocaesarea in *Pontus from 368 (death of Musonis) to ca. 381. He delegated the lector Cyril to the Council of *Constantinople. A relative of *Basil the Great, he opposed him, condemning his *monastic and *liturgical innovations, and followed a *trinitarian line closer to that of *Marcellus of Ancyra. He boasted of his loyalty to the tradition of *Gregory Thaumaturgus. Basil's Ep. 54, 204, 207, 210-211, among others, concern this tension, which sheds considerable light on the ecclesiastical politics of the time. J. Daniélou sought to clarify this in RecSR 54 (1968) 61-66.

R. Pouchet, Basile le Grand et son univers d'amis d'après sa correspondance: une stratégie de communion, Rome 1992.

J. Gribomont

ATHANASIUS GAMMAL (d. 630/631). *Jacobite patriarch from 594/595 to 630/631 and a native of Samosata. Athanasius was a *monk of a *monastery at Qennesre. As patriarch he chose to live at the convent of Mar Zakai, near Callinicum. In 616 at Ennaton, he was reconciled with the sister *monophysite church in *Egypt. In 630 he took part, at the head of a group of a dozen bishops, in unsuccessful theological discussions with the emperor *Heraclius at Mabbug/Hierapolis; the emperor then appointed a *monothelite bishop of *Antioch. Michael the Syrian cites some of his letters; he also wrote a Life of Severus of Antioch, entirely preserved in Ethiopic. A certain Daniel, described as bishop of Aleppo or of *Edessa, wrote his life, under patriarch Theodore (649–667) at the earliest. If this was Daniel of Aleppo, he should perhaps be identified with a Daniel ordained by patriarch Cyriac (793–817). Unfortunately the text of the Berlin MS is incomplete; the Life summarized by Michael the Syrian may be inspired by it.

Baumstark 185-186; E. Sachau, Verzeichnis der syrischen Handschriften der Königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin, Berlin 1899, 523-524; Michel le Syrien, Chronicon, ed. Chabot, Paris 1900, 388.

M. van Esbroeck

ATHANASIUS of Alexandria (295/300–373).
I. Biography and most important works - II. Thought.

Athanasius of *Alexandria imposes himself on the civil and religious history of the 4th c. as both an emblematic and a problematic figure in the relationship between church and empire, in the development of the structures of Egyptian Christianity, which despite divisions reached full maturity under him, in the strategic battles among opposing groups of bishops and between Christian communities of different ideological orientation, and in the evolution of theological thought.

I. Biography and most important works. Athanasius was elected bishop of Alexandria 8 June 329, a little over a year after the death of his predecessor *Alexander (17 April 328), in a situation of acute ecclesial tension. The condemnation of *Arianism at the Council of *Nicaea (325) did nothing to resolve the doctrinal conflict: one of Arius's most avid supporters, *Eusebius of Nicomedia—destined to assume the leadership of the anti-Nicene and anti-Athanasian front—had returned from exile and was free to act. Nor did the *Meletian *schism find in the Nicene canons a solution to its institutional problems. The attempts at reconciliation under Alexander had not brought the desired results, so much so that a third, if not half, of the Meletian bishops on the list given by Meletius to Alexander had broken the reconciliation. The election of Athanasius appeared problematic to every ancient source that mentions it. Designated by Alexander, who valued his abilities in dialectic, according to the synodal of the Egyptian bishops of 338, Athanasius was elected too young (under 30) and through a surprise move that according to other sources he himself organized. Athanasius was instantly a divisive figure who sharpened the ecclesial crises that seemed to have been subsiding. From the events of this disputed election one can see the hard-line approach adopted by the Alexandrian church toward the Meletian church: the subordination, prescribed by the Council of Nicaea, of the Meletian bishop to the Alexandrian bishop of the same diocese, in the eyes of Alexander's church necessarily led to the logical consequence that the Meletian church had no right to participate in the election of the bishop of Alexandria; it seems probable that it was Athanasius who promoted this strategy. Athanasius's attitude throughout the following years leads to the conclusion that he lived the investiture received from Alexander as though it were an expression of the divine will, the transmission of a long theological and ecclesial tradition, that of the "fathers," incarnated in the succession of the bishops of the metropolis, which Athanasius understood in a completely unilateral way.

After the election, while the situation of conflict with the Meletian church continued to deteriorate, Athanasius began his numerous visits to inland *Egypt to strengthen the church he had inherited from Alexander. His first trip (330) was to the *Thebaid, a region in which the Meletian schism had spread with greater success; its purpose was to strengthen the bishops and *monasteries of the area against this danger, as in fact a not-insignificant portion of the monastic world had followed the schism, and some fringe groups had relations with Arianism. The trip to the *Pentapolis of 332 was mainly anti-

Arian in motivation. *Constantine's letter to Athanasius should probably be dated 330/331: the letter threatened to remove him from Alexandria if he did not accept those who wished to enter the church (Rev. Sec. 64). The letter was an expression of the policy of pacification that Constantine was pursuing after the council, aimed at removing sources of conflict and marginalizing extremists. The letter was preceded by the protests of a Meletian delegation to the emperor, to which Athanasius had already responded in a letter to the emperor, defending himself. In late 331 Constantine moved from threats to action, summoning Athanasius to Psamathia, near *Nicomedia, to respond to some rather serious accusations by the Meletian bishops: Athanasius allegedly had forced the Egyptians to provide the church with linen tunics (imposition of the provision of clothing was considered licit only by the army) and had corrupted an imperial official. Upon Athanasius's arrival, the Meletian delegation raised again the question of the validity of his election and accused one of Athanasius's clergy, *Macarius, of breaking the eucharistic *chalice of Ischiras, priest of Mareotis and a follower of *Colluthus, a schismatic stripped of priestly dignity by a council of the Alexandrian church prior to the Council of Nicaea. Ischiras had continued to celebrate the *Eucharist despite the judgment of condemnation on his head and for this was denounced to Athanasius, who sent one of his best priests, Macarius, to resolve the question, probably violently. Athanasius defended himself successfully, and the emperor sent him back to Alexandria. Faithful to his iron-fisted policy, he took advantage of the brief peace to force Ischiras to denounce the Meletian bishops who had led him to make accusations against Athanasius and to request in writing communion with the Alexandrian church.

The most spectacular accusation against Athanasius, however, in the 2nd half of 332, was that of having *Arsenius, bishop of Hypselis, killed—an accusation presented by no less than the new leader of the Meletians, *John Arkaph. Probably because of his sympathy for the Meletians, Bishop Arsenius had been the target of violence on the part of Plusianus of Lycopolis, a Nicene father, fervent anti-Meletian and the Catholic bishop in Meletius's episcopal see, a region where the conflict between the two churches had a particularly high profile and where uncertain or sympathetic positions like Arsenius's could not be tolerated. Having escaped from the house in which Plusianus had imprisoned him, Arsenius disappeared without a trace and was believed to be dead: from this the suspicion arose that Athanasius himself must have been responsible for the death, supported by someone's circulation of the hand from a cadaver, claiming that it was Arsenius's. Athanasius, helped by some deacons, succeeded not only in finding out who had hidden the bishop but also in capturing Arsenius himself, alive. This earned Athanasius not only a new and more fervent letter of support from Constantine—disgusted with the behavior of the Meletians and of John Arkaph—but also a public apology from the latter. In the meantime Athanasius had Ischira, who had again gone over to the Meletians, arrested and tried for charges of lese majesty, for which the expriest was imprisoned.

Shortly before *Easter 334, Athanasius received from Constantine the call to a council to be held in *Caesarea of Palestine: the council was probably desired by Eusebius of Nicomedia and his pressure group, and Athanasius refused to attend. This refusal was thrown in Athanasius's face during the Council of *Tyre and surely diminished his favor with Constantine, precisely at the moment when the emperor was beginning to work out the idea of making the celebration of his tricennalia a symbol of the peace in the church. All modern historians, even those less sympathetic to Athanasius, consider the Council of Tyre to have been a partisan council (335), the basic purpose of which was to condemn and depose a bishop who had the double defect of being a strict adherent to Nicaea and of exercising power, with a considerable sense of his authority, over a vast ecclesiastical region (he had 100 dioceses under him). The state of confusion and violent reaction of the party linked to Athanasius against the Meletian clergy on the eve of the Synod of Tyre is shown by a papyrus note, P. Lond. VI 1914. Athanasius was to depart for Tyre on 11 July 335, accompanied by 48 bishops, some ex-Meletians among them, all of them nonetheless refused seats at the council. The acts of the council, which was composed largely of bishops close to Eusebius of Nicomedia, have not reached us but are summarized by *Sozomen. The accusations by the Meletians have already been noted: Ischiras's broken chalice and the violence to which the priest had been subjected after retracting the contents of the letter of repentance extorted from him by Athanasius; the expulsion and imprisonment of many Meletian bishops; and Athanasius's irregular election, protracting the schism. Athanasius responded by attacking his accusers, and his defense must have seemed particularly impassioned and convincing, since the council decided to send a delegation to Mareotis to better investigate the question of Ischiras. But the delegation, returning to Tyre in early September, brought an unfavorable report concerning Athanasius: the bishops proceeded to his condemnation (he was probably present at the session) and deposition, while the Meletian clergy—including Ischiras, who would shortly become a bishop in Mareotis—were restored to their functions. The participants of the council then left for *Jerusalem, where they celebrated the feast of the dedication of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which Constantine had wanted to be celebrated in peace. For this reason he requested of the bishops present the restoration of Arius, whose doctrine seemed orthodox to him; the bishops ratified the request, but Arius died shortly thereafter. In the meantime Athanasius went to *Constantinople, intending to ask Constantine for a review of his trial: after weeks of waiting, when Constantine reentered the city on horseback on 30 October 335, Athanasius presented himself to the emperor, demanding justice and asking to be judged by the bishops of Tyre in the emperor's presence. This bold act resulted in an imperial letter to the bishops who had participated at the Council of Tyre, calling for a convocation to review the terms of the condemnation. But in the meantime (6 November) a group of Eusebian bishops arrived from Jerusalem, bringing with them the acts of the Synod of Tyre with the report on the investigation in Mareotis. Confronted with a judgment of condemnation with all the formalities in order, Constantine had no choice but to exile Athanasius to *Trier (7 November) in *Gaul, near his son Constantine. Athanasius added that the Eusebians had formulated a new accusation rather than dealing with the one that, according to him, was the basic issue at the Council of Tyre, i.e., that he had claimed that he was able to prevent the supply of grain from Alexandria from reaching Constantinople, an action which could bring the death penalty. The question of whether the episode actually occurred, or whether it was defensive propaganda on the part of Athanasius, is not easily resolved. In the meantime the emperor also exiled John Arkaph, in line with his policy of eliminating the extremists of the two parties to the conflict. Moreover, he did not replace Athanasius on the see of Alexandria, waiting for the time when the animosity between the parties would cool.

We lack even approximate dates for Athanasius's early literary production. This is true esp. for the most demanding theological work of his young phase, the double-apology Contra gentes—De incarnatione Verbi, which has been attributed to the most diverse stages of Athanasius's career. Festal Letter X for Easter 338 helps us to restrict the period of time during which the double theological treatise could have been written, since it contains significant theological parallels with the treatise; but it also includes, for the first time, an explicit anti-Arian polemic, which is absent from the double-apology, which must therefore precede 338. The dependence on some works of Eusebius, whose ideas are partially corrected, and a general and implicit anti-Arian theological position lead to ruling out the period before Arius's first condemnation. The reference to the lack of books in Contra gentes 1 may fit well with Athanasius's time at Trier, but this interpretation is not unanimous among scholars, for whom the most likely date for the work's composition runs from the Council of Nicaea to the exile in Trier. With Festal Letter X, written upon his return from exile in Trier, begins a long period of anti-Arian works by Athanasius, whose Discourses Against the Arians I-II were his most demanding work.

Constantine's death on 22 May 337 signaled an at-least-temporary turn in Athanasius's fortunes. The bishop does not cite the formal act with which the emperor's successors decided upon his return but prefers to present a letter of *Constantine II addressed to the church of Alexandria. In it are clear indications of Athanasius's version of the facts, made known to Constantine II by the Nicene bishop *Maximinus of Trier, who had become Athanasius's friend: indeed, the emperor declares that his father had exiled the bishop to save him from his enemies (the Eusebians) and that it had been his firm intention to restore him to the see of Alexandria. By now it is clear that Athanasius's defensive and propagandistic approach had succeeded in penetrating imperial circles. Receiving word of the end of his exile, the bishop did not return to Alexandria by the most direct route, but took a wide swing through the East, a move that would later be denounced by the Eastern bishops meeting at *Serdica (343). In fact, after the Council of Tyre, Athanasius meant to reestablish friendships in the East and in some way help those who had been removed: *Lucius was reinstalled at Andrinopolis, *Marcellus at Ancyra and *Asclepas at Gaza. The return trip was also extremely important politically. The face of the empire changed radically with Constantine's death: it was subdivided among his three sons, Constantine and *Constans for the western part, *Constantius for the eastern part. Athanasius met with Constantius at Viminacium during the summer of 337 and in *Cappadocia shortly later, either before or after his return to his metropolis. One of the problems addressed with Constantius must have been the ordination of Pistus, a priest who had been condemned as an Arian, as bishop of Alexandria by Bishop Secundus of Ptolemais: the Eusebians, meeting in the winter of 337–338, had also recognized Pistus as the legitimate bishop of Alexandria, informing Pope *Julius of this. During the succeeding years, their campaign became ever more intense. Letters were sent to the emperors in which Athanasius was accused not only of the illegitimacy of his reentry to Alexandria, which had been accompanied by violence and uprisings, but also of having sold, for his own gain, the grain set aside for the *widows of Egypt and Libya—a capital crime, as Athanasius himself insisted more than once during 338–339. It should be noted that this accusation grew out of the situation of conflict between Athanasius's followers and the Arians: the latter—esp. Bishops Secundus of Ptolemais and Theonas of Marmarica, who had recovered their sees after 335—had a claim to a part of this grain which Athanasius, upon his return, may have refused to the Arian dioceses in the name of *orthodoxy.

The council of the whole Egyptian church organized by Athanasius during 338, in which the *monk *Anthony may have participated, responded to these attacks with an encyclical, asserting the invalidity of Pistus's election (though he was not mentioned by name) and appending a series of documents favoring Athanasius. Thanks to this letter and the competence of the Egyptian Catholic delegation entrusted with presenting it to Julius of Rome, the pope promised Athanasius that he would convoke a council to rule justly on the matter. The reaction of the Eusebians, however, was immediate. Exploiting Constantius's presence at Antioch because of the war against the Persians, and forming a sort of permanent council around him, the Eusebians, reiterating the accusations of a few months earlier and the condemnation of Tyre, abandoned Pistus and elected a new bishop, Gregory of Cappadocia, who, shortly afterward, was imposed on Alexandria by public force in a climate of violence and intimidation, referred to ominously by Athanasius in his Encyclical epistle. After a month of resistance during Easter 339, Athanasius left Alexandria for Rome.

Meanwhile, under the harsh government of Gregory of Cappadocia, aided by the prefect Philagrius, the situation of the pro-Athanasian Egyptian church was collapsing: many Egyptian clergy had to leave, and the exiles were replaced. Athanasius's stay in Rome was an opportunity for forming new alliances and establishing important cultural and social contacts, such as those with Marcellus of Ancyra and with Roman aristocratic circles. The council called by Julius (winter 340–341 or spring-summer 341) released him from the condemnation of the Council of Tyre; it also released Marcellus of Ancyra, though he still had a condemnation for *heresy hanging over him, very different from the charge against Athanasius. The Eusebians, whose contact with Julius during the years leading up to these events went beyond merely correspondence, had apparently been defeated on the Western front, whereas in the East their power was strengthened. During this phase Athanasius wrote the Discourses Against the Arians I-II, which were enriched by the dossier of the Arian Asterius perhaps thanks to Marcellus, who had written a work against the brilliant theologian.

In the East, however, the situation was not going well for Athanasius. The Council of *Antioch of 341, organized by Eusebius of Nicomedia—who had been promoted to bishop of Constantinople with Constantius's full support—drew together and strengthened the Eastern bishops, and not just the Arians and Eusebians. At this point the theological discussion was reopened and deepened, to the point of producing or inspiring the production of three creeds, with a fourth added a year later. The second in particular was put forth as the official one: its silence on the Nicene Creed and the technical terminology that characterized it, its insistence on the theology of the three hypostases, and its condemnation of the radical aspects of Arianism, but also of the *Sabellianism that many saw reawakened in Marcellus of Ancyra, make it an important document, capable of winning the consensus not only of moderate Arians but also of vast sectors of the Eastern non-Arian episcopate of Origenian cultural tendency. The council also proudly reiterated its authority over its own territory, claiming to no longer tolerate external interference: this was an unequivocal reference to the Roman council organized by Julius, which had interfered in taking up the defense of two Eastern bishops, Athanasius and Marcellus. Eusebius of Nicomedia died a few months after the council, the great leader of the front of Eastern bishops opposed to Athanasius.

An event of exceptional importance during Athanasius's Roman exile was the Council of Serdica of 343, which displayed the first symptoms among the Mediterranean bishops of the division between West and East that was destined to occur centuries later. The council, desired by Constans as part of his pressure on Constantius, was an enormous failure, in that the two delegations, Western and Eastern, that were supposed to meet in the council, not only did not meet but also launched reciprocal *excommunications. The Western delegation again took up the defense of Athanasius and Marcellus of Ancyra and their reinstatement in their churches. An extremely archaic creed, confessing only one hypostasis, was circulated during the council's sessions. Athanasius rejected it in 362, when he saw that it, having become the standard-bearer for the followers of *Eustathius of Antioch, prevented useful dialogue with the followers of Meletius of Antioch.

Gregory's death on 26 June 345 attenuated the hostility toward Athanasius on the part of Constantius, who yielded to Constans's pressure to restore the exiled bishops. Athanasius was called by Constans to Trier. Then, perhaps passing through *Aquileia, he returned to Rome, where Julius gave him a letter inviting him to resume the see of Alexandria. Having been invited more than once by letter to meet Constantius himself, he finally met him at Antioch. Constantius reestablished all the privileges of the clergy linked to Athanasius and sent a letter to the Christians of Alexandria, exhorting them to live in peace. On his return, Athanasius passed through *Syria, *Phoenicia and *Palestine. At *Laodicea he met and entered into communion with the priest *Apollinaris. At Jerusalem he was accepted by bishop Maximus, who organized a council supporting him. Finally, he was welcomed triumphantly at Alexandria, 21 October 346. Athanasius's fortunes seem to have reached their peak, with over four hundred Mediterranean bishops in communion with him. Shortly he would receive the letter of repentance of *Ursacius and *Valens, Illyrian Arian bishops who had been his enemies. This apparently peaceful situation would not last: his traditional opponents and especially the imperial power would destabilize even this period at Alexandria which had begun so triumphantly.

While ecclesiastical events seemed to again assume an unfavorable tendency for Athanasius, his theological production was very active. After 338, as we saw, he began writing a wide-ranging treatise, which, after various additions and at a date unknown to us, would take the form of the Discourses Against the Arians I-II. The Roman years may have been an opportune time for his gradually producing this work, perhaps in more than one draft. The composition of the Discourse Against the Arians III could also be attributed to the years after his return in 346. The work shows differences from the first two: it treats different themes, such as the concept of the will of the Father and the gospel verses that present a suffering, thirsty, hungry Christ (exploited by the Arians to diminish the divinity of the Logos), but in particular the pars construens of the *trinitarian and *christological discourse is decidedly more emphasized. Another work composed after the return, The Decrees of the Council of Nicaea, proposes for the first time a deeper reflection on the ecumenical council's creed, in particular on the term homoousios:* this was a genuine relaunching, in grand style, of an expression that for many years had been abandoned in the reflection of Western theologians and that of Athanasius himself, and was destined from this point to have significant repercussions on the course of the Arian crisis. Various dates have been proposed for the work, from 347 to 357. Besides doctrinal clarification, Athanasius's purpose was to move the debate from his personal problem of a bishop deposed by a council (Tyre in 335) to the theological problem: in fact, the bishops who objected that homoousios was not scriptural coincided in large part with the circles that considered his presence at Alexandria illegitimate. Profoundly related to this work stylistically, lexically and thematically is the brief work titled The Opinion of Dionysius, written against those who held that *Dionysius of Alexandria's thought was closer to Arian thought than to the Nicene homoousios.

Constans died 18 January 350, assassinated by Magnentius's rebels. On 28 September 351 Constantius defeated Magnentius at Mursia, the city of the Illyrian Arian bishop *Valens, who had foreseen the emperor's victory. With Constantius now the sole emperor, the Eusebians had the opportunity to resume hostilities against Athanasius, in line with the imperial will of reestablishing the religious unity of the empire. Some 30 bishops met in early 350 at Antioch and ruled that Athanasius be replaced by the Arian *George of Cappadocia. A letter to this end was sent to Pope Julius before April 352: the accusation against Athanasius was of criminal lese majesty and treason, for having provoked the discord between Constans and Constantius and for having had relations with the usurper Magnentius. But Julius died 12 April 352. He was succeeded by *Liberius, who in the summer of 353 called a council at Rome to respond to the Eastern bishops' letter. The pope invited Athanasius to attend in person but, given the new political situation resulting from Constans's death, Athanasius thought it better to remain at Alexandria and sent a synodal letter signed by 80 Egyptian bishops, in which he defended himself from the accusations. It has been proposed that the Second Apology Against the Arians is that synodal letter. The polemical work's genesis can be found in Athanasius's reaction to the pressure he had lived under since a few years after his return from the second exile. In the letter he collects further testimonies in his favor, beyond those attached to the synodal letter of 338. Among the many testimonials is the retractatio, sent to him in 347 by *Paulinus of Trier, of his two historical enemies, the Illyrian bishops *Ursacius and Valens: this became, in the general plan of the work, the focal point on which he built his defense. Despite its relatively limited historical value, the retractatio played an indispensable role in Athanasius's purpose, that of hiding the fact that no council of Eastern bishops had ever reopened the discussion of the condemnation of Tyre.

Athanasius still thought he could defend himself before Constantius, who was at *Milan, and sent a delegation of bishops to him, without success. It was clear by then that Constantius had decided to apply against Athanasius the condemnation of the Council of Tyre and of the later Eastern councils. The imperial official Montanus carried a letter of the emperor to Athanasius, inviting him to present himself at court, probably at *Arles, where the emperor planned to celebrate his tricennalia on 8 November 353. But Athanasius refused, realizing that to leave Alexandria meant to leave an opening for George of Cappadocia. At Arles Constantius forced a succession of Gallic bishops to condemn Athanasius. Liberius, following the failure of the additional legates sent to Arles, asked Constantius to convene a more representative council, which was held at Milan in 355. Contrary to the pope's intention, it was used by Constantius to have Athanasius condemned by the largest number of bishops possible. The council closed by exiling *Eusebius of Vercelli, *Dionysius of Milan and *Lucifer of Cagliari, but also with the capitulation of a large number of Western bishops. Nothing remained for the emperor but to carry out Athanasius's condemnation by removing him from Alexandria. Things proved to be far from easy for the notary Diogenes, who was charged with the difficult task. Despite various attempts over a period of months, the imperial official had to leave the city without result. It was probably during this period, as the situation was coming to a head, that Athanasius wrote the Apology to Constantius, defending himself from the accusations that had dogged him since the Council of Tyre, and especially against a series of new charges of lese majesty, compromising relations with the usurper Magnentius, and the unauthorized building of churches. After the notary Diogenes's departure, the situation came to a head on 6 January 356, when the dux Syrianus entered Alexandria with troops; on 8 February he attacked the Church of Theonas, though without finding Athanasius, who had probably been warned. It was in this context that Athanasius wrote the Epistle to the Bishops of Egypt and Libya, probably during the summer of 356: in it Athanasius offers a summary of the anti-Arian polemic of the Discourses Against the Arians and exhorts the bishops not to sign any profession of faith different from that of Nicaea, the only valid profession of faith. Also written in this phase of the beginning of exile was the Life of Anthony, in which Athanasius indicates the ideal model of the monk and the Christian, dedicated to *asceticism and *orthodoxy in faith. At this point Athanasius lived for some years as a fugitive between Alexandria and the Egyptian desert.

This period saw important events from an ecclesiastical and theological point of view. The small council held at *Sirmium in 357 by Valens, Ursacius and *Germinius, the three Illyrian bishops favored by Constantius, proposed a creed which manifested an openness to the proposals of Arianism that had never been seen in Eastern creeds since 341. During the same period, radical Arianism was born with the theologians *Aetius and *Eunomius. The most important success attained by the pro-Arian bishops was the condemnation of Athanasius by the exiled *Liberius and the stepping down of *Ossius of Cordoba. Nevertheless, the united front of the Eastern episcopate began to show large cracks. Some of the bishops, who had gradually detached themselves doctrinally from pro-Arian tendencies in two councils, Ancyra and Sirmium (358), bitterly criticized the formula of the Council of Sirmium of 357. This current, though maintaining a suspicious attitude toward the Nicene Creed and the homoousios, proposed the concept of likeness according to substance, strongly emphasizing this by using a new technical term, homoiousios*. In this context Constantius decided to gather a great council—in two different sessions, one for the Westerners and one for the Easterners—capable of reestablishing religious peace, on the model of Constantine's council at Nicaea. It was anticipated by a small council at Sirmium in May 359, also desired by Constantius and charged with creating a formula on which the largest possible number of bishops could agree: the resulting formula contained the generic expression "alike in everything" (homoios kata panta). The two councils of *Rimini and *Seleucia of 359, confirmed by that of Constantinople of 360, went according to the desires of Constantius and those of Bishop *Acacius of Caesarea, by now the emperor's favorite, against the Western homoousian majority and the Eastern homoiousian group. Shortly later, however, Constantius's death brought an unexpected turn of events.

These were very important years in Athanasius's apologetic and theological production, during which he showed some openness to other trinitarian formulations. If in the bitter, acerbic History of the Arians we find a rereading of the events of the period 335–357 in the light of the break with Constantius—supporter of Arianism and by now judged to be the antichrist—in The Synods of Rimini in Italy and Seleucia in Isauria Athanasius, despite harsh criticism of the many Eastern creeds he reports, gives indications that he understands the new developments that had taken place within the until-then largely unified Eastern episcopate. He thus sought to draw near to the theological positions of the *homoiousians—despite the fact that they held the theology of the three hypostases—and especially to those of *Basil of Ancyra. Moreover, with the Epistles to Serapion I-IV, Athanasius began a deeper reflection on the *Holy Spirit, the first of a certain weight since *Origen, and a reflection he would repropose in all of his trinitarian works from then on. It grew out of a dogmatic concern, posed by *Serapion of Thmuis to Athanasius when the latter was in the desert: in some circles that accepted the Nicene Creed, full divinity was denied the Holy Spirit, with the risk of making him a creature, created ex nihilo.

After Constantius's death (3 November 361), followed immediately by the lynching (24 December 361) of the Arian bishop of Alexandria, George of Cappadocia, by a mob that included pagans, Athanasius returned from his third exile on 21 February 362, thanks to a decree of *Julian. At Alexandria he organized the famous council of 362, in which he discussed with the bishops faithful to him and two non-Egyptian representatives, *Asterius of Arabia and Eusebius of Vercelli, the problem of clergy who had gone over to Arianism. Adopting moderate disciplinary measures—a sign of the need to reunite a church strongly divided after the persecutions—he tried, through the writing and sending of the Tome to the Antiochenes, to propose a solution to the divisions afflicting the Christian community of Antioch. That city's bishop, *Meletius, future president of the Council of Constantinople (381)—with theological positions close to the homoiousians' and exiled for having taken a position against Arianism—had gathered around himself a strong consensus. But there were two other communities present in the metropolis: the Arian community and that of the heirs of Eustathius of Antioch, headed by the priest *Paulinus, anchored in the Nicene Creed and closed to any theological dialogue with those who held the theology of the three hypostases. Athanasius, however, was by then able to see the possible orthodoxy of that theology, and said so openly in his writings. He also discouraged the Eustathians' use of the Western formula of Serdica, while simultaneously inviting Meletius's followers to join with Paulinus. Paulinus's irregular ordination as bishop of Antioch by Lucifer of Cagliari, however, meant the defeat of the plan for doctrinal reconciliation, since Athanasius was unable to fit it into an adequate ecclesiastical policy.

Athanasius was exiled for the fourth time at Julian's orders, between late 362 and the first months of 363. He learned of the emperor's death (26 June 363) only at the end of August, while still in exile in S Egypt. With *Jovian proclaimed emperor, Athanasius left on 6 September to meet him at Hierapolis, obtaining from him recognition as the legitimate bishop of Alexandria. The protests of the Arians of Alexandria, led by Lucian, did nothing to alter the emperor's decision. In October or November of 363, Meletius of Antioch, also back from exile, presented to the emperor Jovian a text approved by a large number of Eastern bishops, among them some of Athanasius's old enemies such as Acacius, which contained the Nicene Creed with a doctrinal clarification concerning the homoousios: the distinguishing term of the Nicene Creed, in addition to being mentioned and accepted, was clarified with the concept of "likeness according to substance [ousia]." But the most serious episode of Athanasius's trip to Antioch was his failed attempt at communion with Meletius, perhaps due to the latter's diffidence regarding Paulinus's irregular ordination as bishop a few months earlier, but also due to his ambition to become the new leader of the Eastern anti-Arian bishops. This event, truly traumatic for Athanasius, radically changed his way of seeing Eastern ecclesiastical matters and fixed his negative attitude toward Meletius until his death. The pleas of *Basil of Caesarea for a reconciliation between those he considered to be the champions of anti-Arian orthodoxy had no effect. Athanasius was by now on the margins of the doctrinal controversy. In fact, in a letter addressed to Jovian, which also contained the Nicene Creed, Athanasius implicitly took a position against the exegesis of that creed given in the council organized by Meletius.

The edict of exile against those bishops who had originally been exiled by Constantius, but were later allowed to return to their sees by Julian, was issued at Valens's initiative on 5 May 365. On the night of 5 October, Athanasius was forced to flee to a villa in the Alexandrian suburbs. He reentered Alexandria in February 366, also by Valens's order. While in the East the situation of the anti-Arian clergy, in particular Meletius of Antioch, remained critical for many years, this last return to Alexandria concluded Athanasius's exiles: from then on he was left in peace by the imperial authorities and gave himself to the construction of a new church. Lucian's attempt to conquer the episcopal throne in 367 met with a humiliating defeat. In this context Athanasius, after his silence following the Antiochene events of 363 to which he had succumbed, again took up his literary activity with some significant works, though of uncertain date. In Festal Letter 39 for Easter 367, Athanasius proposed the canon of Scripture for the Alexandrian church. In the Epistle to the African Bishops (368/371), he once again stressed the importance of the Nicene Creed and its sufficiency as the basic foundation of orthodox faith, while his trinitarian language no longer showed the openness of certain chapters of The Synods or the Tome to the Antiochenes to the theology of the three hypostases; he returns to basing himself on more traditional and customary trinitarian expressions. The work, which knows of *Damasus's election as pope, is interested primarily in events in the West, in particular the presence at Milan of a pro-Arian bishop like *Auxentius (successor of the exiled *Dionysius), who according to Athanasius must be deposed as soon as possible. Finally, in the Epistle to Epictetus, Athanasius takes a position regarding certain extreme conclusions of the Christology of his friend Apollinaris, whom he does not mention by name.

II. Thought. Athanasius essentially subscribed to the Alexandrian theological tradition, though he altered it radically in trinitarian matters with the abandonment of the doctrine of the three hypostases; in anthropological, exegetical and spiritual matters, however, he elaborated the tradition, adapting it to the times. The depiction of the original man that we read in his youthful double-apology Contra gentes—De incarnatione Verbi still has echoes of the Origenian anthropological perspective, despite its lack of the doctrine of the preexistence of the noes. With time this depiction would undergo considerable changes, due to a greater consideration of the effects of the *incarnation on the believer's interiority and on humanity in general, and to the deepening of some themes, such as that of the adoption of human beings as children of God, and, already with the Discourses Against the Arians, that of the role of the Holy Spirit.

The distinctive trait of Athanasius's representation of God is its strong *soteriological emphasis, which prevails to such a degree as to profoundly influence the christological and trinitarian discourse. Starting from the double-apology Contra gentes—De incarnatione Verbi, for Athanasius the saving act par excellence—that without which there would be no salvation for humankind—is the incarnation (enanthrōpēsis) of the Logos: his assumption of a body, his offering of himself as an instrument (organon) by which the person created according to the image (kat' eikona) is not only restored but also profoundly renewed and recreated through union with the incarnate Logos. For salvation to occur, it was necessary that God's Logos possess the essential trait of divinity, a consequence of his real sonship with respect to God the Father. If this dimension were removed from the Logos, he could not effect in human beings—weighed down by sin, corruption and death—the effects of incorruptibility, immortality, divinization and the renewed consciousness of God which are the chief elements of salvation. There is thus an unbreakable binomial in Athanasian thought that remains substantially unchanged, even if its forms and lexicon evolve according to the new historical situations and the theological debate that marked the long course of the bishop's literary production: the salvation of historical humanity, immersed in sin and in the kingdom of death, could derive only from a perfectly divine being, the Logos, Son of the Father, and from his assumption of a real body, perfectly alike in this to all of humanity. Human beings, following the fall and its consequent sentence of death—pronounced because of human orientation to the disordered movements of the soul and to the passions of the body, which now turn them in on themselves—are no longer capable of knowing God, of contemplating him in creation or of grasping him through the words of the prophets. The Logos, assuming a body, appears to them as a man, with a body like their own that falls immediately under their senses; before their eyes he conquers sin, corruptibility and death, precisely in the body; he is at the same time the image (eikōn) of the Father, through which humanity can once again know God. The effects of immortality, incorruptibility, impassibility, knowledge and divinization, assumed by the human being with the incarnation, do not however translate into a change in nature; in Athanasius, much more than in Origen, the profound gulf that separates human beings, in their condition as creatures, from God and from his Logos remains firm. Moreover, for Athanasius there is no *theology without the incarnation (which is its epistemological basis), or the sensible image of the incarnate Logos, or his manifold acts, or the evidence of his death on the cross and resurrection, or the gospel accounts. These latter are the depiction of events which contain in themselves, in clear form, the truths about God and especially about the Logos who reveals the Father: his human and divine dimensions, his body and the divinity that transcends the limits of a creature destined to return to nothing.

However, Athanasius's terminology stressing the divine unity, esp. in the three Discourses Against the Arians, is not balanced by terminology highlighting the distinction of persons. This doesn't make of him a theologian who favors the trinitarian formulations of Eustathius of Antioch or Marcellus of Ancyra. With respect to the latter, in particular, Athanasius is distinguished by the decisive weight he gives to the idea of the eternal generation of the Son from the Father prior to the incarnation. Moreover, in The Synods and in the Tome to the Antiochenes he draws near to conceptions typical of the theology of the three hypostases, which of course are part of his own cultural background, but he does not accept the most technical and distinctive formulations, considering them to be compromised with Arianism. Indeed, precisely in these works, as also earlier in The Decrees of the Council of Nicaea, Athanasius insists on the use of the term homoousios—not understood in the sense of numerical unity but in that of the derivation of the Son from the Father's substance—as the sign of the orthodox faith of Nicaea and a bulwark against the Arian heresy.

As we have already had occasion to emphasize, Athanasius's works present problems of dating and of attribution. The most well-known regards the authenticity of the Discourses Against the Arians III, contested by C. Kannengiesser based on real differences in vocabulary, style and argumentation (although not properly in theology) with respect to the Discourses I-II. Nevertheless, as has been proposed by Strutwolf, these differences could be due to the fact that Athanasius, at the point when he passed from the pars destruens of his anti-Arian discourse (Discourses I-II) to the pars construens (Discourse III), depends on Eusebius, esp. on his Proof of the Gospel and Ecclesiastical Theology: in constructing a positive theology, opposed to Arianism but also aware of the Sabellian character of certain propositions of Marcellus of Ancyra, Athanasius drew on the vocabulary and conceptions of Eusebius, establishing with them a subtle dialectic of acceptance and criticism. The authenticity of the Epistle to the African Bishops has also recently been defended with good historical and theological arguments.

In recent decades research on Athanasius has focused on his pastoral, ascetical and spiritual writings. His works on virginity and the festal letters, i.e., the messages sent annually to all the Egyptian dioceses to announce the time of Easter, but which also contained a rich antiheretical and antischismatic catechesis, show a bishop interested in a variety of problems and themes: the lifestyles of the Christian communities (monasticism and married life), the cult of the *martyrs, the canon of Scripture, the sins of ordinary believers, the value of human sexuality, irregular ordinations, the proper celebration of Easter, the meaning of *fasting, the promise of eternal life.

A still-open problem in the research is that of the relationship between Athanasius and Origen. Despite studies dedicated to individual passages or works, the whole of Athanasius's work has yet to be explored from this perspective. This could lead to a more precise perception of continuity and discontinuity on many levels—exegesis, anthropology, but also that of the representation of the divine.

Bibliographies: Ch. Butterweck, Athanasius von Alexandrien: Bibliographie (Abhandlungen der Nordrhein-Westfälische Akademie der Wissenschaften, 90), Opladen 1995; A. Camplani - G.M. Vian, La ricerca italiana su Atanasio e sugli scritti pseudoatanasiani: Adamantius 4 (1998) 34-48; J. Leemans, Thirteen Years of Athanasius Research (1985-1998): A Survey and Bibliography: Sacris Erudiri 39 (2000) 105-217; A. Camplani, Studi atanasiani: gli Athanasius Werke, le ricerche sulla Thalia e nuovi sussidi bibliografici: Adamantius 7 (2001) 115-131; A. Camplani - A. Jakab - M. Maritano - L. Perrone - S. Tampellini - C. Zamagni, Pubblicazioni recenti su Origene e la tradizione alessandrina: Adamantius, from 1995.

Lexicon: G. Müller, Lexicon Athanasianum, Berlin 1952.

Collected works: PG 25-28, Paris 1884-1887; Athanasius Werke, I, Erster Teil: Die dogmatischen Schriften, hrsg. von der Patristischen Arbeitsstelle Bochum der Nordrhein-Westfälischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, unter der Leitung von M. Tetz. 1. Lieferung: Epistula ad episcopos Aegypti et Libyae, vorbereitet von K. Metzler, besorgt von D.U. Hansen und K. Savvidis, Berlin-New York 1996; 2. Lieferung: Orationes I et II contra Arianos, vorbereitet von K. Metzler, revidiert und besorgt von K. Savvidis, Berlin-New York 1998; 3. Lieferung: Oratio III contra Arianos, vorbereitet von K. Metzler, revidiert und besorgt von K. Savvidis, Berlin-New York 2000; Athanasius Werke, II. Hg. im Auftrage der Kirchenväter-Kommission der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften von H.-G. Opitz, Berlin 1934-1941; Bd. 2: Die Apologien; P.P. Joannou, Discipline générale antique (IV-IX s.) vol. 2: Les canons des Pères grecs, Grottaferrata-Rome 1963 (Letter to Amun; Letter to Rufinianus); Ecclesiae Occidentalis Monumenta Iuris Antiquissima, ed. C.H. Turner, Oxford 1899, 654-662 (epistle of the Council of Serdica).

Editions of individual works and philological commentaries: Sancti Athanasii Archiepiscopi Alexandriae Contra gentes, introd., critical text, tr. and ed. by L. Leone, Naples 1965; Athanasius: Contra Gentes and De Incarnatione, tr. and ed. by R.W. Thomson, Oxford 1971; Athanase d'Alexandrie. Sur l'incarnation du Verbe, tr. and ed. by C. Kannengiesser (SC 199), Paris 1973; Athanase d'Alexandrie. Apologie à l'Empereur Constance. Apologie pour sa fuite, tr. and ed. by J.-M. Szymusiak (SC 56) Paris 1958; Athanase d'Alexandrie. Vie d'Antoine, tr. and ed. by G.J.M. Bartelink (SC 400), Paris 1994; Athanasius von Alexandrien. De Sententia Dionysii, Einleitung, Übersetzung und Kommentar von U. Heil (Patristische Texte und Studien 52), Berlin-New York 1999; Athanasius von Alexandrien. Epistula ad Afros. Einleitung, Kommentar und Übersetzung von A. von Stockhausen (Patristische Texte und Studien 56), Berlin-New York 2002; G. de Jerphanion, La vraie teneur d'un texte de saint Athanase rétablie par l'épigraphie: L'Epistula ad Monachos: RecSR 20 (1930) 529-544; W. Cureton, The Festal Letters of Athanasius, London 1848; R. Lorenz, Der zehnte Osterfestbrief des Athanasius von Alexandrien, Berlin-New York 1986; L.T. Lefort, S. Athanase. Lettres festales et pastorales en copte (CSCO 150-151), Louvain 1965; R.- G. Coquin - E. Lucchesi, Un complément au corpus copte des Lettres festales d'Athanase (Paris, B.N., Copte 176): Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica 13 (1982) 137-142; R.-G. Coquin, Les Lettres Festales d'Athanase (CPG 2102). Un nouveau complément: le manuscrit IFAO, Copte 25 (Planche X): Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica 15 (1984) 133-158; E. Lucchesi, Un nouveau complément aux Lettres festales d'Athanase: Analecta Bollandiana 119 (2001) 255-260; A. Camplani, Atanasio e Eusebio tra Alessandria e Antiochia (362-363): osservazioni sul Tomus at Antiochenos, *l'*Epistula catholica e due fogli copti (edizione di Pap. Berol. 11948), in Eusebio di Vercelli e il suo tempo, eds. E. dal Covolo - R. Uglione - G.M. Vian (Biblioteca di Scienze Religiose 133), Rome 1997, 191-246; G.M. Vian, Testi inediti dal commento ai Salmi di Atanasio (SEA 14), Rome 1974. On Athanasius's life, the edition of the following two texts is fundamental: Histoire "acéphale" et Index syriaque des Lettres Festales d'Athanase d'Alexandrie, ed. A. Martin - M. Albert (SC 317), Paris 1985. For the versions of Athanasius's works in other languages and for the fragments, see CPG.

Studies on the tradition of some works: H.-G. Opitz, Untersuchungen zur Überlieferung der Schriften des Athanasius (AKG, 23), Berlin-Leipzig 1935; A. Camplani, Le lettere festali di Atanasio di Alessandria. Studio storico-critico, Rome 1989; K. Metzler, Kontamination in der Athanasius-Überlieferung: Revue des Études Byzantines 48 (1990) 213-232; K. Metzler - F. Simon, Ariana et Athanasiana. Studien zur Überlieferung und zu philologischen Problemen der Werke des Athanasius von Alexandrien (Abhandlungen der Rheinisch-Westfälischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 83), Opladen 1991.

Recent presentations of the historical figure of Athanasius: D.W.H. Arnold, The Early Episcopal Career of Athanasius of Alexandria, Notre Dame, IN 1991; L.W. Barnard, Studies in Athanasius' Apologia Secunda (European University Studies, Series XXIII, Theology, 467), Bern-Frankfurt 1992; T.D. Barnes, Athanasius and Constantius: Theology and Politics in the Constantinian Empire, Cambridge, MA - London 1993; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVᵉ siècle (328-373) (Collection de l'École Française de Rome 216), Rome 1996.

Recent general introductions to the bishop and his thought: Politique et théologie chez Athanase d'Alexandrie, ed. C. Kannengiesser (Théologie historique 27), Paris 1974; M. Tetz, Athanasius von Alexandrien: TRE 4 (1978) 333-349; K. Anatolios, Athanasius: The Coherence of his Thought, London-New York 1998; A.-L. Pettersen, Athanasius (Outstanding Christian Thinkers), London 1995.

Anthropology, asceticism and spirituality: P. Merendino, Paschale Sacramentum. Eine Untersuchung über die Osterkatechese des hl. Athanasius von Alexandrien in ihrer Beziehung zu den frühchristlichen exegetisch-theologischen Überlieferungen, Münster 1965; J. Roldanus, Le Christ et l'homme dans la théologie d'Athanase d'Alexandrie. Étude de la conjonction de sa conception de l'homme avec sa Christologie, Leiden 1968; G. C. Stead, "The Freedom of the Will and the Arian Controversy," in Platonism und Christentum, Festschrift für Heinrich Dörrie, ed. H.-D. Blume - F. Mann (JbAC.E. 10), Münster 1983, 245-257; D. Brakke, Athanasius and the Politics of Ascetism, Oxford 1995; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie: l'Église d'Égypte et les moines: à propos de la Vie d'Antoine: RSR 71 (1997) 171-188; D. Brakke, "Outside the Places, within the Truth": Athanasius of Alexandria and the Localization of the Holy, in Pilgrimage and Holy Space in Late Antique Egypt, ed. D. Frankfurter (Religions in Graeco-Roman World 134), Leiden-Boston-Cologne 1998, 445-481; Id., Jewish Flesh and Christian Spirit in Athanasius of Alexandria: JECS 9 (2001) 453-481; N. Kwok-kit Ng, The Spirituality of Athanasius: A Key for Proper Understanding of This Important Church Father (European University Studies. Series XXIII: Theology, 733), Bern u.a. 2001; A. Camplani (intro. and tr.), Atanasio di Alessandria, Lettere festali. Anonimo, indice delle lettere festali (Letture cristiane del primo millennio, 34), Milan 2003.

Trinitarian theology: A. Laminsky, Der Heilige Geist als Geist Christi und Geist der Gläubigen. Der Beitrag des Athanasius von Alexandrien zur Formulierung des Trinitärischen Dogmas im vierten Jahrhundert, Leipzig 1969; M. Tetz, Über nikänische Orthodoxie. Der sog. Tomus ad Antiochenos des Athanasius von Alexandrien: ZNTW 66 (1975) 194-222; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo (SEA 11), Rome 1975; G. C. Stead, Divine Substance, Oxford 1977; C. Kannengiesser, Athanase d'Alexandrie évêque et écrivain. Une lecture des traités Contre les ariens (Théologie Historique 70), Paris 1983; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy 318–381, Edinburgh 1988; C. Kannengiesser, Le Verbe de Dieu selon Athanase d'Alexandrie ("Jésus et Jésus-Christ" 45), Tournai 1990; P. Widdicombe, The Fatherhood of God from Origen to Athanasius, Oxford 1993; H. Strutwolf, Die Trinitätstheologie und Christologie des Euseb von Caesarea. Eine dogmengeschichtliche Untersuchung seiner Platonismusrezeption und Wirkungsgeschichte, Göttingen 1999; X. Morales, La théologie trinitaire d'Athanase d'Alexandrie, École pratique des Hautes Études, Sciences Religieuses (thèse), Paris 2002.

Exegesis: G.M. Vian, Il "De Psalmorum Titulis": l'esegesi di Atanasio tra Eusebio e Cirillo: Orpheus n.s. 12 (1991) 93-132; G. C. Stead, Athanasius als Exeget, in Christliche Exegese zwischen Nicaea und Chalcedon, eds. J. van Oort - U. Wickert, Kampen 1991, 174-184; J.D. Ernest, Athanasius of Alexandria: The Scope of Scripture in Polemical and Pastoral Context: VigChr 47 (1993) 341-362; C. Kannengiesser, Athanasius von Alexandrien als Exeget, in Stimuli. Exegese und ihre Hermeneutik in Antike und Christentum. Festschrift für Ernst Dassmann, eds. G. Schöllgen - C. Scholten (JbAC.E. 23), Münster 1996, 336-343; K. Metzler, Welchen Bibeltext benutzte Athanasius im Exil? Zur Herkunft der Bibelzitate in den Arianerreden im Vergleich zur Ep. ad Ep. Aeg. (Abhandlungen der Nordrhein-Westfälischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 96), Opladen 1997; P.F. Bouter, Athanasius van Alexandrië en zijn uitleg van de Psalmen. Een onderzoek naar de hermeneutiek en theologie van een psalmverklaring uit de vroege kerk, Zoetermeer 2001.

Athanasius and the Origenian tradition: A. Ferrari, *Il significato dell'apologia cristiana nel prologo dell'*Oratio contra Gentes di Atanasio di Alessandria: Annali di Scienze Religiose 1 (1996) 261-283; C. Kannegiesser, Das Vermächtnis des "fleissigen" Origenes zur Theologie des Athanasius, in Origeniana septima. Origenes in den Auseinandersetzungen des 4. Jahrhunderts, eds. W.A Bienert - U. Kühneweg, Louvain 1999, 173-184; K. Anatolios, Theology and Economy in Origen and Athanasius, in Origeniana septima. Origenes in den Auseinandersetzungen des 4. Jahrhunderts, eds. W.A Bienert - U. Kühneweg, Louvain 1999, 165-171; E. Prinzivalli, Magister ecclesiae. Il dibattito su Origene fra III e IV secolo (SEA 82), Rome 2002.

Questions of authenticity: G. C. Stead, Athanasius' Earliest Written Work: JTS 39 (1988) 76-91; D. Brakke, The Authenticity of the Ascetic Athanasiana: Orientalia 63 (1994) 17-56; C. Kannengiesser, Die Sonderstellung der dritten Arierrede des Athanasius: ZKG 106 (1995) 18-55; Athanasius: Die dritte Rede gegen die Arianer. I (Kapitel 1-25): Einleitung, Übersetzung und Kommentar; II (Kapitel 26-58): Übersetzung und Kommentar; III (Kapitel 59-67), Übersetzung und Kommentar und Theologiegeschichtlicher Ausblick von E.P. Meijering, Amsterdam 1996, 1997, 1998. See also "Trinitarian theology" and "Editions of individual works and philological commentaries."

A. Camplani

ATHANASIUS of Anazarbus (4th c.). This bishop of Anazarbus (Cilicia) supported *Arius from the first. He did not take part in the Council of Nicaea (325), perhaps having found a way to avoid it, but was obliged to subscribe to the homoousios. According to *Philostorgius he was later *Aetius's teacher. We have a few fragments from him, affirming the most radical theses of Arian doctrine.

CPG 2, 2060-2061; D. de Bruyne, Deux lettres inconnues de Theognius: ZNTW 27 (1908) 107-110; G. Bardy, Recherches sur s. Lucien d'Antioche et son école, Paris 1936, 204-210; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 41-43.

M. Simonetti

ATHANASIUS of Ancyra (d. 369/370). Succeeded *Basil in 360 as bishop of *Ancyra and leader of the *homoiousian party. Elected by the Council of *Constantinople and consecrated by *Acacius of Caesarea in *Palestine, his origins were suspect. He was represented at the Council of *Antioch (363) and took part in that of *Tyana (367). Nevertheless *Basil the Great tried to effect a reconciliation with him and with his father, a rhetor of some authority (Ep. 24-25); at his death (369, or soon after 370) Basil wrote a rather conventional eulogy of him (Ep. 29). *Gregory of Nyssa (C. Eun. I, 37) praises his love of truth and uses his testimony against Aetius.

J. Gribomont

ATHEISM, Accusation of. Accused of "atheism" in the Greco-Roman world were those who, for various reasons, refused to acknowledge the existence of the gods and their benevolent intervention in human life in this world and, behaving accordingly, assumed attitudes contrary to the common religious beliefs and refused to offer to the gods the prescribed worship. Given the deeply rooted public dimension of *pagan religion, the accusation of atheism meant, besides moral disapproval, an explicitly "political" censure that could lead to extreme punishments like exile or condemnation to death. Atheism was perhaps the most important result of the great scientific and spiritual revolution that took place in the Greek world in the 5th c. BC. The rejection of the traditional gods was affirmed as the logical consequence of Sophist political doctrines on the conventional character of religion and of the physical theories on the material nature of the heavenly bodies introduced by Anaxagoras. The law of Diopeithes the seer sought to check the spread of these dangerous innovations. Besides Socrates, who was condemned under the accusation of not acknowledging the city's gods, the most famous "atheists" of antiquity were Diagoras of Melos and Theodore of Cyrene (ample collection of sources ed. by M. Winiarczyk, Diagorae Melii et Theodori Cyrenaei reliquiae, Leipzig 1981). The Epicureans, who denied providence and were critical of the traditional cults, were likewise accused (*Lucian, Alexander or the False Prophet 25).

Lucian's text also attests that, besides the Epicureans, the accusation of "atheism" was leveled at the Christians during the mid-2nd c., and in fact this accusation was clearly documented for the first time during that period, in *Justin Martyr's Apol. (6,1; 76,1-2) and in the Mart. Polyc. (3,2 and 9,2). A few years later it reappears in the events of the *martyrs of *Lyons of 177 (Eus. HE V,1,9-10). *Tatian tells how, to the pagans, the Christians were "atheists to the highest degree" (Ad Graec. 27,1), and *Athenagoras devotes many chapters of his Presbeia Concerning the Christians (4-30) to arguing precisely against this accusation, which was in some sense much more serious than the other widespread accusations of cannibalism and *incest. The pagan Cecilius, portrayed by *Minucius Felix in Octavius (8,2), compares the atheism of the Christians to the well-known atheism of Diagoras of Melos and Theodore of Cyrene.

Jews were also categorized as "atheists," in the pagan meaning of the term, for their rigid *monotheism that rendered them misanthropic (thus Apollonius Molon according to Flavius Josephus, C. Apion II,15). Atheism and Jewish practices were the reason for Flavius Clement and Flavia *Domitilla's condemnation under *Domitian, according to Cassius Dio's account (LXVII,14,1-3). *Julian the emperor cites the wickedness of the Jews as the real source of the atheism of Christians (C. Gal. 43 B).

Still in the early 4th c., the accusation of atheism was an integral part of the polemical baggage used by pagans against Christians, as the convergent testimonies of *Eusebius of Caesarea (Praep. evang.

I,2,2) and *Arnobius of Sicca (Adv. nat. I,29; III,28; V,30; VI,27) show. Arnobius (Adv. nat. I,26,3) and Eusebius (Praep. evang. III,13,4) also refer to a similar accusation by pagans (*Porphyry certainly among them) against Christians, that of being "profane" (bebēloi), i.e., unitiated in the mysteries. For the *Neoplatonist *Iamblichus, their contemporary, "atheists"—among whom Christians were certainly numbered—deny the divinely inspired value of oracular divination and of *theurgy (De myst. III,31).

The Christian *apologists broadly rejected the accusation of atheism, not only by emphasizing the strictly monotheistic character of their faith but also by turning this accusation against their polytheistic opponents. In Christian parlance, in fact, the accusation of "atheism" was used to stigmatize the traditional "polytheism" that kept pagans from accepting the Christian revelation of the one true God. The Jewish *Philo of Alexandria had already defined Egyptian idolatry as atheism (Leg. ad Gaium 25; Post. Caini 2). Beginning with the letter to the Ephesians (2:12), the Christian tradition was unanimous in attributing all pagan religious and moral perversion to their atheism. According to *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. 2,4; 3,2-3 and 6-7), the Greek philosophers had taught the atheism that was the cause of the aberrant behavior of pagans. *Origen returns more than once to the paradoxical expression "atheist polytheism" or "polytheistic atheism" (see Exh. mart. 5 and 32; C. Cels. I,1; III,73). At the school of *Caesarea, where all Greek philosophers and poets were intensively studied, the writings of atheist philosophers who, like the Epicureans, denied providence, were rigorously excluded (see *Gregory Thaumaturgus, Thanksgiving to Origen 13). A special mention is due here to the contributions of Justin Martyr and *Clement of Alexandria. The former admits that the pagan accusation of atheism is valid only in the sense that Christians do not recognize the supposed gods of the traditional pantheon (Apol. 6,1), but adds that for Christians, since they worship the one true God, the accusation of atheism—which, like Socrates, led to their death—is unjust (Apol. 5,3-4). For Justin, all those who, like Socrates, Heraclitus and others, lived according to the logos are Christians in every respect, even if they were considered atheists by the pagans (Apol. 46,3). Their atheism was judged positively from a Christian perspective, since it arose from the reasoned rejection of polytheism.

This reevaluation of the atheism of the pagan philosophers, first proposed by Justin, was then taken up and developed by Clement of Alexandria (Protr. II,24,2). For him, the pagan philosophers who had denied the existence of the gods, while they had not grasped the *truth in its fullness, had at least the merit of suspecting the error of polytheistic belief. In this sense they were the precursors of the true religion, sent by God to enlighten the darkened spirits of the Greeks, just as the prophets were sent to the chosen people to prepare the way for the gospel.

A. von Harnack, Der Vorwurf des Atheismus in den drei ersten Jahrhunderten (TU 28, NF 13/4), Leipzig 1905; A.D. Simpson, Epicureans, Christians, Atheists in the Second Century: TPAPA 72 (1941) 372-381; W. Nestle, Atheismus: RAC I (1950) 866-870; E. Fascher, Der Vorwurf der Gottlosigkeit in der Auseinandersetzung bei Juden, Griechen und Christen, in O. Betz - M. Hengel - P. Schmidt (eds.), Abraham unser Vater. Juden und Christen im Gespräch über die Bibel. Festschrift für O. Michel (AGSU 5), Leiden-Cologne 1963, 78-105; N. Brox, Zum Vorwurf des Atheismus gegen die Alte Kirche: TTZ 75 (1966) 274-282; M. Winiarczyk, Wer galt im Altertum als Atheist?: Philologus 128 (1984) 157-183; M. Winiarczyk, Methodisches zum antiken Atheismus: RhM 133 (1990) 1-15; J.J. Walsh, On Christian Atheism: VChr 45 (1991) 255-277; P.F. Beatrice, L'accusation d'athéisme contre les Chrétiens, in M. Narcy - É. Rebillard (eds.), Hellénisme et Christianisme, Villeneuve d'Ascq 2004, 133-152 (with additional bibliography).

P.F. Beatrice

ATHENAGORAS. Between 176 and 180 he wrote a defense of the Christians, addressed to the emperors *Marcus Aurelius and *Commodus and titled Presbeia ("embassy, address, supplication") of Athenagoras, Christian philosopher in Athens, Concerning the Christians. All we know of Athenagoras is from the title: that he lived at *Athens and was a professional philosopher. The Presbeia may have been written on the occasion of the visit of the two emperors to Athens in September 176; in any event it is almost contemporary with the persecution at *Lyons in 177. There has recently been a great effort (B. Pouderon) to reevaluate, despite its chronological errors, Philip of Sides's information that Athenagoras had initially directed the didaskaleion of *Alexandria. Scholars are skeptical, but it cannot be entirely ruled out that Philip received a tradition that spoke of a period of teaching by Athenagoras at Alexandria, like those of *Justin Martyr and *Valentinus at Rome. In the Presbeia, Athenagoras refutes one after another the three classical accusations against the Christians: *atheism, *incest and the cannibalism of babies. The first charge is discussed much more fully and leads to an exposition of the *Trinity (ch. 10). Toward the end (ch. 37), Athenagoras announces a treatise On the Resurrection. And in fact, Paris. gr. 451, the oldest manuscript of the Presbeia, is followed by a work on the resurrection, whose title says that it is "by the same" author. The condition of the text and the style of the two works have led (R.M. Grant, W.R. Schoedel, N. Zeegers, E. Gallicet, H.E. Lona) to the hypothesis of a late copyist being responsible for the attribution to Athenagoras, and for their consequent combination in a single MS. Pouderon has argued incisively in favor of Athenagoras as the author, and his counterarguments seem solid. Less likely is his conjecture that Athenagoras specifically addressed his work to a *gnostic audience rather than a generally *pagan one. On the Resurrection is divided into two parts: the first refutes the usual objections regarding the impossibility, injustice and unworthiness of the resurrection of bodies, using exclusively "scientific" and rational arguments (the author does not consider scriptural arguments) in support of the concluding, fideistic argument that nothing is impossible with God. The second part argues positively that, since the human being is composed of *soul and *body, both parts are responsible for human choices and must be rewarded or punished together.

E. Schwartz, TU 4, 2, Leipzig 1891; W.L. Schoedel, Oxford 1972; B. Pouderon, SC 379, Paris 1992; R.M. Grant, Some Errors in the Legatio of Athenagoras: VChr 12 (1958) 145-146; L.W. Barnard, Athenagoras, Paris 1972 (with bibl.); T.D. Barnes, The Embassy of Athenagoras: JTS n.s. 26 (1975) 111-114 (on the title and date); P. Nautin, Note critique sur Athénagore, Legatio, 16,3: VChr 29 (1975) 271-275; M. Marcovich, On the Text of Athenagoras, De resurrectione: VChr 33 (1979) 375-382; B. Pouderon, L'authenticité du De resurrectione, in Id., D'Athènes à Alexandrie. Etudes sur Athénagore et les origines de la philosophie chrétienne, Québec 1997, 71-144 (with prior bibliography); N. Zeegers - V. Vorst, Adversaires et destinataires du De resurrectione attribué à Athénagore d'Athènes: Salesianum 57 (1995) 75-122; 199-250; 415-442; 611-656; Athenagorae qui fertur "De resurrectione mortuorum," ed. M. Marcovich, Leiden 2000.

P. Nautin - E. Prinzivalli

ATHENODORUS (3rd c.). Bishop in *Pontus, saint. Feast 18 October in the West, 7 November in the East. From *Eusebius of Caesarea we know that Athenodorus was at *Origen's school in *Caesarea for five years, with his older brother Theodore. Eusebius says that Theodore was the famous *Gregory Thaumaturgus: this identification, for a long time undisputed, is now called into question. The fact remains nonetheless that, according to Eusebius, Athenodorus and Theodore were elected bishops of Pontus while still young (HE VI,30; VII,14). With his brother, Athenodorus took part in the first synod against *Paul of Samosata (HE VII,28).

DHGE 5, 43-44.

E. Prinzivalli

ATHENS. The Christian community of Athens was founded by the apostle Paul (Acts 17:15-34) at a time when, after its destruction under Sulla (86 BC), Athens had entered a phase of reconstruction and rebirth (Broneer; Travlos, Πολεοδομική 93-94). Allied to *Rome—civitas libera et foederata—it expanded under *Hadrian and was enriched in the 2nd c. with new public buildings and villas. It kept up this splendor until 267, when it was destroyed by the Heruli (Travlos, 96-124). A city in the classical mold, it manifestly preserved its tendency to the old way of life. The heart of its social life was the Agora. Under *Hadrian and *Marcus Aurelius the philosophical schools of Athens were expanded and transformed into state institutions (Gregorovius, 54-57; Konstantinidis, 89-92 and 174-176). At Athens Christianity gained adherents from both upper and lower classes (*Dionysius the Areopagite; Damaris; Harnack, 560 and 593). According to tradition Dionysius the Areopagite was the first bishop (Eus., HE III 4,10 and IV 23,2: PG 20, 221 and 384; GCS II, 1,194 and 374). In the 2nd c. the Christian community was very strong, producing *apologists such as *Quadratus, *Aristides and *Athenagoras, and men active in other Christian communities such as popes *Anacletus (son of the philosopher Antiochus) and (probably) *Hyginus, *Clement of Alexandria and later perhaps Pope *Sixtus II. It was also one of the Christian communities persecuted under Marcus Aurelius (Eus., HE IV 26,10-11: PG 20, 396; GCS II, 1,386). In ca. 170 the church of Athens risked dissolving as a result of the *martyrdom of its bishop *Publius, but it recovered under his successor Quadratus (Eus., HE IV 23,3: PG 20, 384; GCS II 1,374; Max, 46-51; Harnack, 216 and 455). Before the mid-2nd c. *Gregory Thaumaturgus studied at Athens (Socr., HE VI 32: PG 57, 536), and *Origen wrote some of his works there (Eus., HE VI 23,4 and 32,2: PG 20, 576 and 592; GCS II,570 and 586). Origen praised the church of Athens for its firmness of faith and the peace that reigned in it (Orig., C. Cels. III, 30: PG 11, 957; GCS I, 227).

After the devastation of Athens by the Heruli, the habitable area decreased by 90 percent (Thompson, Athenian Twilight, 61-66; Travlos, 125-129). The old Agora remained uninhabited until the late 4th c. (Thompson, 65-66), but the city continued to offer teaching through its schools, attracting young men like *Julian, *Basil the Great and *Gregory of Nazianzus (Max, 65-67; Geffcken, 101 and 117ff.). In 398, however, *Synesius of Cyrene was disappointed both by the quality of Athenian teachers and by their training, both in the city and in the surrounding area (Sin., Ep. 272: PG 66, 1524 = Fitzgerald n. 136).

Renewed building activity, begun in the mid-4th c. and continuing throughout the 5th c., restored Athens to its size under Hadrian. This work of reconstruction was supported by the favor of Herculius, eparch of Illyricum (Thompson, 66-68; Travlos, 129-134). The philosophical schools, active everywhere, were also represented by Christian teachers such as *Prohaeresius (2nd half 4th c.). But they retained their predominantly *pagan cult as part of the old religious tradition, as seen in the famous *Neoplatonic academy headed by *Proclus (d. 485). The last pagan philosophers, isolated nostalgics surrounded by a popular Christianity, were expelled by *Justinian in 529 (Gregorovius, 54-57; Konstantinidis, 118 and 174-185; Geffcken, 202ff.). The philosophical schools seem to have been concentrated in the Agora and its neighborhood, and on the Acropolis (Frantz, Pagan; Id., From Paganism 191-193; Travlos, 130-134).

Among the ancient cults, the Eleusinian mysteries disappeared after *Alaric destroyed the temple of Eleusis in 396. Within the city of Athens, the Panathenaic processions on the Acropolis are attested until the 5th c. (Frantz, From Paganism, 193). The Parthenon ceased to be a pagan temple when its chryselephantine statue of Athena was removed and taken to *Constantinople (before 485: Frantz, 200-201 and 204). In the 4th c. Christian worship had its own churches in the city (Greg. Naz., In laud. Basil. Magni 21: "Two ways appeared before us: one principal and more honorable, the other secondary and of less value; the first leads to our sacred buildings and to the doctors who teach in them, the other to those who were trained outside": PG 36, 524), but they were probably in the suburbs.

Christianity seems to have established itself in the city center in the early 5th c., with the founding of a building of four cupolas inside Hadrian's Library. Though this is disputed, this building seems to have been a cathedral church built with the support of the empress *Eudoxia of Athens (Karivieri, 899f.). The basilica identified within the Roman Agora is certainly early Christian (Lazaridis, 96), though its exact date is unknown. At the end of the 5th c., but perhaps later, the temple of Asclepius, which had been in use until shortly before 485, was turned into a church (Frantz, From Paganism, 194-195 and 202; Travlos, Athens, 362-363; Spieser, 310). We have no precise date for the conversion of the Parthenon into a church: it was probably mid-6th c., and reused all of the building's annexes: the choir and altar were set on the spot of the altar of Asclepius, the nave in the temple itself; the place of incubation became the N aisle; the sacred spring was put to use by the church (Travlos, Athen, 357-358; Karivieri, 898). The Erechtheum must have been converted in the late 6th or 7th c.; the Hephaisteion (Theseion), at the foot of the Acropolis facing the Agora, in the 7th c. (Frantz, From Paganism, 202-203; Travlos, Athens, 365-366; Spieser 310-311). Outside Hadrian's city walls, the basilica of the Ilissus, dedicated to the Corinthian *martyr Leonidas, was probably built after the destruction of the church of that name in *Corinth (550–551) (Pallas; for information on other early Christian monuments: Travlos, Athens, 356-378).

In its years of greatest decline, the city's life went on within its existing walls, restored under Justinian (Travlos, Πολεοδομική, 144-155 and 149ff.). Yet the city did retain its splendor. It was visited in 662–663 by the emperor *Constans II, who granted it revenue. In the 7th c. it seems still to have been a cultural center (Gregorovius I 99; Runciman, 294; Cameron). Politically, Athens belonged to the province of *Achaia until this was divided into two themes; ecclesiastically, it depended on the metropolitan of Corinth. In the 8th c. Athens was promoted to metropolis.

F. Gregorovius, Geschichte der Stadt Athen im Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1889; G. Kostantinidis, Ἱστορία τῶν Ἀθηνῶν ἀπὸ Χριστοῦ Γεννήσεως μέχρι τοῦ ἔτους 1821, Athens ²1894; H. Leclercq: DACL I 2 (1924) 3039-3104 (s.v. Athènes); G.A. Sotiriou, Εὑρετήριον τῶν μεσαιωνικῶν μνημείων τῆς Ἑλλάδος, Α', Athens 1927; R. Janin: DHGE V (1931) 15-42 (s.v. Athènes); I. Travlos, Πολεοδομική ἐξέλιξις τῶν Ἀθηνῶν, Athens 1960; Id., RBK 1, 350-389 (s.v. Athens); J. Geffcken, Der Ausgang des griechisch-römischen Heidentums, Heidelberg ²1929; G.I. Konidaris, Πότε προήχθησαν αἱ Ἀθῆναι εἰς μητρόπολιν: PAA 10 (1935) 285-292; St. Runciman, Byzantine Civilisation, London ²1936; V. Laurent, L'érection de la métropole d'Athènes et le statut ecclésiastique de l'Illyricum au VIIIᵉ s.: EtByz 1 (1943) 58-72; O. Broneer, Athens, "City of Worship": Bibl. Archaeologist 21 (1958) 2-28; H.A. Thompson, Athenian Twilight: A.D. 267-600: JRS 49 (1959) 61-72; P. Lazaridis, Μεσιωνικὰ Ἀθηνῶν Ἀττικῆς: AD 19 (1964): chron. 96-99; A. Frantz, From Paganism to Christianity in the Temples of Athens: DOP 19 (1965) 185-205; A.D.E. Cameron, The Last Days of the Academy at Athens: PCPhS 195 (1969) 7-29; A. Frantz, Pagan Philosophers in Christian Athens: PAPhS 119 (1975) 29-38; J.-M. Spieser, La christianisation des sanctuaires païens en Grèce: Neue Forschungen in griechischen Heiligtümern, ed. U. Jantzen, Tübingen 1976, 309-320; D.I. Pallas, Corinthe et Nikopolis pendant le moyen âge: FR 114 (1979); I. Travlos, Bildlexikon zur Topographie des antiken Athen, Tübingen 1971; T.E. Gregory, The Survival of Paganism in Christian Greece: AJPh 107 (1986) 229-242; J. Irmscher, La politica religiosa dell'Imperatore Giustiniano contro i pagani e la fine della scuola neoplatonica ad Atene: Cristianesimo nella Storia 11 (1990) 579-592; A. Karivieri, The So-Called Library of Hadrian and the Tetraconch Church in Athens, in Post-Herulian Athens, ed. P. Castrén, Helsinki 1994, 89-113; A. Karivieri, The Christianization of an Ancient Pilgrimage Site: A Case Study of the Athenian Asklepeion, in Akten des XII. Intern. Kongresses f. christ. Archäologie, II, Münster 1995, 898-905; P. Castrén, Christianity in Athens and Vicinity During the Fourth to Sixth Century A.D., in The Idea and Ideal of the Town Between Late An- tiquity and Early Middle Ages, eds. G.P. Bogliolo - B. Ward-Perkins, Leiden 1999, 211-223.

D.I. Pallas

ATHLETA CHRISTI. The comparison of the Christian with the athlete and the Christian life with a battle occurs frequently in Scripture (1 Cor 4:9; 9:24-26; 2 Tim 2:5; 4:6-8), an influence of philosophical ethics. The *martyrs are the athletes of Christ par excellence, also because authentic martyrs, esp. those who were killed in the amphitheater or the circus, were considered as such (Passio ss. Perpet. et Felic.). The *Byzantine church especially, in its homilies (*John Chrysostom, the *Cappadocians, *Severus of Antioch, *John of Damascus), in the Passiones (read during the *liturgy) and in the synaxaries, evokes the metaphor of the martyr-athlete and sees in the feasts of the martyrs the new Christian "spectacles." *Augustine follows the same line in his preaching in honor of Sts. *Perpetua and Felicity, replacing the *pagan spectacles with the spectacula christiana (see Spectacles). The circular Roman basilicas may reflect the metaphor of the athleta Christi, which is why the Fathers very often described the church of a martyr as a stadium. From the peace of *Constantine on, the agonistic metaphor was extended also to *ascetics, *virgins and bishops.

DACL 1, 3105-3111; TWNT 1, 134-140; 166-167; F. Rütten, Die Victorverehrung im christlichen Altertum. Eine kulturgeschichtliche und hagiographische Studie, Paderborn 1936, 16-36; F. di Capua, La concezione agonistica del martirio nei primi secoli del cristianesimo e l'introito della messa di S. Agata: EphLit 61 (1947) 229-240; G. Lomiento, Ἀθλητής τῆς εὐσεβείας: VetChr 1 (1964) 113-128; R. Merkelbach, Der griechische Wortschatz und die Christen: ZPE 18 (1975) 101-148; A. Bandura, Athleta Christi nella patristica latina dei primi quattro secoli, Diss. Pontificia Universitas Lateranensis - Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, Rome 1994; E. La Rocca, Le basiliche cristiane "a deambulatorio" e la sopravvivenza del culto eroico: S. Ensoli - E. La Rocca (eds.), Aurea Roma. Dalla città pagana alla città cristiana, Florence 2000, 204-220.

S. Heid

ATTICUS (d. 425). Patriarch of *Constantinople from early March 406 to 10 October 425. He restored relations with *Rome, which had been broken by the condemnation of *John Chrysostom, and asked *Cyril of Alexandria to replace John's name in his church's *diptychs. He expelled *Pelagius's friend Celestius from Constantinople and corresponded with *Augustine; a letter to him attributed to the head of the Armenian church is spurious (see CPG 5660). His generosity to the poor of *Nicaea is famous. Among his acts are preserved fragments of a dogmatic letter to Eupsychius on the divinity of Christ.

CPG 5650-5660; CSEL 88, Vienna 1981, 32-38, see LVILVII; DHGE 5, 161-166; ODB 1, 230; LTK 1, 1165-1166; Marienlexikon 1,266; Grumel, Les regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople, Kadiköi-Bucharest I, 1, 1932, 35-48; J. Lebon, Discours d'Atticus de Constantinople sur la sainte Mère de Dieu: Muséon 46 (1933) 167-202; M. Brière, Une homélie inédite d'Atticus, patriarche de Constantinople (406-425): ROC 29 (1933-34) 160-186; G. Dagron, Naissance d'une capitale. Constantinople et ses institutions de 330 à 451, Paris 1974, passim; M. Geerard - A. Van Roey, Les fragments grecs et syriaques de la lettre "Ad Eupsychium" d'Atticus de Constantinople (406-425), Corona Gratiarum. Miscellanea patristica, historica et liturgica Eligio Dekkers O.S.B. . . . oblata, Brugge 1975, vol. 1, 69-81; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana. Recherches sur l'Eglise de Rome, son organisation, sa politique, son idéologie, de Miltiade à Sixte III (311-440), Rome 1976 (passim, see index); G. Madec, Du nouveau dans la correspondance augustinienne: REAug 27 (1981) 59-60; M.F. Berrouard, Les lettres 6e et 19e de saint Augustin: REAug 27 (1981) 264-277; F.J. Thomson, The Slavonic Translation of the Hitherto Untraced Greek "Homilia in nativitatem Domini nostri Jesu Christi" by Atticus of Constantinople: AB 118 (2000) 5-36.

D. Stiernon

ATTILA (ca. 400–453). King of the *Huns. Son of Mundzuk, brother of Octar and Roas (Jordanes, Hist. Goth. 35), he settled in 434 in the region of the vast Hungarian plain and from there began his great expansion eastward, conquering S Russia and the entire Danube basin. At the death of his brother Bleda he remained the sole leader of the Huns. From 441–447 he engaged in a great military campaign against the *Byzantine Empire: he invaded the Balkan peninsula and pushed through Greece as far as Thermopylae, withdrawing from there in exchange for major concessions on the part of the emperor *Theodosius II. He maintained cordial relations with *Rome thanks to the mediation of the general Aetius but, emboldened by his power, made ever more insistent demands of the emperor *Valentinian III, who refused them. In spring 451 he crossed the Rhine with a huge army and invaded *Gaul as far as Orléans, sowing terror and destroying many cities, including Metz. The Roman army, led by *Aetius and helped by a large group of *Visigoths led by King *Theodoric I, attacked the Huns at the Catalaunian Fields, or Campus Mauriacus, between Châlon-sur-Marne and Troyes, stopping Attila's advance and forcing him to retreat to Pannonia (Jordanes, Hist. Goth. 36). In 452 Attila moved from the Danube region into *Italy, destroying the cities of *Aquileia, *Milan and Pavia. Pope *Leo I met him on the River Mincio near Mantua before he could reach the gates of Rome, to beg him in God's name to spare the city of *Peter and *Paul. The impression of his encounter with the pope, which has become popular legend, and the condition of his army, tired and decimated by sickness, led Attila to accept the emperor's peace proposals, and he withdrew from the Italian peninsula to return to his domains in Hungary. He died unexpectedly in 453. His death meant the end of the kingdom of the Huns, which broke up rapidly due to rivalry between his sons.

F. Altheim, Attila und die Hunnen, Baden-Baden 1950; E.A. Thompson, A History of Attila and the Huns, Oxford 1948, It. tr. Florence 1963; E. Demougeot, La formation de l'Europe et les invasions barbares, 2. De l'avènement de Dioclétien (284) à l'occupaton germanique de l'Empire romain d'Occident (début du VI[e] siècle), II, Paris 1979, 522-557; Attila Flagellum Dei?, Convegno internazionale di studi storici sulla figura di Attila e sulla discesa degli Unni in Italia nel 452 d.C., S. Blason Scarel (ed.), Studia Historica 129, Rome 1994; P. Howarth, Attila, King of the Huns: Man and Myth, London 1994; E.A. Thompson, The Huns, Oxford 1996; A. Arecchi, Attila e Teodorico. L'impero finisce a Pavia, Pavia 1997.

G. Pilara

AUDENTIUS (d. ca. 395). Predecessor of Asturius (Ildef., De vir. ill. 2) in the see of *Toledo (385–395). According to *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 14) he wrote De fide adversus omnes haereses, against the *Manichees, *Sabellians, *Arians and esp. the *Photinians (Bonosiani). The *heresies or deviations of *Priscillian and his followers were included. Audentius wrote against the Priscillianists at the height of their influence, but without citing them; his work is lost. A.G. Vega believes to have identified Audentius's De fide in *Augustine's sermon 233, a booklet On Faith, which coincides with the profession of faith of the first Council of Toledo. Audentius's De fide would be the primitive text of the Toledan Creed. Our Audentius should not be confused with *Auxentius, who appears in the first Council of *Saragossa (380).

A.C. Vega, De Patrología Española: Bol. R. Acad. Hiat. 169 (1972) 263-325; H. Chadwick, Priscilliano de Avila, Madrid 1978, 278; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura española, 4 vols., Madrid 1997, II, 25.

E. Romero Pose

AUDIANI. Rigorist *monastic sect founded in *Syria by Audius, a deacon of *Edessa. *Epiphanius considers them *heretical, describing them in Panarion, ch. 70. In particular he attributes the *anthropomorphite theory to them, according to which the divine form is literally the same as the human form. While the sect's activity seems to have been confined to Syria and later to Scythia (where *Constantine outlawed it), the anthropomorphite theory turns up in 4th-5th-c. Egyptian monastic circles, perhaps independent of the audiani, and esp. among those circles most opposed to the theories of *Origen and therefore of *Evagrius of Pontus. *Socrates mentions them (HE VI, 7), as do two *Coptic texts (Life of Aphu of Oxyrhynchus; ps.-Agathonicus of Tarsus).

Hfl-Lecl 1, 479-488; EC 2, 389-390; RAC 1, 910-915; bibliography in A. Guillaumont, Les "Kephalaia gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique, Paris 1962, 59-61; H.Ch. Puech, Enquête sur la Gnose, I, Paris 1978, 271-300.

T. Orlandi

AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS

I. Ecclesiastical constitutions and secular legislation - II. Canonical sources and ecclesiastical authors.

I. Ecclesiastical constitutions and secular legislation. St. Paul, developing the gospel precept (Mt 18:15), exhorted Christians to resolve their disputes within the community, using one of themselves as judge (1 Cor 6:1-8). This procedure, inspired by Jewish models, was adopted in Christian communities, and with the gradual institutionalization of the Christian religion the role of arbitrator and reconciler was naturally assumed by the bishop, who had authority and, more often than not, the legal knowledge necessary for this task. The Didache (XV) and the Apostolic Constitutions* (II, 5,46.47.49) confirmed the apostle's proposal, stressing the need for Christians to have recourse to the bishop's tribunal rather than appealing to civil authorities. This kind of judgment by the religious authorities, though confirmed by the sources, was of course neither regulated nor sanctioned by any imperial law: the audientia episcopalis remained something within the church and responded to purely religious demands. In judging, the bishop based himself on the lex christiana, which complied with a series of disciplinary moral rules that followed from gospel precepts. From the time of the proclamation of religious peace, *Constantine officially recognized the audientia episcopalis, affirming the principle in the constitution of 23 June 318 (CTh I, 27, 1), which was further specified in the imperial rescript of 333 (C. Sirmondiana 1). The emperor thus rendered the college of bishops licitum in every respect, and in particular attributed to the bishop the authority to decide, without limitation, ratione materiae et personae. Whenever one of the two litigants in a private dispute requested recourse to the bishop's tribunal, the imperial judge was obligated to accept the proposal without hesitation: the provocatio to the bishop had to be accepted even without the other party's consent; finally, the bishop's verdict had full force and could not be appealed. Bishops could judge in both civil and penal cases; they could accuse and judge a *pagan, a *heretic or a schismatic; the civil authority in effect kept only the simple executive function. The imperial power was not slow in reconsidering these privileges, and in 376 the emperors *Valens, *Gratian and *Valentinian signed a constitution (CTh XVI, 2, 23) with which they reserved penal cases to secular tribunals and limited the application of the episcopale iudicium only to civil cases. A new intervention (398) by the emperors *Arcadius and *Honorius introduced the consent of both parties as a necessary prerequisite for moving a case to the bishop's tribunal (CI 1, 4, 7). The following year Honorius, with the specific intention of limiting episcopal power, which as the sources show had increased tremendously (Augustine, De opere monachorum XXIX, 37; Ep. XLVIII, 1; Enarratio II in Psalmum XXV, 13; Confessioni VI, 3, 3; Ambrose, Ep. LXXXII; John Chrysostom, De sacerdotio, III, 17), ordered that all cases in matters of faith were to be submitted to the bishop's judgment, whereas in civil and penal cases, Roman law and the will of the imperial judge had to be respected (CTh XVI, 11, 1). With the constitution of Arcadius, Honorius and Theodosius (CI I, 4, 8 = CTh 1, 27, 2: year 408), there was a return to a greater autonomy for ecclesiastical tribunals: the legislator conceded the possibility of recourse, in an appeal, to the episcopal tribunal for whoever requested it, confirming the authority of the ecclesiastical cognitor and that his verdict could not be appealed. Emperor *Valentinian III introduced a new constitution, recorded as Novella XXXV of 15 April 452, in which he confirmed the need for consent between the parties in order to defer the case to a religious tribunal, whether the litigants were clergy or laity, thus excluding recourse to the privilegium fori. Valentinian's Novella XXXV was abrogated in 460 by the emperor Majorian with Novella XI. The audientia episcopalis was again considered by jurists under *Justinian in the writing of the Corpus Iuris Civilis (Codex repetitae praelectionis I, 4: De episcopali audientia et de diversis capitulis). In line with the constitutions of 398 and 408, the possibility of recourse to the bishop's arbitration based on the agreement of both parties was confirmed; in particular, the question was treated in Novellae LXXXIII and LXXXVI, published in 539: the legislator allowed recourse to the episcopal tribunal for both civil and criminal cases, when the latter regarded crimes in ecclesiastical matters, and when one of the two litigants was not fully satisfied with the judgment of the secular tribunal. Extremely important was Novella CXXIII of 546, in which the *Byzantine emperor, respecting the institution of the privilegium fori, esp. in cases where a bishop was a plaintiff or defendant, made episcopal verdicts subject to appeal, offering both clergy and laity the full right to a civil tribunal, either to confirm or enforce the bishop's decision or to defer the case to a local judge.

II. Canonical sources and ecclesiastical authors. The conciliar acts we have (Conc. Carthag. III [397], can. IX: Mansi III, 882; Conc. Chalced. IV [451], can. IX: Hfl-Lecl II, 2, 791-797) and the ample written evidence of the fathers of the church allow us to assert that recourse to the institution of the audientia episcopalis was a practice rooted in the life of the various Christian communities, especially in the period following Constantine's legislation. In some of his works St. *Augustine, bishop of *Hippo, attests how burdensome his judicial tasks were to him, saying that almost all of his time was taken up in settling disputes between believers; he also tried to specify the legitimacy of his legal power, confirmed by the tradition as well as by the imperial provisions that had placed bishops' verdicts absolutely beyond appeal (De opere Monachorum XXIX, 37; Enarratio II in Psalmum XXV, 13; see also Possidius, Vita S. Agostini XIX). An important text that addresses the problem of ecclesiastical tribunals, and that to a certain extent also explains the modus agendi in civil cases, is the letter sent by *Ambrose, bishop of *Milan, to Marcellus (Ambr., Epistolarum Classis II, Ep. LXXXII). We have various evidence concerning Ambrose's legal activity (Ambr., Ep. Classis I; Ep. XXI, 2; Aug., Confessionum Libri VI, 3, 3; Theodoret, Historia Ecclesiastica IV, 6). We also have much evidence from the Eastern church. *Basil of Caesarea (Regulae fusius tractatae, interrogatio XLIX; Epistolarum Classis III, Epistula CCCVII), *Gregory of Nazianzus (Oratio XLIII, 34) and *John Chrysostom (De sacerdotio III, 17) give evidence of repeated involvement in disputes among the faithful.

P. De Francisci, Per la storia dell'episcopalis audientia fino alla Novella 35 di Valentiniano, "Scritti O. Scavalcanti." Annali della Facoltà di Giurisprudenza di Perugia 30, Rome 1918, 47-75; A. Pugliese, Sant'Agostino giudice. Contributo alla storia dell'episcopalis audientia: "Studi dedicati alla memoria di Paolo Ubaldi." Pubblicazioni della Università Cattolica del Sacro Cuore, serie 5°, 16 (1937) 263-299; G. Vismara, Episcopalis audientia. L'attività giurisdizionale del vescovo per la risoluzione delle controversie private tra laici nel diritto romano e nella storia del diritto italiano fino al secolo nono, Milan 1937; V. Bušek, Episcopalis audientia, eine Friedens- und Schiedsgerichtsbarkeit: ZRG 28 (1939) 453-492; B. Biondi, Il Diritto Romano Cristiano: Orientamento religioso della legislazione, I, Milan 1952, 374-384, 445-461; W. Selb, Episcopalis audientia von der Zeit Konstantin bis zur Nov. XXXV Valentinians III: ZRG 53 (1967) 162-217; O. Diliberto, Paolo di Tarso, I ad Cor. VI, 1-8, e le origini della gi- urisdizione ecclesiastica nelle cause civili: Studi Economico-Giuridici 39 (1979) 183-219; C.G. Mor, I poteri temporali dei vescovi in Italia e in Germania nel Medioevo, "Annali dell'Istituto storico italo germanico," Quaderno 3, Bologna 1979; F.J. Cuena Boy, La "Episcopalis Audientia," Valladolid 1985; G. Vismara, Ancora sull'episcopalis audientia (Ambrogio arbitro o giudice?): Studia et Documenta Historiae et Iuris 53 (1987) 55-73; C. Gebbia, *Sant'Agostino e l'*episcopalis audientia, in L'Africa romana. Acts del VI Convegno di Studio (Sassari, 16-18 December 1988), Sassari 1989, 683-695; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (IVe-Ve siècles), in Histoire du Droit et des Istitutions de l'Église en Occident, Paris [2]1989, 330-340; M.R. Cimma, L'episcopalis audientia nelle costituzioni imperiali da Costantino a Giustiniano, Turin 1989; G. Crifò, A proposito di episcopalis audientia. Institutions, société et vie politique dans l'Empire romain au IVe siècle ap. J.C., Collection de l'École Française de Rome 159, Rome 1992, 397-410; G. Vismara, La giurisdizione civile dei vescovi, secoli I-IX, Milan 1995; P. Maymò, La episcopalis audientia durante la dinastia teodosiana. Ensayo sobre el poder jurídico del obispo en la sociedad tardorromana, Congreso Internacional La Hispania de Teodosio, 1, Salamanca 1997, 165-170; Id., *La legislació constantiniana respecte a l'*episcopalis audientia: Pyrenae 30 (1999) 191-203; G.L. Falchi, La diffusione della legislazione imperiale ecclesiastica nei secoli IV e V, in Legislazione imperiale e religione nel IV secolo, eds. J. Gaudemet - P. Siniscalco - G.L. Falchi, Rome 2000, 148-151; O. Huck, A propos de CTh 1,27,1 et Csirm 1. Sur deux textes controversés relatifs à l'Episcopalis audientia constantinienne: ZRG 120 (2003) 78-105; G. Pilara, Sui tribunali ecclesiastici nel IV e V secolo: StudRom 52, 3-4 (2004) 353-378.

G. Pilara

AUDITE OMNES AMANTES. Alphabetical hymn in rhythmic trochaic septenarii in praise of *Patrick, *apostle of *Ireland. Included in the Antiphonary of Bangor (folios 13-15) with the title Ymnum Sancti Patrici for use in liturgical settings, it is now thought to be the work of Colman Alo (d. 611), whereas it was traditionally considered a work of *Secundinus (Sechnall, d. 447), son of the "Lombard" Restituto and Patrick's sister and perhaps one of the clerics who came to Ireland from the continent in the 5th c.; he is commemorated locally as a saint on 27 November.

Sharpe 1605; Lapidge-Sharpe 573; Kenney 87; CPL 1101; BS 11,805-807.

Editions and translations: PL 53, 837-840; 72, 590-592; W. Stokes, The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, London 1887, II, 382-384; C. Blume, Analecta hymnica Medii Aevi 51, Leipzig 1908, 340-346; L. Bieler, The Hymn of St. Secundinus: PRIA 55C (1953) 117-127; E. Malaspina, Gli scritti di san Patrizio. Alle origini del cristianesimo irlandese, Rome 1985, 140-143.

Studies: L. Bieler, St. Secundinus and Armagh: Seanchas Ardmhacha 2 (1956) 21-27; A. Orchard, Audite omnes amantes*: A Hymn in Patrick's Praise*, in D.N. Dunville et al., St. Patrick AD 493-1993, Woodbridge 1993, 153-173; M.W. Herren, An Early Irish Precursor of the "Offiziendichtung" of the Carolingian and Ottonian Periods: Euphrosyne 22 (1994) 291-300.

E. Malaspina

AUGUSTALIS the African. The first ecclesiastical author to leave an aid for the computation of *Easter was Augustalis. He composed a Laterculus, i.e., an Easter table, giving the date for the celebration of Easter from 213–312. He used an 84-year Easter cycle; the custom of indicating on every 1 January the age of the moon (Epact) and the day of the week perhaps goes back to him. He also proposed the saltus lunae every 14 years. His work is lost, but its basic instructions can be deduced from information in the anonymous Computus Carthaginensis, a. 455*, written in the 16th year of King *Genseric (CPL 2296; see B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie, I, 279-297). Since he was eulogized as sanctissimae memoriae (I, 8), he was probably bishop of an *African see; he is also called litterarum . . . scientia praeditus et calculationis arte peritus. Augustalis's cycle, widely used in Africa until the late 4th c., was continued and revised by Agriustia; the church of *Rome must also have used it until the end of the 3rd c.

CPL 2273; B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie, I, Leipzig 1880, 5-23, 138, 150; DHGE 5, 414; DTC 11, 1953; CPPM III/A 630.

V. Loi - B. Amata

AUGUSTINE of Aquileia (408–434). Successor to St. *Chromatius as bishop of *Aquileia. His activity is known to us only because of the *Pelagian *heresy. He seems in fact to have been the recipient of a Libellus fidei of a group of northern Italian bishops and clergy, protesting against certain measures that Augustine, the metropolitan of Aquileia, took in deference to orders of the court of *Ravenna and to the document (Tractoria, 418) in which Pope *Zosimus denounced the Pelagian heresy and clearly set forth *Catholic doctrine. There are doubts about who the Libellus fidei is addressed to, but it is very probable that, just as the Pelagians of southern *Italy turned to *Rufus of Thessalonica, those of the north tried to win over the metropolitan of Aquileia.

G. Cuscito, Cristianesimo antico ad Aquileia e in Istria, Trieste 1977, 193-194 (with bibl.); PCBE 2,223.

G. Cuscito

AUGUSTINE of Canterbury (d. 604). Prior of the *monastery of St. Andrew on the Caelian Mount, was chosen by *Gregory in 596 as the leader of the mission to evangelize the Anglo-Saxons of England. On reaching Provence, the missionaries lost heart and returned to Rome, but Gregory encouraged them and sent them out again. Augustine landed ca. Easter 597 at the mouth of the Thames in Kent, whose king *Ethelbert was married to the Frankish princess Bertha, a Christian. This circumstance facilitated Augustine's work; within a short time he could report to Gregory the *baptism of 10,000 Angles. *Bede (HE 1,33) tells us of the baptism of the king a few months after Augustine's arrival, but this is not certain. Informed of these successes, Gregory sent Augustine the archiepiscopal pallium, along with new instructions and reinforcements of every kind. The intention was that the ecclesiastical province being formed would in the future be divided into two provinces centered in London and *York, but it was some time before this plan could be realized. In the meantime Augustine, now *archbishop of *Canterbury near London, extended the range of his activity into southern England, where he introduced the *Benedictine rule, and beyond the Thames, among the eastern Saxons. His contacts (602 or 603) with the British of Wales were unsuccessful; they were for the most part already Christianized, but followed *Celtic practices that conflicted with Rome on several points. Some British bishops had talks with Augustine, but mistrusting him in part because he worked among the Anglo-Saxons, bitter enemies of the British Celts, they did not want to recognize him as primate of England, much less accept the Roman rite for the celebration of Easter and baptism. He died there soon after, 26 May, 604.

DHGE 5,427 432; HF. Bing, St. Augustine of Canterbury and the Saxon Church in Kent: Archaeologia Cantiana 62 (1949) 108-129; I. Wood, The Mission of Augustine of Canterbury to the English: Speculum 69 (1994) 1-17.

M. Simonetti

AUGUSTINE of Hippo (354–430)
I. Life - II. The man - III. His thought.

I. Life. What we know about his life derives from his "first confessions" or Dialogues of Cassiciacum (De b. vita 4; C. Acad. 2,2,3-6; De ord. 1,2,5; 1,10,29; 2,10,52; Solil. 1,1,2-6); from the Confessions, his most famous work, of definite value autobiographically, as well as theologically, philosophically, mystically and literarily; from his "last confessions" or Retractations, written toward the end of his life (426–427), rich in documentary, theological and autobiographical information. His Discourses 355 and 356 tell us of the daily life that he conducted in the domo episcopi. *Possidius's Life of St. Augustine describes Augustine's "life" and "habits" as a bishop with historical sense and a sober style. What we know of his writings derives from the Retractations, an original work containing an examination of conscience or critical revision of all his works (opuscula in libris), of which he indicates the theme, chronological order, corrections to be made or interpretation to be given (he did not have time to review the opuscula in epistolis [letters] and the opuscula in tractatibus [sermons]); from Possidius's Indiculum, incomplete and here and there imprecise, but invaluable; and from the manuscripts themselves, which have nearly all survived, despite their quantity and size.

From these sources we can reconstruct his life and record his writings.

From birth to conversion (354–386). Born at *Thagaste (Numidia), 13 November 354, the son (perhaps eldest) of *Patricius, a small landowner and town councilor, and of *Monica, a very pious Christian. Had a brother, *Navigius, and a sister, name unknown. He was Roman in language, culture and feeling, if not by descent; he studied at Thagaste, Madaura and *Carthage.

Augustine taught *rhetoric at Carthage, then at *Rome and *Milan. He mastered *Latin language and culture, but did not know Greek well, and understood little or no *Punic. Given a Christian education, in intention he always remained a Christian. At 19, reading the Hortensius of Cicero, he converted to the love of wisdom, which, disappointed with the Scriptures, he sought shortly thereafter with the *Manichees, for three basic reasons: for the wisdom that they promised to teach by reason alone, without recourse to the authority of faith; for their adherence to Christ, whose disciples they claimed to be; and for their radical solution to the problem of *evil. In a matter of days he became a fierce anti-Catholic and a faithful Manichee. Though not without reservations, he accepted Mani's method, piety and metaphysical presuppositions: materialism, *dualism and *pantheism. Discovering after nine years the weakness of the Manichean system, he turned to skepticism: his movement of separation from the *Catholic faith, begun on rationalist pretexts, thus ended with an act of distrust in reason. His road of return began at Milan, aged 32. *Ambrose's preaching restored his trust in Catholic teaching on the interpretation of Scripture and revealed to him the spiritual notion of the soul and of God. He overcame skepticism, recognizing its error in method (not reason or faith, but reason and faith) and accepting the *authority of the church, guarantor and interpreter of Scripture, as the "north star" to which to entrust himself. He overcame materialism by discovering, with the help of the *Platonists, the interior light and the true notion of evil. He overcame naturalism—and resolved the new problem that had arisen for him, that of mediation—by reading St. *Paul and recognizing in Jesus Christ the Mediator of *grace and the Redeemer. With that, his return to the Catholic faith was complete. With the restoration of faith, however, the problem that first arose at 19 reasserted itself, of the concrete way to live out the search for wisdom, or to live—by now the same thing for Augustine—the Christian ideal. After hesitation and struggles, he decided to abandon every earthly aspiration, including marriage, and to consecrate himself totally to that ideal (Conf. 8,6,13–12,30). Augustine's conversion has been much discussed during the past century. From these studies I believe it must be concluded, if one wishes to remain faithful to the sources, that: (1) the Confessions also have historical value, though in them the narrative facts (which are different from those in the Dialogues) must be distinguished from the judgment of the narrator, who is Augustine, by now a bishop; (2) the conversion was to the Catholic faith, or rather a return to it, seen not in contrast but in harmony with the goal of wisdom indicated by the Platonists; (3) that adherence to the characteristic motif of the faith and the authority of the church took place prior to his reading of those philosophers, even though its content was still "vague and fluctuating beyond any reasonable measure of doctrine" (Conf. 7, 5, 7); (4) the reading of the Platonicorum libri in spring 386 led to Augustine's discovery of *Neoplatonic spiritualism, which allowed him to overcome the materialistic conception of God and the soul, as well as the notion of a substantive evil he inherited from his Manichean experience. But it was his later reading of St. Paul, with valuable clarifications by the priest *Simplicianus, which led him to know Christ's divine and human nature and the *soteriological significance of his sacrifice. His conversion to Christ was completed, then, at the beginning of the month of August, when he decided to consecrate himself completely to Christ, renouncing worldly hopes and marriage.

From conversion to priesthood (386–391). The academic year being over, Augustine finally found the time and the means to read books by Christian authors such as *Marius Victorinus and Ambrose, which helped him to deepen his Christian faith, as is shown by the dialogues written at Cassiciacum (probably modern Cassago) in the last months of the year. In March 387 he left his retreat at Cassiciacum to return to Milan, where he followed Ambrose's *catechesis and was *baptized by him on the Holy Saturday night, 24–25 April. He decided to return to *Africa with his family to put into effect there "the holy purpose" of living together in the service of God. His mother died at Ostia during the trip and he returned to Rome, where he stayed for 8-10 months, taking interest in the *monastic life, leaving again for Africa after July or August 388 (death of the usurper Maximus), establishing himself at Thagaste, where "with those united with him, he lived for God . . . and taught those present and absent with discourses and books" (Possidius). He wrote numerous books at Cassiciacum, Milan, Rome and Thagaste, all but two on Christian *philosophy. The arguments are on the following topics: certainty (Acad.), blessedness (Beat.), the order of things and evil (Ord.), the immortality of the soul (Solil. and Immort. an.), the greatness of the soul (Quant. an.), evil and free will (Lib.), an encyclopedia of the liberal arts (Disc.), which concluded the De grammatica (lost) and the De musica (on rhythm). He also wrote two works against the Manichees: a comparison between Catholic and Manichee doctrines on morals (Mor. eccl. cath. et de mor. Man.) and an *allegorical interpretation of Genesis (Gen. Man.). Later, ca. 390, he wrote the short masterpiece on true religion, De vera religione, which contains in seminal form many ideas of the City of God.

From priesthood to episcopate (391–396). In 391 he went down to *Hippo to "look for a place to found a *monastery and to live with my brothers" (Serm. 355,2) and was there surprised by the priesthood, which he accepted reluctantly so as to not oppose the divine will. He founded a monastery and lived there according to plan, as a priest and *monk, in *asceticism and study "according to the manner and the rule established at the time of the apostles" (Possidius, 5). By the bishop's will, and contrary to African practice, he carried out the task of preaching (Ep. 21). In 395, or 396 according to others, he was consecrated coadjutor bishop, and by 397 had sole direction of the diocese. He then left the monastery of the laymen, which became a "seminary" of priests and bishops for all of Africa (Possidius, 11), and withdrew in domo episcopi, which he made into a monastery, the monastery of the clerics (of Hippo) (see Serm. 355 and 356). To complete his theological formation, which he recognized as imperfect (Ep. 21), he immersed himself in the study of Scripture and the Fathers. He confronted the problem of the credibility of the Catholic faith (Util. cred.), gave an important address on faith and the creed before a council of totius Africae (Fide symb.), concerned himself with morality and biblical spirituality (Serm.

Dom.) and also, with little success, with Pauline soteriology (Exp. Gal., Ep. Rom. inch.) and Genesis (Gen. imp.). In the meantime he continued the Manichean controversy through the dispute with *Fortunatus (Fort.) and two works: De duabus an. and Contra Adimantum Man.; he also entered the *Donatist controversy with a popular song (Psal. Don.) and a lost work: Contra Ep. Donati (see Retract. 1,21).

From episcopate to death (396–430). Augustine's pastoral and literary activity increased with the episcopate, as did his understanding of Christian doctrine. His pastoral activity concerned (1) the church of Hippo, to which he belonged and felt attached: preaching (twice a week—Saturday and Sunday—and often for more days in succession, even twice a day), the audientia episcopalis* which could last the entire day, care of the poor and orphans, formation of clergy, organization of monasteries of men and women, administration of ecclesiastical goods (a task not loved but tolerated), visits to the sick; (2) the African church: participation at annual councils, frequent trips at the invitation of colleagues or to respond to ecclesiastical needs; (3) universal church: dogmatic controversies, replies to enquiries, book after book on the widest variety of questions proposed to him and imposed on him. As bishop he continued the controversy with the Manicheans: he refuted the prologue of Mani's so-called fundamental letter (Fund.); disputed with Felix on creation and on the origin of evil (Fel. Man.); wrote on the ontological goodness of things (Nat. bon.); responded to Faustus on the harmony between the OT and NT (Faust.), to *Secundinus on the immutability of God, the nature of evil and creation ex nihilo (Secund.), which Augustine thought to be his best anti-Manichean work (Retract. 1,10). He also continued the Donatist controversy, demonstrating the historical and theological inconsistency of the *schism and responding to its defenders: *Parmenian (Parmen.), *Petilian (C. litt. Petil.), *Cresconius (Cresc.); he clarified the validity of *baptism administered by *heretics (Bapt.); proved the universal unity of the church with biblical texts (Unit. eccles.); was the soul of the great Catholic-Donatist debate of 411, summarizing its Acts afterward (Brev. coll.) and launching an appeal to the Donatists for unity (Don., a "great" work, written "with much care," the best of all: Retract. 2,40); wrote a manual for count *Boniface on the history of Donatism, the intervention of imperial laws, the goodness of the church that calls back and receives those in error (De corrept. Donatistarum = Ep. 185). If success smiled on his labors, it was because "he knew what he wanted and had recourse to the necessary means; he knew how to enlist the necessary allies and to draw them after him in the victorious campaign of which he was the soul" (Monceaux).

The Donatist controversy was not over when the *Pelagian controversy began. Augustine was not the first or only to intervene, but his "stringent, positive, persevering" criticism was decisive for the fate of Pelagianism (De Plinval). The controversy naturally divides into two periods, one expository, the other polemical. In the former, the tone is calm and friendly, without mention of names or, if mentioned, with expressions of esteem; in the latter the tone is sharper, especially toward the end. The first, fundamental work, expounds the theology of redemption and baptism, of original sin and grace, and responds to the Pelagians' difficulties (Pecc. merit.); the second, also fundamental, explains the relations between the law (letter) and grace (spirit) and clarifies the concept of Christian freedom (Spir. litt.). He then responded, without naming him, to Pelagius's De natura, demonstrating that, so as not to render vain the cross of Christ, not only must nature be defended but also the grace that heals and frees nature (Nat. grat.); he also responded to Caelestius's Definitiones, denying the impeccantia and maintaining the imperfection of human justice, even among saints (Perf.). After Pelagius's absolution by the Synod of *Palestine, Augustine, the Acts in hand, wrote a work (Gest. Pelag.) in which he showed that Pelagius had been absolved but Pelagianism condemned. Shortly thereafter he intervened to clarify the equivocation by which the Pelagians spoke of grace and original sin (Grat. Chr.). He also wrote 4 books to clarify the errors of the young bishop Victor and to defend his own oscillation between creationism and spiritual *traducianism (An. orig.). With the condemnation of Pelagianism by *Zosimus's tractoria, the polemical phase began, which lasted from Contra duas Ep. Pel. and De nuptiis et concupiscentia to the two responses to *Julian of Eclanum: the 6 books of Contra Iulianum and the 6 of Contra secundam Iuliani responsionem, the latter work unfinished because of his death.

Another controversy related to the Pelagian controversy arose among the monks of *Hadrumetum (Africa) and *Marseille (*Gaul), on the questions of grace/freedom and *predestination. Augustine responded to the first question with De gratia et libero arbitrio, in which he showed from Scripture the need to hold firm two truths, freedom and grace; and with De correptione et gratia (a key work in the Augustinian system), in which he treats of the themes of predestination and the efficacy of grace, different before and after original sin. To the second he responded with De praedestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiae, in which he demonstrated that the beginning of faith and final perseverance are gifts of God. Besides these controversial works there were many others: exegetical, moral, pastoral, philosophical-theological. Among the exegetical works: De doctrina christiana, important for the principles of hermeneutics and sacred preaching and the dogmatic synthesis based on uti ("use") and frui ("enjoyment"); De bono coniugali and De sancta virginitate on the relation between the goodness of marriage and the excellence of consecrated virginity; De catechizandis rudibus, a manual of *catechesis rich in pedagogical insight; De fide et operibus, on the relation between faith and works; Contra mendacium, on the inadmissability of lying; De cura pro mortuis gerenda, on the veneration of the dead; De opere monachorum, on the duty of manual labor for monks not occupied with study or the priestly apostolate, etc. Among the philosophical-theological works, other than the manual of dogmatics (Enchiridion ad Laurentium) and the treatises on the vision of God (De videndo Deo = Ep. 147) and the presence of God (De praesentia Dei = Ep. 187), his three famous works were Confessions, De Trinitate and City of God. Less celebrated but no less important was De Genesi ad litteram. It has been said of Augustine's most famous work, the Confessions, that it is fascinating not only because of its autobiographical and literary value but also for its reflections on evil, the creation, time, grace and the soul's journey to God. De Trinitate, Augustine's main dogmatic work, has exercised a decisive influence on Western *trinitarian theology. For theological and spiritual purposes it expounds the biblical doctrine, the theory of relations, the "psychological" explanation of man as the image of the *Trinity, the personal properties of the *Holy Spirit, the love and communion of the Father and the Son. The City of God, his masterpiece, is an apologetical and dogmatic work in 2 parts, 5 sections and 22 books. Augustine responds to *pagan accusations by expounding the Christian doctrine on the beginning, progress and eternal destinies of the two cities, which are founded on two loves—of self and of God—that are mingled in the historical process but separated in the eternal abode. Finally, the 12 books of De Genesi ad litteram, important for the explanation of the first three chapters of Genesis, as well as for its anthropological doctrine (books 6, 7, 10), the theory of simultaneous creation and that of seminal ideas. To these works should be added his correspondence (on the most varied arguments: philosophical, theological, exegetical, historical, spiritual, autobiographical; the Maurist edition includes 270 Letters [52 to Augustine and 9 from him included in the opuscula in libris]; later another 6 were published, and more recently another 29 [in CSEL 88]); also discourses, in three groups: Tractates on the Gospel of John (124 treatises on the gospel, 10 on 1 John); Expositions of the Psalms (a huge work rich in spiritual doctrine, the only complete patristic exposition of the Psalms); the Sermons proper, the fruit of almost 40 years of preaching, with biblical, *liturgical, *hagiographical and other content. Of perhaps three or four thousand, only ca. 570 survive, including new discoveries. Augustine died at Hippo 28 August 430.

II. The man. In evaluating this prodigious activity we must bear in mind that Augustine was at once a philosopher, theologian, mystic, poet, orator, polemicist, writer and pastor, qualities which complemented one another and made of him a man "to whom no one, or certainly very few, can be compared among those who have flourished from the beginning of the human race until today" (Pius XI). He is a philosopher, indeed the creator of Christian philosophy, but not a cold thinker: he knows the ways of the spirit and describes them with depth and passion; a theologian who brought about great progress in understanding Christian dogmas—trinitarian, *christological, soteriological, *ecclesiological, *sacramental, *eschatological—but who possesses a profound sense of the *tradition and full submission to the Catholica; a mystic who is also a pastor; a master who considers himself a disciple, indeed, a codisciple of Christ with the faithful; with a hunger to know Scripture, all of Scripture, quae Christum narrat et dilectionem monet (De cat. rud. 4,8): after reading it in and according to the church's living and praying tradition, he desires to expound it faithfully and clearly, intent on saying nothing of his own, convinced that to do so would be to speak falsehood (De Trin. 15, 28, 51; In Jo. Ev. tr. 5, 1). He loved to debate within the church, where the only victory must be that of *truth (ubi victoria veritas: Civ. Dei 2, 29, 2), debating "with holy humility, with Catholic peace, with Christian charity" (Bapt. 2, 3, 4). The Catholic Church has always considered Augustine one of its greatest doctors. *Celestine I defended his memory, numbering him among the "greatest teachers," as have many other popes to our day. Many councils—*Orange, Trent, Vatican I and Vatican II—have drawn widely on his doctrine and on his words themselves, showing that the doctrine was not Augustine's but the church's, and thus the church recognizes it as its own. Theologians—not least St. Thomas Aquinas—have always given great attention to his teaching. It is true he has been interpreted variously, but this is less a sign of obscurity than of interpreters being guided by the interests of the moment or of the objective difficulty of the problems. Augustine is not an obscure author, but neither is he an easy one, for many reasons: depth of thought, quantity of works, diversity of language, the unsystematic nature and evolution of his doctrine. Only those who manage to overcome all these difficulties will find the real Augustine, who is always alive in his works (Possidius, Life 31,8). In any case, the teaching of the Catholic Church, of which he wanted to be a humble interpreter (Quid sum? Numquid Catholica ego sum?. . . Sufficit mihi ut in ea sim: Enarr. in ps. 36, s. 3,19), remains the best key for understanding his thought.

III. His thought. Even a rapid synthesis would be impossible in this setting. A few lines must suffice, under three headings: philosophical, theological, spiritual.

Philosophical. The first problem that Augustine studied and resolved was that of the relation between reason and faith, the two "forces" that lead us to knowledge (Acad. 3, 20, 43; Ord. 2, 9, 26; Mor. eccl. cath. 1, 2, 3). The solution is summed up in the dual maxim: crede ut intellegas and intellege ut credas (Serm. 43,9). The first is based on the difficulty and multiplicity of the problems that must be resolved in order to give life a sure and wise orientation; the second, on the fact that no one believes "unless he has first thought that he must believe" (Praed. 2, 5), and indeed it is reason that shows us "who we must believe" (Ver. rel. 24,45). Assured of the collaboration between reason and faith, he studied the great themes of human thought, which he reduced to two—God and man (Solil. 1, 2, 7)—and created "Christian" philosophy (C. Iul. 4, 14, 77), which is both philosophy and something new: new with respect to the philosophy of the Platonists, whom he preferred (Acad. 3, 20, 43; Ver. rel. 4,7; Civ. Dei 8,5; 11,5), but whose "great errors" he opposed (Retract. 1, 1, 4), esp. those regarding *creation (Civ. Dei 11,4-5; 12,15-20), the preexistence of the *soul (Gen. litt. 10, 15, 27; Ep. 164 and 166), the unnatural and violent union of the soul with the *body (Trin. 15,7,11; Gen. litt. 7,27, 38; An. orig. 4, 2, 3), and the cyclical and *metempsychotic theory of history (Civ. Dei 10,30; 12,26) that he considered the magna deliramenta of these great philosophers (Serm. 241,6). Certain scriptural teachings touching on reason also served to stimulate his philosophical research: the creation of things and of man in God's image (Gen 1:1; 1:27; Jn 1:3); the notion of God as subsistent being (Ego sum qui sum: Ex 3:14); the knowability of the Creator through creatures (Rom 1:20). Augustine has three principles: (1) interiority, on which he insists in order to affirm the perception of truth by the mind ("truth lives in the inner man": Ver.. rel. 39,72) and guarantee certainty (Si fallor, sum: Civ. Dei 11,26); (2) the participation from which he derives creation ("Every good is either God or proceeds from God": Ver. rel. 18,35) and divine exemplarism ("Individual things have been created according to their particular ideas": Div. quaest. 83, q. 46,2); (3) immutability, which distinguishes creatures from the Creator, since "the only true, genuine, authentic being is immutable being" (Serm. 7,7; Conf. 7, 11, 17), the ipsum esse (Trin. 5, 2, 3), everything changeable is created: "The heavens and the earth proclaim that they have been created, mutantur enim atque variantur" (Conf. 11, 4, 6).

Enlightened by these principles Augustine studied the themes of God and humanity, the former so as to understand the latter ("God is the cause of being, the light of knowledge, the source of love": Civ. Dei 8,4), and the latter so as to understand the former. Indeed, he ascended to God starting from the human, who is, thinks and loves (and therefore through a threefold way: of being, knowledge and love), and illustrated the mystery of the Trinity by studying its image in human nature (Trin. 8-15). Human nature is "the great abyss," whose depths he scrutinizes (Conf. 10, 8, 10-17, 26), and "the great problem," esp. because of the presence of evil, the solution to which he seeks through reason and, not finding this complete or satisfactory, through faith. His point of departure is the composition of soul and body, which is profound (Gen.litt. 7, 27, 38), even mysterious (Ep. 137, 3, 11), and constitutes humanity. In general the great problems of *Augustinian philosophy, imposed by human nature, are three, with three great solutions: creation, *illumination and *beatitude. Augustine develops and defends these against the errors of the Platonists: (1) creation ex nihilo and freedom (in time), (2) illumination (not recollection) that gives ideas their certainty and universal value, (3) beatitude that, by its nature (if it is not eternal, it is not beatitude), excludes the cyclical idea of the Platonists.

Theological. Augustine's theological thought follows a method that includes adherence to the magisterial authority of Christ, the desire to know the content of the faith (intellectum valde ama: Ep. 120, 3, 13), the sense of mystery ("better a faithful ignorance than a rash knowledge": Serm. 27,4), and the conviction of the originality of Christianity, i.e., of the depositio fidei which must be preserved and, if necessary, defended. The authority of Christ, then, is manifested (1) in Scripture, which is the soul of theology; (2) in the tradition, which is apostolic if universal and ancient (Bapt. 4, 24, 31); and (3) in the church, which fixes the canon of Scripture ("I would not believe in the gospel if the authority of the Catholic Church did not lead me to so do": C. Ep. Man. 5,6; Faust. 28,2), transmits the tradition and interprets both.

Guided by this method Augustine deepened his understanding of the Christian mysteries, bringing about a great advance in *dogma. As we cannot summarize all of his thought here, we will focus on ecclesiology and soteriology, two mysteries to the understanding of which his contribution was greatest. In the Donatist controversy and in the City of God he developed the notion of the church as (1) a community of the faithful built on the foundation of the apostles; (2) a community of righteous pilgrims in the world, from Abel until the end of time; and (3) a community of the predestined, living in blessed immortality. The first is the communio sacramentorum in which, under the guidance of the bishops (Serm. 146,1), the councils (Ep. 54,1) and the Sedes Petri (Ep. 43,7), the good and the bad are united, the holiness of the former not being contaminated by the latter, although the *sacraments, by their christological nature, are also valid, though not fruitful, outside the true church. The second is the communio iustorum, which was also present before Christ, but not without Christ, in eschatological tension. The third is the communio praedestinatorum, consisting of those who constitute God's glorious kingdom, but "also now, the church is the *kingdom of God and the kingdom of heaven" (Civ. Dei 20, 9, 1).

In the Pelagian controversy he developed the theology of *redemption, *justification and actual grace, as well as that of *death, concupiscence, infant baptism and human solidarity (with Adam and with Christ). The key to understanding his doctrine is the *cross of Christ, the significance and efficacy of which he wanted to defend: ne evacuetur crux Christi (1 Cor 1:17). Of redemption, which is necessary because without Christ the Redeemer no one has been or ever would be freed; objective because it does not consist only in an example but also in the expiation of sins and reconciliation with God; universal from the fact that all without exception have been redeemed, he deduces the universality and the nature of original sin, which does not consist in imitation, as the Pelagians claimed, but in propagation, and is transmitted to all with human nature itself, which is in a state of decadence because of the sin of the first man (Pecc. merit. 1, 9, 9-10). For this reason all people need to be justified in Christ. Justification brings about the remission of sins, which is plena et tota, tota et perfecta (Pecc. merit. 2, 7, 9), and interior renewal, which begins here on earth and becomes perfect after the resurrection, when not only sin but also "mortality" and "infirmity" will cease (C. duas Ep. Pel. 3, 3, 4-5). But to attain justification and persevere in it, we need divine grace, which consists not in creation, even if this can be called grace, nor only in the divine law or the remission of sins, but "in the inspiration of charity by which we do with love what we know we ought to do" (C. duas epp. Pel. 4, 5, 11). Augustine defends the necessity, efficacy and gratuity of grace understood in this way. He teaches us to defend freedom and grace because Christ, according to the Scriptures, is both Savior and judge; he insists that we must hold both of these truths even when we we don't see their harmony, which is a difficult question for all and understandable by few; he points to the "sweet liberality of love" as the way to reconcile them: grace is not irresistible to the will but helps the will to resist *temptation.

Finally, on the mystery of predestination, the depth of which he appreciates, he highlights the gratuity of salvation, of which the shining example is the Savior himself, the man Christ Jesus (Praed. 15,30; Persev. 24,67): both the beginning of faith and final perseverance are gifts of God. Regarding those who are not saved he holds (1) that sins are the object of divine foreknowledge, not of predestination (An. orig. 1, 7, 7; Praed. 5. 10, 19); (2) that Christ died for all, including those not saved; (3) that "God does not abandon if he is not abandoned" (Solil. 1, 1, 5; Conf. 4, 9, 14; Nat. gr. 26,29; Civ. Dei 13, 15; etc.); (4) that if God, in whom there is no iniquity (Rom 9:14), can save everyone without merit, he cannot condemn anyone who does not deserve it (C. Iul. 3, 18, 36; Ep. 194, 6, 30; Civ. Dei 12,27). To understand the Augustinian doctrine of predestination one must consider all its aspects, including pastoral, and view it apart from the Scholastic disputes, which considered it under a different paradigm.

Spiritual. Augustine influenced our understanding of the Christian life no less than theology, in a deep and ongoing manner: he defended its foundations (theology of grace), developed its contents, showed its relation to the Christian mysteries and described its goal. The content can be summed up in the following arguments: universal vocation to holiness; charity as the soul, center and measure of perfection; humility as the indispensable condition for the growth of charity; *purification or ascetism as the law of interior ascents; *prayer as a duty and a need, the means and end of spiritual life; gifts of the Holy Spirit; imitation of Christ; love for and meditation on Scripture. Regarding the vocation to holiness he showed a doctrinal balance between the goodness of marriage and the excellence of consecrated virginity: regarding the states themselves, the latter is superior to the former iure divino (Virginit. 1, 1). Regarding all the Christian virtues taken together, a married person can be more perfect than the consecrated virgin. Regarding charity he highlighted three aspects: vitality, gratuity, centrality; he distinguished between servile fear or fear of punishment, which is opposed to charity, and the chaste or filial fear that accompanies charity and increases with it. His chapter on prayer is important, explaining its nature and defending its necessity (linked to the necessity of grace), interiority, usefulness for others, even "for those who have not yet been called, that they might be" (Persev. 22,60), its "christocentricity," since it is Christ who "prays for us, prays in us, and is prayed to by us" (Enarr. in ps. 85,1). Regarding the mysteries, he illustrates our relationship with the Trinity, the "recollection, contemplation and love" to which the Christian's worship and love is oriented (Trin. 15, 20, 39); with Christ the way and homeland, and therefore the Christian's entire life; with the church, love for which is the measure of perfection ("Everyone possesses the Holy Spirit in the measure in which he loves the church": Tract. Ev. Jo. 32, 8); with justification, which beyond remission of sins is the progressive restoration of the image of the Trinity in the person (Trin. 14-15); with eschatology, where there will be concors differentia (Virginit. 29); and in general with Scripture, hearing and meditating on which nourish the spiritual life (Conf. 11, 2, 2). He then describes the degrees of the spiritual life (Quant. an. 33,73-76), which correspond to those of charity (Nat. grat. 70, 84) and to the gifts of the Holy Spirit (Serm. Dom. 1, 1, 3-4, 12; 2, 5, 17-11, 39). He describes the nature of contemplation as a great mystic (Conf. 9, 10, 23-26; 10, 40, 65; Enarr. in ps. 4 1, 9-10), without neglecting its relation to the pastoral life (Serm. 103; 104; 179, 4-5), which involves an equilibrium between caritas veritatis and necessitas caritatis (Civ. Dei 19,19), an equilibrium which is one of the great merits of Augustinian spirituality.

CPL 250-386. Critical editions: Maurini (1679-1700), the best overall and the only complete, reprinted many times (Paris, Venice, Naples) and reproduced by J.P. Migne, Patrologia Latina (PL) 32-46; Corpus Vindob. (CSEL) from 1887; Corpus Christianorum (CCL) from 1954.

Bilingual editions: BA (Fr.) from 1948; BAC (Sp.) from 1951; NBA (It.) from 1965; Ger.: Sankt Augustinus - Der Lehrer der Gnade (anti-Pelagian works) from 1955.

Translations: The Fathers of the Church, New York from 1948; The Works of Saint Augustine: A Translation for the Twenty-First Century, J. Rotelle (ed.), Hyde Park, NY 1979–. For the individual works in the various languages see Patrologia III, 338-379.

Studies: See Augustinus Lexikon, Basel 1986–; Augustine Through the Ages: An Encyclopedia, Grand Rapids 1999. The literature being immense, I will limit myself to citing:

(1) Bibliographies: E. Nebreda, Bibl. Augustiniana, Rome 1928; Bulletin de Théologie Ancienne et Médiévale, Mont César-Louvain 1929ff.; R. González, Bibl. Agustiniana del Centenario: Religión y Cultura 15 (1931) 461-509; M.F. Sciacca, Augustinus: Bibl. Einführungen in das Studium d. Phil., Bern 1948; Bulletin Augustinien: AnThA 1949-1953 and then REAug of 1955; E. Lamirande, Un siècle et demi d'études sur l'ecclésiologie di St. Aug. Essai bibliographique: REAug 8 (1962); T. van Bavel, Répertoire bibliographique de St. Aug. (1950-1960), Steenbrugge 1963; A. Rigobello, Studi agostiniani in Italia nell'ultimo ventennio: Cultura e Scuola 32 (1969) 73-84; C. Andresen, Bibliographia Augustiniana, Darmstadt 1973; R. Lorenz, Zwölf Jahre Augustinusforschung (1959-1970): Theol. Rundschau 38-40 (1973-75); Fichier Augustinien: Inst. Ét. Aug., Paris 1972; E.S. Lodovici, Agostino: Questioni di Storiografia Fil., I, Brescia 1975, 445-501; T.L. Miethe, Augustinian Bibliography 1970-1980, Westport, CT 1982; A. Moda, Bibliografia per uno studio di S. Agostino: Nicolaus 22 (1995) 179-239. For the individual works, see the ample bibliography in the NBA.

(2) General Studies: Enciclopedie: C. Boyer, S. Agostino: EC I, 519-567; A. Casamassa, Agostino: EI I, 913-923; E. Portalié, Augustin: DTC I, 2268-2472; M.F. Sciacca, Agostino: Enc. Fil., I, 8-111, Milan-Venice 1957; A. Trapè, S. Agostino: BS I, 428-596; Id., Patrologia, III, 325-434 (with ample bibliography and indication of the eds. and trs. of the individual works).

(3) Miscellanea: Miscellanea Agostiniana, I, Rome 1930 (S. Aug. Sermones post Maurinos reperti), II, Rome 1931 (Studi); Miscellanea Augustiniana, Nijmegen 1930; Mélanges Augustiniennes, Paris 1931; Études Augustiniennes, Paris 1951; Recherches Augustiniennes, Paris 1958ff.; var. aus., S. Ag. Nel XV centenario della morte, Milan 1930; La Ciudad de Dios (special issue), 2 vols., El Escorial 1954; H.I. Marrou, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris ²1949 (It. tr. Milan 1987); A. Trapè, Agostino. L'uomo, il pastore, il mistico, Fossano 1976 (Rome 2001); C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique romaine, 2 vols., Paris 1979-1981; Les lettres de saint Augustin découvertes par Johannes Divjak, Paris 1983; A.-M. La Bonnardière (ed.), Saint Augustin et la Bible, Paris 1986; var. aus., Atti del Congresso int.le su S. Agostino nel XVI centenario della sua conversione, 3 vols., Rome 1987; A. Trapè, S. Agostino. Introduzione alla dottrina della grazia, 2 vols., Rome 1987-1990; M. Merino (ed.), Verbo de Dios y palabras humanas en el XVI centenario de la conversión cristiana de San Agustín, Pamplona 1988; A.J. Springer, Augustine's Use of Scripture in His Anti-Jewish Polemic, Louisville, KY 1989; G.P. Lawless, Augustine of Hippo and His Monastic Rule, Oxford 1990; Collectanea Augustiniana: Augustine, Second Founder of the Faith, J.C. Schnaubelt and F. Van Fleteren (eds.), Bern 1990; F. Thélamon, Destruction du paganisme et construction du royaume de Dieu d'après Rufin et Augustin: CrSt 11 (1990) 523-544; G. Madec, La patrie et la voie, Paris 1989 (It. tr. Rome 1993), ²2001; J.-L. Maier, Le dossier sur le donatisme, Berlin 1987-1989; E. Roll, Der platonisierende Augustinus, Stuttgart 1990; San Agustin en Oxford, X Congreso Internacional de Estudios Patrísticos, J. Oroz Reta (ed.), Madrid 1991; Augustine: From Rhetor to Theologian, ed. J. McWilliam et al., Waterloo, ON 1992; "Augustinus minister et magister": homenaje al profesor

Argimiro Turrado Turrado, O.S.A., 2 vols., Madrid 1992; N. Cipriani, Le fonti cristiane della dottrina trinitaria nei primi Dialoghi di S. Agostino: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 253-312; G. Madec, Petites études augustiniennes, Paris 1994; D. Marafioti, Sant'Agostino e la nuova alleanza: l'interpretazione agostiniana di Geremia 31, 31-34 nell'ambito dell'esegesi patristica, Brescia 1995; G. Madec, Le Dieu d'Augustin, Paris 1996; Id., La philosophie de Saint Augustin, Paris 1996; P.-M. Humbert, Gloria gratiae. Se glorifier en Dieu, principe et fin de la théologie augustinienne de la grâce, Paris 1996; M.A. Tilley, Donatist Martyr Stories: The Church in Conflict in Roman North Africa, Liverpool 1996; Id., The Bible in Christian North Africa: The Donatist World, Minneapolis 1997; J.M. Rist, Agostino: il battesimo del pensiero antico, It. tr. Milan 1997; M. Fiedrowicz, Psalmus vox totius Christi: Studien zu Augustins "Enarrationes in Psalmos," Freiburg 1997; E. TeSelle, Living in Two Cities: Augustinian Trajectories in Political Thought, Tonawanda, NY 1998; Augustinus in der Neuzeit: colloque de la Herzog August Bibliothek de Wolfenbüttel, 14-17 octobre 1996, K. Flasch - D. de Courcelles (eds.), Turnhout 1998; Augustin prédicateur (395-411), Paris 1998; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Agostino: tra etica e religione, Brescia 1999; San Agustín en Oxford, XII Congreso Internacional de Estudios Patrísticos, J.J. Oldfield - J. Anoz (eds.), Madrid 1999; N. Cipriani, La precettistica antica e la regola monastica di S. Agostino: Augustinianum 39 (1999) 365-380; L. Alici, L'altro nell'io: in dialogo con Agostino, Rome 1999; S. Lancel, Saint Augustin, Paris 1999; P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo: A Biography, New ed. with an epilogue, Berkeley, CA 2000; Augustine and Liberal Education, K. Paffenroth -K. Hughes (eds.), Aldershot 2000; Augustine and His Critics: Essays in Honour of Gerald Bonner, ed. R. Dodaro - G. Lawless, London - New York 2000; B. Kursawe, Docere-delectaremovere: die officia oratoris bei Augustinus in Rhetorik und Gnadenlehre, Paderborn 2000; P.-M. Hombert, Nouvelles recherches de chronologie augustinienne, Turnhout 2000; R.W. Dyson, The Pilgrim City: Social and Political Ideas in the Writings of St. Augustine of Hippo, Woodbridge 2001; C. Simonelli, La resurrezione nel De Trinitate di Agostino: presenza, formulazione, funzione, Rome 2001; G. Lettieri, L'altro Agostino: ermeneutica e retorica della grazia dalla crisi alla metamorfosi del "De doctrina christiana," Brescia 2001; "L'adorabile vescovo di Ippona": Atti del Convegno di Paola (24-25 May 2000), F.E. Consolino (ed.), Soveria Mannelli 2001; F. Dolbeau, Vingt-six sermons au peuple d'Afrique, mise à jour bibliographique, 1996-2000, Paris 2001; Augustinus Afer: Saint Augustin, africanité et universalité, O. Wermelinger et al. (eds.), Fribourg 2003.

A. Trapè

AUGUSTINIANISM. The continual reference to *Augustine in the West in the generations after him created Augustinianism (term coined by Franz Ehrle in 1889), or better "Augustinianisms," given the variety of interpretations of his thought in the theological, philosophical, spiritual and political spheres. If, on the one hand, the polymorphous interpretation of Augustine reflects the indubitable richness of his writings, it also indicates, on the other, their difficulty, so much so that Augustine himself felt the need to assist his readers. To this end he wrote his Retractationes three years before his death (427), the first book containing annotations to his writings before his episcopate (396/97), the second regarding his writings as bishop. In the consciousness of transmitting the faith contained in the Sacred Scriptures and handed down by the Roman Church (Ep. 194,1), he suggested criteria for reading his work, three in particular. (1) Bear in mind his progressive growth in knowledge of the Christian faith. If, for example (wrote Augustine), one reads his writings from before his episcopate, he will see that Augustine himself had been *Pelagian, thinking that faith originates in human beings and is not a gift of God; in fact he had already changed his opinion on this matter in the two books written to *Simplicianus (Praed. 4,8). (2) On many questions he was only able to indicate in some cases how far he was from understanding the question, in other cases only its complexity, and in still others only a sketch of a possible approach to a response (Trin. 1, 1,3; Retract. 2,53; Corrept. 1,1). Thus to read Augustine by extrapolating texts and contexts without also taking into account the chronology of his writings, one can refer to him without really grasping his thought. (3) One must even consider the necessity of continually validating the results of his research, not ruling out the possibility of error (Persev. 21,55). Thus he counseled his readers to attend to his writings once he had amended his life, and not to fall into the errors into which he may have fallen (Trin. 1, 3,5). Augustine also thought that not everyone could follow some of his writings, and when this was the case he advised either leaving off reading (as in Trin. 1, 3,5), or repeated reading accompanied by prayer, considering it a grace of God to be able to understand them in some way (advice given the *monks of *Hadrumetum on the understanding of the coaction of God's grace with human freedom [Grat. lib. arb. 24,46; Corrept. 1,1]).

The problems that confront scholars with respect to Augustine's legacy concern above all the Augustinian truth of the various Augustinianisms. Today, development of the methods of scientific criticism allows us to better distinguish Augustine's thought from perspectives that derive from readings of his writings which occurred in contexts of concerns different from those of the original context. We will give a brief historical summary of these readings, ignoring, however, interpretations given to his thought while he was still alive, related esp. to the polemic with *Julian of Eclanum and with the monks of *Marseille (on the latter, Ep. 225-226 inter augustinianas; and the Ep. Ruf. 5,6: PL 51, 77-90).

After his death, interpretation of Augustine went in two directions, in two different periods: the first, from his death (430) to the Council of Trent (1563), transmitted through *florilegia and four of his principal writings (Confessions, De Trinitate, De civitate Dei, Enarrationes in Ps.), though modulated by the Church of Rome; the second, which developed after the Council of Trent, according to the varying directions of the theological schools (the controversialists and that of the Augustinenses), the Augustinian movement at Louvain (Baius and Jansen), Paris (Port-Royal and the spiritual school of De Berulle - Pascal), and 19th-c. Italian spiritualism (V. Gioberti and A. Rosmini) and 20th-c. philosophy.

First period (from Augustine's death to the Council of Trent). The beginning of Augustinianism was marked negatively for Augustine by the libelli of double *predestination (to eternal life and death), drawn in some way from two Augustinian writings, De correptione et gratia and De praedestinatione sanctorum. These were read pessimistically, accusing Augustine of having sacrificed human freedom to God's grace and considering humanity as a massa damnata or damnationis. These interpretations, already noted by Augustine during his lifetime (426–427) in the Ep. of Prosper to Rufinus (PL 51, 77-90), we also find after his death (431–435) in the following works: *Prosper of Aquitaine's Pro Augustino responsiones: ad capitula obiectionum Gallorum calumniantium (PL 51, 155-174, also in PL 45, 1833-1844), ad capitula obiectionum Vincentiarum (PL 51, 176-186, also in PL 45, 1843-1850), and ad excerpta Genuensium (PL 51, 187-202, also in PL 45, 1849-1858); the Pseudo-Augustinian Responsio VI de praedestinatione (to be dated not after 435), contained in Hypomnesticon contra Pelagianos et Caelestianos vulgo Libri Hypognosticon (PL 45, 1611-1664, ed. J.E. Chisholm, Fribourg 1980, II, 191-208), which addressed the theme of predestination in 8 chapters, summarizing them in the Praedestinatio ad vitam and in the Praedestinatio ad mortem; *Arnobius the Younger's Praedestinatus of 432–435 (PL 53, 583-672; ed. F. Gori CCL 25B). After 435 the question reappears in writings titled De praedestinatione et gratia (divina-animae-gratiae) qui intitulatur de voluntate Dei (PL 45, 1677-1680) with the theme incommutabilis voluntas omnipotentis Dei (1,1), an interpretation that captivated all later predestinationists until Calvin, and those who speak of a "rigorous, extremist and pessimistic Augustinianism."

The reaction to such a reading of Augustine was immediate, both by the Church of Rome—Augustine had always spoken in a way consistent with the Roman Church, e.g., regarding *trinitarian faith (Trin. 1, 4,7) and original sin: fides ipsa nobiscum Romanae Ecclesiae [our faith is that of the Roman Church itself] (Ep. 194,1)—and by his other readers. The Church of Rome paid tribute to Augustine's auctoritas until the Council of Trent by officially recognizing him as a doctor: *Celestine I decreed to the bishops of *Gaul (431): Augustinum sanctae recordationis virum pro vita sua atque meritis in nostra communione semper habuimus, nec unquam hunc sinistrae suspicionis saltem rumor adspersit: quem tantae scientiae olim fuisse meminimus, ut inter magistros optimos etiam ante a meis semper praedecessoribus haberetur [We have always had in our communion Augustine of sacred memory, a man known for both his life and merits; there has never even been a hint of a rumor of any sinister suspicion: we remembered how he had such great knowledge in those days having always considered him to be among the best teachers more so than any of my predecessors] (Ep. 21, 2,3; PL 50, 530). The following confirm this position. Gelasius I (492–496): Hieronymum atque Augustinum ecclesiasticorum lumina magistrorum . . . [Jerome and Augustine were the luminaries of the teachers of the churches] (Ep. 7; PL 59, 40 B-C); the Decretum Gelasianum* (early 6th c.): de opusculis sanctorum patrum, quae in ecclesia catholica recipiuntur . . . item opuscula beati Augustini Hipponeregiensis episcopi [Concerning the opuscula of the holy fathers which have been received in the catholic church there are . . . likewise those of the blessed Augustine, Bishop of Hippo Rhegius] (IV, 2, 189-190; ed. Dobschütz TU 38/4, Leipzig 1912, 36-37); Pope Hormisdas (520) (Ep. 70,5 [Ad Possessorem]: PL 63, 493A); Boniface II (531) (Ep. 1 [to bishop *Caesarius of Arles]: PL 65, 31-32, in connection with the Council of Orange in 529); Martin I (pope 649–655) (Mansi X, 798-799; in PL 87, 119-121 on the consanguinity of the faith of the African Church with that of the Roman Church, made possible by the common source in Augustine). It should be noted how Martin I's testimony went well beyond a simple defense of Augustine's orthodoxy in questions regarding the grace of God and free will. Augustine's auctoritas is also present in *Leo the Great regarding *Chalcedonian *Christology, and consequently also in the synods of the Greek Church.

Regarding other readings of Augustine, positive florilegia for the Bishop of Hippo were begun by *Prosper of Aquitaine in the style of "sentences" (Sententiae ex operibus S.A., in PL 51, 427-496) and also as epigrams (Epigrammata ex sententiis S.A., in PL 51, 497-532), in which he was imitated by *Vincent of Lérins (PLS III,23-45 other excerpta). There are also the excerpta of *Eugippius (Excerpta ex operibus S.A., in PL 62, 561), which, beyond their frequent use, opened the way for the genre of the Testimonia divinae scripturae et Patrum of *Isidore of Seville and of the collections of phrases of various authors that resulted in the medieval Libellus Scintillarum (PL 88, 597-718 and PLS IV,218-2124). The Carolingian period esp., with its taste for collections, paved the way for the sententiae of the medieval masters who, in their teaching, did not have the original texts available to them, but collections of texts, called Tabulae or Auctoritates, which included an explanation. After Augustine's death, Prosper, on the one hand, rejected the attribution to Augustine of a predestination ad mortem and, on the other hand, defended the Augustinian perspective on the relationship between God's grace and the good done by the person. With him, however, the "predestination" problem began to be considered not so much in the Augustinian context of the grace of Christ but in the philosophical vision of the conception of God as the cause of everything. In this can be seen the first step toward the conception of predestination elaborated a century later by *Fulgentius of Ruspe (d. 533). Fulgentius nevertheless spoke of a "Catholic" reading of Augustine that of course went beyond any possible meaning that can be given to his statements (Ad Monimum I,28,1-5: 28,1: dictorum sancti Augustini . . . quid catholicus habeat intellectus de his quos ad interitum praedestinatos audemus [We have heard of the statements of Saint Augustine . . . which the catholic intellect holds concerning those who are predestined to destruction]). Until the 9th c. (the Carolingian Renaissance), the positive reception of Augustine continued in *Caesarius of Arles, regarding the theology of grace and free will (Council of Orange of 529); in *Cassiodorus for the liberal arts; in Eugippius, who made a synthesis of Augustine's works, having to some extent collected the library of Hippo; in Boethius for Augustinian trinitarian and christological themes; in the Victorine school for scriptural *exegesis; in Alcuin for the elaboration of a program of studies that united the liberal arts and the gifts of the *Holy Spirit; and in Anselm of Canterbury for theology united with philosophy (fides quaerens intellectum).

The low Middle Ages knew theological Augustinianism through Peter Lombard, compiler of the theological manual of the Sententiarum libri, the scholastic text most commented on by the great masters of the period, 90 percent of which was composed of sentences from Augustine. Through that text Augustine became the undisputed master of the medieval theological schools, including the masters of the Franciscan school (e.g., Alexander of Hales, Bonaventure of Bagnoregio) until Duns Scotus and William of Ockham, the masters of the Dominican school—in particular Albert the Great—until St. Thomas, and the masters of the University of Paris (e.g., Henry of Ghent). In the English context things reached the point in 1277 where the theologians R. Kilwardby and J. Peckham condemned the doctrines of Thomas Aquinas in the name of those of Augustine. With St. Bernard came the spiritual Augustinianism of grace and free will, of the primacy of the love of God (De diligendo Deo) and of progressive *ascetism (degrees of humility). If the 13th c. saw the establishment of Thomistic Aristotelianism, Scotism, Ockhamism, etc., the 14th c. knew the Augustinianism of the theological school of the Hermits of St. Augustine (OESA or OSA). Founded by Giles of Rome—together with Giles of Viterbo, Augustinus Triumphus, Alexander of San Elpidio, William of Cremona, Ugolino of Orvieto, Simone Fidati and the Englishman Thomas Bradwardine (d. 1349)—they developed that "School of Augustine/ Augustinsschule" that Gregory of Rimini called the via Augustini. They emphasized the will (the theologia cordis) over knowledge (the ratio)—and thus the superiority of theology over philosophy—the theory of *illumination, the absolute gratuity of gratia sanans, prescinding from any merit de condigno of human freedom. In the area of *ecclesiology, the school maintained the spiritual primacy of the church over the worldly political power, which developed into "political Augustinianism," according to Arquillère's famous formula.

Humanism took up Augustine with Petrarch (Secretum), Cusanus (Docta ignorantia), Marsilius Ficinus (De Christiana religione) and the Spanish humanist J.L. Vives, who wrote a celebrated commentary on the City of God. Italian humanism in particular knew a recovery of *Platonism through the Augustinian convent of the Holy Spirit at Florence in its phase of "Augustinization," whereas German Christian humanism emphasized evangelical categories (devotio moderna).

Second period (from the Council of Trent, 1563, to Vatican II, 1965). With Luther's much-discussed reading of Augustine, post-Tridentine Augustinianism lost its unified character, modulated by the Church of Rome, and fragmented into the Augustinianisms of the Catholic theological schools: the controversialist theologians; the school of the Augustinenses (E. Noris, Gianlorenzo Berti, Belelli); the Augustinianisms of Louvain and Paris (the first more theological, the second more spiritual: De Berulle, then Bossuet, Fénelon, Pascal, Malebranche, Blondel, Marcel); the Italian Augustinianism of Vico, Gioberti, Rosmini and, in more recent times, 20th-c. philosophy; the Augustinianisms linked to the Protestant Reformation (Augustine's authority was invoked against the legitimate authority of the Catholic Church) and with the Catholics Michael Baius and Jansen - Port-Royal, condemned by the Roman Curia.

Luther's (1483–1546) anthropology of the human being as peccator (the iniustitia hominis, being unable to overcome this, can only be covered by the iustitia Christi) led to the identification of peccatum originis with concupiscentia, considering the latter not only fomes peccati but also sin, the equivalent of the Pauline lex membrorum or lex peccati; these theses were condemned by the Tridentine decrees De iustificatione, de peccato originali of 1547. Luther's reading of the homo peccator was accredited to St. Augustine. Later with Baianism and Jansenism, after Rome's condemnation of some of their propositions, a genuine mistrust set in regarding the reading of Augustine's writings; from that point he came to be considered by many, esp. by the controversialists, more a weight from which to be freed than a Catholic author to be followed. The principal writings proposing a reading of Augustine contrary to that of the Catholic Church were Luther, Commentary on the Letter to the Romans ("Ad romanos," vol. VII, ed. Weimar 1931); Baius (1513–1589), De prima hominis iustitia (1564); Jansen (1585–1638), Augustinus, seu doctrina S.A. de humanae naturae sanitate, aegritudine, medicina adv. Pelagianos et Massilienses (published posthumously in 1640). Following are two texts giving the tone of the difficulties such authors provoked in Christian people and among theologians. Luther wrote: "It is impious to assert that after the sin (of Adam) the natural assets remained intact, whether in human beings or in angels" [impie qui asseruerunt naturalia mansisse post peccatum integra, tam in hominibus quam daemonibus] (quarta disputatio, De loco Rom. 3,28, Weimar 1926, vol. 39, n. 14, p. 55); Jansen later wrote: "The grace of Adam issued from the fact of being created; it was due to his nature in its healthy and integral state" [Gratia Adami est sequethe creationis, et erat debita naturae sanae et integrae] (in DS 2435). The Church of Rome intervened in this context to condemn a proposition of the Jansenist movement that invoked Augustine even to the disregard of papal bulls: Ubi quis invenerit doctrinam in Augustino clare fundatam, illam absolute potest tenere et docere, non respiciendo ad ullam Pontificis Bullam [Where there is found a clear foundation for doctrine in Augustine, we hold and teach it with absolute authority, without regard for any papal bull] (Alexander VIII, Decreto del S. Officio [7 Dec. 1690]: Errores Iansenistarum, in DS 2330).

Augustinianism passed through its most difficult period in the 17th and 18th c. Today Augustinianism, more than reflecting a theological or spiritual system, is broadly present in postmodern attempts to rethink the human person rather than in a precise, conscious reflection.

John Paul II, in the preface of the apostolic letter Augustinum Hipponensem, issued on the occasion of the 16th centenary of St. Augustine's conversion (386–1986), summarizes the role of Augustine's presence in the church and suggests new perspectives: "Augustine of Hippo, from the time when, one year after his death, he was numbered by my ancient predecessor Celestine I among the 'best teachers of the Church,' has continued to be present in the life of the Church and in the mind and culture of the entire West. To other Roman pontiffs then . . . I also added my voice to that of my predecessors, expressing the deep desire that 'his philosophical, theological and spiritual doctrine be studied and disseminated, such that he would continue . . . his magisterium in the Church, a magisterium, I added, both humble and luminous, that speaks above all of Christ and of love.'" In conclusion John Paul II reaffirmed: "In some way all of us in the Church and in the West feel ourselves to be disciples and sons [of Augustine]. . . . May the magisterium of such a doctor and pastor continue in the Church and in the world, to the benefit of culture and of faith."

First period. (1) H. Marrou, S. Augustin et l'augustinisme, Paris 1955; J.T. Lienhard, The Earliest Florilegia of Augustine: Augustinian Studies 8 (1977) 21-31; J. Madoz, Excerpta Vincentii Lerinensis, in PLS III,23-45; V. Grossi, La recezione "sentenziale" di Agostino in Prospero di Aquitania. Alle origini delle frasi sentenziali attribuite ad Agostino, in A. Zumkeller - A. Krümmel (eds.), Traditio Augustiniana. Studien über Augustinus und seine Rezeption (Festgabe W. Eckermann), Augustinus Verlag-Würzburg 1994, 123-140; V. Grossi, L'auctoritas magisteriale di Agostino e la Chiesa Romana (sec. V-VIII), in Memoriam Sanctorum venerantes (Miscellanea in onore di mons. Victor Saxer), Ed. PIAC 48, Vatican City 1992, 491-502; Id., L'auctoritas di Agostino nella dottrina del "peccatum originis" da Cartagine (418) a Trento (1546): Augustinianum 31 (1991) 329-360; P. Brezzi, Considerazioni sul cosidetto "agostinismo politico" (altomedievale): Augustinianum 25 (1985) 235-284; R. Arbesmann, Der Augustiner-Eremitenorden und der Beginn der humanistischen Bewegung, Würzburg 1965; F. Stegmüller, Gratia sanans. Zum Schicksal des Augustinismus in der Salmantizenserschule, in M. Grabmann - J. Mausbach, Aurelius Augustinus . . . , Cologne 1930, 395-409; D. Trapp, Augustinian Theology of the Fourteenth Century: Notes on Editions, Marginalia, Opinions and Booklore: Augustiniana 6 (1956) 146-274; A. Zumkeller, Die Augustinertheologen Simon Fidati von Cascia und Ugolin von Orvieto und Martin Luthers Kritik an Aristoteles: ARG 54 (1963) 15-37. (2) A. Bergvall, Augustinian Perspectives in the Renaissance, Uppsala 2001 (Psychology, Epistemology, Semiology, Politics, The Two Kingdoms); D.C. Steinmetz, Luther and Staupitz: An Essay in the Intellectual Origins of the Protestant Reformation, Durham NC 1980; L. Smits, Saint Augustin dans l'œuvre de Jean Calvin I: Étude de critique littéraire, Assen 1957.

Second period. (1) E. Stakemeier, Der Kampf um Augustin. Au- gustinus und die Augustiner auf dem Tridentinum, Paderborn 1937; V. Grossi, Agostino d'Ippona e il Concilio di Trento, in G. Alberigo - I. Rogger (eds.), Il Concilio di Trento nella prospettiva del Terzo Millennio, Brescia 1997, 313-341; Id., Indicazioni sulla recezione-utilizzazione di Agostino d'Ippona nella teologia post-tridentina: Lateranum 62 (1996) 221-251; on the Augustinianism of the 16th-17th c., the issue on the theme Le siècle de saint Augustin, of the journal: XVII[e] siècle 34 (1982) 99-241; P. Stella, Agostinismo in Italia e cultura patristica europea tra sette e ottocento: Augustinianum 16 (1976) 173-203; M. Lamberigts (ed.), L'augustinisme à l'ancienne faculté de Théologie de Louvain, Louvain 1994; C. Senofonte, Baio - Giansenio - Arnauld: Augustinianum 36 (1996) 255-270; L. Ceyssens, Autour de la Bulle Unigenitus. La déclaration, dèrnière illusion et ultime désillusion de Louis XIV: RHE 84 (1989) 5-29; L. Ceyssens, Le "Saint Augustin" du XVII[e] siècle: l'édition de Louvain (1577): Revue XVII[e] siècle 135 (1982) 103-120; A. Vanneste, Pour une relecture critique de l'Augustinus de Jansénius: Augustiniana 44 (1994) 115-136; B. Neveu, Augustinisme janséniste et magistère romain: Revue XVII[e] siècle 34 (1982) 191-209. (2) On the school of the Augustinenses in particular, W. Bocke, Introduction to the Teaching of the Italian Augustinians of the 18th Century on the Nature of Actual Grace, Louvain 1958; B. Van Luijk, Le controversie teologiche nei secoli XVII-XVIII e gli Agostiniani: Augustiniana 13 (1963) 201-225; Id., Gianlorenzo Berti agostiniano (1696-1766): Rivista di Storia della Chiesa in Italia 14 (1960) 235-262; 383-410; M.K. Wernicke, Kardinal Enrico Noris und seine Verteidigung Augustins, Würzburg 1973; A. Trapè, De gratuitate ordinis supernaturalis apud theologos augustinenses litteris encyclicis "Humani generis" praelucentibus: Analecta Augustiniana 21 (1951) 217-265; H. de Lubac, Augustinsme et théologie moderne (Th. 63), Paris 1965; J. Rupp, Pour le dialogue entre l'église et le monde moderne: l'indispensable Augustinisme: L'Ami du Clergé 76 (1966) n. 7 97-103; J. Morán, Presenza di S. Agostino nel Concilio Vaticano II: Augustinianum 6 (1966) 460-488; B. Neveu, Pour une histoire de l'Augustinianisme, in K. Flasch - D. De Courcelles (eds.), Augustinus in der Neuzeit, Brepols 1997, 175-201.

V. Grossi

AUGUSTINUS HIBERNICUS (7th c.). Irish exegete; we know almost nothing of his life. He was active in 655. His name recurs esp. in regard to spurious works of *Augustine. Attributed to him are three books: De mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae, a 7th-c. exegetical work on the most extraordinary events and miracles related in Scripture, and also perhaps a Commentary on the Catholic Epistles, written in the 7th c. in *Ireland and used by ps.-Hilary (see M. Esposito: JThS 21 [1920] 316-318; B. Bischoff: SE VI [1954] 269-270; CPL 1123 a [1995]).

PL 35, 2149-2202; M. Esposito, in Proceed Roy. Irish Acad., XXXV, 1919, 189-207; B. Bischoff: SE VI (1954) 189-281 (esp. 223-274); P. Grosjean, Quelques exégètes irlandais du VII[e] siècle: SE VII (1955) 67-98; Patrologia 3, 381; M. Simonetti, "De mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae." Un trattato irlandese sui miracoli nella S.S.: RomBarb 4 (1979) 225-251; J. Kelly, Hiberno-Latin Exegesis and Exegetes: Annuale Mediaevale 21 (1981) 46-60; CPL 1123 (1995); CALMA 1, 506.

M. Spinelli

AUGUSTUS, emperor (63 BC–AD 14). First *Roman emperor; Jesus was born during his reign (Lk 2:1-2). During the first centuries the idea that God had invested the unknowing Augustus with the mission of creating a political situation of unity and peace favorable to Christ's redemptive work was discreetly affirmed: *Melito of Sardis (cit. by Eus., HE IV, 26) stressed that Christianity and empire developed together in a providential design; *Origen (Cels. II, 30) held that God had given the Roman Empire a unifying task so as to eliminate obstacles to the propagation of the gospel; in line with Origen, *Eusebius of Caesarea (Dem. ev. III, 2,37; III, 7,30ff.) observed the connection between the universal empire pacified by Augustus and Jesus' birth; *Orosius, in the Hist. adv. paganos VI, 20, gave Augustus a divine consecration, considering his empire to be in every way prepared by the grace of Christ who was to come, and intepreting in that sense a prodigy that occurred at the start of the Augustan monarchy. The *Byzantine *John Malalas's late 6th-c. Chronicle even attributed to Augustus, with the legend of the Capitoline vision, a knowledge of the birth of Jesus Christ during his reign.

A.H.M. Jones, Augustus, New York 1970; P. Siniscalco, L'idea dell'eternità e della fine di Roma negli autori cristiani primitivi: StudRom (1977) 1-26; G.G. Belloni, Le "Res Gestae Divi Augusti." Augusto, il nuovo regime e la nuova urbe, Milan 1987; E.S. Ramage, The Nature and Purpose of Augustus' Res Gestae, Stuttgart 1987; J. Burian, Die Errichtung des Prinzipats und der Tatenbericht des Augustus: Klio 73 (1991) 420-431; A.B. Bosworth, Augustus, the "Res gestae" and Hellenistic Theories of Apotheosis: JRS 89 (1999) 5-18; A. Giardina - A. Schiavone, Storia di Roma, Turin 1999; A. Ziolkowski, Storia di Roma, It. tr., Milan 2000; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

AUNACARIUS of Auxerre (b. before 540/d. before 605). Aunacarius, or Aunarius, descendent of a noble Orléans family, became bishop of Auxerre 31 July 561. He held a diocesan synod in 585 or 592, whose 45 canons concern mainly liturgical and disciplinary questions (CCL 148A, 264-272). He took part in the councils of Paris (573) and Mâcon (581/3, 585), and produced a new recension of Mart. hier., the only one surviving. An Instructio de rogationibus et vigiliis (CPL 1311) that regulates eucharistic celebrations for the whole diocese is his. Also preserved are two letters sent by Pope *Pelagius II (CPL 1707) to Aunacarius, which show a certain influence of the bishop on the politics of the time, and a letter of Aunacarius sent to the African priest Stephen (CPL 2083), asking him to write a Life of St. *Germanus (lost) and St. Amatrius, his predecessors. Aunacarius is probably the author of the prologue of *Caesarius of Arles's Regula Monachorum. He died on a 25 September before 605, the day on which he is commemorated by the Mart. Rom.

BHL 805-806; Verzeichnis (41995) 305; BS 2, 592-593; LMA 1, 1238-1239; 6, 357-361; L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule 2, Paris 1899, 446; H. Atsma, Klöster und Mönchtum im Bistum Auxerre: France 11 (1983) 1-96; Y. Hen, Culture and Religion in Merovingian Gaul, Leiden 1995, 97-100.

S. Samulowitz

AURASIUS of Toledo (d. 615). Preacher who headed the church of *Toledo from 603–615. *Ildefonsus describes him as a good and moderate man (De vir. ill. 4). In the Synod of Toledo of 610 he obtained a decree from King *Gundemar, confirming the metropolitan dignity of the see of Toledo and making the city the capital of the ancient province of Carpentania. Of him we have only a brief, violent letter of *excommunication sent to the judaizing Frogan, count of Toledo, who had dared to rebel against the king (Ep. ad Froganem Toleti comitem).

CPL 1296; Díaz 81; MGH Ep. 3, 689; PLS 4, 1593-1596; J. Gil, Miscellanea wisigothica, Sevilla 1972, 45 and 48; DHGE 5, 494-597; L.A. García Moreno, Prosopografía del reino visigodo de Toledo, Salamanca 1974, 113; A. González Blanco, El Decreto de Gundemaro y la historia del siglo VII, in Los Visigodos III, Murcia 1986, 159-169; U. Dominguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 466ff.

P. Marone

AURELIAN, emperor (d. 275). Lucius Domitius Aurelian, emperor from 270–275; fought successful wars against the barbarians on the Rhine and Danube, and in the East against Zenobia, queen of Palmyra. He reformed the coinage and built the still-existing wall around Rome. A fervent devotee of the gods, in 274 he had a temple built in the city to the sun god, whose worship he made obligatory. For this reason he intended to resume *persecution of the Christians, to whom he had not previously been hostile; he had intervened in the dispute between *Paul of Samosata and *Domnus over the see of *Antioch, ruling that the church should be handed over to the bishop recognized by the Roman pontiff and the other Italian bishops (Eus., HE VII, 30)—a de facto admission of a Roman supremacy. According to *Eusebius of Caesarea, Aurelian intended to persecute the Christians (HE 7,30,20-21), though *Lactantius speaks as though the persecution began only once the emperor had been assasinated.

L. Pareti, Storia di Roma e del mondo romano, VI, Turin 1961; R. MacMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire: (A.D. 100-400), New Haven CT 1984; It. tr., La diffusione del cristianesimo nell'Impero romano 100/400, Rome-Bari 1989; M.H. Dodgeon - S.N.C. Lieu, The Roman Eastern Frontier and the Persian Wars, AD 226-363, London-New York 1991; V. Cubelli, Aureliano imperatore: dalla rivolta dei monetieri alla riforma monetaria, Florence 1992; E. Cizek, L'empereur Aurélien et son temps, Paris 1994; M. Christol, L'Empire romain du IIIe siècle. Histoire politique (192-325 après J.-C.), Paris 1997; A. Watson, Aurelian and the Third Century, London 1999; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

AURELIAN of Arles (523–551). Son of Sacerdos, bishop of *Lyons in 541; appointed bishop of *Arles in 546 at only 23; at the request of Childebert I, Pope *Vigilius appointed him vicar of the apostolic see in *Gaul, with the pallium (Jaffé 912, 913, 918). He had good relations with the court, which aided him to the benefit of the church of Arles. He founded the *monasteries of Sts. Peter and Paul for men and St. Mary for women. He wrote the rules for the two monasteries, broadly inspired by the rules for *monks and nuns written by *Caesarius of Arles. He took part in the Council of Orléans (549); he wrote Pope Vigilius regarding his position on the question of the *Three Chapters. We have the pope's response (PL 69, 41; Jaffé 925). Died at Lyons and was buried in the family tomb in the Church of St. Nicesius. His feast is 16 June.

CPL 1055, 1844-1846; PL 68, 405 (Ep. ad Theobertum; extract); 71, 1164 (idem); PLS 4,1203-1206; MGH Ep. 3,124; CCL 117, 426-428; A. Schmidt, Zur Komposition der Mönchsregel des heiligen Aurelian von Arles: Studi Monastici 18 (1976) 17-54; W.E. Klingshirn, Caesarius of Arles. The Making of a Christian Community in Late Antique Gaul, Cambridge 1994, 262-264; CALMA 1,550.

A. Hamman

AURELIUS of Carthage (d. 427). Little is known of his life; *Paulinus (Vita Ambr. 54) mentions a brother, *Fortunatus, a deacon in ca. 411. *Augustine, returning to Africa in 388, found Aurelius a deacon at *Carthage, and their friendship began then. From Augustine we know of his charity (Civ. Dei 22, 8,3), of his opposition to paganistic rites that Christians celebrated at the tombs of the martyrs and to the holding of agapai* in church (Aug., Ep. 22,4; 29,10). Aurelius was elected bishop between 390–393 (probably 391–392). *Cyprian's fame and Carthage's position as the capital of *Africa had increased the responsibility attached to this position; Aurelius himself spoke of these burdens at the council of 397 (Mansi, III 746, 929).

Only a few of his writings and speeches survive: the circular letter De damnatione Pelagii atque Caelestii of 419 (PL 20, 1009-1014) and the brief interventions at various councils (Mansi, III 699-843). His pastoral activity involved the problem of protecting Christian morals against the return of idolatry; Augustine praises his wisdom and vigor in this (Serm. 311,5). Often having to leave Carthage to attend councils, he entrusted preaching, previously the exclusive task of the bishop, to priests (Aug., Ep. 41, 1-2). He introduced psalmody into the Mass for the formation of the faithful (Aug., Retract. 2,11). Facing tensions that arose among *monks who refused to work, judging it inferior to prayer, he turned to Augustine, who ca. 400 dedicated to him De opere monachorum (Retract. 2,21). Aurelius had to guide the Christian community of Carthage at a time when it faced two schismatic movements: the *Donatists, led by *Primian, and a dissident Donatist group led by *Maximian.

Aurelius was a constant presence at the many African councils held mainly against the Donatists and *Pelagians from the late 4th c. through the first decades of the 5th c. In 416, presiding at an African provincial council, he signed the first synodal letter addressed to Pope *Innocent I against Pelagianism (Aug., Ep. 175; Mansi, IV, 321-324); Innocent's response was addressed to him (Mansi, III, 1071-1074; Aug., Ep. 181). Innocent and Aurelius had other contacts on the Pelagian problem, mediated by Augustine (Mansi, III, 1049.1078-1080). His position toward Pope *Zosimus, whose sympathies Pelagius and *Celestius had won, was less cordial (Mansi, IV, 350-359). The replies of the African episcopate, presided over by Aurelius, were ignored, both at the Council of Carthage of 1 May 418 (Mansi, IV, 366-367; 377-380), and in the two councils in late 418 and 25 May 419 (Mansi, III, 830-844). Still on the Pelagian problem, *Honorius and *Theodosius II asked Aurelius to preside over three more councils: 421 (Mansi, IV, 447-452), 424 (Mansi, III, 839-844) and 426 (Mansi, IV, 517-528). He died at Carthage in 430.

Aurelius made no special theological contribution: he was overshadowed by Augustine, with whom he was in perfect sympathy throughout his life, and whose advice he always relied upon. Augustine also dedicated De Trinitate and De Gestis Pelagii to him. Pastorally, his wisdom and his skill as a mediator seem to have made him a focal point of the African bishops and people (Possid., Vita Aug. 8; Aug., Ep. 41,2; Serm. 355,4; 111). *John Chrysostom (Ep. 149) also declared his profound esteem for Aurelius. *Orosius names him among the great defenders of the faith (Apol. 1), and *Fulgentius of Ruspe puts him among the great doctors of the church for his vigilance against *heresies (De verit. praedest. 2,22,42). The Mart. hier. commemorates him 20 July.

CPL 393-396; PL 20, 752-756; 1009-1014; 56, 418; 50, 423-427; DHGE 5, 726-738; BS 2, 609-612; PCBE 1, 105-127; F. Refoulé, Datation du premier concile de Carthage contre les Pélagiens et du "libellus fidei" de Rufin: REAug 9 (1963) 41-49; Ch. Munier, La tradition littéraire des canons africains (345-525): RecAug 10 (1975) 3-22 (see 7-10).

M.G. Mara

AUSONIUS (d. ca. 395). Decimus Magnus Ausonius, born at Bordeaux ca. 310, died there ca. 395, was first a professor and poet of that famous school, then the future emperor *Gratian's tutor at Trier, a courtier loaded with titles and honors (364–385); then, all his influence lost, he returned to his native town to cultivate his thought games and word games, esp. those of his 20 years at Trier. He taught *Paulinus before his *baptism (390) and vainly tried to dissuade him from the *ascetic life (395). He wrote Christian poems during his time with Gratian; his daily poems (Ephemeris and Domestica 2-3) may be a poetic transposition of his pre- and postbaptismal *catechetical instructions. There is nothing Christian in some of his other poems (Bissula, Cento nuptialis, prayers without biblical references, etc.). He remained in the antechamber of Christianity: an erudite but amiable rhetorician, ambitious but good, a singer of Janus and of Jesus. His bookish muse was inspired by contemplation of nature (Mosella), but never by biblical laus Dei. Yet his Parentalia were not indifferent Christians: his widowed sister Julia Dryadia, always avid for truth and ardent in charity (12,5-8), was a source of joy in their paternal home (12,9-12); his aunt Julia Cataphronia lived humbly in virginal *chastity and voluntary *poverty (26); his aunt Emilia Hilaria, a lover of consecrated *virginity, was as solicitous in charity as Christian virgines devotae (6); his uncle Clemens Contemptus lived a poor and solitary life in terra Rutupina. The equal distance from paganism and Christianity that led Ausonius to joke even about the Tris Deus Unus (Griph. 88) does not seem foreign to his captious mentality.

Ch. Guignebert, Les demi-chrétiens et leur place dans l'Église antique: RHR 88 (1923) 65-102; Patrologia 3, 264-266; J.R. Hussey, Ausonius and the Concept of the Worthwhile Life, Tufts University 1974; F. Benedetti, La tecnica del vertere negli epigrammi di Ausonio, Florence 1980; E. Di Lorenzo, Ausonio. Saggio su alcune componenti stilistiche, Naples 1981; G.J. Fisher, Studies in Fourth and Fifth Century Latin Literature with Particular Reference to Ausonius, Southampton 1981; Ch.-M. Ternes, Ètudes ausoniennes, Luxembourg 1986; A. Alvar Ezquerra, Estado actual de los estudios sobre Ausonio: biblio- grafía crítica 1960-1987: Estudios clásicos 33 (1991) 53-96; F. Della Corte, Storia (e preistoria) del testo ausoniano, Rome 1991; M.J. Lossau (ed.), Ausonius, Darmstadt Wiss. 1991; V. Messana, L'ironia di Ausonio e il suo sentimento religioso, in Polyanthema: studi di letteratura cristiana antica offerti a Salvatore Costanza, Messina 1991, 75-108; L. Mondin, Storia e critica del testo di Ausonio: a proposito di una recente edizione: BStudLat 23 (1993) 59-96; H. Sivan, Ausonius of Bordeaux: Genesis of a Gallic Aristocracy, London 1993; N.G. Davis, Cupid at the Ivory Gates: Ausonius as a Reader of Vergil's Aeneid: Colby Quarterly 30/3 (1994) 162-170; G. Guttilla, Ausonio e Paolino: rapporti letterari e umani: Impegno and dialogo 10 (1994) 177-189; L. Mondin, Dieci anni di critica ausoniana: 1984-1993: BStudLat 24/1 (1994) 192-255; J.F. Drinkwater, Re-Dating Ausonius' War Poetry: AJPh 120/3 (1999) 443-452; L. Mondin, Qualche novità sul "Technopaegnion" di Ausonio, con un saggio inedito di Dante Nardo: Lexis 17 (1999) 319-344; G. Polara, Tra "ars" e "ludus": tecnica e poetica in Ausonio, in G. Mazzoli - F. Gasti (eds.), Prospettive sul tardoantico: Atti del Convegno di Pavia (27-28 novembre 1997), Como 1999, 31-47; M. Skeb, Subjektivität und Gottesbild: die religiöse Mentalität des Decimus Magnus Ausonius: Hermes 128/3 (2000) 327-352.

C. Riggi

AUSPICIUS of Toul (d. 487/490). A person of vast culture, appointed bishop of Toul ca. 472. *Sidonius Apollinaris, his friend and correspondent, praises him in a letter to Comes Arbogastes of *Trier (see Ep. 7,17,3), and wrote a letter to Auspicius himself (Ep. 7,11,10) from exile in 475/476. We have an Epistula metrica of Auspicius's, one of the first significant examples of the genre; it is addressed to Arbogastes between 475/480 and gives him a program of Christian behavior (how to avoid cupidity and avarice) and government (respect bishops). The letter's perspective is pastoral; the style is somewhat elegant and varied, characteristically aristocratic. Auspicius died ca. 487/490 and was buried at St. Mansuy, where his body was rediscovered in 1107. His feast is 26 February (originally 8 July).

Editions: CPL 1056; PL 61, 1005-1008; MGH, Ep. 3,1 (1892) 135-137; repr. in CCL 117 (1957) 442-447; MGH, Poetae latini 4,2, 614-617; Fontes 4, 338-340 (ed. and bibl.).

Studies: AAS (1739) Julii, VI, 561-562; W. Brandes, Des Auspicius von Toul rhythmische Epistel an Arbogastes von Trier, Berlin-Wolfenbüttel 1905 (13, 16f., 24); Schanz, 4/2 (1920) 378f.; W. Meyer, Die rhythm. Jamben des Auspicius, in Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur mittelalterlichen Rytmik III, Berlin 1936, 1-42; DHGE 5 (1931) 781; Torsy (1959) 63; BS 2 (1962) 626f.; LexdesMitt 1 (1977) 1249; LTK[3] 1, 1268-1269; Patrologia 4 (1996), 289-290; BBKL 21 (2003) 44 (with bibl.).

M. Maritano

AUTHARI (560 ca.–590). Third king of the *Longobards (Lombards), *Arian, he succeeded his father, Cleph, in 584 after ten years' interregnum. His wise and ordered administration was favorable to the *Romans who, directly subjected to the Longobards in payment of tribute, were no longer vexed by arbitrary spoliation, so that relations between both parties moved toward a balanced normalization. Authari took the title Flavius to win popular favor and as an ideal link of legitimacy with the Roman Empire: all later Longobard kings imitated him. He tolerated the Catholics but, for fear of undermining loyalty to their Arian kings, forbade the Longobards from having their children baptized according to the Catholic rite; for this he was little loved by *Gregory the Great (see Epist. I, 17). He drove the Greeks out of the Exarchate and routed the Franks. He married *Theodelinda, Catholic daughter of duke Garibald of Bavaria. He died at Pavia, 15 November 590, and was succeeded by Agilulf. The historian Paulus Diaconus judges him favorably, on the whole.

Paulus Diaconus, Historia Langobardorum, III, 16-18; III, 27-35; G. Pepe, Medioevo barbarico, Turin 1941; G.P. Bognetti, L'età longobarda, II, Milan 1967; P. Delogu, Il regno longobardo, in G. Galasso, Storia d'Italia, I. Longobardi e Bizantini, Turin 1980.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

AUTHORITY, Ecclesiastical

I. The evidence of the early church - II. The functions of authority.

I. The evidence of the early church. Evidence tells us much about the structure of the first communities and of the authority exercised by their leaders and responsible men. One thing that modern criticism has brought out well is the diversity of constitutional forms adopted and the variety of functions exercised in the community, the traditions supporting it and the doctrines expressing its ecclesial consciousness (Dias 34-165).

It is beyond dispute that the Christian communities were from the start ordered bodies, in which the various functions (pastoral, liturgical, charitable, etc.) were carried out by appropriate ministers. The early church knew a wealth of *charisms, whose beneficiaries, esp. prophets, evangelists and teachers, enjoyed great prestige. Yet they remained subject to the judgment of community leaders, who could, with more or less latitude, admit them to governing offices. Rather than irreducibly opposing charisms and ministries, they were seen as complementary in their immense variety, under the guidance of the *Holy Spirit. Far from being slaves to charismatic or democratic anarchy, the early communities, following synagogue, priestly, Essene or other traditions, formed organizations—churches—under the direction of responsible leaders, invested with appropriate authority.

Even a cursory discussion of authority in the early church must bear in mind the three complementary realities just mentioned (constitutional forms, ministers and charisms, ecclesiological doctrines), situating them as precisely as possible in time and space. It is not enough to list the types of institution and the sociological models that emerge from the ecclesiastical structures of the first three centuries: one must call attention to how the very concept of authority was transformed under the influence of the context. The Christian tradition recognized above all else divine authority, the foundation of doctrinal and moral truth (Tertull., Cast. 4,6; Adv. Marc. IV, 4,5; see Aug., Civ. Dei I, 26); the authority of Scripture (Tertull., De pudicitia II, 10; Adv. Praxean XI, 9; Apol. 19,1; see Aug., Civ. Dei XII, 11); that of the rule of faith (Tertull., Adv. Marc. IV 12,3); and of the apostles, privileged witnesses and guarantors of this faith (Tertull., De praescr. haer. XXI, 4). The function of apostolic authority is to ensure the unaltered transmission of the doctrine received from Christ—and Christ, from God—explains *Tertullian; episcopal succession is the tangible evidence of this tradition. It guarantees the authenticity of faith and the permanence of apostolic authority in the church (De praescr. haer. XXI, 1; Adv. Marc. IV, 2,1). *Cyprian explains Tertullian's position with the doctrine of the local church, bearer of apostolic authority and of the authentic *tradition, but does not confine the origin of the authority that developed within the church to this tradition: he also stresses the role of the *martyrs (Ep. LXI, 2), identical to that of the Fathers and of the bishops met in council (Ring, 102-107). Beginning with Cyprian, the authority usually discussed is that of bishops and priests (Ep. LIX, 4, 13; cf. Leo the Gr., Ep. VI, 2), but from a twofold perspective. These in fact invested, on the one hand, with the authority derived from their position in the church, also, on the other hand, have a personal stature that is all their own and which confers on their actions a wholly particular authority. This latter authority is expressed as dignitas, gravitas, sanctitas, etc. At the beginning auctoritas was not confused with potestas. Cyprian notes with great precision that the episcopal power necessary for the exercise of this function derives from the authority that comes to the bishop in virtue of this function—pro episcopatus vigore et cathedrae auctoritate (Ep. III, 1). Later, the two terms were increasingly confused, all the more easily the more the bishop's powers were modeled on those of Roman magistrates. Pope *Gelasius, however, distinguished auctoritas sacra pontificum from regalis potestas (Jaffé 632); medieval canonists no longer made this distinction and credited the Roman pontiff with plenitudo potestatis.

II. The functions of authority. Leaving aside the forms of government of the apostolic and post-apostolic communities, it is a fact that from the 2nd c. the monarchical episcopate was imposed on all the Christian churches. Ignoring the modest beginnings of this institution and the stages of its development, we will describe its various aspects at the time when the episcopate displayed its whole potentiality. The texts of the 2nd and 3rd c. amply illustrate the nature of this authority, which was always held to be of divine origin. They agree perfectly on this principle and see in the bishop's election neither the delegation of the community nor a transfer to the bishop of rights and powers originally possessed collegially by the college of prebyters. Still less do they speak of the co-opting of sacred rights and powers, originally held by the "people of God," to the bishop's advantage. For *Hippolytus of Rome, through ordination the Holy Spirit descends on bishops who are the successors of the apostles, high priests, doctors, pastors and responsible leaders in the church (Philos. I, 1,6). In the Apostolic Tradition,* the prayers of ordination attest that the essence of the rite consists in the transmission of this sacred authority through the laying on of hands (chs. 2-3; ed. Botte, 5-11). Here we see the beginning of the later classical elements of the doctrine of the power of orders and the power of jursidiction. Moreover, in the power of jurisdiction and in the pastoral office, the Fathers included the power of the magisterium so as to ascribe to the bishop Christ's threefold dignity as priest, prophet and king. With these formulations, inspired more by Scripture than by a legal analysis of the functions exercised and powers really held by bishops, they expressed the convinction that the bishop's authority extended to all areas of church life: in a word, the bishop is free to administer the church as he will and is accountable only to God. Cyprian forcefully summed up this opinion: "Everyone must recognize that the bishop is in the church and the church in the bishop; if anyone is not with the bishop, neither is he in the church" (Ep. LXVI, 8,3). Cyprian was also the first to employ the concept of collegium to indicate the communion among the bishops (Ep. LXVIII, 3); indeed, he emphasized that apart from this universal college a bishop on his own has neither power nor dignity (Ep. LV, 24). Authority was affirmed in the church in three principal ways: (1) by formulating laws, (2) by exercising justice and (3) by suppressing errors.

Legislative power. This was held through the various jurisdictional elements, understood as mutually constituting a whole for the good of the churches. Chronologically, this power was first exercised (1) at the level of the local church by the bishops; then (2), in the broader framework of conciliar legislation (from the 2nd half of the 2nd c.); and finally (3), at the level of pontifical legislation, which tended to universalize itself, as did that of ecumenical councils.

1. No episcopal legislation survives in the form of episcopal statutes (or synodals), which prevailed only from the early Middle Ages. But such legislation certainly existed from the beginnings of the monarchical episcopate, though exercised under the more modest forms of oral prescriptions, practical directives and every kind of regulation for the good of the community. Traces of it remain in the rich anonymous literature that appeals to the apostles (from the Pastoral and Catholic Epistles to the voluminous 4th-c. compilations Apostolic Constitutions, Testament of Our Lord,* Octateuch* of Clement etc.). The immense variety of subjects dealt with in these writings attests the vast powers held by the bishops in the community's daily life: morals, canon law, social organization, education, assistance; all the sectors of Christian life, personal, family and social, were subject to their authority. But how was it actually exercised? We can imagine this exercise, at every level, as ranging from a kindly paternalism to the most rigid authoritarianism.

2. Conciliar legislation is the richest and theoretically most elaborate, starting from the 4th c., though it soon found itself in competition with pontifical legislation. In this area certain problems arose. First, that of the range of application of conciliar canons. Though the universal validity of ecumenical councils was not legally contested (nor the validity of local councils for provincial decisions), in fact (and in law) it was difficult, and often impossible, to define the territory affected by the canons of a council of bishops from different places but which did not reach ecumenicity (Gaudemet 2,15). Only *Africa constituted a unity, inasmuch as the presence of all its provinces at a plenary council guaranteed the application of canons to the whole and to every region. But could the same be said for the local councils of *Italy, *Gaul or *Spain? And what was their legislative power based on? The bishops, taken individually, certainly had this power over their own churches; they could therefore use it in council and make decisions together, which their respective flocks were bound to observe. But what if they had not approved the decision? Did the approval of the majority bind them also? And by what right, if it were true that all bishops had the same charism? The same problem also applied to absent and unrepresented bishops. In these cases, were not bishops required to give their consensus to conciliar decisions to whose elaboration they had not contributed, or which they had not explicitly approved at the time of their formulation?

This self-discipline appears to have been essentially moral rather than legal and was justified by the need for a common standard within Christian society. In the early church, where doctrine and tradition, action and teaching, *sacraments and *dogma were inextricably bound up, a bishop could not, of his own will, modify a tradition accepted everywhere, nor esteem above its accepted value a particular rite that was not essential or had only a local character, since "it is right that the whole should prevail over the different parts," as St. *Augustine says (Bapt. 2, 9,14). We must therefore take account of two external factors that played an important role in the acceptance of conciliar canons: on the one hand, the Fathers threatened the gravest sanctions (deposition, *excommunication etc.) against bishops who refused to observe them; and, on the other, a time came when the emperor consecrated the decisions of a council (which he had summoned for well-defined ends) as secular laws, accompanying them with sanctions. If this imperial act did not confer on the canons their authority, it could not contribute to ensuring their observance. From the time under examination (4th-5th c.), legislation came to form a hierarchy based on the prestige of the various conciliar assemblies, a phenomenon linked to various factors: number and origin of participants, fame of the bishops present, the will of the prince. We must also take account of literary tradition and changes in textual transmission. Augustine formulated some principles on this delicate matter: canons of general councils prevail over those of local councils; more recent decisions could abrogate earlier decisions of equal authority (Bapt. II, 3,4). In the 5th c. the papacy made the authority of a council rest on its *communion with the see of *Rome (Leo the Gr., Ep. CXLVII-CXLIX). For *Gelasius, male gesta synodus was what was contrary to Scripture, the doctrine of the Fathers and ecclesiastical norms, what the whole church had not accepted and, above all, what Rome had not approved (Ep. XXVI, 6).

3. From the start of the 3rd c. the papacy intervened in disciplinary matters, but it is not yet possible to determine exactly the areas to which these rulings applied (certainly Rome; probably central and S Italy and the islands of which Rome was the capital; but other regions?). Cyprian's correspondence attests Africa's autonomy with respect to discipline. The 4th c. shows progress in this area, with the issuing of decretals. *Siricius's letter to *Himerius seems a response or a rescript styled on the model of the relatio, in accordance with the practice of the imperial chancellery, but this was not the Roman pontiff's only form of intervention. He could transmit the decisions of the Roman synod to the bishops of a province or reply to a bishop's queries or establish new principles by virtue of his own authority. This direct legislation developed continually from the time of *Innocent I (401–407), reaching its height with *Leo the Great, Gelasius and *Hormisdas. The Roman pontiffs justified their legislative power by their authority in doctrinal and disciplinary matters; they appealed to their primacy, based on the Tu es Petrus; and they invoked the necessity of disciplinary authority as a condition and sign of unity of faith.

In the first decretals, the popes were very prudent; far from imposing their directives authoritatively and threatening violaters with sanctions, they invited to observance through fraternal exhortation and unceasing prayer (e.g., Siricius to Himerius: Jaffé 255; Siricius to the bishops of Africa: Jaffé 258; Innocent I to *Victricius of Rouen: Jaffé 286). They took extreme care to respect the tradition, citing Scripture abundantly and appealing to the customs and decisions of the Fathers (i.e., of the bishops met in council and of their own predecessors on the chair of Peter: Gaudemet 223). Under the great 5th-c. pontiffs, firm defenders of Roman primacy, the normative character of decretals was reinforced. The reply inviting observation of a provision became a legislative rule of more universal and permanent import, which could never be put in question.

Judiciary power. There were three instances of this power: the pope, the council and the bishop. The first two were exceptional instances, exercised in grave cases and mainly in matters of doctrine. Only at a late stage did the pope and the council become courts of appeal and revision. The ordinary instance of this power was that of the bishop, the audientia episcopalis*.

Penal justice. As the responsible head of his community, the bishop had a right to adjudicate to suppress errors (doctrinal deviations, disciplinary lapses). Such a system, however, appropriate for the small communities of the early church, soon showed itself inadequate; tribunals were thus needed to judge the bishops. From the 4th c. a more complex system appeared. Penal jurisdiction was no longer entrusted to special tribunals but ensured through different legal proceedings, the competence of which was not well defined in all cases, as the principle of hierarchy tended to prevail. Bishop, metropolitan, council, primate and pope could judge what penalties to apply. For this reason there were also various degrees in the conciliar proceedings, from the local or regional council to the ecumenical. In the 5th c., the advances in Roman primacy expanded the procedure for appealing to Rome.

RAC 1,902-909 (Auctoritas); 2,394-407 (Bischof); 10,360-492 (Gerichtsbarkeit); TWNT 2,595-619; U. Gmelin, Auctoritas, römischer Princeps und päpstlicher Primat, Stuttgart 1937; Th. Klauser, Der Ursprung der bischöflichen Insignien und Ehrenrechte, Krefeld 1949; J. Brosch, Charismen und Ämter in der Urkirche, Bonn 1951; W.H. Plöchl, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts I, Vienna 1953, 51ff., 343ff. (It. tr. Milan 1963); M. Kaiser, Die Einheit der Kirchengewalt nach dem Zeugnis des Neuen Testaments und der apostolischen Väter, Munich 1956; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (IVe-Ve s.), Paris 1958; B. Botte, La collégialité dans le Nouveau Testament et chez les Pères apostoliques, in Le concile et les conciles, Chevetogne 1960; K. Rahner - J. Ratzinger, Episkopat und Primat, Freiburg i.Br. 1961; O. Perler, L'évêque représentant du Christ selon les documents des premiers siècles, in L'Episcopat et l'Église universelle, Paris 1962; H. v. Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Tübingen 1963 (Eng. tr. London 1969); H. Lütcke, Auctoritas bei Augustin, Stuttgart 1968; P. Zmire, Recherches sur la collégialité épiscopale dans l'Église d'Afrique: RecAug 7 (1971) 3-72; P.V. Dias, Kirche in der Schrift und im 2. Jahrhundert, HDG III, 3a, Freiburg i.Br. 1974 (Sp. tr. Madrid 1979); O. Heggelbacher, Geschichte des frühchristlichen Rechts bis zum Konzil von Nizäa 325, Freiburg 1974, 23-69; Th.C. Ring, Auctoritas bei Tertullan, Cyprian und Ambrosius, Würzburg 1975; LTK 1, 1298-1303; TRE 5, 17-32; N. Schiffers, Autorität/Macht: Neues Handbuch Theologischer Grundbegriffe 1, 96-109; B. Holmberg, Paul and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles, Lund 1977; L.I. Scipioni, Vescovo e popolo. L'esercizio dell'autorità nella chiesa primitiva (III secolo), Milan 1977; P.F. Fransen, Authority in the Church, Louvain 1983; Ch. Munier, L'autorité de l'Église et l'Autorité de l'Esprit d'après Tertullien: RSR 58 (1984) 77-90.

Ch. Munier - G. Pilara

AUTOBIOGRAPHY. Greco-Roman antiquity produced an abundant and diversified literature, which manifested a strong interest in autobiography. Only rarely, however, did it produce autobiographical works with the principles and formal structure of a genuine literary genre, comparable in richness and precision to biography.

Setting aside the scant autobiographical information present in archaic Greek poetry (Hesiod and the lyric poets), in which one at times encounters the poet's self-conscious personal expression and inner feelings, we must acknowledge that a true and proper interest in introspection and the retrospective reflection that allows one to evaluate and narrate, in the present, the events of one's own past life emerges only in the 4th c. BC, in the context of the crisis of the polis and the emphasis on individual personality that resulted from it. This explains the development of autobiography in the centuries of *Hellenism and of the *Roman Empire, in the most varied forms and for the widest variety of motivations. Autobiography responded to a variety of needs, such as defending one's actions in the face of criticism and accusation (apologetic motivation); celebrating and explaining one's political, military or intellectual activity; narrating travels or explorations; showing, for edification and propaganda purposes, one's inner walk and the personal experiences of religious conversion; etc. Kings, politicians, historians, sophists, philosophers and poets all made use of autobiography, in literary forms such as aretalogical inscriptions, funerary epigraphs, letters, orations, novels, diaries, treatises and poetry. It is enough to cite as examples Isocrates's On Exchange of Estates; Plato's letter VII; the aretalogical inscriptions of Ptolemy I Evergete and Antiochus I; the Autobiographies of Nicolaus of Damascus, Flavius Josephus and Libanius; the confidences and personal memories scattered throughout *Philo of Alexandria's biblical commentaries and in the writings of the emperor *Julian; elegy IV,10 of Ovid's Tristia; memoirs of wars and travels, from Xenophon's Anabasis to the Commentarii of Julius Caesar; conversion stories like Apuleius's Metamorphosis, the Hieroi logoi of Aelius Aristides; etc.

Significant autobiographical fragments are not lacking in Christian authors of the first centuries: one thinks, e.g., of the letters (Gal and 2 Cor) in which Paul defends (apologetic motivation) the legitimacy of his apostolic vocation in polemic with his rivals the false apostles, and of the so-called Wir-Stücke [we sayings] of the Acts of the Apostles. *Abercius's epigraph contains precious autobiographical information on his life. The information provided by various texts, e.g., the first chapters of *Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho, the diary of the *martyr *Perpetua transcribed by the author of the Passio, Gregory Thaumaturgus's Thanksgiving to Origen, Cyprian's Ad Donatum, the Praefatio to Commodian's Instructiones, the introduction to the De Trinitate of *Hilary of Poitiers, and the Vision of Dorotheus and the Praefatio of *Prudentius represent important acquisitions insofar as these authors succeed in harmoniously combining information on the events of their life with a personal self-awareness of the experience of "conversion," whether "intellectual" or "moral."

Expressions of the states of the soul found in some prophetic texts (esp. Jeremiah) and in some psalms of praise or supplication played no small role in the origin of Christian autobiography. The characteristic element of Christian autobiography, however, regardless of the literary form employed, is the interaction of the "I" with the external world in the decisive context of God's saving intervention. Only at the end of the 4th c., nearly contemporaneously with the pagan rhetor *Libanius's autobiography (374-390), did Christian autobiography fully come into its own with *Gregory of Nazianzus and *Augustine.

Gregory often speaks of himself and of his personal experiences—family, cultural and ecclesiastical—in some prayers (e.g., 2, 9, 10, 12, 36, 42, 43) and in many poems. Section II.1 of PG 37 contains 99 compositions de seipso. Standing out among these for length and vigor is the poem De vita sua in 1,949 iambic trimeters, written immediately after the funeral oration for *Basil of Caesarea (382) and the first autobiography in verse in the Greek language. In it, mainly to console himself, Gregory responds to the accusations arising from the envy of his opponents—for Gregory, a kind of literary redemption of the defeat dealt him by events.

With Augustine's Confessions (397–400), Christian autobiographical discourse becomes even more complex and attains to depths previously unexplored. In his account the ordered chronological presentation of the external data mixes seamlessly and is enriched with the description of his intellectual and religious development and of his moral conversion leading to the radical choice of *asceticism. In the work, the author's earlier meditations on the mystery of original sin and divine election elaborated in Ad Simplicianum, and the new approach to the Scriptures just presented in the first two books of De doctrina christiana, find their appropriate autobiographical application. The story's plot, which reserves ample space for introspection and biblical *exegesis, nonetheless contains lacunae and obscurities which suggest the author's intention to offer an "authorized" interpretation of his own life. From the 5th and 6th c., a more or less clear influence of the Confessions can be observed in *Paulinus of Pella's Eucharisticos and *Ennodius of Pavia's Eucharisticum de vita sua. The autobiography of *Patrick, apostle to Ireland, bears the title Confessio.

A. Sizoo, Autobiographie: RAC I (1950) 1050-1055; P. Courcelle, Les Confessions de Saint Augustin dans la tradition littéraire. Antécédents et postérité, Paris 1963; Chr. Jungck, Gregor von Nazianz. De vita sua, Heidelberg 1974; G.A. Benrath, Autobiographie: TRE IV (1979) 772-789; E. Giannarelli, La tipologia femminile nella biografia e nell'autobiografia cristiana del

IV secolo, Rome 1980; K. Berger, Hellenistische Gattungen im Neuen Testament: ANRW II.25,2, Berlin-New York 1984, 1031-1432, here 1271-1274 (bibl.); M.F. Baslez - Ph. Hoffmann - L. Pernot (eds.), L'invention de l'autobiographie d'Hésiode à saint Augustin (Études de littérature ancienne 5), Paris 1993; A. Marcone, Tra paganesimo e cristianesimo: gli sviluppi dell'autobiografia nel IV secolo d.C., in Cristianesimo latino e cultura greca sino al sec. IV (SEA 42), Rome 1993, 7-18; I. Gallo - L. Nicastri (eds.), Biografia e autobiografia degli antichi e dei moderni, Naples 1995; C. White, Gregory of Nazianzus: Autobiographical Poems (Cambridge Medieval Classics 6), Cambridge 1996; var. aus., L'autobiografia nel Medioevo, Spoleto 1998; M. Hinterberger, Autobiographische Traditionen in Byzanz (Wiener Byzantinische Studien 22), Vienna 1999.

P.F. Beatrice

AUTUN. Augustodunum, a *Roman colony, later Civitas Eduorum (4th c.). A flourishing city in the early empire, it declined after the Batavian sack of 269 and the attack of the *Franks in 532. Its first reliably attested bishop is *Reticius (Duchesne, Fastes, II, 176), present at the Councils of Rome (313) and *Arles (314). A Christian community probably existed there before the 4th c., although *Pektorius's inscription may be of the 4th c. (DACL I, col. 3196), and the Life of Symphorianus (BHL 7967-7968), a local *martyr, a version of which was already known to *Gregory of Tours (Gloria Conf., 77), is not earlier than the 5th c. The stages of the expansion of this church, situated in the feudal dependency of *Lyons, are marked by the episcopates of Euphronius (mid 5th c.) (CPL 988), *Syagrius, who took part in the councils convoked by King Guntram (from 570-585), and finally *Leodegar (St. Léger, 663-680), known from a 7th-c. Life (BHL 4850; CCL 117, 527ff.) that relates his struggles with the Frankish king Childeric II (673) and with Ebroin, and finally his execution. The next attested bishop after *Reticius is *Cassian, followed by *Hegemonius, Simplicius (346?), Simplicius II (418?), all mentioned in Mart. hier., like Euphronius (452-475 . . .), Flavian, Pragmatius (517 . . .), Agrippinus (533 and 538) and Nectarius (549 . . .). After Syagrius (561–599) possibly a Leifastus, then Rocco (614 . . .), Babo (627 . . .), Ferreolus (contemporary of King Dagobert 629–639) and Ragnobert (660 . . .). *Leodegar was succeeded by Hermenarius, *abbot of St. Symphorianus and Ansbert (693 . . .); the only known 8th-c. bishop was Iddo (762). The episcopal complex includes, besides the ecclesia (dedicated to St. Nazarius and attested beyond doubt from the 6th c.), a domus, baptistery (7th c.) and, doubtless SE of the present cathedral, a basilica of St. Croix, located in the fortified castrum inside the old urban area, where two *monasteries are attested (6th c.). But it is mainly in the environs of the *cemetery to the east (St. Pierre de l'Etoffe) that oratories, basilicas and monasteries were established, esp. the basilica of St. Symphorianus, attested in the 5th c., St. Peter's (5th c.?) and St. Stephen's (5th c.).

L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, II, Paris 1910, 174-181; J. Berthollet, L'évéché d'Autun, Autun 1947; M. Chaume, Recherches d'histoire chrétienne et médiévale, Dijon 1947, 57ff.; Ch. Pietri, Autun, in La topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule, Paris 1974, 9-17; A. Ferrua, L'epigrafia cristiana prima di Costantino, in Atti del IX Congresso di Archeologia cristiana, Vatican City 1978, 583-613; C. Sapin, Autun, cité mérovingienne: Dossier d'Archéologie (May 1981) 32-38; Ch. Pietri (additions by J.-Ch. Picard), Autun, in Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIII[e] siècle. IV. Province ecclesiastique de Lyon (Lugdunensis Prima), Paris 1986, 37-45.

Ch. Pietri

AUXENTIUS of Durostorum (d. 386). *Arian bishop of Durostorum in *Moesia near Scythia, he had to leave his see as a consequence of *Theodosius's anti-Arian measures (ca. 380). Some time later (ca. 382) he was at *Milan, protected by the empress *Justina, and was appointed bishop of the Arian community there (not to be confused with the earlier *Auxentius, bishop of Milan from 355–374); he clashed with *Ambrose on the question of handing over basilicas to the Arians (385). A pupil of Ulfilas, he wrote the letter De fide vita et obitu Ulfilae, contained in the Dissertatio Maximin contra Ambrosium.

CPL 691; PLS 1, 703-707; SC 267, 236-251; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 44-58, 439; BBKL I, 305; Y.-M. Duval, La convocation du concile d'Aquilée de 381, in I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli III-V. XXX Incontro di Studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma 3-5 maggio 2001: SEA 78 (2002) 421-437.

M. Simonetti

AUXENTIUS of Milan (d. 374). A native of *Cappadocia, *Arian, he was a priest at *Alexandria under *Gregory the Cappadocian (339–345). In 355 he was ordained bishop of *Milan to replace the deposed *Nicene *Dionysius. He may have attended the Council of *Rimini. In 364 *Hilary, *Eusebius of Vercelli and a few other bishops tried to expel Auxentius from his see, but he appealed to *Valentinian, to whom he gave a written document appealing to the decisions of the Council of Rimini, declaring that he never knew Arius, expounding a very vague profession of faith and accusing his enemies of causing disorder in Milan by their interference. Valentinian decided for him and expelled his accusers. Later Auxentius repelled a similar attempt by *Filaster.

PL 10, 617-618; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 439; Simonetti 585; BBKL I, 305; C. Alzati, Un cappadoce in Occidente durante le dispute trinitarie del IV secolo: Aussenzio di Milano, in Ambrosiana ecclesia. Studi sulla chiesa milanese e l'ecumene cristiana fra tarda antichità e medioevo, Milan 1993, 45-95; M. Durst, Das Glaubensbekenntnis des Auxentius von Mailand. Historischer Hintergrund - Textüberlieferung - Theologie: JbAC 41 (1998) 118-168.

M. Simonetti

AVE PHOENICE, De (early 4th c.). A crypto-Christian protreptic epyllion in 85 elegiac distichs that presents serious interpretive difficulties regarding origin, date and the philosophical-religious doctrine it contains. It is not mentioned by *Jerome, but by *Gregory of Tours (582) and by the manuscript tradition attributed to *Lactantius, who compare it with a certain *millenarian aspiration and precise textual parallels. The elegant poem, considered by turns *pagan or Christian in character, addresses a theme popular in the literature and figurative arts of *Late Antiquity: the myth of the Phoenix arising from its ashes. The mythical bird, which already for the *pagans symbolized the world that continually renews itself, was taken up by Christian artists and writers (beginning with *Clement of Rome), who exploited its allegorical potential as a symbol of *resurrection and eternal *life. For Fontaine, who interprets the poem politically and is inclined to date it at 326, it was addressed to syncretist pagans of the imperial court who were familiar with the political import of the effigy of the phoenix that appeared on some *Constantinian coins.

Editions: PL 7, 277ff., CSEL 27, 2, 1 (1893), 135-147; E. Rapisarda, Il carme "De ave Phoenice" di Lattanzio, Catania [3]1959 (with text and It. tr.); U. Boella, Florence 1973 (It. tr.); A. Anglada Anfruns, Barcelona 1984 (text, Sp. tr. and comm.).

Studies: J. Fontaine, La letteratura latina cristiana (It. tr., ed. S. D'Elia), Bologna 1973, 69-70; R. van den Broek, The Myth of the Phoenix According to Classical and Early Christian Traditions, Leiden 1972 (with bibl. from 1876 to 1960); F. Bisconti, Aspetti e significati del simbolo della fenice nella letteratura e nell'arte del Cristianesimo primitivo: VetChr 14 (1979) 21-40; S. Isetta, Il "De ave Phoenice" attribuito a Lattanzio: Civ.Cl.Cr. 1 (1980) 379-409 (thorough bibl.); J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 53-66; W. Kirsch, Textimmanenz und Texttranszendenz bei Interpretation literarischer Kunstwerke, am Beispiel des Phoenix-Gedichts des Laktanz: WZRostock 34 (1985) 26-28; A. Wlosok, Die Anfänge christlicher Poesie lateinischer Sprache. Laktanzens Gedicht über den Vogel Phoenix, in P. Neukam (ed.), Information aus der Vergangenheit. Dialog Schule-Wissenschaft, klassische Sprachen und Lit., Munich 1982, 19-67; Id., Wie der Phoenix singt, in Musik und Dichtung, FS V. Pöschl, Frankfurt 1990, 209-222; D. Cerullo, Il carme De ave Phoenice di Lattanzio, in M. Rossi Cittadini (ed.), Presenze classiche nelle letterature occidentali, Perugia 1995, 343-365; M.G. Moroni, Note testuali al carme De ave Phoenice: Boll. St. Lat. 25 (1995) 105-110; E. Delbey, L'élégie De ave Phoenice: une poétique nouvelle de la métamorphose pour une esthétique du decus chez Lactance: REL 76 (1998) 216-225.

A.V. Nazzaro

AVITUS of Braga (d. after 418). Priest of *Braga in Portugal, lived at *Jerusalem from 409. There he exhorted his friend, the priest *Lucian—who following a vision had discovered the relics of St. Stephen at Kefar Gamala (Caphargamala), N of Jerusalem—to write an account of his discovery (ca. 415–416). Avitus translated into *Latin the Greek text of this Epistula de inventione corporis S. Stephani martyri (PL 41, 805ff.), and in 416 sent it with some of the saint's *relics and a dedicatory letter to Palchonius, bishop of Braga, by the hand of *Orosius. The narration's content seems suspect (cf. the Gelasian Decree in PL 59, 177—if, however, the Apocalypse of Stephen is identifiable with Lucian's account), as does the genuineness of the relics, which never reached their destination but were divided between the faithful of Minorca and *Uzalis in *Africa. *Augustine tells us of the spread of their cult in Africa (Serm. 316-324; Civ. Dei 22,8). At Jerusalem Avitus and Orosius took part in talks with Bishop *John regarding *Pelagianism (25 July 415). He is probably *Jerome's correspondent in Ep 79; 108; 124. Gennadius mentions him in the De viris illustribus (ch. 48).

Editions: CPL 575; PL 41, 805-808; E. Vanderlinden: REByz 4 (1946) 178-217 [181-183 (MSS), 188-189 (Epistula Aviti) 190-216 (Latin version)]. See also BHL 7850-7856.

Studies: DHGE 5 (1931) 1201-1202 (with bibl.); B. Altaner, Avitus von Braga. Ein Beitrag zur altchristlichen Literaturgeschichte: ZKG 60 (1941) 456-468 (= TU 83, 450-466); P. Peeters, Le tréfonds oriental de l'hagiographie byzantine, Brussels 1950, 50-58; J. Martin, Die "Revelatio s. Stephani" und Verwandtes: HJ 77 (1958) 419-433; B. Altaner, Avitus of Braga: A Contribution to the History of Ancient Christian Literature: Classical Folia 22,1 (1968) 105-120; J. Vilella, Biografía crític a de Orosio: JbAC 43 (2000) 94-121 (on Avitus: passim).

M. Maritano

AVITUS of Piacenza (d. ca. 457). Eparchius Avitus (former emperor), born of a senatorial family ca. 395 at Clermont (Aventicum, *Gaul). Having many important relatives, he began a military career under *Aetius. It seems he was first made magister militum, then praetorian prefect in Gaul ca. 439–440, during which time he had to deal with the *Visigoths, filling military and civil offices simultaneously. Retired from public life, he won the support of the Visigoths against *Attila's Huns. He then retired to private life again, near Clermont. In 455 he was appointed magister militum praesentalis by the emperor Petronius Maximus and sent as ambassador to the Visigoths to confirm their status as foederati. At Maximus's death (12 May 455) the Visigoth king *Theodoric urged him to assume the imperial purple, and he was acclaimed emperor at *Arles (9/10 July). He was recognized by the Roman Senate and went to *Italy (the *Vandals of *Africa had sacked *Rome), and on 1 January assumed the consulship in the capital; his son-in-law, *Sidonius Apollinaris, proclaimed the *panegyric (carmen 7). Later *Maioranus, comes domesticorum, and Ricimer rebelled and defeated him at Piacenza, 17 October 456, but spared his life. Eusebius, perhaps bishop of *Milan, consecrated him bishop of Piacenza (quem vitae reservatum Eusebius episcopus ex imperatore episcopum facit, *Prosper of Aquitaine, Cronaca s. a. 456). He died in 457 under unclear circumstances; his body was taken to Brioude.

PCBE 2,196-198; PCBE 2,229f.; R.W. Mathisen, The Third Regnal Year of Eparchius Avitus: The Interpretation of the Evidence, in Studies in the History, Literature and Society of Late Antiquity, Amsterdam 1991, 163ff.; Id., Agrestius of Lugo, Eparchius Avitus, and a Curious Fifth-Century Statement of Faith: JECS 2 (1994) 71-102.

A. Di Berardino

AVITUS of Vienne (d. 518). Alcimus Ecdicius Avitus, born ca. 450 of a noble family at *Vienne, where he succeeded his father as bishop ca. 490. The political moment was delicate since the *Burgundians, in whose realm Vienne was, feared Frankish expansionism; being *Arians, after *Clovis's conversion to Catholicism they doubted the loyalty of their Catholic clergy, not without some justification. Avitus nonetheless maintained good relations with King Gundobad, though he failed to convert him. He had a primary role in the conversion to Catholicism of Gundobad's successor *Sigismund; in 517 he presided over the the Council of Epaon, which confirmed the Burgundians' transition to Catholicism.

Avitus wrote in prose and in verse. His prose was collected in two corpora, one in 9 books of letters, the other in a single book of homilies. The letters, which largely survive, are written in the mannered and elaborate style typical of learned men of the time. They address various topics, some trivial, in the tradition of Sidonius, but many others linked to Avitus's pastoral activities, take up organizational, disciplinary and doctrinal questions. In Ep. 34 he forcefully stresses the primacy of the bishop of *Rome. The letters which open the corpus are doctrinal in character: Ep. 1 includes the Dialogi cum Gundobado rege, of which large fragments remain; in it, Avitus shows himself well acquainted with the arguments of anti-Arian *trinitarian theology. He is much less at ease in Ep. 2-3, Contra Eutychianam haeresim libri II, a *monophysite treatise written ca. 512 in connection with the *Acacian *schism: his information is scanty and he confuses the contrasting *heresies of *Nestorius and *Eutyches. In Ep. 4, De subitanea paenitentia, he refutes, without naming him, a letter in which *Faustus of Riez had maintained that *penitence at the point of death was insufficient to make up for a whole life of sin.

Only three of his sermons remain, plus fragments: two deal with *rogations, a ceremony of *expiation recently introduced at Vienne which would spread throughout the West. Avitus, who was highly educated and had a very aristocratic conception of the literary vocation, seems, like *Caesarius, to have been unconcerned with communicating at a popular level: his preaching is almost as elaborate and refined as his letters, with no concern for accessibility. Avitus's literary vocation is most evident in his poetry: his epigrams are lost, but we have 5 books De spiritualis historiae gestis, and the poem De virginitate, all in hexameters, written—as the author makes known in his introductory letter—as befits a Christian poet, who must put factual truth before ornateness of form. The first of the two works is in the genre of biblical paraphrase and aims to make the sacred text more accessible to educated people who were accustomed to the affectation of classical poetry. It presents episodes from Gen and Ex: the creation, the first sin, the flood, the crossing of the Red Sea. Avitus displays a good capacity for description and all the stylistic and metrical skill learned from the excellent instruction he had received.

CPL 990-997; PL 59; MGH AA, 6,2; H. Deninger, Alcimas Ecdicius Avitas, évêque de Vienne (460-526) et la destruction de l'arianisme en Occident, Geneva 1890; H. Goelzer, Le latin de S. Avite, Paris 1909; A. Roncoroni, L'epica biblica di Avito di Vienne: VChr 9 (1972) 303-329; M. Simonetti, Letteratura antimonofisita d'Occidente: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 522-532; G. Simonetti Abbolito, Avito e Virgilio: Orpheus 3 (1982) 49-72; S. Isetta, Rassegna di studi avitani (1857-1982): Bollettino di Studi Latini 13 (1983) 59-73; P. Flury, Juvencus und Alcimus Avitus: Philologus 132 (1988) 286-296; BBKL I, 311; Letters and Selected Prose, eds. D.R. Shanzer - I. Wood, Liverpool 2002.

M. Simonetti

AXIOPOLIS (Hinog, Cernavoda, Romania). A *Roman, then Romano-*Byzantine, city in the former province of *Scythia Minor, situated on a small plain on the right bank of the Danube, ca. 3 km (2 mi) S of the head of the great Cernavoda railway bridge, opposite the isle of Hinog. Martyrologies record several *martyrs at Axiopolis, headed by Cyril, Kyndeas and Dasius (Tasios). This is confirmed by a Greek epitaph (first half of the 4th c.), discovered by chance in 1947, bearing these three names. It specifies that *Dasius was martyred at Axiopolis, from where his *relics were transported to Durostorum and from there to Ancona in *Italy, probably following the Avar and Slav invasions at the end of the 6th c. The epitaph of the *sarcophagus in Ancona cathedral, mentioning the "holy martyr Dasius brought from Dorostoron," confirms this date for the translation. Archaeological excavations begun in 1898–1899 led to the discovery, near the N door of the fortress of Axiopolis, of a cemeterial basilica; on its S side was a small rectangular cell, within which was found a gravestone bearing the name "Anthusa, daughter of the great comes Gibastes." The epigraph with the martyrs' names was found in 1947 in the ruins of the basilica. The 1899 excavations, almost at the center of the old city, uncovered a rectangular room (8 × 12 m) with a brick floor; its SE corner was a cruciform pool, 0.5 m deep. The room is thought to be the baptistery of a Christian church. Numerous ceramic objects (amphorae, lamps, lids) were also found during the 1898–1899 excavations, all marked with a *cross.

There is one discovery of particular importance among those which, during the last twenty years, have advanced the archaelogical panorama of ancient Axiopolis. While it is true that there is no lack of remains of the first Christian basilicas built in this important city of Scythia Minor—in which a bishop certainly resided after the 5th-c. reform that saw *Tomis (the provincial capital) elevated to the rank of metropolitan see—it is also true that what best expresses the approach to worship among the early faithful are the private burial places. In the context of these, a Christian spirituality developed that was perhaps deeper, more authentic and more immediate.

An example of these, probably a family tomb in the chamber style, is a long rectangle with an E-W orientation. The interior, with its unusual brick barrel vault, is plastered and painted with one coat of red and decorated by alternating crosses and trees (extremely stylized) of different sizes; on the W wall, a cross whose arms extend to the edges is framed by two trees, one on each side; on the N and S walls, three trees each; on the E wall, a cross and a tree on each side of the entrance. Painted in red at the entrance to the tomb are two Greek letters (O and Y), a cross and a tree. Immediately to the right of the entrance, a small tree in a red frame; to the left, a cross in a rectangular frame. Above is painted the Greek letter Θ, an abbreviation of Θ(εοῦ). The cross-tree combination could easily be a symbol of the Tree of Life.

Considering the number of burials in the monument and their composition (two men, two women and a child), it is very likely that this was a family tomb. *Iconographic and stylistic criteria allow it to be dated from the late 5th c. to the early 6th c.

Except for a wooden box and a knife, the funeral trousseau includes very personal objects: a small gold cross, mounted with rolled and welded gold leaves and with a stone set in the center, and two earrings, both simple circles, one large and one small. Jewelry of this kind was quite common throughout Scythia Minor, and exact parallels can be found in all the coastal cities. On the skeleton on the S side of the tomb was found a rectangular bronze buckle, also of a production and type common in the province.

The only possible dating for the tomb is the first half of the 6th c. The reuse of a limestone slab to close off the only entrance to the tomb—a slab that in all probability belonged originally to a presbytery—does not necessarily have to be linked to the destruction of a church (even if this link might be suggested by the Avar destruction of 587); at the present state of research, lacking precise and relevant local comparisons, it is not possible to better specify the reasons for this reuse.

Unfortunately the rapidity with which the excavation had to be carried out did not allow for the examination of other similar monuments in the area around the tomb. This type of monument, however, is widespread throughout Scythia Minor, with the only peculiarity being the vault in brick rather than entirely in ston. But even this has at least a comparison in the funeral complex of Galatz.

R. Netzhammer, Die christlichen Altertümer der Dobrudscha, Bucharest 1918; Em. Popescu, Inscrip iile grecești și latine din secolele IV-XIII descoperite în România, Bucharest 1976; I. Barnea, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; Id., Christian Art in Romania, 1, Bucharest 1979; A. Suceveanu - I. Barnea, Contributions à l'histoire des villes romaines de la Dobroudja: Dacia n.s. 37 (1993) 159-179; BS 4,483f.; LTK³ 3,31f.; R. Pillinger, Das Martyrium des Heiligen Dasius, Vienna 1988; A. Rădulescu - V. Lungu, Le christianisme en Scythie Mineure à la lumière des dernières découvertes archéologiques, in Actes du XI^e Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne, 1984, III, 2561-2615; Provincie Romane: Scythia Minor, in EAA, Secondo Supplemento, 1994.

I. Barnea - A. Garrisi

B

BAALBEK ORACLE. The Oracle of Baalbek is a 6th-c. AD Greek oracular composition contained in a 12th-c. MS of Mt. Athos, part of the broad stream of the Sibylline tradition. The Oracle is a "rewriting" of an older oracle attributed to the *Tiburtine Sibyl, composed in the 4th c. AD and reaching us in *Latin translation. Its name derives from its probable authorship by an unknown author from the Syrian city of Baalbek—renamed Heliopolis after Macedonian colonists settled there (3rd c. BC)—seat of a famous sanctuary of the local Baal, identified with Zeus and later with Jupiter and thus known in the Greco-Roman world as Zeus/Jupiter Heliopolitanus. The Sibylline author seems to indicate the founding of the sanctuary in a passage mentioning the sacred buildings erected by "three sovereigns, Antiochus, Tiberius and Gaius" (Alexander 1967, 13, lin. 76-80). The oracle consists in the interpretation by the Sibyl of a dream of 100 Roman senators, as part of an exposition of the course of human history in the light of God's salvific action in Christ. The author freely elaborates his source's data, lengthening the sixty years after *Constantinople's founding it had predicted as the date of the end of the world, and inserts a whole range of post-4th-c. historical information. This shows how the Sibyl, by now for centuries transformed from a *pagan prophetess to an authoritative spokesperson of the revelation of the one God of the Jews and the Christians, was capable of adapting its message, rich in apocalyptic content, to changing historical situations.

P.J. Alexander, The Oracle of Baalbek: The Tiburtine Sibyl in Greek Dress, Dumbarton Oaks Studies X, Washington, DC 1967; P.F. Beatrice, Das Orakel von Baalbek und die sogenannte Sibyllentheosophie, RQA 92 (1997) 177-189; I. Cervelli, Questioni sibilline: Studi Storici 4 (1993) 895-1001; Y. Hajjar, Baalbek, grand centre religieux sous l'Empire suivi d'un appendice: Supplément II au corpus des documents iconographiques et épigraphiques héliopolitains, in ANRW II, 18, 4, Berlin-New York 1990, 2458-2508; H.W. Parke, Sibyls and Sibylline Prophecy in Classical Antiquity, New York 1988, It. tr. Genoa 1992; G. Sfameni Gasparro, La Sibilla voce del dio per pagani, ebrei e cristiani: un modulo profetico al crocevia delle fedi, in I. Chirassi Colombo - T. Seppilli (eds.), Sibille e linguaggi oracolari. Mito Storia Tradizione, Atti del Convegno Macerata-Norcia settembre 1994, Pisa-Rome 1999, 505-553.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

BABAI bar Nesibnaye the Less (d. 628/629). Biographical information on this monk is known only from a biography of the Berlin MS published by F. Nau and Seert's Chronicle. Combining these sources, we know that Babai was born in 563 to a Persian family that was exiled to *Nisibis by Shapur. He gave himself to worldly pleasures until he was 22, when (585) he did three years of spiritual exercises with *Abraham of Kaskar on Mt. *Izla. When Abraham died (588), Babai became a hermit in a cave near Ati in *Adiabene, receiving *Communion at the *monastery of Mar Ishozeka. His lengthy prayers foiled the attacks of *demons. Mar Abda and the future *catholicos Sabnis withdrew with him; at this time he healed bishop Jacob of Hodata. Urged by a revelation, he then returned to Mt. Izla and there built a monastery for over a thousand monks on the site of a ruined monastery founded by a certain Samuel. He is thought to have died at 75-and-a-half, in 628/629, although Seert's Chronicle tells of his last miracle, the prophecy of the sickness and death of Shiroè, one of the last of the *Sassanids, who died in 630—clearly the basis of Babai's reputation as a thaumaturge. We have several of his liturgical lauds and two sermons on *penance.

F. Nau, Histoire d'Abraham de Kaskar et de Babai de Nisibe: ROC 21 (1918) 161-168; A. Scher, Chronique de Séert, in PO 13, 4 (1918) 454-456; Baumstark 132; S.P. Brock, Notulae Syriacae. Some miscellaneous identifications: LM 108 (1995) 69-78; BBKL 20,83-85.

M. van Esbroeck

BABAI of Gbilta. A reformer of the sacred music of the Eastern church, Babai was originally from Gbilta in the diocese of Tirhan. He founded numerous schools of sacred music in the dioceses of *Adiabene and Marga (24; 60 according to other sources), which he directed and visited annually from the oldest of the schools at Kephar Uzel. According to Thomas of Marga, he lived during the patriarchate of Salibazeka (714–728). Author of mēmrē, didactic writings and letters, in particular he left many poetic compositions for liturgical use, traces of which are still present in the *liturgy of the hours.

Baumstark, 212-213; BO III/1, 177-181; E.A.W. Budge, Thomas of Marga, Book of Governors, III, London 1893, 1-3.

K. den Biesen

BABAI the Great. *Hegumen (d. 628). Born at Beth 'Aynata in Beth Zabday, after the customary period at the theological school of *Nisibis, he entered the Great Convent of Mt. *Izla, founded by *Abraham of Kaskar. Returning to his own region, he there founded a *monastery and a school. Returning again to the Great Convent, he became its third hegumen (after Abraham and *Dadisho), during a difficult period in which, by will of the emperor, the *Persian church was without a *catholicos. After *Chosroes II's death (628) he was designated catholicos but refused the position and died shortly thereafter.

He was important for the Persian church at various levels. First, he affirmed *Nestorian orthodoxy more explicitly than the hegumens who preceded him, so much so that it was officially sanctioned, in the formula of the two hypostases and a single prosōpon,* by a meeting of bishops in 612; noteworthy in this regard is his polemic against *Henana, rector of the school of Nisibis, who seemed to have introduced some troubling novelties in the areas of scriptural *exegesis—abandoning *Theodore of Mopsuestia's literalism—and esp. *Christology, with the at least partial revision of the Christology of the two hypostases and a single prosōpon. Babai also strengthened order and discipline in the *monastic world, though not without harshness, to the point that some older monks abandoned the community of Mt. Izla as a result.

Abdisho of Nisibis in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers (ch. 66, in Assemani, Biblioteca Orientalis, III, I 88-97) attributes more than 80 works to Babai, the majority of which are lost. Noteworthy among those we possess are the commentary on the Centuries of *Evagrius of Pontus; some treatises on Christology (the Book of the Union and other writings); *hagiographical writings (esp. the Acts of the Martyrdom of the Priest George, a Persian who converted to Christianity and was martyred under Chosroes II in 615); and monastic rules.

General presentations: J. Labourt, Christianisme perse, 280-287; Duval 73, 135, 212, 213, 223; Baumstark 137, 139; Chabot 60-61; Ortiz de Urbina 139-141; P. Bettiolo: Patrologia V, 476-477, 480-481.

Editions and translations: Story of the martyr George: P. Bedjan, Histoire de Mar Jabalaha, de trois autres patriarches, d'un prêre et de deux laïques nestoriens, Paris 1895, 416-571. Commentary on the Centuries of Evagrius: W. Frankenberg, Euagrius Pontikus: AKGWG n.s. 23/2 (1912) 8-471. The Book of Union and other treatises: CSCO 79-80, ed. A. Vaschalde, Louvain 1953. Rules: A. Vööbus, Syriac and Arabic Documents Regarding Legislation Relative to Syrian Ascetism, Stockholm 1960, 176-184.

Studies: L. Abramowski, Die Christologie Babais des Grossen, in Symposium syriacum 1972 (OCA 197), Rome 1974, 219-245; Id., Babai der Grosse: christologische Probleme und ihre Lösungen: OCP 41 (1975) 289-343; G. Chediath, The Christology of Mar Babai the Great (Oriental Institute of Religious Studies 49), Kottayam 1982; M. Tamcke, Der Katholikos-Patriarch Sabrîšô' I. (596-604) und das Mönchtum (Europäische Hochschulschriften 23/302), Frankfurt–Bern–New York–Paris 1988; G. Chediath, La contribution théologique de Mar Babai le Grand: Istina 40 (1995) 83-94; P. Bruns, Finitum non capax infiniti: ein antiochenisches Axiom in der Inkarnationslehre Babais des Grossen († nach 628): OC 83 (1999) 46-71; G.J. Reinink, Babai the Great's Life of George and the Propagation of Doctrine in the Late Sasanian Empire, in Portraits of Spiritual Authority: Religious Power in Early Christianity, Byzantium and the Christian Orient, ed. J.W. Drijvers - J.W. Watt (Religions in the Graeco-Roman World, 137), Leiden-Boston-Cologne 1999, 171-193; BBKL 1,316.

A. Camplani

BABYLAS of Antioch (d. 251). Martyr. According to *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE VI,29,4 and VI,39,4), Babylas should be listed in the series of the bishops of *Antioch of the 3rd c., between Zebennus (d. 240 c.) and *Fabius. He died during *Decius's persecution, in 251, probably on 24 January, the date he is commemorated in the 4th-c. Syrian calendar. The same source in Eusebius tells us that Babylas died in prison after confessing the faith; it is to this death in chains that *Severus of Antioch alludes in his homily honoring the martyr 24 January 513 (ed. Fr. Graffin, PO 38,2, 369-389). A century earlier, *John Chrysostom had claimed that Babylas was decapitated (PG 50, 527-534); he also attributes to Babylas the episode recounted by Eusebius (HE VI,24) of the bishop who demanded a public confession of the emperor Philip the Arab (244–249) before admitting him to the Easter vigil liturgy, placing this event at Antioch. Babylas was first buried in the Christian cemetery at Antioch, extra portam Daphniticam, but ca. 351 the Caesar Gallus had his body moved (the first official translation of relics of which we have record) to a church built in the martyr's honor in the suburb of Daphnè, to suppress the cult of Apollo there. *Julian the Apostate (362) had Babylas's relics moved elsewhere; not long afterward, Bishop *Meletius (d. 381) had a new basilica built for them, where Meletius himself was also buried, as John Chrysostom tells us (PG 50, 515-520). Already Severus of Antioch, in the text cited, alludes to the three children said to have been martyred with Babylas and remembered in some calendars. An echo of this tradition is in *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Francorum I,30) and in the Roman Martyrology on 24 January. In the Eastern church he is commemorated on 4 September. His remains were moved to Cremona in the Middle Ages.

BHG 889-893; PO 38, fasc. 2, 369-389; PG 50, 527-534; PG 50, 515-520; DHGE 6, 33; BS 2, 679-680; W. Eltester, Die Kirchen Antiochias im IV. Jahrhundert: ZNTW 36 (1937) 251-286; R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945, 109-111; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Paris 1947, 123ff.; J. Mécérian, Expédition archéologique dans l'Antiochène occidentale: Mélanges de l'Université Saint-Joseph 40 (1964) 1-144; H. Crouzel, Le christianisme de l'empereur Philippe l'Arabe: Gregorianum 56 (1975) 545-550; J. Chrysostome, Discours sur Babylas, SC 362, Paris 1990; LTK³ 1, 1334.

J.-M. Sauget

BACCHYLLUS. Late 2nd-c. Bishop of *Corinth, and one of the most notable personalities of his time. In the *quartodeciman controversy he supported the Roman custom, sending a letter to Pope *Victor (196) that *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE V,23,4) says was written in his own name, but *Jerome (Vir. ill. 44) says it was written in the name of all the bishops of *Achaia.

DHGE VI, 52; P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens des IIᵉ et IIIᵉ siècles, Paris 1961, 87-90.

E. Prinzivalli

BACHIARIUS (d. 425). 4th-5th-c. monk from *Gallaecia (Genn., Vir. ill. 24). Went to *Rome to defend himself against the accusation of *Priscillianism, expounding his theological position in the Libellus de fide, which was accepted. He returned to *Spain and died in 425 (Mundó, against Lapôtre and Duhr). His writings are the De lapso and the Libellus de fide; we have two drafts of the latter, a writing that exercised a great influence in the Middle Ages and was used by John of Fécamp (Confessio fidei). G. Morin also attributes two letters to him (RBen 40 [1928] 289-310), a thesis shared by Mundó, whereas Fischer is more reserved (Verzeichnis). Some effort has been made to identify Bachiarus with the Peregrinus episcopus, editor of the apostolic canons of Priscillian. The hypothesis appears difficult to sustain for D. de Bruyne, not impossible for A. Lambert. In the Libellus Bachiarus expounds the main truths of the faith; a highly learned man, he knew the Bible perfectly and overused *allegory. His taste for Orphism and astrology is troubling.

CPL 568-570; FL 20, 1237-1262 (De lapso); FL 20, 1019-1062 (De fide): ed. Madoz: RET 1 (1940-41) 457-488. The letters: ed. Morin: RBen 40 (1928) 289-310 - PLS I, 1035-1045, the first also in MGH Ep. 3, 714; A. Lapôtre, La coena Cypriani et ses énigmes: RecSR 3 (1912) 497-596; G. Morin, Pages inédites de l'écrivain espagnol B.: BALAC 4 (1914) 117-126; Id., Pages inédites de deux Pseudo-Jérôme des environs de l'an 400: Deux lettres mystiques d'une ascète espagnole: RBen 40 (1928) 289-310; D. de Bruyne, Études sur les origines de la Vulgate en Espagne: RBen 31 (1914/1919) 373-401; J. Duhr, Le De fide de B.: RHE 24 (1928) 5-40; 301-331; Id., Aperçus sur l'Espagne chrétienne du IVᵉ siècle ou le De lapso de B., Louvain 1934; Id., DSp 1, 1187-1189; Id., Une lettre de condoléance de B.: RHE 47 (1952) 530-585 (Ep. ad Tarasium); A. Lambert: DHGE 6, 58-68 (excellent treatment); F. Cavallera, Le De fide de B.: BLE 39 (1938) 88-94; J. Madoz, La nueva redacción del libellus de fide de B.: EstEcl 17 (1943) 201-211; A. Mundó, Prolegomena in B. editionem criticam, Tesi Pont. Un. Greg. Rome 1950; Id., Preparando la edición critica de B.: Bracara Augusta 8 (1957) 88-97; Id, Estudios sobre el De fide de B.: StudMon 7 (1965) 247-303 (with bibl.); RHCE 1, 27-29; H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila, Oxford 1976; J.P. Bouhot, La tradition manuscrite du De fide de Bachiarius: REAug 25 (1979) 73-84; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique, Paris 1991, I, 193-199; Domínguez del Val 1, 26-49.

A. Hamman

BAETICA. Province of Hispania created by Augustus (27 BC) and reorganized by *Diocletian (ca. AD 297). The following episcopal sees are documented in the 4th and early 5th c., confirmed by the presence of their bishops at councils: Corduba (Cordoba), Hispalis (Seville, metropolitan see), Illiberis (Granada), Ipagrum (Aguilar de la Frontera? Cordoba), Malaca (Málaga), Urci (near Pechina? Almería) and Tucci (Martos, Jaén). Evidence of other possible episcopal sees comes from the presence at councils of presbyters, sometimes recorded as representing their bishops: Acinipo (Ronda la Vieja, Málaga), Aiune (Arjona? Jaén), Alaro (Iluro? Alora, Málaga), Astigi (Ecija, Seville), Ategua (near Espejo, Cordoba), Carbula (Almodóvar del Río? Cordoba), Drona (Brona? Cadiz), Espora foederatorum (Montoro, Cordoba), Igabrum (Cabra, Cordoba), Iliturgi (near Mengibar? Jaén), Ossigi Latonium (Mancha Real? Jaén), Segaluinia (Selambinia? Salobregna, Granada), Singili Barba (near Antequera? Málaga), Solia (Alcaracejos? Cordoba), Ulia (Montemayor, Cordoba) and Urso (Osuna, Seville). To these must be added the sees of Elipa (Niebla, Huelva) and Italica (Santiponce, Seville), known from 589, and that of Asido Caesarina (Medina Sidonia, Cadiz), first mentioned in 619. Baetica had a great *monastic tradition, documented by the coenobia of Cadiz (Gades; Nono and Benedicta, founded by Fruttuoso ca. 650), Igabrum, Illiberis, Italica and Asido Caesarina.

The Councils of *Seville I (590) and Seville II (619) met at Baetica. Meriting special mention is the so-called Council of *Elvira, known from the Hispanic Canonical Collection (7th c.) and the Epitome Hispanica (6th/7th c.). The traditional chronology dates it 300/305, although after Meigne's studies, some scholars are inclined to consider it a canonical collection. The author divided the 81 canons of the Hispanic recension into three groups: A (can. 1-21); B (63-75); C (the remainder). The similarity of these acts with the canons of other councils, the disordered presentation of the canons beginning from numbers 20/21 and their unusual number (81) lead to the rejection of the notion of a unitary redaction of this text. Meigne does not rule out the possibility that a council was celebrated in Illiberis and that the 19 bishops and 24 presbyters mentioned at the beginning of the acts existed at the time. What can be verified of the chronology of these 43 names strongly suggests that the council was held ca. the 3rd decade of the 4th c. The most important religious personages of this province were *Ossius of Cordoba (1st half 4th c.); Gregory of Illiberis (2nd half 4th c.); *Leander of Seville (2nd half 6th c.); *Severus of Málaga (last quarter 6th c.) and *Isidore of Seville (1st half 7th c.).

Early Christian *sarcophagi made at Rome (4th c.) are very interesting archaeologically. Some are from the 1st half of the 4th c., such as the sarcophagi of Cordoba, Martos (Jaén), Castillo de Locubín (Jaén), Berja (Almería), Italica and Los Palacios (Seville); the rest, those of Cadiz and Jerez de la Frontera (Cadiz), are from the 2nd half of the 4th c.; later, locally made sarcophagi are from Alcaudete (Jaén), Écija and La Peñuela (Huelva). Early Christian basilicas have been found at Gerena (Seville), three-aisled with a tripartite presbytery, with a late 4th-c. narthex and baptistery; La Vega del Mar (Málaga), with two apses, one to the E and one to the W, two entrances at the N and S, and a tripartite end (like the following), and El Germo (Cordoba), probably a private church, with two apses and an apsidal room connected to the baptistery. From the *Visigoth period are the churches of Alcalá de los Gazules (Cadiz), the complex of the Villa de la Dehesa de la Cocosa (Badajoz), Burguillos (Seville), Alcaracejos (Cordoba) and Valdecebadar (Badajoz). The existence of other churches is indicated by the presence of baptismal pools (Alcáceres Reales of Seville or El Guijo, Cordoba) and epigraphical evidence (Vives, num. 301, 303-310, 313, 316, 322-326, 328, 333-335, 338-339, 354, 360, 561, 569): Usagre (Badajoz), Cabra, Málaga and Niebla, and in the provinces of Seville (Jerez de los Caballeros, Facialcázar, Dos Hermanas, Ginés, La Morera, Italica and Carmona), Granada (Granada and Loja), Cadiz (Medina Sidonia, Vejer de la Frontera, Zahara and Bornos) and Jaén (Alcalá la Real, Martos and Porcuna). Of note are inscriptions regarding the deposition of Bishop Pimenius of Ecija's relics (Vives, 304-306, 309). The sources also attest the existence of churches, such as the small basilica dedicated to Felix at Cordoba or the Church of *Jerusalem at Seville.

J. Vives - T. Marín, Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos, Madrid 1963; var. aus., Actas I reunión Nacional de Arqueología paleocristiana hispánica, Vitoria 1967; P. de Palol, Arte hispánico de la época visigoda, Barcelona 1966; Id., Demografía y arqueología de los siglos IV-VIII: BSEAA (1966) 5-66; Id., Arqueología cristiana de la España romana, Madrid-Valladolid 1967; Id., Arqueología cristiana hispánica de tiempos romanos y visigodos: RAC, Miscell. Josi, II (1967) 177-232; J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda, Barcelona 21969; D. Iturgaiz, Baptisterios paleocristianos de Hispania, Barcelona 1970; P. de Palol, Arqueología cristiana romana y visigoda: DHEE, I (1972) 96-113; A. Recio, Tapas romanas de sarcófagos paleocristianos en Hispania: Atti VIII Congr. Int. Arch. Crist. Vatican City-Barcelona 1972, 409-430; A. Recio, Fragmentos de sarcofagos romano-cristianos en Andalucía: Antonianum 48 (1973) 357-359; M. Sotomayor, Datos históricos sobre sarcófagos romano-cristianos de España, Granada 1973; L.A. García Moreno, Prosopografía del reino visigodo de Toledo, Salamanca 1974; R. Puertas, Iglesias hispánicas (s. IV al VIII). Testimonios literarios, Madrid 1975; M. Meigne, Concile ou collection d'Elvire?: RHE 70 (1975) 361-387; A. Recio, Baetica paleocristiana y visigoda: RivAC 54 (1978) 23-82; H. Schlunk - Th. Hauschild, Hispania Antiqua. Die Denkmäler der frühchristlichen und westgotischen Zeit, Mainz am Rhein 1979; M. Sotomayor, Historia de la Iglesia en España, I. La Iglesia en la España romana y visigoda (dir. García Villoslada), Madrid 1979; var. aus., Actes II reunió d'Arqueologia paleocristiana hispànica, Barcelona 1982; L.A. García Moreno, Historia de España visigoda, Madrid 1989; J.L. Ramírez, La inscripción de Torrebaja (Pueblo Nuevo del Guadiana, Badajoz), original modelo de la epigrafía cristiana: Antigüedad y Cristianismo 8 (1991) 89-98; F. Salvador, Aspectos sociales en las reglas monásticas de la Bética: La sociedad de la Bética. Contribuciones para su estudio, Granada 1994, 495-515; F.J. García de Castro, Sociedad y poblamiento en la Hispania del siglo IV d.C., Valladolid 1995; C. Godoy, Arqueología y liturgia. Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII), Barcelona 1995; E. Gozalbes, Aspectos de la crisis del Bajo Imperio romano en la comarca del Campo de Gibraltar: III Jornadas de Historia del Campo de Gibraltar (La Línea de la Concepción 1994), Almoraima 13 (1995) 109-116; F.J. García de Castro, La sociedad bética del siglo IV d.C. a través de las fuentes epigráficas: Mainake 17-18 (1995-1996) 193-205; F. Salvador, Prosopografía de Hispania Meridional, III: Antigüedad Tardía (300-711), Granada 1998; var. aus., Acta Antiqua Complutensia, I: Complutum y las ciudades hispanas en la Antigüedad Tardía (eds. L.A. García Moreno - S. Rascón), Alcalá de Henares 1999;

H. Gimeno - M. Miró, Carmina para Honorato, obispo de Hispalis: La polémica inscripción del sucesor de San Isidoro: AEA 72 (1999) 241-257; F. Salvador - A. Jesús, Propuesta de topografía monástica meridional en época hispano-visigoda: Florentia Iliberritana 12 (2001) 351-363; J. Vilella, Las iglesias y las cristiandades hispanas: panorama prosopográfico, in La Hispania del siglo IV. Administración, economía, sociedad, cristianización, ed. R. Teja, Bari 2002, 117-159; J. Vilella - P.E. Barreda, Los cánones de la Hispana atribuidos a un concilio iliberritano: estudio filológico, in I concili della cristianità occidentale. Secoli III-V (SEA 78), Rome 2002, 545-579.

J.A. Jiménez

BALAAM (iconography). Mesopotamian seer (Num 22–24) charged by King Balak of Moab with cursing the Hebrews for camping on his lands. When the donkey carrying him refused to stay on the road, the seer, instead of cursing, blessed Israel three times. The blessing has been interpreted by Christians as a prophecy of Christ's birth. Balaam appeared quite early in Roman *cemeteries, characterized by the presence of a star (see Num 24:17). The oldest depiction of Balaam may reflect this prophecy: Balaam (if it is actually him depicted in the scene) points to a star (cemetery of Priscilla, next to *Mary with the Child, first decades 3rd c.; Museo Pio Crist. Vat., epitaph of Severa, 3rd c., associated with the scene of the *magi; cemetery of Ss. Pietro e Marcellino, 4th c.; cemetery of via D. Compagni, mid-4th c.; cemetery of Ciriaca, 2nd half 4th c., where a Christogram replaces the star). Regarding funerary reliefs, Kirschbaum cites numerous other representations in which the image of the prophet may be recognizable together with other persons. From the 4th c. the scene also spread in which Balaam beats the donkey while the angel of the Lord appears to the donkey, stopping it with a bloody sword, as in Num 22:21-23: this episode appears on a *sarcophagus of the cemetery of S. Sebastiano (early 4th c.) and in the scenes painted in cubicles B and F of the cemetery of via D. Compagni (2nd quarter 4th c.).

E. Kirschbaum: EC 2, 717ff.; H. Aurenhammer: LCIK I, 276-280; J.J. Timmers: LCI I, 239; Wp 184ff.; Wa III, 49; L. de Bruyne, Sarcofago cristiano con nuovi temi iconografici scoperto a S. Sebastiano sulla via Appia: RivAC 16 (1939) 247-270; E. Kirschbaum, Der Prophet Balaam und die Anbetung der Weisen: RQA 49 (1954) 129-171; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto la Via Latina, Rome 1990; F. Bisconti, Il cubicolo dell'Esodo nel cimitero dei Giordani. Ultime manifestazioni pittoriche nelle catacombe romane, in Domum Tua Dilexi, Misc. A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 81-108; TIP 132-134.

G. Santagata

BALAI. Syrian poet (1st half 5th c.). We know nothing of his life, except that he was probably *chorbishop in the region of *Aleppo. The only chronological point of reference is provided by five hymns written in honor of a bishop Acacius, usually identified with the homonymous bishop of Aleppo (Beroea, today Aleppo), died c. 432. Balai also composed a long series of poems in pentasyllabic verse, many of which are included in the liturgical books of the *Jacobite and *Maronite churches, and an important poem for the dedication of the Church of Qenneshrin (Chalcis)—one of the few texts of primitive *Syriac literature attesting the conception of an invisible church, hidden in the hearts of believers (Murray); in it the angelic liturgy of Is 6 is explicitly linked to the Christian *liturgy.

General presentations: Duval 335; Baumstark 61-63; Chabot 35; Ortiz de Urbina 91-93; P. Bettiolo: Patrologia V, 457-458.

Transmission of the poetic work, edition, translations and studies: M. Zetterstéen, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der religiösen Dichtung Balai's, Leipzig 1902; J.J. Overbeck, S. Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae episcopi Edesseni, Balaei, aliorumque opera selecta, Oxonii 1865, 251-336. On the poem for the dedication of the Church of Qenneshrin, see R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom: A Study in Early Syriac Tradition, Cambridge 1975, 262-274; R. Graffin, Poème de Mar Balaï pour la dédicace de l'Église de Qennešrin: PdO 10 (1981/1982) 103-121; K. McVey, The Soghita on the Church of Edessa in the Context of Other Early Greek and Syriac Hymns for the Consecration of Church Buildings: Aram 5 (1993) 329-370; E. Vergani, Isaia 6 nella letteratura siriaca. Due autori del V secolo: Balai e Giovanni il Solitario: Annali di Scienze Religiose 7 (2002) 169-192.

A. Camplani

BALEARI. Archipelago in the W Mediterranean near the Iberian Peninsula, of which the Late Antique sources cite Maiorica (Majorca), Minorica (Minorca), Ebusus (Ibiza) and Capria (Cabrera). Conquered by the *Romans (123 BC), they became part of Tarraconensis, then Carthaginiensis (ca. AD 297); ca. 385 the Balearic province was created. Sacked by Gunderic's *Vandals (Ydatius, Chron. ad. a. 425; Isidorus Hispal., Hist. Wand. 73), after *Valentinian III's death (455) the Baleari were integrated into the *Vandal province of Sardinia (Victor. Vit., Hist. Pers. 1, 13), and a Vandal military leader replaced the praeses insularum Balearum (Notit. Dign., Occ. I, 105; XXI, 15). Apollinarius conquered it for the *Byzantines (534) and was its governor (Procopius Caes., De bello Vand. 4,5,7-9). They were part of *Mauretania II (Georgius Cypr., Descr. orbis Rom. 673-674) until the arrival of the Muslims (707).

Although the tradition assumed that Paul's planned missionary trip to Hispania (Rom 15:24, 28) actually occurred (Jerome, Ep. 65,12; 71, 1; 120,9; Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Interpr. Epist. II ad Tim. 4,17), the presence of Christianity is only attested with certainty by the letter of Bishop Severus (Ep. De conu. Iud.; datable to early 418) and Consentius's critical note (Ep. 12*, 4; 419/420). Severus tells us of his recent consecration as bishop of Iamona (Ciudadela), the arrival at Mahón of the relics of St. Stephen and their deposition in the local church, the large-scale conversion to Christianity of the influential Jewish community, and the burning down of the synagogue by the Christians and its replacement with a church which the Jews themselves then occupied. Based on archaeological evidence which dates the initial phases of the known Christian basilicas, such as Son Bou, to the 4th c., the most splendid period was the 5th-6th c.

Known in the *Vandal period are the titularies—forced by the Vandal king *Huneric to be present at the dispute with the *Arian bishops at *Carthage (1 February 484; Not. Prou. et ciu. Afric., Sard. 4)—of three episcopal sees, probably the only ones: Helias of Maiorica; Macarius of Minorica and Opilio of Ebusus. Known from the *Byzantine period are the letter of bishop *Licinianus of Carthago Nova (Cartagena) to his colleague Vincent of Ebusus, correcting him for accepting a judaizing text as canonical (Licinianus Carthag., Ep. 3); *Victor of Tunnuna's exile in the Baleari (Victor Tunn., Chron., ad. a. 555,2); and the intervention of *Gregory the Great (603) to resolve the problems of the *monastic community—probably located on the reef of Es Clot des Guix on the island of Capria (Gregory the Great, Reg. 13; Ep. 47). Possibly from the same period is the inscription of the presbyter Bas[sus] (Sa Carrotja), identified by some with a homonymous Roman of the titulus sancti Pudentis, still living in 595. In the 5th-7th c. the Balearian church does not seem to have had contact with the *Visigothic church, since it was present at no peninsular council.

The Christian archaeology of the Baleari has been much studied following the chance finding (1883) of the basilica of Cas Frares (Llucmajor, Maiorca). The four Majorcan architectural complexes are particularly noteworthy: Son Peretò and Sa Carrotja (Manacor), Son Fadrinet (Campos) and Cas Frares (Llucmajor); and the five Minorcan: Es Formàs de Torelló (Mahón), S. Bou (Alaior), Es Cap des Port (Es Mercadal), Illeta del Rei and Illeta d'En Colom (yet to be studied). To these are added the Christian buildings documented by the sources at Mahón (418): a church extramuros containing the relics of Stephen, the church intramuros built by the Jews on the cite of their earlier synagogue, and perhaps the structures of a small monastic community (Severus Minor., Ep. de conu. Iud. 20,4; 4,2; 12,2-3, 20,4).

These complexes knew their maximum splendor in the 5th-6th c. and clearly show North African influence, as is evident from the planimetric design of the buildings and from the arrangement of the space. All have baptisteries except Cas Frares; that of Son Peretó has two contiguous pools. The buildings are for the most part three-aisled, some on a rectangular plan (Cas Frares and Sa Carrotja), or with attached rooms (Son Peretó, Son Bou, Es Formás de Torelló, Illeta de Rei); others very probably had a counter-choir (Son Peretó, Cas Frares and Es Cap des Port). The complex of Es Cap des Port stands out for the architectural complexity of its plan. There are less explicit remains of these complexes as well, for the most part architectural material, movable art for use in *liturgy, and in urban and rural necropolises—Sanisera (Sanitja), the forum of Pollentia (Alcúdia), Hort d'Es Palmer (Ibiza), carrer Aragó (Ibiza), etc.—which point to the existence of associated basilicas. Until now no church has been discovered at Ibiza, but other evidence has come to light, such as the gold ring of Vifredus, decorated with a cross (Ibiza, 7th c.).

Also significant are the funerary inscriptions of the first Balearian Christians known by name: Honoria (Sa Carrotja, late 5th c.), Arguta (Pollentia, 5th/6th c.), and Marcus and Baleria (Son Peretó, mid-5th c.). Christian mosaic decoration—sparse on the peninsula and completely lacking at Sa Carrotja (only with mosaic laudae), Son Bou and Es Cap des Port—is a characteristic element of the Balearian complexes.

A. Lambert, Baléares: DHGE VI, Paris 1932, 364-379; È. Vanderlinden, Reuelatio Sancti Stephani: REB 4 (1946) 178-217; G. Seguí Vidal, La basílica descubierta en Son Bou y los orígenes del cristianismo en Menorca: Studi sulla church antica and sull'umanesimo, Rome 1954, 79-92.; P. de Palol, Basílicas paleocristianas en la isla de Menorca: Festschrift Friedrich Gerke, Baden-Baden 1962, 39-53; J. Camps Coll, Primeros hallazgos arqueológicos en las islas de Cabrera y Conejera: VII Congreso Nacional de Arqueología, Saragossa 1962, 188-190; P. de Palol, Arqueología cristiana de la España romana: siglos IV-VI, Madrid-Valladolid 1967; Id., Arte paleocristiano en España, Barcelona 1968; P. de Palol - G. Rosselló - Bordoy - A. Alomar - J. Camps, Notas sobre las basílicas de Manacor, en Mallorca, Valladolid 1968; J. Vives, Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda, Barcelona 1969; C. Veny, La cristianització de les Balears: Randa 5 (1977) 43-51; E. Demougeot, L'évêque Sévère et les juifs de Minorque au Ve siècle: Majorque, Languedoc et Roussillon, Actes du LIII Congrès de la Fédération Historique de Languedoc Méditerranéen et du Roussillon, Montpellier 1982, 13-34; E.D. Hunt, St. Stephen in Minorca: An Episode in Jewish-Christian Relations in the Early 5th Century AD: JTS 33 (1982) 106-123; J. Vilella, Relacions comercials de les Balears des del baix imperi fins als àrabs: Les Illes Balears en temps cristians fins als àrabs, Ciudadela 1988, 51-58; R. Zucca, Insulae Baliares. Le isole Baleari sotto il dominio romano, Rome 1998; J. Amengual, Els orígens del cristianisme a les Balears, I-II, Palma de Mallorca 1991-1992; C. Ginzburg, La conversione degli ebrei di Minorca (417/418): Quaderni Storici 27 (1992) 277-289; J. Amengual, Vestigis d'edilícia a les cartes de Consenci i Sever: III Reunión de Arqueología Cristiana Hispánica, Barcelona 1994, 489-497; N. Duval, La place des églises des Baléares dans l'archéologie chrétienne de la Méditerranée occidentale: III Reunión de Arqueología Cristiana Hispánica, Barcelona 1994, 203-211; J.C. de Nicolás i Mascaró, Sigillates paleocristianes ataronjades i grises a l'Illa de Menorca (Balears): III Reunión de Arqueología Cristiana Hispánica, Barcelona 1994, 311-320 (esp. 320); C. Godoy, Arqueología y liturgia. Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII), Barcelona 1995; B. Ferrer, Jueus i cristians a Hispania durant l'Antiguitat Tardana (417/418-654): aproximació als motius del conflicte: AIEG 38 (1996-1997) 1245-1264 [= Hispània i Roma: d'August a Carlemany. Congrés d'Homenatge al Dr. Pere de Palol, III]; M. Orfila - F. Tuset - T. Ulbert, Informe preliminar de los trabajos en el conjunto paleocristiano de Son Fadrinet (Campos, Mallorca): V Reunión de Arqueología Cristiana Hispánica, Barcelona 2000, 237-243; J. Vilella, Las relaciones eclesiásticas de Hispania con África en época vándala (a. 429-533): Augustinianum 42 (2002) 445-468.

C. Buenacasa - J. Sales

BAPTISM

I. Baptism in the Fathers - II. Iconography - III. Baptismal controversy.

I. Baptism in the Fathers. Baptism, the act of immersing oneself or being immersed in water, is not a Christian creation. It was practiced by numerous sects in the time of Jesus, and by the Jews for admitting proselytes. By metonymy, the word signified the whole sacramental procedure by which the catechumen broke with sin and the seductions of the devil, entered a new relationship, through faith, with the triune God and was joined to the people of the new covenant. We find the first specific information in Acts 8:37, then in Didache 7, which already adapts to different situations, and in *Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 61); it is the first ritual in the Apostolic Tradition* 21, attested by the Verona *palimpsest. The first Fathers (*Irenaeus, *Origen) speak more of *theology than *liturgy. *Tertullian's De baptismo is the first complete treatise, an echo of the baptismal *catechesis.

Other than the common biblical texts (Ex 14:15-31; Mt 3:13-17; Lk 3:21-22; Mk 1:4, 9-11; Jn 1:31-34; 1 Cor 10:1-2; 1 Pet 3:21), it can be easily shown that the Fathers more commonly used Pauline baptismal theology (Rom 6:2-6; 1 Cor 12:12-13; Gal 3:27; Col 2:11-13; Tit 3:5-7). There is a strongly Johannine line of interpretation (Jn 3:18), however, represented by the churches of *Armenia and *Syria but also by other groups such as the *gnostics.

The baptismal liturgy was well-fixed by the 4th c. but with some variation regarding the day on which it was celebrated. Most of the Fathers give us catecheses at once doctrinal and liturgical (*Cyril of Jerusalem, *John Chrysostom, *Ambrose, *Augustine, *Theodore of Mopsuestia), allowing us to describe its development and clarify what is common and what is peculiar to the various rites and liturgical milieus in the patristic golden age. In the first place, baptism is not a magical act: the condition of its efficacy is faith. Consequently, its administration begins with the renunciation of the devil and confession of the Christian faith. The renunciation is done facing west, the region of darkness; Cyril begins his *mystagogical homilies with it (I, 9). The renunciation of the pompa diaboli, sometimes spitting on the ground, is done by responding to three questions (evil, seduction, works: Tertullian). The confession of faith is made with hands outstretched, facing east; it is attested by Cyril and by the Apos. Con. VII, 41. The threefold *trinitarian confession of the Trad. ap. 35 is not attested by the Latin version, but it seems to have mirrored the Eastern custom; the use of the first-person singular stresses the individuality of the practice. In *Africa in Augustine's time, the two acts seem to have been carried out in the baptismal water. In the East, Cyril and Theodore attest a prebaptismal anointing of the whole body with oil. (The ancients covered themselves with oil before bathing, to protect the body.) The oil was blessed by the bishop or priest (Apos. Con. VII, 42), for remission of sins and preparation for baptism. Ambrose also speaks of a rite of anointing, of the mysterium apertionis of Ephphetha, celebrated by the bishop on Holy Saturday. The anointing was to strengthen the candidate in his final battle with the Adversary and hence had exorcistic value (Cyril, Cat. 20,3). It should be noted that the Syrian church knew no postbaptismal anointing before the 5th c.

As for the rite itself, to judge from Western baptisteries and from *iconography, the baptized entered the pool up to his or her waist and either received a jet of water or the celebrant poured water on him. Baptism by infusion (pouring) was already attested by Did. 7,1. The ternary rite is meant to be a confession of the Trinity (Tertullian, *Hippolytus). Theodore (Hom. cath. 14,16) reports the impersonal formula: "NN is baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." John Chrysostom (Catech. bapt. 2,26) and the later Syrian rituals say the same. This detail of the rite shows that in Syria the accent was on the primary role played by Christ in baptism: it is death and resurrection, and thus a participation in the whole paschal mystery, from the passion to the resurrection. It is moreover a new exodus, a crossing of the Red Sea and the Jordan and entry into the promised land. For Cyril, the saving water is both a tomb and the maternal womb (Cat. 20,4). The fecundity of the waters recalls the maternity of the church, often evoked in inscriptions in baptisteries and in the baptismal exhortations of *Zeno of Verona. The church, the new Eve, becomes the mother of the living. The *epiclesis of the bishop makes the Spirit descend into the waters and brings about new birth in the Spirit, an extension of Mary's virginal motherhood (Didymus, *Trin.*11,13); with this the water acquires its virtue, at once purificatory and sanctificatory. Tertullian distinguishes three rites: anointing, signing of a cross on the forehead, and laying on of a hand or hands (Tertullian, Bapt. 1). For Tertullian, Hippolytus and Augustine the anointing is part of the baptismal ritual and expressed the admission of the baptized into the priestly, royal and prophetic people. The Latin texts do not allow us to find the origin of *confirmation in baptism. Sphragis, or consignatio, the imposition of the sign of the cross on the forehead, is of apostolic origin according to *Basil of Caesarea (De Sp. Sancto 27,66); there is much variation in the rite. Theodore knows two consignationes: one before and one after the baptism, but he does not mention salt or perfumed oil (Hom. 14,27). For Ambrose and Augustine the consignatio seems to take place between the anointing and the imposition of the hand. The problem remains of the chrismatio, or anointing with holy oil, in the name of the Spirit or of the Trinity (Cyril, Cat. 21,3; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Catech. bapt. 3,8), which Ambrose mentions after "the bath of water in the Spirit." From the 4th c. in the East the chrismatio with *salt, blessed by the bishop, with the formula "the seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit" is meant to signify the gift of the Spirit (Cyril, Cat. 21; Serapion, Euch. 25; Const. Ap. VII,22,2). After the anointing, the neophyte puts on a white tunic, which seems to have still been unknown to Hippolytus and which became general practice in both East and West during the 4th c. (Cyril, Cat. 22,8); the garment symbolizes purity of heart and the incorruptibility of the body. The Fathers saw in it the recovery of the integrity of Eden (Ambrose, *Gregory of Nyssa), likeness with the transfigured Christ and an *eschatological sign (Theodore, Hom. catech. 14,26). In the 5th c. the West added *light to these rites (ps.-Ambrose, De lapsu virg. cons. 5); the East knows a *crown, perhaps Jewish Christian in origin (Odes of Sol. 7 and 9).

P. Lundberg, La typologie baptismale dans l'ancienne Église, Uppsala 1942; J. Daniélou, Traversée de la mer Rouge et baptême aux premiers siècles: RecSR 33 (1946) 402-430; O. Cullmann, Le baptême des enfants et la doctrine biblique du baptême, Neuchâtel 1948; W.M. Bedard, The Symbolism of the Baptismal Font, Washington, DC 1951; R. Roques, Le sens du baptême selon le Pseudo-Denys: Irénikon 31 (1958) 427-449; A. Stenzel, Die Taufe, Innsbruck 1958 (It. tr. Alba 1962); L. Villette, Foi et sacrement, I. Du Nouveau Testament à saint Augustin, Paris 1958; J.Ch. Didier, Le baptême des enfants dans la tradition de l'Église, Tournai 1959; C.I.K. Story, Justin's Apology I. 62-64: Its Importance for the Author's Treatment of Christian Baptism: VChr 16 (1962) 172-178; A. Hamman, L'initiation chrétienne, Paris 1963 (texts); V. Grossi, Battesimo dei bambini e teologia: Augustinianum 7 (1967) 323-337; J. Jeremias, Le baptême des enfants dans les quatre premiers siècles, Lyon 1967; E. Koslic, El acontecimiento salvífico del bautismo según Tertuliano, Vitoria 1967; A. Hamman, Le baptême et la confirmation, Paris 1969 (bibl.; Sp. tr. Barcelona [1]1970, [2]1977, [3]1982); P.A. Gramaglia, Il Battesimo dei bambini nei primi quattro secoli, Brescia 1973; G. Venturi, Problemi dell'iniziazione cristiana. Nota bibliografica: Ephem Liturg 88 (1974) 241-270 (ample bibl. survey); H.M. Riley, Christian Initiation: A Comparative Study of the Interpretation of the Baptismal Liturgy in the Mystagogical Writings of Cyril of J., J. Chrysostom, Theodore of M. and Ambrose of M., Washington, DC 1974; G.W. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit, London [2]1976 (orig. ed. London 1956); R. de Latte, Saint Augustin et le baptême. Étude liturgico-historique du rituel baptismal des enfants chez saint Augustin: Questions liturgiques 57 (1976) 41-55; G. Kretschmar, Nouvelles recherches sur l'initiation chrétienne: La MaisonD. 132 (1977) 7-32; E. Nagel, Kindertaufe und Taufaufschub, Frankfurt 1980; B. Neunheuser, Taufe und Firmung, Freiburg 1983 (Fr., Eng. and Sp. tr.); A. Houssiau, Le baptême selon Irénée de Lyon: EThL 60 (1984) 45-59; C. Nardi, Il battesimo in Clemente Alessandrino, Rome 1984; W.H. Alla, Le baptême des enfants dans la tradition de l'Église copte d'Alexandrie, Fribourg 1985; J.-P. Longeat, Les rites du baptême dans les homélies catéchétiques de Théodore de Mopsueste: Questions liturgiques 66 (1985) 193-202; D.F. Wright, The Origins of Infant Baptism—Child Believers' Baptism?: Scottish Journal of Theology 40 (1987) 1-23; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du II^{e} au VI^{e} siècle, Spoleto 1988; Ch. Munier, Rites d'onction, Baptême chrétien et Baptême de Jésus: RSR 64 (1990) 217-234; E.R. Tura, Il battesimo sacramento pasquale in S. Cirillo di Gerusalemme, Rome 1990; K. McDonnell - G.T. Montagne, Christian Initiation and Baptism in the Holy Spirit, Collegeville 1991, 83-333; J.-C. Larchet, Le baptême selon saint Maxime le Confesseur: RSR 65 (1991) 51-70; T.M. Finn, Early Christian Baptism and the Catechumenate, I. Italy, North Africa, and Egypt, II. West and East Syria, Collegeville 1992 (texts); J.-P. Cattenoz, Le baptême, mystère nuptial: théologie de Jean Chrysostome, Venasque 1993; P. Cramer, Baptism and Change in the Early Middle Ages, c. 200–c. 1150, Cambridge 1993, 9-129; V. Grossi, La catechesi battesimale agli inizi del V secolo, Rome 1993; A. Benoît, Le baptême dans l'église ancienne (I^{er}-III^{e} siècles), Bern 1994; A. Hamman, Le baptême d'après les Péres, Paris 1995 (texts; orig. ed. 1962); M. Modemann, Die Taufe in den Predigten des hl. Maximus v. Turin, Frankfurt 1995; C. Aubin, Les enjeux christologiques de la date du baptême: La MaisonD. 210 (1997) 67-96; L. Hartman, Into the Name of the Lord Jesus: Baptism in the Early Church, Edinburgh 1997; D.A. Smith, Irenaeus and the Baptism of Jesus: ThS 58 (1997) 618-642; W. Harmless, Bautismo, in A. Fitzgerald (ed.), Diccionario de San Agustín, Burgos 2001, 161-172 (orig. ed. Augustine through the Ages, Grand Rapids 1999, 84-91).

A. Hamman - M. Flores Colín

II. Iconography.

1. The earliest depictions of baptism. Depictions of baptism belong to the earliest motifs of early Christian art and indeed appear with greater frequency precisely at the beginning. The Roman catacombs preserve baptismal scenes in cubicles A 2 (WK 39), A 3 (WK 27, 3) and perhaps also A 5 (H.L. Hempel, Die Bedeutung des Alten Testamentes für die Programme der frühchristlichen Malerei [diss.], Mainz 1956, 33) of the so-called crypts of the Sacraments in St. Callisto; on the ceilings of cubicles III (WK 73) and 54 (J. Wilpert, Ein Cyclus christologischer Gemälde aus der Katakombe der Heiligen Petrus u. Marcellinus, Freiburg i. Br. 1891), in rooms A (pl. I and III; WK 57; 58,1), If (RivAC 44 [1968] 61; fig. 26), and in the crypt of the teaching Christ (RivAC 9 [1932] 29ff.; fig. 8) of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus; in arcosolia 42 and 77 of *Domitilla (Fausone 97-105); perhaps also in the "Greek" chapel of Priscilla (Hempel 166). Also the scene in arcosolium 3 of St. Hermes (Basilissa), until now interpreted as the healing of the possessed man, probably depicts the baptism of a catechumen, and a scene in the catacomb of Ponziano the baptism of Christ (Fausone 126-39). In the 4th c. baptismal scenes became increasingly rare and by the end of the c. completely disappeared from the figurative plans of catacomb painting.

The same evolution can be seen in *sarcophagus reliefs: in the earliest ones, depictions of baptism are quite frequent. Noteworthy are the sarcophagi of Via della Lungara (Rep 777), St. Maria Antiqua (Rep 747) and—despite some doubt—Le Mas d'Aire (H. Kaiser-Minn, Die Erschaffung des Menschen auf den Spätantiken Monumenten des 3. u. 4. Jh. = JbAC Erg.Bd. 6, Münster 1981, 29), and the sarcophagus fragments of the Museo Pio Cristiano (Rep. 150) and the Wollmann Collections (Ws 19,4). These reliefs are datable to ca. the late 3rd c. Baptismal scenes disappear from sarcophagi much earlier than from funerary painting (Gerke 145ff.) and seem to be definitively excluded from the rich figurative inventory of the friezes of Constantinian sarcophagi.

The content and meaning of baptismal depictions are variously interpreted by iconographical research. The normal depiction consists of a small naked figure immersed in water, while a larger male figure lays hands on his head; the scene is completed by a *dove hovering overhead; streams of water sometimes surround the baptizand or descend upon him. Departing from this scheme is a fresco in the region of Lucina in the catacombs of St. Callisto (WK 29,1), where a man is depicted standing on dry ground, his hand held out to help another enter or leave the water. The depiction may not have a properly baptismal significance, however, but penitential (J. Fink: Theol. Revue 50 [1954] 172). The dress of the baptizer varies. For Wilpert (La fede, 90), the exomis is the dress of the prophets, typical of *John the Baptist, and thus identifies a baptismal scene as the baptism of Christ; the long tunic and dalmatic refer (also for Wilpert) to the liturgical vestments of an ecclesiastic, and mark the scene as the baptism of a catechumen. It is doubtful, however, whether such formal differences can justify such a diversity of content. The earliest baptismal scenes, even when the baptizer must be identified as John, do not represent the historical episode of the baptism in the Jordan, but baptism as a permanent sacramental event. The meaning of any baptismal scene in a sepulchral context, we may assume, was what popular belief, instructed by the church's teaching, hoped for as a gift of the sacrament of baptism and saw represented in the baptism of Jesus. Moreover, the majority of baptismal scenes emphasize the significance assumed by the sacrament in the 3rd c. as preparation, acceptance and confirmation (J. Kollwitz, Das Christusbild des dritten Jahrhunderts, Münster 1953, 22-26).

2. Indirect depictions of baptism. Alongside images of baptism proper, various depictions occur, neutral or biblical, which are understood as iconographical expressions of baptism. The fisherman, mentioned as alluding to baptism already in *Clement of Alexandria's suggestions of iconographical themes for ornamenting rings (Paed. 3, 11, 59, 2: GCS 1, 270, 7-11), as well as deer and other animals who quench their thirst at the waters (Corblet 514-523) is neutral, for example. Biblical motifs include, in the earliest period, the healing of the paralytic, Moses's miracle of the spring, the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well and Noah.

In the 4th c., among iconographical depictions of Peter that were fashionable in the Constantinian era, Moses's miracle of the spring was transformed into Peter's miracle of the spring; also introduced was the new motif of the Israelites crossing the Red Sea. The baptismal meaning of these depictions is not always cogent and may from time to time be derived from their use in contemporary literature (esp. in baptismal catechesis) or from the place occupied in the iconographical program. Three important aspects must be emphasized in indirect depictions of baptism: (1) they increase the presence of baptismal elements in early Christian art; (2) they accent the baptismal message of individual decorative programs—the healing of the paralytic, e.g., would allude to the remission of sins and preservation of baptismal grace, according to Jesus' words to him, "Sin no more, that nothing worse befall you" (Jn 5:14); (3) they express the idea of baptism when direct depictions of baptism are absent from the iconographical program of sepulchral art. Moreover, the crossing of the Red Sea attests the close connection between theology and iconography; indeed, the scene is present even in the earliest Christian art, so much so that in the 4th c. the Fathers refer amply to Pauline baptismal theology, interpreting the Easter baptismal rite as the Exodus of Passover (van Moorsel 90-100).

3. Later iconographical evidence (from the 5th c.). When explicit depictions of baptism reappear in the 5th c., their forms and content differ perceptibly from those of the earlier era. The scene appears on a column base in the Istanbul Archaeology Museum, enriched by the addition of two draped angels (Volbach-Hirmer 76). In the dome mosaic in the Orthodox baptistery at *Ravenna (430/58), the Jordan pays Christ royal honors, its hands veiled according to court ceremony (Volbach-Hirmer 141); in the dome mosaic of the *Arian baptistery (ca. 500) the river is shown approving the baptismal gesture (Volbach-Hirmer 149). In Maximian's cathedral at Ravenna (545/53) the figure of the Jordan appears fleeing, or rather turning its shoulders in terror (Volbach-Hirmer 232), a clear reference to the crossing of the Jordan by the Israelites (Josh 3; Ps 114:3). Even if the personification of the Jordan alludes to the actual river and so to the biblical account of Jesus' historical baptism, the majority of baptismal scenes, including those not mentioned here, possess an epiphanic character. Thus the cosmological elements of sun and moon, sometimes introduced (6th-c. ivory relief: Schiller, fig. 360), signify the hand of God, dispenser of light (codex of Rabbula, Florence: Schiller, fig. 356), and the apostles in adoration (e.g. Ravenna). Contemporary liturgical use of the baptismal pericope also emphasizes the depiction's epiphanic significance (Jerphanion 172-183). Thus the *christological aspect of the baptism in the Jordan, already present in the gospels but which had acquired a sacramental connotation in 3rd-c. Christian theology, now appears in full, warding off the danger of *adoptionist, *Jewish Christian and *heretical *gnostic abuses. Following the dogmatic clarification of Christology between *Nicaea and *Chalcedon, baptismal scenes could escape from the ambiguous situation (baptism of Jesus and baptism of catechumens) of the earlier period and distinguish the two unequivocally. Apart from the depiction of a baptismal font in the form of a cup on a child's tombstone in *Aquileia, 2nd half of the 4th c. (Kötzsche-Breitenbruch 198ff.), the oldest early medieval scenes show the baptism of believers being administered in various forms of baptismal fonts (Mielke 246). *Byzantine baptismal scenes with a cross in the water of the Jordan probably derive from the memory of *pilgrims to *Palestine who had seen a cross planted on the place of Jesus' baptism (Jerphanion 169-172).

J. Corblet, Histoire dogmatique liturgique et archéologique du sacrament du baptême, 2 vols., Paris 1882; J. Strzygowski, Iconographie der Taufe Christi. Ein Beitrag zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der christlichen Kunst, Munich 1885; A. de Waal, Die Taufe Christi auf vorkonstantinischen Gemälden der Katakomben: RQA 10 (1896) 335-349; H. Leclercq, Baptême de Jésus: DACL 2 (1925) 346-380; G. de Jerphanion, Épiphanie et Théophanie. Le baptême de Jésus dans la liturgie et dans l'art chrétien: La Voix des monuments, Paris 1930, 165-188; G. Wilpert, La fede della chiesa nascente secondo i monumenti dell'arte funeraria antica, Collezione "Amici delle catacombe", Vatican City 1938; F. Gerke, Die christlichen Sarkophage der vorkonstantinischen Zeit, Berlin 1940, 142-148; L. de Bruyne, L'imposition des mains dans l'art chrétien ancien: RivAC 20 (1943) 113-278; W.M. Bedard, The Symbolism of the Baptismal Font in Early Christian Thought, Washington, DC 1951; L. Réau, Iconographie de l'Art Chrétien, vol. II/2, Paris 1957, 296-310; W.F. Volbach - M. Hirmer, Frühchristliche Kunst, Munich 1958 (It. tr. Florence 1958); Th. Klauser, Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der christlichen Kunst IV: JbAC 4 (1961) 128-145; G. Ristow, Die Taufe Christi, Recklinghausen 1965; P.P. van Moorsel, Rotswonder of Doortocht door de Rode Zee, 's-Gravenhage 1965; G. Schiller, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst, vol. I, Gütersloh 1966, 137-152 figs. 344-388; U. Mielke, Taufe: LCI 4 (1972) 244-247 (bibl. 247); ibid., Taufe Jesu 247-255 (bibl. 255); E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 99-103; 348-372; A. Nestori, Repertorio topografico delle pitture della catacombe romane = Rome Sotterranea Cristiana 5, Vatican City 1975; L. Kötzsche-Breitenbruch, Das Elfenbeinrelief mit Taufszene aus der Sammlung Maskell im British Museum: JbAC 22 (1979) 195-208; A.M. Fausone, Die Taufe in der frühchristlichen Sepulkralkunst. Eine archäologisch-ikonologische Studie zu den Ursprüngen des Bildthemas, Studi di Antichità Cristiana 34, Vatican City 1982; D. Scortecci, Il tema iconografico del battesimo di Cristo nella cultura cristiana del III secolo a Roma: AFLPer 33 n.s. 9 (1985/86) 257-275; J.G. Deckers et al., Die Katakombe "Santi Marcellino e Pietro." Repertorium der Malereien, Roma Sotterranea Cristiana 6, Vatican City 1987; L. Heiser, Die Taufe in der orthodoxen Kirche. Geschichte, Spendung und Symbolik nach der Lehre der Väter, Trier 1987; Battesimo e battisteri, ed. R. Iorio, Florence 1993.

E. Dassmann - H.R. Drobner

III. Baptismal controversy. The *Novatian *schism raised the question of whether those who had received Novatianist baptism should be rebaptized upon being reconciled with the church (Eus. HE VI, 43), which led to the baptismal controversy (255–257). The Novatianists rebaptized all those who passed over from the *Catholic church to themselves (Eus., HE VIII, 8; Cypr., Ep. 73,2 to Jubaianus, of 256). A certain Magnus had asked *Cyprian whether "those who come from the Novatianists" should be baptized again in the Catholic church. Cyprian replied (Ep. 69 to Magnus [255]) that since *heretics had no power to baptize, the baptism of those who turned from heresy was not a second baptism, but a first. From this perspective, Cyprian did not assert the existence of a new baptism as such, since he did not consider any baptism possible outside the church (Cypr., De unit. 11, against Novatian); he associated the validity of the sacrament with the rectitude of the minister. He submitted a similar question to 18 *Numidian bishops at the fifth council of *Carthage (first baptismal council: PL 3, 1035-1044) in spring 255 (Cypr., Ep. 70), which concluded: "No one can be baptized outside the church" (ibid. 1). Quintus, a bishop from *Mauretania, disagreed with Cyprian and reminded him that he and his colleagues were aware of an ancient custom in favor of the validity of baptism conferred by heretics; the Mauretanian bishops seem to have been more consonant with *Rome. Cyprian replied to Quintus (Ep. 71, 3-4 [255]): "One must not prescribe from custom, but conquer by reason." He also appealed to his predecessor in the see of Carthage, *Agrippinus, and to the first council of Carthage (ca. 220), which had held the baptism of heretics to be invalid (Cypr., Ep. 72,3; 71,4). According to *Vincent of Lérins, Agrippinus had initiated the practice (PL 50, 645-646), which after him spread. In the spring of 256, 71 bishops of the provinces of Proconsular *Africa and *Numidia met at the sixth council of Carthage (second baptismal council: PL 3, 1044-1050) and confirmed the decisions of the preceding council. The decision was communicated to Pope *Stephen by Cyprian's synodal letter (Ep. 72, of 256), which concluded: "We do not wish to establish any law, because each bishop is responsible before God for his actions" (ibid. 3). The pope's letters are lost, but he seems to have threatened *excommunication (Cypr., Ep. 75,24: Firmilian to Cyprian, 256) and refused to receive legates from Africa (ibid. 25). In Ep. 73 to Jubaianus (256), a Mauretanian bishop who disagreed with him, Cyprian held that the Novatianist practice of rebaptizing had no relevance to new baptism in the church, since Novatian, in claiming to associate the one baptism with himself, was only imitating what the church did (ibid. 2). On 1 September 256 Cyprian succeeded in aligning the whole African episcopate with his positions: he obtained the unanimous consensus of the bishops present (Sententiae episcoporum numero LXXXVII) at the seventh council of Carthage (third baptismal council: PL 3, 105 1-1078). For the bishop of Carthage he says that schismatics and heretics do not possess baptism, and therefore they must be baptized with the only valid baptism when they want to enter the Catholic church; his thought is expounded in letters 69-75. All that remains of Stephen's pontifical rescript is the central expression cited by Cyprian, Ep. 74,1, to Pompeius (256): Nihil innovatur nisi quod traditum est (Eus., HE VII, 3,1; Novat., Ep. 30,8, before the schism: nihil innovandum putavimus). Pope Stephen insisted that one must only lay hands, as a sign of *penitence, on those who had returned from heresy (Cypr., Ep. 74,1). Stephen's action on the question of the baptism of heretics was not limited to N Africa. He wrote to the churches of Asia Minor—*Cilicia, *Cappadocia, *Galatia and neighboring provinces—asking them to renounce the practice of rebaptizing, and threatening excommunication (DS 111: Ep., fragm. ad episcopos Asiae Minoris, a. 256 = Cypr., Ep. 75,18; Eus., HE VII, 5,4-5). *Firmilian, bishop of *Caesarea in Cappadocia, sided with Cyprian and blamed Stephen for the division between Rome and the East (Cypr., Ep. 70). Stephen appealed to Mt 16:18. The baptismal controversy between Rome and Carthage ended unexpectedly with Stephen's death (257) and Cyprian's martyrdom (14 September 258). *Dionysius of Alexandria, who followed Roman custom, worked to placate the contending parties (Eus., HE VII, 5,3-6; VII, 9,1 and 6), although different traditions remained in different regions.

The Council of *Arles (314) recognized the baptism of heretics as valid (can. 9 [8]: DS 123), but the practice had by then assumed different dimensions with the advent of Donatism. The Donatists rebaptized against the exponents of the Catholic church. In the 4th c. the custom of rebaptizing in the African church was practiced by the Donatists for those who came from the Catholic church; for them every baptism administered by heretics or by unworthy persons (the traditores of *Diocletian's persecution), or by those who had been consecrated by them, was invalid. While the Council of *Nicaea of 325 on the one hand recognized the baptism of the Novatianists, on the other hand it did not accept those of the *Paulinians (followers of *Paul of Samosata), perhaps due to trinitarian doctrine (can. 8; 19); according to *Athanasius, however, their rite was correct (Or. 2 contra Ar. 44-45: PG 26, 236-240; cf. BA 29, 598-599). The case of the conversion of *Arians also posed the problem of their acceptance in the church; some priests wanted to rebaptize those already baptized within Arianism. Pope *Siricius, based on Scripture and on the canons, on the decreta generalia of Pope *Liberius, and on the tradition of the Eastern and Western churches, rejected this practice (Ep. 1,2: PL 13, 1134). In the course of the 4th c. a sacramental theology was elaborated, beginning with *Optatus of Milevis, which established a distinction between a heretic and a schismatic, and then by Augustine, who venerated St. Cyprian but rejected his theory (Contra Cresconium 2,32). He founded the validity of the sacraments on the correct form established by Christ, the true minister: in ista quaestione de baptismo non cogitandum quis det, sed quid det (on the question of baptism, let us consider not who gives but what he gives—Bapt. 4,10,16[17]); Petrus baptizet, hic est qui baptizat; Paulus baptizet, hic est qui baptizat; Iudas baptizet, hic est qui baptizat (Peter may baptize, but it is [God] who baptizes; Paul may baptize, but it is [God] who baptizes; Judas may baptize, yet it is still [God] who baptizes—In Ioh. Evang. 6,7). The intervention of Augustine and of other bishops was accompanied and rendered effective by a severe imperial legislation which condemned anyone who was rebaptized. Baptism also caused controversies during the Protestant Reformation, when appeals were made to the Fathers to demonstrate the decadence of the church from its original purity.

Cyprian, Ep. 69-75 (CSEL 3, 2, 749-827); CPL 50; Concilia Carthaginensia: PL 3, 1011-1102; G. Bardy, Baptismale (Controverse): Cath 1, 1232-1234; L. Villette, Foi et sacrement, Paris 1959; L. Campeau, L'origine de la querelle baptismale: Science et Esprit 21 (1969) 329-356; 22 (1970) 19-47; H. Gülzow, Cyprian and Novatian, Tübingen 1975; J. Patout Burns, On Rebaptism: Social Organization in the Third-Century Church: JECS 1 (1993) 367-403; P.G. Caron, "Ne sanctum baptisma iteretur" (CTh. 16.6; CI. 1.6): AARC 6 (1986) 166-180; E. Contreras, Sententiae episcoporum numero LXXXVII de haereticis baptizandis: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 407-421; S.G. Hall, Stephen of Rome and the One Baptism: SP 17, 2 (1982), 796-798; Id., Stephen I of Rome and the Baptismal Controversy of 256, in Miscell. Historiae Eccl., ed. B. Vogler, Brussels-Louvain 1987, 78-82; H. Pietras, Il fondamento ecclesiologico della posizione di Dionigi di Alessandria nella controversia battesimale, in Recherches et Tradition, Mélanges H. Crouzel, Paris 1992, 199-210; M. Labrousse, Le baptême des hérétiques d'après Cyprien, Optat et Augustin: influences et divergences: REAug 42 (1996) 223-242; F. Morgenstern, Die Kaisergesetze gegen die Donatisten in Nordafrica (im Zusammenhang mit dem antidonatistischen Wirken des Augustinus von Hippo): ZRG 110 (1993) 103-123.

R.J. De Simone

BARBARUS SCALIGERI. Name given to an anonymous *Alexandrian Greek chronicle, translated into very poor *Latin ca. AD 700. Its title reflects both the nature of the Latin—replete with Gallicisms—and the identity of the humanist—Giuseppe Giusto Scaligero—who discovered and published the uncial manuscript (Parisinus, Bibl. Nat. 4884 [7th-8th c.]) in which it was transmitted. A fragment of the original Greek text, reaching us in a single sheet of illustrated papyrus (P. Berol. 13296) from the early 5th c., shows a close relation of this chronicle to the Chronographus anonymus*, preserved in the illustrated papyrus discovered by W. Goleniscev.

The Barbarus Scaligeri, also known as Excerpta Barbari, is a universal chronicle that begins with Adam and has three parts: the history of the world until Cleopatra's death (31 BC); select passages from lists of kings, including Persian and Assyrian; and a list of Roman consuls from Julius Caesar to Valentinian Augustus III and Eutropius (AD 387), with a gap from *Domitian to *Diocletian. The final section, containing a list of emperors until *Anastasius I (512), is probably not authentic. The chroncler's sources included *Hippolytus and *Eusebius, but the main source is Sextus *Julius Africanus. Barbarus Scaligeri was in turn probably used by later chroniclers such as *John Malalas, though the latter does not acknowledge it as a source.

Based on the similarity between the sheet of papyrus containing the only fragment of the Greek original of the Barbarus Scaligeri and the papyrus of the Chronographus discovered by Goleniscev, we can hypothesize that the Barbarus Scaligeri is a revision of a lost Alexandrian chronicle, which was the direct source of the Goleniscev papyrus. The illustrations in the single sheet of the Berlin papyrus may also point to older elements: they seem to have been painted for a wide use, which would fit well with examples of encaustic and with the vascular decorations of the first *Coptic period.

Editions: CPG 5539; ed. Princeps J.J. Scaliger, Thesaurus temporum, Leiden 1606, 44-70; a better edition in: A Schoene, Berlin 1875; Latin text with Greek retranslation in: C. Frick, Chronica Minora 1, Leipzig 1892, 183-371; T. Mommsen, Chronica Minora, MGH AA IX, Berlin 1892, 272-298 (excerpts only).

Studies: H. Gelzer, Sextus Julius Africanus und die byzantinische Chronographie; 2. Die Nachfolger des Julius Africanus, Leipzig 1885; repr. New York 1967, 316-329; Bauer-Strzygowsky, Eine alexandrinische Weltchronik, Text und Miniaturen eines griechischen Papyrus der Sammlung W. Goleniscev, Denkschriften der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften Phil.-histor. Klasse 51, Bd. 2, Vienna 1905; F. Jacoby, PWK 6,6 (1909) 1566-1576; L. Bréhier, DHGE 6 (1932) 593; R. Klein, Lexikon des Mittelalters 4 (1989) 156; E. Jeffreys, B. Croke, R. Scott, Studies in John Malalas: Byzantina Australiensia 6, Sydney 1990, passim; ODB 1, 253; D. Stiernon, DPAC 1, 474.

P. Allen

BARBELO-GNOSTICS. 2nd-c. *gnostic sectarians whose name derived from the female *aeon Barbelo, who occupied a central place in their mythology. It is difficult to specify the nature and functions of this aeon or to fix the details of the complex mythological system founded on her, because our sources (Iren., Adv. haer. I, 29,1-4; Epiph., Panarion 25,2-5 and 26,1-19; Theodoret, Haeret. fabul. compendium 1,13) disagree on particulars. Barbelo is the feminine element at the origin of all things. The invisible Father manifested himself to this aeon, and it became the mother of all the living, which derive from her through successive pairs of aeons. It is also Barbelo's task to free the divine element imprisoned in matter and reestablish pleromatic unity. A *Coptic text of cod. BG 8502, the Apocryphon of John (also present, in various diverse recensions, in the *Nag Hammadi library: NHC II,1; III,1; IV,1), shows surprising analogies—as well as differences—with the system described by *Irenaeus concerning Barbelo. Unlike Irenaeus, *Epiphanius (who calls them Barbeliots) describes at length their customs and rites, during which they abandoned themselves to the most unbridled excesses, sacrilegiously parodying the sacred mysteries of Christianity. The confused information given by the heresiologists and the similarities of this system with others known under different names (see, e.g., the identical functions of Barbelo and of Sophia Prunikos among the *Ophites; Iren., Adv. haer. I, 30) prevent us from identifying a precise sectarian group or a coherent doctrinal system under the name Barbelo-gnostic.

W. Foerster, Die Gnosis. I.: Zeugnisse der Kirchenväter, Zürich 1969, 133-161; H. Leisegang, Die Gnosis, Leipzig 1924; E. de Faye, Gnostiques et gnosticisme, Paris 1925, 379-412; L. Cerfaux, Barbelognostiker: RAC I, 1176-1180; A. Böhlig, Gnosis und Synkretismus, I, Tübingen 1989, 289-311.

C. Gianotto

BARCELONA

I. History - II. Councils.

I. History. Ancient Barcino, in the province of Tarraconensis (*Spain). Roman presence there goes back to 218 BC, during the *Punic Wars. In 263 Spain was devastated by German bands, and in 415 the *Visigothic king Athaulf established his residence there. In 714 it fell under Muslim rule and was reconquered in 801. The earliest reference to Christianity in Barcelona is in *Prudentius, who mentions St. Cucuphas as the glory of the city (Perist. IV, 33-34); his legendary passio is from the 7th c. Information on Sts. Eulalia and Severus is unreliable. The first known bishop of Barcelona, Praetextatus, appears only mid-4th c., when he accompanied *Ossius of Cordoba to the Council of *Serdica (343). The most illustrious prelate was St. *Pacian, who brought theological prestige and importance to the city, esp. with his doctrine on *penance. Less splendid in Barcelona's history was Bishop Nundinarius, whose behavior in nominating Irenaeus, bishop of Terrassa, as his successor brought harsh criticism from Pope *Hilarus (465). At Barcelona, suffragan diocese of *Tarragona and seat of two councils (540 and 599), St. *Paulinus of Nola was made to accept ordination from Bishop Lampius (394). The 5th-c. arrival of *Goths, Visigoths, and the *Arian faith gave rise to a double hierarchy, one Catholic and the other Arian, which lasted until the III Council of *Toledo. Catholic bishops: Praetextatus (ca. 343), Pacian (379–391), Lampius (394–400), Sigisarius (ca. 415), Nundinarius (d. 465), Agricius (ca. 517), Nebridius (ca. 540), Paternus (ca. 546), Ugnas (589–599), Emila (600–633), Oya (634–638), Quiricus (640–666), Idalius (666–689), Laulfus (689–703).

II. Councils.
540, provincial. Metropolitan Sergius of Tarragona presided, with six other bishops present. We have 10 shortened canons on *liturgy, clergy, monks and the infirm.

599, provincial. Metropolitan Asiaticus of Tarragona presided, with 11 other bishops present. The most important of the four canons is the third, on the procedure for the ordination of bishops. Others prohibited accepting money for conferring holy orders and excommunicated consecrated virgins and penitents who married.

J. Mas, Notes historiques del bisbat de Barcelona, Barcelona 1906, 13; S. Puig y Puig, Episcopologio de la sede Barcinonense, Barcelona 1929; Mansilla, Geografía I, 146-147; A. Pladevall, La introducció i difusió del cristianisme a Catalunya a l'epoca romana, Barcelona 1994; DicHistEclCat I (A-C), Barcelona 1998, 199ff.; E. Flórez, ES 29; Vives, Concilios, 53-54; 163-185; Orlandis, Concilios, 120-124; 244-246.

P. de Luis

BARDESANES (Bardaisan) of Edessa (154–222). Bardesanes of *Edessa (Bar Dayṣan = "son of the river Dayṣan"), philosopher, astrologer, ethnograph and Christian theologian, an intellectual situated halfway between Aramaic culture and Greek philosophical culture and an outstanding figure in the development of the various forms of Syrian Christianity. We known little with certainty of his life: born in 154 (Chronicle of Edessa), he died in 222; *Julius Africanus (d. 240) says that he saw him at the court of *Abgar VIII, of Edessa's ruling dynasty. *Moses of Khorene tells of his emigration to *Armenia following Edessa's definitive Romanization (216). According to *Porphyry, Bardesanes met an Indian delegation on mission to the emperor Elagabalus in 218. The other Greek, Syriac, Armenian and Arabic sources offer accounts generally influenced by heresiological stereotypes; consequently, the only thing certain is Bardesanes's activity among the elite of Edessa in the court circle of the local king. For an understanding of the cultural situation, we must bear in mind that in the 2nd and 3rd c. the city was characterized by *Hellenistic and Eastern artistic and literary cultures and by a great variety of religions: Christianity was not yet structured in an ecclesiastical hierarchy (which came about only in the early 4th c.) but was divided into different streams such as Bardesanism, *Jewish Christianity, those Christians who formed the nucleus of future *orthodoxy—still a minority in the 2nd-3rd c. and called Palutians after their leader *Palut—*Marcionites, who came into conflict with Bardesanes and his school, and various kinds of *gnostics (Quqiti, *Audiani, *Valentinians, *Sethians). Bardesanes's surviving work shows us his great attention to Greek philosophy (*Platonic, *Aristotelian, *Stoic, atomist), astrology and ethnography. We have a few fragments of his on astral conjunction; Porphyry offers two citations from a work dedicated to Indian customs; Moses of Khorene says that Bardesanes was his source for some information on the history of *Armenia. His works indicate that he founded a cultural circle of elites, or perhaps a philosophical school, in which questions of astrology, cosmology, morality and religion were freely debated. The circle would prove enduring: only in the 5th c. would Bishop *Rabbula succeed in rooting it out at Edessa, though he would not prevent its spread to the East. *Ephrem the Syrian alludes to the poetic works of Bardesanes's son, who, according to *Sozomen, was named *Harmonius and introduced metric hymns into *Syriac.

The main sources for a knowledge of Bardesanes's thought and that of his disciples are the following: (1) The Book of the Laws of the Countries (Liber legum regionum; hereafter BLC), was written in Syriac and partially cited according to an old Greek version by the ps.-*Clementine literature and by *Eusebius of Caesarea; it is presented in the form of a dialogue between Bardesanes and some of his disciples, one of whom, Philip, may well be the author, though some scholars do not rule out the possibility that Bardesanes himself wrote the dialogue. (2) The polemical works of Ephrem, and in particular the Confutations in Prose (CP) and a certain number of Hymns Against Heresies (HAH), paraphrase and cite texts, in prose and poetry, of Bardesanes, his disciples and his son, on cosmogony, anthropology, *soteriology, philosophy, the meaning of names and astrology. Singularly effective among these is HAH 55, where poetic verses are cited that allude to gnostic mythological figures destined to enter into the *Manichean pantheon: the Father and the Mother of life, who generate the Son of life; the *Holy Spirit, a feminine figure, who generates two daughters; the young Spirit, destined for marriage, who pronounces with some modification the words of Christ on the cross (Mt 27:46); again the Father and the Mother of life who, through sexual union, generate paradise and the astrological elements; the two are compared to the sun and the moon. (3) The four cosmological traditions transmitted by Barhadbshabb Arbaya (late 6th c.), *Theodore bar Konai (8th c.), Moses bar Kepha (10th c.) and John of Dara (early 10th c.) paraphrase, and at times cite, the myth of the origins of the cosmos and of the ordering intervention of a divine being. (4) A multiplicity of later heresiological references, written in Syriac and Arabic by Christian and Muslim writers simplify Bardesanes's complex speculations into a *dualism similar to that of the Manicheans, or they take up and enrich the mythology expounded in Ephrem, HAH 55 (Agapius of Mabbug).

Analysis of these sources allows us to reconstruct part of the Bardesanite system. The BLC has as its basic theme the relationship between free will and fate. The character "Bardesanes" distinguishes, in the course of his conversation with the students, two realities in human life: (1) nature (kyānā), that is, a person's natural dispositions (birth, growth, reproduction, aging, death); and (2) destiny (ḥelqā), the contingencies that may favor or diminish the potentialities of nature (deformities, riches, poverty). Human beings, who undergo in their bodies the action of nature and fate, as the image of God also possess free will (ḥērutā), the possibility of carrying out positive and negative actions. Its seat is in the intelligence, according to a philosophical perspective with hints of *Stoic influence, but esp. *Aristotelian (a comparison with *Alexander of Aphrodisias's On Fate is possible), Jewish and Christian. To demonstrate this, "Bardesanes" offers the discourse that gave the work its Syriac title, in which he describes, starting from the East, the "laws"—that is, the moral and religious customs of peoples (including Jews and Christians)—showing how they depend on fate. The discourse ends by saying that even fate and its components received a small portion of power from the divinity, which they exercise, poorly or well, until the time when that mixture through which God linked natures—i.e., the original beings, when they were mutually damaged by one another—is purified. This reciprocal violence, as we shall see, is understandable only from the perspective of Bardesanian cosmogony.

Ephrem (CP) and the four cosmological traditions allow us a knowledge of the Bardesanian representation of the world's origins. Unfortunately Ephrem's attribution of the same fragments in some places to Bardesanes and in others to his disciples prevents us from establishing with certainty, except in very rare cases, what should be attributed to the master and what to the school. Four beings existed from eternity: light, wind, fire and water (different, therefore, from the classical model of the four elements), distributed over the four cardinal points. They existed in a state of indeterminacy according to *Theodore bar Konai, who seems to allude to a Bardesanian verse containing a reference to the tohu wabohu of Gen 1:2. According to Bardesanes's disciples, these beings were collections of atoms. Above the beings is God, the Lord of all things, and underneath them darkness. For a reason that varies according to the tradition, or perhaps according to the evolution of the school—i.e., either the wind that blows over the fire, or an event (gedšā), or pure chance (šegmā)—the four beings collide with and combat one another, provoking the darkness that assails them, hiding and partially contaminating them. The Logos, or "Word of thought" (mēmrā d-tar'itā), or the "Power of the originary word" (ḥaylā d-mēmrā qadmāyā), is sent by the supreme divinity to separate the darkness from the beings; the Logos constitutes the true and proper creation apart from that which remains contaminated by the darkness, and this then becomes an instrument for the gradual purification of the universe. Theodore bar Konai makes reference also to the sending of a Spirit "from above," which could coincide with the Spirit that appears in Ephrem (HAH 55). Still, according to Ephrem, we learn that for some disciples it is not the Logos that was sent but atoms of intellect, power and thought. Ephrem and other sources insist on the sending of life, which is a sort of element of animation of the human intellect, which could perhaps depend on the Logos. That life, according to Ephrem (CP), descends from on high, above the moon, to be poured out on the cosmos; according to Agapius of Mabbug it comes from the Father of life through the Mother of life.

Ephrem says that the human body is the result, on the one hand, of the image of God or of his wisdom and, on the other hand, of the work of the archons (linked to fate). The body is destined to dissolution, and thus there is no resurrection. Joined to the body are the soul—corporeal but light in weight—and the intelligence, of divine provenance and a fragment of the breath of the divinity in the cosmos. True resurrection is only spiritual and consists in reaching God with the superior part (soul and intellect), to be united to him in the wedding chamber of light (gnōn nuhrā, a common expression in primitive Syriac literature): this is possible for those who overcome the celestial spheres in which souls were enclosed by Adam's sin until the arrival of the Savior. The Bardesanian Christ is the one who announces the truth, allowing those who keep his word to overcome the spheres (Jn 8:51-52).

Mani was aware of the importance of the Bardesanian community in *Osroene, as one of his works, the Book of the Mysteries, attests. From the titles passed down to us by An-Nadim, we can deduce that he polemicized against Bardesanes's doctrine of the soul. Besides this polemic, we can note some differences between the two systems: Manichean dualism (darkness and light) was much more radical than that of Bardesanes in that the initial event is born of the attack of the darkness against the light in Mani, whereas in Bardesanism it is produced by a chance occurrence through which the elements, colliding, provoke the partial mixture of the darkness with them. In Bardesanism the body enjoys a less negative status than in Manichean doctrine; free will, granted not only to human beings but also to the elements in Bardesanism, is a notion absent in Manichean doctrine. Nonetheless, on some points the two currents draw near each other, to the extent that it is arguable that Mani knew and appreciated some Bardesanian proposals: (1) in both there is a doctrine of the three ages: the primordial age, the age of the commingling of light and darkness, and the age of their definitive separation; (2) in contrast to what occurs in gnostic doctrines, where the created world is the negative result of the process of the degradation of the divinity, in Bardesanism and Manichaeism it is intentionally created by the supreme divinity as an instrument of liberation of the original elements (Bardesanes's four elements or Mani's light) from the negativity of darkness; (3) both elaborate a soteriological physics; (4) in Mani also the figures of the Father and the Mother of life appear, although in Bardesanes their status is not entirely clear; (5) in both, the vital function of the sun and moon is stressed.

The most important question for the interpretation of the writings, more or less fragmentary, that have reached us from antiquity is whether Bardesanes and his school can be considered gnostics. We must bear in mind that the sources can be classified, according to the greater or lesser dualism of their ideological tendency, into three groups: the BLC, more moderate and little inclined to dualism (even if there is some reference to the fundamental motif of the clash between the elements); the majority of the fragments transmitted by Ephrem and esp. by later heresiology; and HAH 55, which seems to be oriented toward gnosticism. Some have offered an interpretation that takes into account esp. the position of BLC and a portion of the second category of writings, discounting the evidence of HAH 55. Others have stressed the difference between the sources, taking esp. HAH 55 as their reference point: the difference would be due to different authors, who have in some cases mitigated the original dualism and in other cases accentuated the gnostic sense. The problem is still unresolved and, despite the abundance of studies, further clarification is still possible. Certainly the question of the relationship with gnosticism should be stated with greater clarity: can the surviving fragments necessarily be situated within gnosticism, if by gnosticism we mean that doctrine which asserts a crisis within the divine world (the myth of Sophia or others like it)? The evidence gained from a complete analysis of the texts allows one to distinguish Bardesanian from gnostic dualism. In most of the Bardesanian texts the idea is rejected of a clash within the divinity: of a sin, a passion or a rupture, as in the Valentinian myth of Sophia. The idea prevails, rather, of an incident occurring in his eternal creation (the four beings), which at a second moment induces the divine intervention. We must bear in mind that one of the basic problems faced by Bardesanes and his disciples was the presence in Edessa of Marcionism, with its idea of an absolute contraposition between the creator God and the foreign God of Jesus Christ, who in Bardesanism seem rather to coincide. In summary, it seems that Bardesanism can be situated within the dualisms of the Late Antique period, without however coinciding with any of them: profoundly influenced by Greek philosophy, it could be placed alongside minor forms of 2nd-c. dualism, such as that of *Hermogenes, attacked by *Tertullian in the same period.

The main reference work on Bardesanes and his work, with bibliography, history of the studies and editions of the sources, remains H.J.W. Drijvers, Bardaiṣan of Edessa, Assen 1966. After 1966 other heresiological texts were published or translated, or those already published underwent a philological revision: see G. Vajda, Le témoignage d'al-Māturidī sur la doctrine des Manichéens, des Daysanites et des Marcionites: Arabica 13 (1966) 1-38, 113-128; W. Madelung, Abu ʿisa al-Warraq über die Bardesaniten, Marcioniten und Kantäer, in Studien zur Geschichte und Kultur des vorderen Orients. Festschrift für Bertold Spuler, ed. H.R. Roemer and A. Noth, Leiden 1981, 210-224; A. Camplani, Note bardesanitiche: Miscellanea marciana 12 (1997) 11-43. On the citations drawn from Porphyry by a work of Bardesanes on India, see F. Winter, Bardesanes von Edessa über Indien. Ein früher syrischer Theologe schreibt über ein fremdes Land, Innsbruck 1999.

For a general presentation of the debate on Bardesanian thought, see A. Camplani, Rivisitando Bardesane. Note sulle fonti siriache del bardesanismo e sulla sua collocazione storico-religiosa: Cristianesimo nella Storia 19 (1998) 519-596. On the Book of the Laws of the Countries, see esp. the following studies: A. Dihle, Zur Schicksalslehre des Bardesanes, in Id., Antike und Orient. Gesammelte Aufsätze, eds. V. Pöschl - H. Petersmann, Heidelberg 1984, 161-173, 220; I. Ramelli, Linee generali per una presentazione e per un commento del Liber Legum Regionum con traduzione italiana del testo siriaco e dei frammenti greci: Istituto Lombardo. Rendiconti Lett. 133 (1999) 311-355; T. Hegedus, Necessity and Free Will in the Thought of Bardaisan of Edessa: Laval théologique et philosophique 59 (2003) 333-344. Besides Drijvers, other scholars have sustained the unitary, nondualistic character of Bardesanian thought: E. Beck, Bardaisan und seine Schule bei Ephräm: Muséon 91 (1978) 271-333; J. Teixidor, Bardesane d'Edesse. La première philosophie syriaque, Paris 1992. Favoring a gnostic interpretation are: T. Jansma, Natuur, lot en vrijheid. Bardesanes, de filosoof der Arameër en zijn images, Wageningen 1969; B. Ehlers (Aland), Bardesanes von Edessa— ein syrischer Gnostiker: ZKG 81 (1970) 334-351; G. Widengren, Bardesanes von Edessa und der syrisch-mesopotamische Gnostizismus. Ein Beitrag zur Vorgeschichte des Manichäismus, in The Many and the One, Essays on Religion in the Graeco-Roman World Presented to Herman Ludin Jansen on His 80th Birthday, Trondheim 1985, 153-181; Id., Aramaica et Syriaca II. Textes concernant Bardésane d'Édesse: Orientalia Suecana 33/35 (1984/86) 479-486; P.O. Skjærvø, Bardesanes, in Encyclopaedia Iranica, ed. E. Yarshater, London - New York 1989, vol. 3, 780-785.

A. Camplani

BARHADBESHABBA. Disciple of the famous *Henana at the school of *Nisibis in the 2nd half of the 6th c., he later became bishop of Halwan. As bishop participated in the Synod of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon in 605. Of his literary work only the treatise on the Cause of the Foundation of the Schools has survived, composed between 581–604, half theological and half historical in character, published by A. Scher. With A. Baumstark, we must be careful to distinguish between the bishop of Halwan and a homonymous and contemporary native of Beth Arbaya, mentioned by Habdisho of Nisibis in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, author of an ecclesiastical history titled History of the Holy Fathers Who Suffered Persecution for the Truth, published by F. Nau. Barhadbeshabba also wrote commentaries on Mark's gospel and on the Psalter, a Book of Treasures, and controversial treatises.

ʿAbdīšoʿ, Catalogus Librorum, ch. 93 in: Assemani, BO 3, 1, 169; Duval 72, 204, 411; Baumstark 136, 349; Chabot 59; F. Nau, PO IX, 449-631 (II part), XXIII, 177-343 (I part); Ortiz de Urbina, 132-133; E. Herman, DHGE 6, 791-792; A. Scher, PO IV, 317-404.

J.-M. Sauget

BARLAAM (d. 303?). Martyr of *Antioch. The antiquity and importance of the cult of Barlaam are attested not only by the different dates in the *Byzantine and Eastern calendars but also by at least three homilies or *panegyrics in his honor: by *John Chrysostom (PG 50, 675-682), by *Severus of Antioch (PO 12, 90-96) and one anonymous (PG 31, 484-489). The latter text, attributed to *Basil of Caesarea in *Cappadocia, is the origin of the confusion which makes of Barlaam a martyr of that city, a tradition echoed in the Roman Martyrology's mention of 19 November.

While the period near 1 June seems the most acceptable among the various commemorations of the calendars (Severus's homily was given between 1–14 June 515), the exact date of Barlaam's martyrdom is not known with certainty, all the more so because it has not been established whether or not he died immediately from the tortures inflicted upon him, aimed at persuading him to deny his faith; in any case he was considered worthy of the title of martyr. Barlaam's torments were unique enough to be recounted: forced to extend his hands over a *pagan altar on which coals and incense were burning, if the pain had caused him to turn his hands the gesture would have been considered a sacrifice contrary to the Christian faith. Barlaam courageously let his hands be burned rather than yield to the intense pain, as his persecutors had hoped.

Barlaam was buried in a suburban cemetery of Antioch. John Chrysostom proclaimed the mentioned panegyric over his tomb; Severus gave his homily in a church of the city where the 40 martyrs of *Sebaste were also venerated.

Other Eastern cities, such as *Constantinople and *Edessa, have a church dedicated to Barlaam.

BHG 221-223; H. Delehaye, S. Barlaam martyr d'Antioche: AB 22 (1903) 129-145; DHGE 6, 812-813; Vies des SS. II, 656-659; BS 2, 786-787.

J.-M. Sauget

BARLAAM and JOSEPH, Life of (8th c.). The so-called romance of Barlaam, whose Greek edition (PG) was long attributed to *John of Damascus but must be later, though it may come from the circle of his monastery of St. Saba (Volk), tells the story of Joseph, the son of an Indian king, who converted to Christianity against his father's will after being instructed by the monk Barlaam; after abdicating his rule, Joseph become a monk. The very large volume, in which parts of the legend of Buddha as well as entire Christian works such as *Aristides's Apology are condensed, can be understood as a guide to the monastic life. As such it is important evidence of *Byzantine spirituality.

CPG III (1979) 8120 (with notes on the history of the textual tradition and many versions): PG 96, 860-1240 (J.P. Boissonade, 1832) and LCL 34 (1967), with an introduction by D.M. Lang. - F. Dölger, Der griechische Barlaam-Roman. Ein Werk des hl. Johannes von Damaskos, Ettal 1953; D.M. Lang, St. Euthymios the Georgian and the Barlaam and Ioasaph Romance: Bulletin of the School of Oriental Studies 17 (1955) 306-325; B. Studer, Jean Damascène, 4. Le roman de Barlaam: DSp 8, 464ff.; E. Chintibidse, Ekwtime Atoneli, der Verfasser der griechischen Version von "Barlaam und Joasaph": Wissenschaftl. Zeitschrift der F. Schiller Universität, Jena, 26 (1977) 29-41; TRE 17 (1988) 131-32; P. Bádenas de la Peña, La Historia de Barlaam y Josafat. Redacción bizantina anónima, Madrid 1993; LTK³ 2, 8 (bibl.); LACL (2002) 387ff.

B. Studer

BARNABAS (1st c.). The nickname—interpreted as "son of consolation" (or "exhortation"), but probably meaning "son of prophecy" or "son of Nabas/Nabi"—given in Acts 4:36 by the *apostles to Joseph, a Levite from *Cyprus, who sold a field and gave them the proceeds. His activity is largely linked to *Paul, whom Barnabas presented to the apostles (Acts 9:27). Sent to *Antioch, Barnabas observed the successes in converting the Gentiles and brought Paul there from *Tarsus (Acts 11:22ff.), returning with Paul to *Jerusalem to deliver the collection taken on the occasion of the famine (Acts 11:30). They were joined by John Mark (Acts 12:25), Barnabas's cousin (Col 4:10), and when Paul and Barnabas were chosen to go out to preach the gospel, John Mark accompanied them on this first missionary journey (Acts 13–14) but abandoned them at Perga. At Lystra, the crowd took Barnabas and Paul for Zeus and Hermes, wanting to offer sacrifice to them (Acts 14:8-18). Back at Antioch, Barnabas and Paul were sent to Jerusalem to settle the controversy that had arisen at Antioch over circumcision and together bore a letter back to Antioch with the apostles' response (Acts 15:1-35). Leaving for a second missionary journey, Barnabas wanted to take John Mark, against Paul's advice: he therefore parted with Paul and embarked for Cyprus with his cousin (Acts 15:37ff.). The reason for this break may in fact have been Barnabas's ambiguous attitude at the time of the so-called Antioch incident (Gal 2:11-13), if we date the split after the events of Acts 15:1-35. We hear no more of Barnabas after the departure for Cyprus; presumably he died, since Paul, back in contact with John Mark—perhaps a sign of an earlier reconciliation with Barnabas as well (see also the eulogy of Barnabas in 1 Cor 9:6, where we learn that Barnabas supported himself by manual labor)—makes no further mention of his inseparable cousin (Col 4:10; Philem 24). The late legend of the Acts and Martyrdom of Barnabas at Cyprus (5th c.) recounts Barnabas's death at Salamis at the hands of the Jews. Chronologically, it is impossible that Barnabas could have written the Epistle of *Barnabas; *Tertullian (Pudic. 20) attributes the book of Hebrews to him. A "gospel of Barnabas" is cited as apocryphal in the Decretum Gelasianum* (5th-6th c.) and in the Catalogue of the Sixty Canonical Books (6th-7th c.), but must be considered lost. The Italian Gospel of Barnabas, whose present form probably dates from the 14th c., is a work of Muslim propaganda, thought to rework literary traditions whose earliest nucleus may go back to the lost Gospel of Barnabas. A brief maxim under Barnabas's name (PG 2, 781-782) has no counterpart in the Epistle of Barnabas or in our Italian Gospel of Barnabas.

DB 1, 1461-1464; DHGE 6, 847-849; EC 2, 863-866; BS 2, 798-816; LTK³ 2, 17-18; ODC³ 159; RAC 1, 1207-1212; Acta et passio Barnabae in Cypro, ed. Bonnet, Acta Ap. Apoc. II, Leipzig 1903; L. Cirillo, Evangile de Barnabé. Recherches sur la composition et l'origine, Paris 1979 (with It. text and Fr. tr.).

F. Scorza Barcellona

BARNABAS, apostle (apocryphal). Barnabas, native of *Cyprus, called "apostle" by *Clement of Alexandria and the apocryphal Acts of Barnabas, mentioned frequently in the Acts of the Apostles as a convert to Christianity, active in *Antioch and companion of *Paul on the first apostolic journey. Two other works also speak of his activity: Mark's Acts of Barnabas (5th c.) and Alexander's Panegyric of St. Barnabas (6th c.). The first work describes his travels with Paul, the conflict with Paul over Mark, his apostolate in Cyprus and his death (burned by the Jews). In the first part of the Panegyric the author describes Barnabas's activity in Cyprus and his death (by stoning), in the second part Cyprus's struggle for autocephaly and the discovery of St. Barnabas's body with a copy of the gospel of St. Matthew. The ps.-Clementines (4th c.) speak of Barnabas's stay and apostolate at *Rome. Finally, the Historia Datiana (11th c.) speaks of Barnabas's activities at *Milan, where he went from Rome; this work is connected to Milan's 11th-c. struggle for supremacy in N *Italy. The lists of the apostles also mention Barnabas's sojourns at Milan and Rome, but a century earlier the N Italian church fathers say nothing of them. An apocryphon also speaks of the travels and passion of Sts. *Bartholomew and Barnabas. Often attributed to Barnabas the apostle is the Epistle of Barnabas, a writing of the Apostolic Fathers that was sometimes inserted in the lists of the books of the canon of the NT. *Tertullian considers Barnabas the author of the canonical Letter to the Hebrews (De pudicitia 20). In the Decretum* (Ps.-)Gelasianum (5,3,2) a Gospel of Barnabas is condemned; in Italian and fragmentarily in Spanish there is a Gospel of Barnabas, clearly Muslim in character and with *Jewish Christian elements; we do not know if there is a connection between these two works.

CANT 46, 285-286, 264; BHG 225-226; BHL 983-990; LCIK 5, 316-320; BS 2, 798-817; Lipsius 2,2, 270-320; O. Braunsberger, Der Apostel Barnabas, Mainz 1876; A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 421-423.

Ed. Gospel of Barnabas - L. Cirillo - F. Frémaux, Paris 1977 (intr., text and Fr. tr., commentary); E. Giustolisi - G. Rizzardi, Milan 1991 (It. tr.). Trans.: Eng. - D. Sox, London 1984; Sp. - L.F. Bernabé Pons, Granada 1998; Ger. - S.M. Linges, Bonndorf 1994. Acts and Panegyric: Lipsius - Bonnet 2,2, 292-302; P. van Deun, CCG 26,1993; It. - Erbetta 2, 594-600 (acts); Pol. - M. Starowieyski: Analecta Cracov. 23 (1991) 391-413 (acts). Historia Datiana: A.C. Colombo, De vita civitatis Mediolani, de adventu Barnabae apostoli, Bologna 1951, 14-21; Sp. text: T.J.E. Fletcher, The Spanish Gospel of Barnabas: NT 18 (1976) 314-321.

J.D. Burger, L'énigme de Barnabas, MH 3 (1946) 180-193; M. Philonenko, Une tradition essenienne dans l'Évangile de Barnabas, in Mélanges d'histoire des religions offerts à H.Ch. Puech, Paris 1974, 191-195; J.M. Magnin, En marge de l'ébionitisme. L'évangile de Barnabé: OrChr 29 (1979) 44-64; R. Stichel, Bemerkungen zum Barnabas-Evangelium: Byzantinoslavica 43 (1982) 189-201; L.F. Bernabé Pons, El Evangelio de San Bernabe. Un Evangelio islámico español, Alicante 1995 (bibl.); see also: *Apocrypha in Eastern Languages: Muslim.

M. Starowieyski

BARNABAS, Epistle of. Included among the so-called Apostolic Fathers, a theological treatise in highly conventional epistolary form, limited to general initial and final greetings (but with no title), though with frequent appeals to interlocutors in the course of the argument. Barnabas can be divided into two distinct parts: chs. 2-16 and chs. 18-21,1, framed by the introduction (ch. 1) and by first and second conclusions (chs. 17; 21,2ff.). In the introduction the author proposes to write "not as a teacher" (Barn. 1,8; cf. 4,9), so that his audience might have perfect knowledge along with faith (Barn. 1,5). The first part, more theoretical, consists of an anti-Jewish polemic and illustrations of OT prophecies and prefigurations. The polemic turns on the basic idea that the Jews have never been able to understand God's will—being uncircumcised in heart and ears or misled by an evil angel (chs. 9-10)—and thus all the religious practices by which they thought to establish a relationship with God were simply the fruit of misunderstanding: sacrifices and fasting (Barn.

2,4ff.; 3), circumcision and dietary prohibitions (Barn. 9-10), the sabbath and the temple (Barn. 15-16). There was never actually a divine covenant with the historical Israel: the Sinai covenant was broken with the tablets of the law, thrown down by Moses when he learned of Israel's idolatry in his absence (Barn. 4,6-9; 14). The true covenant is that of Jesus, sealed in the hearts of those who hope and believe in him (Barn. 4,8).

This negative judgment on Israel excepts only the patriarchs and prophets, to whom a spiritual understanding of the divine will was granted (see in particular chs. 9-10). This understanding is the same as that of Christians, who are circumcised in heart and ears and thus can understand the true sense of the divine commands expressed in Scripture. The only key to the OT, therefore, is one that seeks a spiritual sense in clear opposition to the carnality of the Jews (and to a literal interpretation of Scripture): hence an "*allegorical" *exegesis (in a broad sense), or more precisely and in most cases, a *typological exegesis, is the way in which the scriptural prophecies and prefigurations of Christ's redeeming death at the hands of those who had persecuted the prophets are to be read (Barn. 5; 6,5-7). Christ is the stone rejected by the builders which became the cornerstone (Barn. 6,1-4). Israel's entry into the Promised Land is a symbol of faith in Christ manifested in the flesh (Barn. 6,8ff.); the passion was foretold in the rites of the day of fasting and the scapegoat (Barn. 7), and in the lustral aspersion with water and the ashes of a sacrificed heifer (Barn. 8). Jesus and the cross are adumbrated in the 318 servants circumcised by Abraham, since in the Greek alphabet 18 = IH, the initials of Jesus' name, and 300 = T, symbol of the cross (Barn. 9,7-9). *Baptism and the cross are prefigured in the trees planted by streams of water spoken of in Ps 1 and Ezek 20:6 (Barn. 11); the saving cross, in Moses's prayer with open arms (Ex 17) and the bronze serpent of Num 21 (Barn. 12,1-7). Jesus was foretold as Son of God, not son of man (Barn. 12,8ff.); the preeminence of the new people of God, the Christians, over the older Jews was prefigured in the superiority of Jacob over Esau and Ephraim over Manasseh (Barn. 13).

The epistle is not lacking in *apocalyptic ideas, esp. in chs. 2,1-3; 4, which refer to Dan 7. In Barn. 15 the notion of a cosmic week of 7000 years is proposed, followed by an eighth millennium, which is the beginning of a new creation. The second part expounds the moral instruction of the "Two Ways," presented as "other knowledge and doctrine," in a form independent of the analogous elaborations of the Didache* and the Didascalia Apostolorum*.

The disproportion between the two sections of the epistle and the nonlinear succession of arguments in the first part led in the past to the thesis that Barnabas was a composite text, the fruit of successive interpolations of an original text, variously identified. Modern criticism tends rather to attribute these features to the scant development of the sources—collections of testimonia (Prigent) or of catechetical documents (Wengst)—by the author of an essentially unitary work.

Chronology rules out the traditional attribution to the Barnabas of Acts: the epistle postdates the destruction of the temple in 70 (see Barn. 16,3-4). If the foreseen reconstruction of the temple is that of the temple of Capitoline Jove, built by *Hadrian on the ruins of the temple of *Jerusalem in 131, the epistle must postdate this; the interpretation of the passage is controversial, however, and could refer to either an eventual rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem or to the building of the temple in the hearts of the faithful. The epistle is ordinarily dated in the first three decades of the 2nd c.; Carleton Paget, however, indicates a probable date of composition between 96–98, under Nerva, hinted at in the obscure reference of Barn. 4,4-5 to the succession of kingdoms symbolized by the horn of the beast of Dan 7:7-8, 19-24. The epistle's place of origin is debated: *Alexandria has been proposed, not so much perhaps due to the kind of exegesis, broadly "allegorical," it contains but by the fact that the first to cite it was *Clement of Alexandria, who did so repeatedly; this is now the prevalent opinion (Carleton Paget, Prostmeier). Other scholars, however, have considered Syria-Palestine (Prigent) or Asia Minor (Wengst), because of a series of points of contact with theological traditions more easily associated with those regions.

In the 4th-c. Sinaiticus codex, the epistle is included among the books of the NT, after John's Apocalypse; *Origen (C. Cels. I 63) calls it a "Catholic epistle," but *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE III 25,4) already numbered it among controversial works (see Jerome, De vir. ill. 6). We also have the epistle in an old Latin version (late 2nd or 3rd c.) which ends with ch. 18, omitting the "treatise of the Two Ways" and the second conclusion.

RAC 1 (1950), 1212-1217. For an exhaustive bibliography of editions and studies see that of F.R. Prostmeier's edition, cited herein. The most recent editions include those of J.M. Heer, Die Versio latina des Barnabasbriefes und ihr Verhältnis zur altlateinischen Bibel, Freiburg 1908 (with the old Latin version); P. Prigent - R.A. Kraft, Epître de Barnabé, SC 172, Paris 1971 (with Fr. tr.); F. Scorza Barcellona, Epistola di Barnaba, CP I, Turin 1975 (with It. tr.). K. Wengst, Schriften des Urchristentums: Didache, Barnabasbrief, zweiter Klemensbrief, Schriften an Diognet, Darmstadt 1984, 101-202 (with Ger. tr.); A. Lindemann - H.

Paulsen, Die Apostolischen Väter, Tübingen 1992; F.R. Prostmeier, Der Barnabasbrief, übersetzt und erklärt, Göttingen 1999. Only the translation in H. Windisch, Der Barnabasbrief, Handbuch zum NT. Ergänzungsband: Die Apostolischen Väter III, Tübingen 1920 (ample commentary); Erbetta III, Turin 1969, 11-36; O. Soffritti, La lettera di Barnaba, Rome 1974. Specific studies: J.A. Robinson, Barnabas, Hermas and the Didache, London 1920; J. Muilenburg, The Literary Relations of the Epistle of Barnabas and the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, Marburg 1929; J.A. Robinson (ed. R.H. Connolly), The Epistle of Barnabas and the Didache: JTS 35 (1934) 113-146; P. Meinhold, Geschichte und Exegese im Barnabasbrief: ZKG 59 (1940) 255-303; G. Schille, Zur urchristlichen Tauflehre. Stilistische Beobachtungen am Barnabasbrief: ZNTW 49 (1958) 31-52; A. Hermana, Le Pseudo-Barnabé est-il millénariste?: EThL 35 (1959) 849-876; P. Prigent, Les Testimonia dans le christianisme primitif. L'Épître de Barnabé I-XVI et ses sources, Paris 1961; L.W. Barnard, Studies on the Apostolic Fathers and Their Background, Oxford 1966; Kl. Wengst, Tradition und Theologie des Barnabasbriefes, Berlin 1971; E. Robillard, L'Épître de Barnabé: trois époques, trois théologies, trois rédacteurs: RBi 78 (1971) 184-209; J.P. Martín, L'interpretazione allegorica nella Lettera di Barnaba e nel giudaismo alessandrino: SSR 6 (1982) 173-183; P. Richardson - M.B. Schukster, Barnabas, Nerva and the Yavnean Rabbis: JTS 34 (1983), 31-55; K.K. Chandler, The Rite of the Red Heifer in the Epistle of Barnabas VIII and Mishnah Parah, in W. Scott Green (ed.), Approaches to Ancient Judaism, Chico, CA 1985, 99-114; P.F. Beatrice, Une citation de l'Évangile de Mathieu dans l'Épître de Barnabé, in J.M. Sevrin (ed.), The New Testament in the Early Church, Louvain 1989, 231-245; J. Carleton Paget, The Epistle of Barnabas, Tübingen 1994; J.A. Draper, Barnabas and the Riddle of the Didache revisited: JSNT 58 (1995) 89-113; F. Scorza Barcellona, Le norme veterotestamentarie sulla purità nell'Epistola di Barnaba: ASE 13 (1996) 95-111; R. Hvalvik, The Struggle for Scripture and Covenant: The Purpose of Epistle of Barnabas and Jewish-Christian Competition in the Second Century, Tübingen 1998.

F. Scorza Barcellona

BARSABAS of Jerusalem (2nd c.). Wrote a treatise On Christ and the Churches, preserved only in a *Georgian translation, against *Ebionite *Christology.

M. van Esbroeck, Barsabée de Jérusalem, Sur le Christ et les Églises (PO 41,2), Turnhout 1982.

K. den Biesen

BARSANUPHIUS (d. after 540) and JOHN of Gaza (d. 542). We have no historical information on Barsanuphius, except that he was born in *Egypt in the 5th c., where he led a *monastic life in the *Scete tradition. During the first half of the 6th c. we find him as a recluse in the *cenobium of Thavatha, near *Gaza; he was guided by the *hegumen Seridos, who served as intermediary between Barsanuphius, the monastic community and the outside world. His fame as a charismatic, reader of souls, and a person of balanced and sure judgment were such that monks, clergy and laity all went to him for counsel and help; nevertheless, he communicated with his correspondents only in writing. We have no treatises of spirituality from Barsanuphius, only a collection of 850 letters of various length (two of which have reached us only in a *Georgian version), mixed together with those of another famous *ascetic, John "the prophet," Barsanuphius's disciple and friend who was once hegumen of the monastery of Merosaba and later withdrew in solitude near his friend, assuming with him spiritual direction of the cenobium. The letters are in the form of "questions and answers," erotapokriseis. Barsanuphius remained outside of the theological disputes of the time and was critical of the *Origenist or *Evagrian currents widespread in Palestinian monasticism in the first half of the 6th c. Among Barsanuphius's disciples should be mentioned *Dorotheus of Gaza and *Dositheus. Upon John's death (ca. 540), Barsanuphius withdrew in complete isolation and presumably died shortly thereafter. According to a local tradition his *relics were transported, ca. 850, to Oria (Brindisi), where he is still venerated. This explains his memoria in the Roman Martyrology 11 April; the *Byzantine calendars celebrate him on 6 February. Barsanuphius's spirituality was nourished by meditation on Scripture and by the great monastic (esp. *Egyptian) tradition, the main idea being that of following Christ, proposed through a constant invitation to the "cutting out" of one's personal will in unreserved obedience to one's spiritual father—a living, divine oracle to the one who subjects himself to his guidance.

CPG 7350; eds. D.J. Chitty (PO 31,3); F. Neyt - P. de Angelis-Noah - L. Regnault (SC 426-427, 450-451, 468); translations: Barsanuphe et Jean de Gaza. Correspondance. Recueil complet traduit du grec par L. Regnault ou du géorgien par B. Outtier, Solesmes, [2]1993; Barsanufio e Giovanni di Gaza. Epistolario, eds. M.F.T. Lovato - L. Mortari, Rome 1991; DSp 1, 1255-1262; BS 2, 839-840; S. Vailhé, EO (1904) 268-276; 8 (1905) 14-25; 154-160; Derwas J. Chitty, The Desert a City, Oxford 1966, 132-140; F. Neyt, Les lettres à Dorothée dans la correspondance de Barsanuphe et de Jean de Gaza (diss. Louvain), 1969; Id., Citations "Isaïennes" chez Barsanuphe et Jean de Gaza: Muséon 89 (1971) 65-92; S. Tugwell, Ways of Imperfection, London 1984, 83-92; L. Perrone, Εἰς τὸν τῆς ἡσυχίας λειμῶνα. Le lettere a Giovanni di Beersheva nella corrispondenza di Barsanufio e Giovanni di Gaza, in Mémorial Dom Jean Gribomont (1920–1986), Rome 1988, 463-486; B. Bitton-Ashkelony - A. Kofsky, Gazan Monasticism in the Fourth-Sixth Centuries: From Anchoritic to Cenobitic: POC 50 (2000) 14-62; L. Perrone, Palestinian Monasticism, the Bible, and Theology in the Wake of the Second Origenist Controversy, in J. Patrich (ed.), The Sabaite Heritage in the Orthodox Church from the Fifth Century to the Present, Louvain 2001, 245-259.

J.-M. Sauget - L. Perrone

BARSAUMA (d. 458). Syrian *archimandrite, defender of *Eutyches and ally of *Dioscorus of *Alexandria. Strong in the religious and political influence that Eastern *monasticism had acquired, at *Theodosius II's invitation he participated at the Council of *Ephesus (449) as representative of the archimandrites (Mansi VI, 593) and played a decisive and tumultuous part in the condemnation of *Flavian of Constantinople, who died three days later, perhaps due to ill-treatment. At the Council of *Chalcedon (451), Barsauma was accused of having provoked Flavian's death and, failing to subscribe to Eutyches's condemnation within three days, was anathematized and exiled. The *monophysites considered him a saint.

E. Wipszycka, Storia della Chiesa nella tarda antichità, Milan 2000; S. Acerbi, Conflitti politico-religiosi in Oriente nella tarda antichità: il II Concilio di Efeso (449), Madrid 2003, passim.

E. Prinzivalli

BARSAUMA of Karka of Beth Slok (d. after 630). Bishop of Susania (Bēt Ḥuzāyē, in present-day S Iran) and author of mēmrē, liturgical prayers and a theological treatise titled Book of the Liver, he also composed some innovative funeral discourses. The Chronicle of Seert preserved the Arabic translation of two of Barsauma's letters, one public and the other secret, addressed to Patriarch *Isho'yahb II (628–643/644). Barsauma was part of a group of bishops that criticized Isho'yahb II for the profession of faith he presented to the emperor *Heraclius in 630, which they considered a betrayal of the theological tradition of the Eastern church.

Baumstark, 196; BBKL 21, 73s.; BO III,1, 173; A. Scher, Histoire Nestorienne II/2 (PO 13,4), Paris 1918, 562-576 (Arabic text of the two letters).

K. den Biesen

BARSAUMA of Nisibis (415?–490/496). Bishop Barsauma of *Nisibis's activity took place at one of the crucial moments of the *Persian church, during a time—the last quarter of the 5th c.—when it was beginning to assume its clearest features, both on the institutional level, with a more solid structuring of the ecclesiastical hierarchy and a better alignment of the episcopal internal workings within the Persian Empire, and on the theological level, with the progressive marginalization of *monasticism and the *monophysite clergy, and an increasingly clear orientation toward *dyophysitism. Barsauma is significant for a number of reasons: the bishop called attention to and opposed the centralization, taking place at the time, of ecclesiastical power in the hands of the *catholicos of the imperial capital, *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, favoring rather a more democratic model of the church (and perhaps more ancient in Persia), which would give space to ancient ecclesiastical sees like his own; he also promoted a profound distinction between secular clergy, for whom marriage and societal commitment were recommended, perhaps even obligatory, and monasticism, which was pushed to the edges of the cities; finally, he played a decisive role in the moving of the dyophysite theological school from *Edessa to Nisibis, putting it under the direction of the theologian-poet *Narsai, who had to emigrate to the East after the closure of the school of Edessa (489). This manifold activity caused the earliest monophysite tradition (e.g., *Simeon of Beth Arsham) to consider him as among the worst of powerful men, a bloody persecutor of his ecclesiastical enemies; the *Nestorian tradition as well, esp. catholicos Timothy, had considerable reservations concerning him, esp. regarding *ecclesiology.

Born in the first quarter of the 5th c., probably Syriac-speaking, he also learned Greek at Edessa and Persian upon his emigration to the Persian Empire. He received his theological education at the theological school of Edessa, when the bishop of that city was Ibas (435–457), *Rabbula's successor and the director of the Qiyor school; both were important figures for the translation of Theodore of Mopsuestia's writings into *Syriac. After this period of strictly dyophysite theological training, Barsauma had the function of preacher at Nisibis: his eloquence and learning were such that he was proclaimed bishop of the city immediately upon the see becoming vacant. This episode is not easily dated: in 435, as the Nestorian tradition tells us, or in 457, after the death of *Ibas of Edessa; or perhaps even later, but certainly some years before 489, when the school of Edessa was closed. In addition to his functions as bishop, Barsauma was charged by King Pērōz of Persia, or more probably by some of his officials, with carrying out local diplomatic activity. The split between Barsauma and catholicos Baboway (457–484) took place in the 480s. Barsauma stirred up a rebellion of bishops critical of the monarchy and of the behavior—not above suspicion of *simony and misadministration—of the catholicos: the group met in council at *Beit Lapat (Gundešapur) in 484; the acts can be reconstructed indirectly. Among the various canons regarding simony and other matters of ecclesiastical discipline is the strong affirmation of the importance of *Theodore of Mopsuestia. It is unclear whether marriage for clergy was authorized at this council or a dispensation of the vow of chastity was made for monks who desired it. Baboway and other bishops reacted by anathematizing the accusers, but events took a bitter, unexpected and dramatic turn with the sentencing of Baboway to death by the Persian emperor, for presumed treason. The reasons for the rebellion lessened for a time, and in a small synod held at the village of Beit Adrai, Barsauma made an act of submission to the authority of the new catholicos—Aqaq, his old school companion—and effectively annulled the decisions of the Council of Beit Lapat. Barsauma did not participate in the synod organized by Catholicos Aqaq in 486 at Seleucia-Ctesiphon (Barsauma's few letters in response to Aqaq's pressing invitations are all that remain of his production), at which canons regarding the marriage of clergy were issued and the doctrine of the dual nature of the divinity and humanity of Christ was affirmed. In the meantime, Barsauma married a virgin ascetic. After this council, in circumstances and for reasons that are not entirely clear and that may have been doctrinal, Barsauma began a new battle against the catholicos, which only ended with the nearly contemporaneous deaths of both, before 496.

'Abdiso', Catalogus librorum, c. 54, in BO 3, 66-70; J. Labourt, Christianisme perse, 131-152; G. Bardy: DHGE 6, 948-950; Duval: LS 165, 343; Baumstark 108-109; Chabot 50; Ortiz de Urbina 118-120.

Fundamental is the monograph of S. Gero, Barṣaumā of Nisibis and Persian Christianity in the Fifth Century (CSCO 424, Subsidia 63), Louvain 1981.

A. Camplani

BARTHOLOMEW, apostle. Named among the Twelve (Mk 3:18 par.). The proper name of Bartholomaios (Bar Talmai) may have been Nathanael. Favoring this identification—unknown in the Christian literature of the first centruies and first known in the *Syrian church, but contested by *Augustine (In Ps. 65, 4: PL 36, 788-789)—could be Jn 21:2 and Philip's link with Nathanael (Jn 1:45-46) and with Bartholomew in the lists of the Twelve. In *gnostic discourses Bartholomew is one of Jesus' interlocutors (Sophia J. C.; Pistis Sophia 136; Libri di Jeu A 1-3), as also in the Quaest. Barth. (where he interrogates Jesus after the *resurrection, and Mary regarding the *incarnation). Allusions to a Gospel of Bartholomew in antiquity and the Middle Ages are so infrequent that the existence of the *apocrypha was doubted until the first fragment was published in 1835. The first mention and a citation are found in ps.-*Dionysius, the second in *Epiphanius. The so-called Book of Hierotheos gives another citation, and *Jerome alludes to this gospel; it is unclear whether the Decretum Gelasianum alludes to this work. The legend of Judas's thirty coins, a group of writings contained in a 12th-c. poem and attributed to St. Bartholomew, could be from this apocrypha. Later identified as the Gospel of Bartholomew was a text preserved in Greek, Latin and Slavic, in the Slavic manuscripts titled Questions of Bartholomew, a title which accords with the literary genre of the text and is confirmed by another Latin MS. Another work, titled Book of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ According to Bartholomew, has reached us in *Coptic. These two texts are not two different recensions going back to one original; nor is their account as brief as it is sometimes said to be, and they have few elements in common. The Questions contain many elements characteristic of *apocalyptic literature. In the Acta Thom., Bartholomew is one of the eleven apostles who draw lots to divide the regions of the world for preaching. *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE V, 10,3) tells of a tradition according to which *Pantaenus is said to have met some Christians on his trip to India, where Bartholomew had preached and left behind a Hebrew gospel of Matthew. The Acta Barth. purports to describe his martyrdom in India, though according to the Acta Andr., Bartholomew was a missionary with Andrew along the coast of the Black Sea; according to the Acta Phil. he was Philip's companion at Hierapolis and Lycaonia. Later traditions describe his martyrdom in *Armenia (flayed and beheaded according to some, crucified according to others). His *relics were venerated at Daras, Mesopotamia (Theod. Lect. 2,57: PG 86, 211), on the island of Lipari (Greg. of Tours, Gloria Mart. 1,34), at Benevento and at *Rome.

Acta Barthol., in R.A. Lipsius - M. Bonnet, Acta Apost. Apoc., Leipzig 1888, II/1, 128-150; Erbetta II, 581-591; BS 2, 852-862; see P. Cherchi, A Legend from St. Bartholomew's Gospel in the Twelfth-Century: RBi 91 (1984) 212-218; F. Scheidweiler - W. Schneemelcher, Bartholomaeusevangelium: W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apocryphen, I, Tübingen [5]1987, 424-440; J.-D. Kaëstli, Où en est l'étude de l' "Évangile de Barthélemy"?: RBi 95 (1988) 5-33; L. Cirillo, Le baptême, remède à la concupiscence, selon la cathéchèse ps.-clémentine de Pierre: Hom. XI 26 (Rec. VI 9; IX 7), in T. Baarda et al. (ed.), Text and Testimony: Essays on New Testament and Apocryphal Literature in Honour of A.F.J. Klijn, Kampen 1988, 79-90; J. Irmscher - G. Strecker, Die Pseudoklementinen: Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, II, Tübingen [5]1989, 439-488; R.E. Van Woorst, The Ascent of James: History and Theology of a Jewish-Christian Community, Atlanta 1989; H.J.W. Drijvers, Adam and the True Prophet in the Pseudo-Clementines: History and Religion in Late Antique Syria, Aldershot 1994, XIV, 314-323; F.S. Jones, An Ancient Jewish Christian Source on the History of Christianity: Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions 1.27-71, Atlanta 1995; M. Viel-berg, Klemens in den Pseudoklementinischen Recognitionen. Studien zur literarischen Form des spätantiken Romans, Berlin 2000; D. Côté, Le Thème de l'opposition entre Pierre et Simon dans les Pseudo-Clémentines, EAug SA 167, Paris 2001.

R. Trevijano

BARTHOLOMEW (patristics and apocrypha). The name of the apostle Bartholomew figures in all three lists of the *apostles in the NT; he is also identified with Nathanael (Jn 1:45-51). We have no further information on Bartholomew. The Arabic Gospel (ch. 30) has him miraculously healed by the Virgin as a baby. His apostolate is located in various places: India, with Matthew (Eusebius, HE V,10), Lycaonia (ps.-John Chrysostom, *Ephrem), *Armenia, oasis in *Egypt, *Mesopotamia and Parthia and in the regions of the Black Sea, where he is said to have accompanied Andrew; according to other apocrypha he accompanied Philip in Lycaonia (Hierapolis). His death is variously described: stoning, burning, crucifixion, flaying, etc. There are two groups of writings on Bartholomew: works in which Bartholomew himself speaks, and others linked to his name. Writings include the unpublished Greek Acts of Bartholomew, a Latin passion, book VIII of ps.-*Abdias, and some Eastern texts (Armenian [Fr. tr. CCAp 4, 479-530]; Acts of Andrew and Bartholomew in Arabic, Coptic and Ethiopic). The Latin Passio speaks of his passion in India; another group of texts, in Armenia, where he met Thomas, Jude and Thaddeus. His body is said to have been at Martyropolis in the 4th c., then at Daras and finally transported to Lipari (6th c.), and from there to Benevento, then to Rome. There are a few Greek (Theodore the Studite, Nicetas of Paphlagonia) and Latin sermons on this apostle.

A Gospel of Bartholomew was condemned by the Decretum* (Ps.-)Gelasianum (5,3,6) and by *Jerome (In Mt prol.). A Book of Mysteries, the existence of which is confirmed by ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite (Theologia mystica 1,3) and by the Book of Hierotheos (of Stephen Bar Sudaili? 6th c.), preserves some sentences ascribable to Bartholomew himself. The Questions of Bartholomew exists in Latin and Greek, and the Book of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ of Bartholomew in *Coptic. The first text is a dialogue between Jesus and the apostles, with Bartholomew playing a prominent role. At Bartholomew's request, Jesus reveals the mysteries of his death, miraculous conception and *descent into hell, and those of Satan and of hell. The *apocryphon, divided into four scenes and an appendix and based on the Bible, is from the 7th to the 8th c., but probably contains fragments from the 2nd c.; it circulated widely in Ethiopia and in the Slavic world. The Book of the Resurrection, preserved in large Coptic fragments (perhaps for liturgical use), speaks mainly of facts related to Christ's resurrection. Here Bartholomew also has an important role, but less so than in the previous work.

BS 2, 1962, 852-878; Lipsius 2,2,54-108; CANT 258-264, 63, 80; BHG 227-232; BHL 1001-1014; BS 2, 852-878; LCIK 5, 320-334; M. v. Esbroeck, La naissance du culte de S. Barthélemy en Arménie: ReArm 17 (1983) 171-195; Id.: AB 80 (1962) 425-429; Id.: Muséon, 106 (1993) 98-99; J.D. Kaëstli, Où en est l'étude de l'"Evangile de Barthélemy"?: RBi 95 (1988) 5-33; J.D. Kaëstli - P. Cherix, introduction, see below.

Acts: Lipsius-Bonnet 2,1,128-150; (Lat.); CCAp 4, 429-530 (Armenian passion, Fr. tr.).

Questions: Ed.: CANT 63; trans.: It. - Craveri 423-444; Erbetta 1/2, 288-319, II, 581-591; Moraldi 1, 749-800; Ger. - F. Scheindweiler, in Schneemelcher 1, 424-440; Fr. - J.D. Kaëstli - P. Cherix, L'Évangile de Barthélémy, Apocryphes 1, Turnhout 1993, 27-142; J.D. Kaëstli, in EApC 1, 257-356; Eng. - James 166-181; Schneemelcher ET 1, 539-553; Sp. - Santos Otero 530-566; Starowieyski 1/2, 753-776.

Book of the Resurrection: Ed.: CANT 80; E.A.W. Budge, Coptic Apocrypha in the Dialect of Upper Egypt, London 1913, 1-48 (with Eng. tr.). Trans.: Eng. - W. Crum, in R. de Rustafjaell, The Light of Egypt from Recently Discovered Predynastic and Early Christian Records, London 1909, 110-136; Fr. - J.D. Kaëstli - P. Cherix, L'Évangile de Barthélémy, Apocryphes 1, Turnhout 1993, 143-241; J.D. Kaëstli, EApC 299-356 (trans.); It. - Erbetta 1/2, 301-319; Moraldi 1, 801-805 (summary); Ger. - W. Schneemelcher, in Schneemelcher 1, 437-440 (summary).

M. Starowieyski

BASIL, archimandrite (d. after 434). *Antiochene, deacon and *archimandrite at *Constantinople, follower of *Cyril of Alexandria. With the monk and lector *Thalassius (whom PG 91, 1471-1480 confuses with the friend of St. *Maximus the Confessor), he was the first to accuse *Nestorius of *heresy and violence before the emperor *Theodosius II (ca. 430) (Mansi 4, 1101-1108); he was ill-received, however. After the Council of Ephesus (431), he gave Patriarch Proclus (434–446) a libellus (preserved in Latin) for the condemnation of the works of *Theodore of Mopsuestia (PG 65, 851-856; Mansi 9, 240-242). *Liberatus (PL 68, 991) mentions a second libellus and a treatise against *Diodore of Tarsus and Theodore (both lost).

CPG III, 5774-5775; DHGE 6, 1078; Bardenhewer 4, 211-212.

A. De Nicola

BASIL, Liturgy of Saint (CPG 2905/CPG Suppl. 2905). The liturgical collections of the *Byzantine *liturgy, starting with the euchological Barberini 336 (AD 795), give three *anaphorae (eucharistic formularies), one of which is attributed to St. *Basil. It is very beautiful, but rarely used today due to its length (ed. F.E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western I, Oxford 1896, 308-345; M.I. Orlov, Liturgia Sv. Vasilija Velikago, Petersburg 1909; P.N. Trempelas, Ai treis Leiturgiai, Athens 1935). There is also a shorter *Alexandrian anaphora of St. Basil (PG 31, 1629-1677) in Greek, *Coptic, Arabic and Ethiopic (v. J. Doresse - E. Lanne, Un témoin archaïque de la liturgie copte de s. Basile, Louvain 1960, and W.F. Macomber: OCP 43 [1977] 308-334). The *Syriac, *Armenian, *Georgian and *Palaeoslavonic versions and an Arab version follow the Byzantine recension, in places in a form earlier than that of the Greek MSS. P.H. Engberding, Das eucharistische Hochgebet der Basileiosliturgie, Münster 1931, after critically treating the entire documentation, suggested that the Alexandrian recension was the (*Antiochene) text inherited by Basil, and the Byzantine form was a revision due to his initiative. B. Capelle, in the appendix to the publication of a Coptic MS by Doresse-Lanne (see above), supports this theory by numerous observations. Engberding himself, however, returning to the argument in Das anaphorische Fürbittegebet der Basiliusliturgie (OrChr 47 [1963] 16-52; 49 [1965] 18-37; cf. Muséon 79 [1966] 287-313), was reticent. Even if the Byzantine formula adds traits reflecting Basil's influence, nothing guarantees that it contains no further additions. In any case this must be admitted for the prayers that frame the anaphora: if they bear Basil's name, like other prayers of the ritual or in the Mystagogical History (CPG 8023), it is because of the similarity to the anaphora.

Of the numerous translations, see the Italian, with notes, of P. Scazzoso, Introduzione alla ecclesiologia di S. Basilio, Milan 1975, 144-170; J.R.K. Fedwick, The Anaphoras of St. Basil and St. James: An Investigation into their Common Origin, Rome 1992.

J. Gribomont

BASIL and EMMELIA (4th c.). Parents of *Basil the Great and *Gregory of Nyssa, both from aristocratic *Cappadocian families. Basil, a lawyer and literary scholar, taught rhetoric at *Neocaesarea in Cappadocia and was the son of wealthy Christians with landholdings spread throughout *Pontus and Cappadocia; during *Diocletian's persecution they were forced to hide in the mountains. Emmelia, an orphan whose father may have died in *Licinius's persecution, married young. Nine of the couple's children survived, including—in addition to Basil and Gregory—*Peter, bishop of *Sebaste, and *Macrina. *Gregory of Nazianzus speaks of Basil in the Oratio XLIII, 9,11 (PG 36, 503ff.), praising his virtue. Basil died in 350 and, with her daughter Macrina, Emmelia withdrew to Annesi near the River Iris (Pontus). She died ca. 373 and was buried next to her husband in the Church of the Forty Martyrs at Sebaste. Feast 30 May.

Gregory of Nyssa, Vita Macrinae: PG 46, 963-966; Gregory of Nazianzus, In laudem Basilii: PG 36, 499-512; DHGE 15, 429; BS 2, 949; R. van Dam, Becoming Christian: The Conversion of Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003, 77-78; R. van Dam, Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003.

L. Navarra

BASIL of Ancyra (4th c.). Ordained bishop of *Ancyra to replace *Marcellus, deposed in 336. Previously a doctor, he had had a good literary training. He stood out among the more representive elements of the Eusebians, both at *Serdica (343) and esp. at *Sirmium in 351, when he brought the charge that led to *Photinus's deposition. *Athanasius counted him among his adversaries. But faced with the revival of radical *Arianism (335 c.), Basil, who until then had esp. opposed the *monarchianism of Marcellus and Photinus, developed his doctrine in a clearly anti-Arian direction. He was the leading figure of the *homoiousian reaction of 358, through the Council of Ancyra and through influence on *Constantius, which led to the ephemeral triumph of the Council of Sirmium of 358 against the Arians. In the period leading up to the councils of *Rimini and *Seleucia, however, he was persuaded to subscribe to the (anti-homoiousian) Sirmian formula of 22 May 358. He added some personal clarifications to make it compatible with homoiousian doctrine, but the gesture weakened his prestige, and at the Council of Seleucia (359) he played only a secondary role. He was deposed at the Council of *Constantinople of 360, which sanctioned the defeat of the homoiousians in favor of the *homoians and moderate Arians. Regaining freedom of action after Constantius's death, he was one of the homoiousians who wrote to *Jovian in 363 against the final decisions of Rimini and Seleucia and in favor of a new council. This is our last glimpse of him. *Jerome (Vir. ill. 89) says he was the author of several works, naming a Contra Marcellum and a treatise On Virginity, the latter very probably identified in a work On True Purity in Virginity, wrongly attributed to *Basil of Caesarea. We have Basil's Ancyran synodal of 358 (also under the name of *George of Laodicea) and a subsequent doctrinal clarification, both basic documents of homoiousian theology.

CPG II, 2825-2827; Quasten II, 203-205 (bibl.); F. Cavallera, Le De virginitate de Basile d'Ancyre: RHE 6 (1905) 5-14; Simonetti 586; BBKL I, 406; T.D. Barnes, The Crimes of Basil of Ancyra: JTS 47 (1996) 550-554.

M. Simonetti

BASIL of Caesarea in Cappadocia (Basil the Great) (ca. 330–379)

I. First publications - II. Episcopate. Activity at Caesarea - III. Ecumenical activity - IV. Canonical activity - V. Hellenic culture - VI. The liturgy - VII. Minor and spurious works - VIII. Death and funeral eulogies.

Aristocratic in culture, sense of responsibility and in the ownership of immense landed estates in *Pontus and *Armenia, Basil, born ca. 330, was a brilliant student of *rhetoric (including philology, *philosophy and administration) at *Caesarea, *Constantinople and *Athens, where he became close friends with *Gregory of Nazianzus. From childhood he had received a solid Christian formation, esp. from his grandmother, the elder Macrina. After his father's death in 358, he renounced a career, sold his property, requested *baptism and retired to a family property on the Iris at Annesi with his mother and his sister *Macrina; his elder brother Naucratius had preceded him there, and to a certain degree his younger brother, *Gregory of Nyssa, shared this way of life until his marriage. Though Gregory of Nazianzus's more contemplative ideal was not satisfied by this, he did stay for some time at Annesi and contributed to Basil's formation. Beginning in 340 a radical evangelical movement arose from *Armenia to Constantinople, deeply at odds with the state church; *Eustathius of Sebaste, the movement's inspiration, visited Annesi and enjoyed great authority there, though Basil was not unaware of the ambiguous social and psychological motives mixed in with these religious aspirations.

I. First publications. After a journey of reflection to the nascent centers of *monasticism in *Syria and *Egypt, Basil composed a "dossier" of 1500 NT verses, the Moral Rules, a compendium of Christian duties related to the crisis of his time. He and Gregory of Nazianzus also studied Origen during this period, drawing from his work an exegetical and philosophical methodology, the Philocalia. He also had some knowledge of *Eusebius of Caesarea, though the very clear anti-*anomoian position that Basil adopted after 360 made him wary of a certain *subordinationist Origenism. Shortly before 364 he wrote three books Against Eunomius, the bishop of Cyzicus whose Apologia gave a strong impetus to this tendency, inducing Eustathius and his colleagues at the Synod of *Lampsacus to align themselves with the *Nicene groups, send a delegation to Rome and finally to subscribe to the homoousios. Despite permanent tension with the bishop of Caesarea, Basil was raised to the priesthood and acquired great authority thanks to his exceptional *ascetic and charitable activity. His preaching was as severe—especially toward the rich—as it was brilliant. After retiring to Annesi to accommodate the bishop, the latter called him back to stand up to the emperor *Valens, and Basil found himself in an even stronger position. The ascetic communities, which predated and were relatively independent of him, supported and were supported by him. They asked for his response to their questions on the interpretation of the gospels, and a first collection of his answers, the Asceticon, was published when these institutions were still in mid-development. This recension is preserved only in *Latin and *Syriac versions that attest its early circulation; it is called the Little Asceticon to distinguish it from the Greek editions, twice as long, which superseded it and which suppose more structured fraternities. This Great Asceticon is difficult to date, since Basil does not appeal to his episcopal authority for support; nonetheless it is likely that he continued to respond to such queries until the end of his life. Only a few letters, notable for their elegance, survive from this period; other more simple ones, and doubtless numerous homilies, must have been lost.

II. Episcopate. Activity at Caesarea. Bishop Eusebius's death (370) unleashed strong opposition to Basil among the episcopate and clergy, but the people wanted him and he set out to win over the electors with an energy that rather scandilized Gregory of Nazianzus, more drawn to *contemplation and *poetry. The help of *Eusebius of Samosata and *Meletius of Antioch, from somewhat of a distance, effectively sustained the Nicene reforming party. Basil was quick to align himself with *Athanasius, who had appreciated his actions and had confidence in him; in return, the deacon Sabinus gave him a pledge of the communion of the West. Basil's ascetic and charitable activity intensified, thanks to the funds at his disposal, with the building of *Basiliad, a hospice town which was to become the center of modern Caesarea. From Sebaste, *Eustathius sent a group of disciples to organize everything as it had been done in his own see. Basil continued to preach, but it is hard to discern which of his moral homilies and his homilies on the Psalms date from his priesthood and which from his episcopate. The nine homilies on the Hexameron, preached during *Lent, must be assigned to his last years; they have an evident tendency to replace the *Platonic and *Stoic vision of the world with an ambitious *exegesis, and their attack on the abuse of *allegory in exegesis could certainly apply to his brother Gregory's as yet unpublished doctrine. (It is certain that his successors and friends, the other Cappadocians, published their writings after his death more so than during his lifetime, with the clear intention of supplementing his more rigorously biblical doctrine; he seems to have encouraged them to reflect rather than to publish.) The homilies On the Creation of Man and On Paradise are posthumous, edited by a disciple; if a genuine piece completes the Hexameron, it is the homily Consider Yourself. Basil anticipated the Middle Ages in placing himself at the helm of his city against the government, as a powerful prostatēs. Much of his correspondence reflects this social mission, and we often see him intervening on behalf of an impoverished aristocracy. He left little written trace of his administration of the local church; we have some correspondence with the *chorbishops, responsible for the vast countryside of a diocese in which inhabited centers were rare. The two books On Baptism, whose authenticity has recently been questioned, provided catechists with pastoral directives for a fairly exacting preparation, in reaction against the easy baptism of a lax church. In the end, the support that Basil received against imperial pressure and the veneration that followed his death prove his popularity; especially those who opposed his election seem to have understood that they had everything to gain by rejoining his ranks.

III. Ecumenical activity. Basil was always actively concerned with the wider unity of believers, against the *Arian court and philosophy and for an evangelical reform that would give a wide berth to the ascetic ideal but without yielding to uncontrollable excesses. His idea of the church hinged on the group of bishops led by *Meletius of Antioch, who was suspect to the old Nicenes; in fact, from 374, the West would incline more and more toward *Paulinus of Antioch's "little church," anticanonical in origin, which Basil considered *schismatic if not *heretical. (What Basil says about it in Ep. 214 to a high official friendly to the West and to the Nicenes is rather tendentious and does not harmonize with the whole of his theology.) Throughout his life Basil tried, by long correspondence and numerous embassies, to get the West to send a mission that could observe the situation on the spot and renew links with the church of Antioch. He was conscious of being in communion with the universal church, including the West (Ep. 204,7), and of being qualified to restore unity; his disappointment with *Damasus's pride and refusal to be informed (Ep. 259,2) made no change in this persevering will to unity. His friends, continuing his policy after his death, managed to completely rehabilitate Meletius at the Council of Constantinople in 381. In a more limited geographic area, Basil also tried to end disputes among the bishops of Asia Minor. He upheld a fairly moderate dogmatic formula which guaranteed the expression of faith, without imposing on the different traditions more than Scripture required: confession of the Nicaenum and a break with those who reduced the *Holy Spirit to a creature, without imposing a newer and more positive formula. His Ep. 113 and 114 are a splendid document, showing how, through common charitable work, one could grow in faith on the basis of an agreement so conceived. It was impossible, however, to maintain communion in this spirit with bishops who mistrusted each other: Eustathius and his friends, Theodotus of Nicopolis (linked to Meletius), and *Atarbius of Neocaesarea. In 373, despite several days of friendly and detailed talks at Sebaste, which had momentarily succeeded in reaching agreement on the unity of veneration of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, Eustathius withdrew his concessions and in turn accused Basil. After two years of silence, Basil felt obliged to proclaim the breach, publishing his Treatise on the Holy Spirit and a series of pamphlets (Ep. 223, 224, 226, 244). As a result, his friends (and subsequent biographers) systematically omitted any mention of Eustathius, despite the evidence attested by the documents. Chs. 10-27, the central nucleus of the Treatise, form a dialogue so coherent and respectful of its opponents' objections that Dörries has rightly seen in it a direct echo of the visit to Sebaste, and the argument that succeeded in obtaining the old ascetic's adherence before he finally joined the ranks of the pneumatomachi, or *Macedonians. Ecumenical undertakings were complicated by a minor administrative conflict: in 372 the creation of a civil province, Cappadocia II, gave the bishop of *Tyana an occasion to claim metropolitan rights over the whole west of the region. The struggle that followed is symptomatic of the tensions that disturbed ecclesiastical structures in their adaptation to imperial administrative frameworks. It was in these circumstances that Basil, to multiply the number of sees under his jurisdiction, imposed the see of Sàsima on Gregory of Nazianzus, that of Nyssa on his brother Gregory and so on. Outside his province he was more successful, making his disciple *Amphilochius metropolitan of Iconium, in Lycaonia. Besides the authority of his character and the support of the people, Basil drew political strength from the influence of the see of Caesarea in Armenia, beyond the frontier. If *Valens's internal policy, and esp. the praetorian prefect Modestus and the vicar of Pontus Demosthenes, tended to put obstacles in his way, the general responsible for the Armenian border, Terentius, a Westerner and Nicene, honored him with his confidence and supported him.

IV. Canonical activity. Wishing to follow in his own episcopal activities the path traced by Basil, his favorite disciple, *Amphilochius of Iconium, to whom the Treatise on the Holy Spirit and a series of precise theological letters had been addressed, asked him for a written account of the canonical traditions to be respected. Three Epistles (188, 199, 217) enumerate 84 canons, partly pre-Basilian (and at times, in his judgment, unsatisfactory) and partly retouched or created by Basil. The contrast with the Asceticon, and even with the Homilies, shows how the once-intransigent ascetic had become aware of a bishop's possibilities.

V. Hellenic culture. In his ascetic works, or in his book On Baptism, aimed at a public with little education, Basil willingly employed a simple style. Texts aimed at a refined audience, on the other hand, e.g., some homilies and esp. some letters, could be of great elegance. Only with difficulty can such differences be attributed to chronological evolution, though we can understand how some youthful works might bear the imprint of the brilliant spirit of Athens. Thus Ep. 2, an open letter to Gregory of Nazianzus, is a defense of the ascetical ideal in universities. The famous Address to Young People on Hellenic Culture takes the same line: on the pretext of guiding his nephews, Basil explains how Athenian philosophy and paideia may lead to an attitude not unlike Christian asceticism. Both works systematically downplay biblical justification—of supreme authority for Basil—and confine themselves to preparing minds accustomed to other models. The Renaissance, happy to find a justification for ancient literature, gave a great welcome and a new purpose to these works of Basil.

VI. The liturgy. Basil's concern for the prayer life (and working life) of monastic communities, and later with the edification of the Caesarean church, explain his presence in the liturgical movement. Ep. 2 and Great Rule 37 expound a program for sanctifying the day; Ep. 207, 3 responds to the criticisms of more conservative churches; Homilies on Psalms 1 and 28, on Thanksgiving, and many others develop the theme of divine praise. Echoes of euchological formulas can be seen in the Great Rule 2. A beautiful Byzantine eucharistic formulary bears Basil's name; it also exists in *Syriac, *Armenian, *Paleoslavonic and Arabic. A similar, but shorter and more archaic, *Alexandrian formulary survives in Greek, *Coptic and Arabic (see Basil, Liturgy of Saint).

VII. Minor and spurious works. The ascetic corpus has reached us through various traditions: one from Basileias of Caesarea, attested by the Armenian version; one, obviously, from the Studite tradition; one dependent on the Hypotyposis ascetica, a collection sent by Basil in his last years to some communities of Pontus. This Hypotyposis included the Moral Rules (some think, without foundation, that it is a revised edition) with its original prologue On the Judgment of God and a new prologue On Faith (seemingly before 373); and the Great Asceticon, with a prologue. The Basileias collection had a supplementary prologue and a list of Epitimia (penances assigned to certain faults): writings certainly not from Basil's hand, but perhaps contemporary. Ascetic manuscripts add other, later prologues, and esp. the Monastic Constitutions (Palestine?), which left room for Egyptian anchorism and had great success in the Slavic world and in *Byzantine monasticism. Some homilies are not authentic: On the Creation of Man; On Paradise; Second Homily on Psalm 28; Homilies on Psalms 37 and 132 (Eusebius of Caesarea); on Barlaam; On the Holy Spirit; On Penitance (Eusebius of Emesa); On Free Will (ps.-Macarius); Ne dederis somnum; Third Homily on Fasting; On Mercy; Consolation to a Sick Person (Basil of Seleucia?); and others recently published or promised by M. Aubineau. The Commentary on Isaiah, written in Cappadocia in the 4th c., is generally considered inauthentic. The treatise On Virginity, not authentic, has been attributed by F. Cavallera to *Basil of Ancyra. Many letters in the traditional collection are not Basil's: 8 (*Evagrius of Pontus); 93 (*Severus of Antioch); 10, 16, 38, 189 (Gregory of Nyssa); 47, 166, 167, 169-171, 321 (Gregory of Nazianzus); 39-45, 50, 197 § 2, 335-359 (or 346-359?), 360, 365, 366 are to be rejected.

VIII. Death and funeral eulogies. In 378 Basil's activity seems to have been greatly reduced; he died (according to his liturgical anniversary) 1 January

379. The brilliant funeral eulogies of Gregory of Nazianzus and Gregory of Nyssa had an excessive influence on *hagiography, and are far from corresponding to the facts that emerge from an analysis of his writings.

Editions: CPG 2835-3005; CPG/S 2835-3008.

Translations: [also listed in CPG/S] PG 29-32; SC 7, 26; It. - Opere ascetiche, eds. U. Neri - M.B. Attioli, Turin 1980; Fr. - B. Pruche, Traité du Saint-Esprit, SC 17; Letters: Fr. - Courtonne, Paris 1957-1966; Eng. - R.J. Deferrari, London 1926-1934; S.A.C. Way, Washington, DC 1965-1969; It. - A. Regaldo Raccone, Alba 1968.

Studies: M.G. Murphy, St. Basil and Monasticism, Washington, DC 1930; S. Giet, Les idées et l'action sociales de saint Basile le Grand, Paris 1941; E. Amand, L'Ascèse monastique de saint Basile, Maredsous 1949; G.L. Prestige - H. Chadwick, St. Basil the Great and Apollinaris of Laodicea, London 1956; H. Dörries, De Spiritu Sancto. Der Beitrag des Basilius zum Abschluss des trinitarischen Dogmas, Göttingen 1956; T. Špidlík, La Sophiologie de S. Basile, Rome 1961; S.A.C. Way, Saint Basil, Exegetic Homilies, Washington D.C. 1963; B. Pruche, Autour du traité sur le Saint-Esprit de saint Basile de Césarée: RecSR (1964) 204-232; J. Gribomont, Esotérisme et tradition chez S. Basile: Œcumenica. Annales de recherches œcuméniques 1967, Neuchâtel 1967; J. Gribomont, Histoire du texte des Ascétiques de S. Basile, Louvain 1953; Y. Courtonne, Un témoin du IVe siècle. Saint Basile et son temps d'après sa correspondance, Paris 1973; E. Cavalcanti, Il problema del linguaggio teologico nell'adv. Eunomium di Basilio Magno: Augustinianum (1974) 527-539; E. Cavalcanti, Studi eunomiani, Rome 1976; Th.A. Kopecek, A History of Neo-Arianism, 2 vols., Philadelphia 1979; P.J. Fedwick, The Church and the Charisma of Leadership in Basil of Caesarea, Toronto 1979; J. Cazeaux, Les échos de la sophistique autour de Libanios, Paris 1980; P.J. Fedwick (ed.), Basil of Caesarea: Christian, Humanist, Ascetic, 2 vols., Toronto 1981; P. Maraval, La date de la mort de Basile de Césarée: REAug 34 (1988) 25-38; R. Pouchet, Basile le Grand et son univers d'amis d'après sa correspondance: une stratégie de communion, Rome 1992; Ph. Rousseau, Basil of Caesarea, Berkeley, CA 1994; P.J. Fedwick, Bibliotheca Basiliana Universalis: A Study of the Manuscript Tradition of the Works of Basil of Caesarea, 4 vols., Turnhout 1993-2000; W.-D. Hauschild, Basilius von Caesarea (ca. 329–379): TRE 5, 301-313; Basilius Caesar., Discorso ai Giovani, with a Latin version by L. Bruni, Florence 1984; Basil of Caesarea, Lettere - I, It. tr. by M. Forlin Patrucco, Turin 1983; Basil of Caesarea, Le regole, It. tr. by L. Cremaschi, Magnano 1993; S.J. Voicu, Cesaria, Basilio (Ep. 93/94) and Severo: Augustinianum 35 (1995) 697-703.

J. Gribomont

BASIL of Cilicia (first half of 6th c.). *Presbyter at *Antioch, then bishop of Irenopolis in *Cilicia. Wrote 16 books, 13 in dialogue form, including a vigorous polemic against the *Neochalcedonian theologian *John of Scythopolis, whose works he criticized in three books titled Against the Nestorians. Ignoring personal insults, he then energetically defended the position of the school of Antioch, for which he was charged with being a *Nestorian. The patriarch *Photius knew Basil's pamphlet (Cod. 107) and his ecclesiastical history (Cod. 42), both now lost. The latter work, prolix and muddled but based on rich documentary sources, dealt with the mid-5th to mid-6th c. The *Suidas (or Sudas), which compares Basil with the more important *Basil of Caesarea, knows another unknown polemical work against the presbyter Archelaus.

PWK 3, 54ff. Photius's summaries, with Fr. tr. and comments, ed. René Henry, vols. I and II, Paris 1959/60.

J. Irmscher

BASIL of Seleucia. In Isauria (bishop from 444/448; d. after 468). Little is known of his life, except his participation at the Synod of *Constantinople of 448, at the latrocinium of *Ephesus (449) and at the Council of *Chalcedon (451). Despite his inconstancy—he oscillated against, for and once more against *Dioscorus—his profession of faith of 448 (a commentary on *Cyril of Alexandria's Formula of Union of 433; CPG 5339) was incorporated into the dogmatic definition of Chalcedon; he later remained faithful to the Chalcedonian party. About fifty of his homilies remain, revealing him to be a moderate follower of the *Antiochene school; most still await a critical edition and an examination of authenticity. It has been shown that some of his homilies are revisions of works by other authors and that they, in turn, are the source of later hymns, esp. those of *Romanus Melodus. Two homilies, attributed in the manuscripts to *Basil the Great and thought by some to be of *Proclus of Constantinople (CPG 5834-5835), should perhaps be attributed to Basil of Seleucia. The De vita et miraculis s. Theclae (CPG 6675), attributed to Basil, is a spurious work by a priest of Seleucia whom Basil himself had excommunicated.

CPG 6655-6675 and 5834-5835; PG 85, 27-474; DHGE 6, 1156-1157; B. Marx, Der homiletische Nachlaß des Basileios von Seleukia: OCP 7 (1941) 329-369; M. van Parijs, L'évolution de la doctrine christologique de Basile de Séleucie: Irénikon 44 (1971) 493-514; K. Mitsakis, The Hymnography of the Greek Church in the Early Christian Centuries: JÖByz 20 (1971) 31-49; M. Aubineau, Homélies pascales (SC 187), Paris 1972, 167-277; A. de Halleux, La définition de Chalcédoine: RTL 7 (1976) 3-23; 155-170; G. Dagron, Vie et miracles de sainte Thècle (Subs Hag 62), Brussels 1978; J.M. Tevel, De preken van Basilius van Seleucië. Handschriftelijke overlevering - Editie van vier preken, Utrecht 1990.

S.J. Voicu

BASIL the Great (pseudo). The Tractatus de consolatione in adversis, a short work composed probably in *Gaul on the occasion of the epidemic of 580, seems to have been written to console its readers, exhorting them to accept their sorrows in the light of Christ's redemptive work. It was previously identified with the consoling letter sent by *Victor of Cartenna to a certain Basil (CPL 854) about his son's death.

CPL 999; PG 31, 1687-1704; DTC 15, 2876-2877; F. Görres, Der echte und falsche Victor von Cartenna: Zeitschrift für Wissenschaftliche Theologie 49 (1906) 484-494.

P. Marone

BASILIAD. Name given by *Gregory of Nazianzus to the "new city" (Or. 43,63) founded by *Basil the Great just outside the walls of his episcopal see of Caesarea for receiving and caring for *lepers, the injured, the sick, the *poor and *pilgrims. Named for Basil, the city was an application of the evangelical principles of poverty and charitable openness to the poor and needy, an openness born out of an intrinsic demand of being followers and imitators of Jesus Christ. Basil's city exercised such an attraction on the people that the old city was gradually abandoned, and the city-hospice of St. Basil kept the name "new city" even after a century.

M.M. Fox, The Life and Times of St. Basil the Great as Revealed in his Works, Washington, DC 1939; Ph. Rousseau, Basil of Caesarea, Berkeley, CA 1994; A. Holmes, A Life Pleasing to God: The Spirituality of the Rules of St. Basil, London 2000.

M.G. Bianco

BASILIDES (2nd c.). According to information from *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VII, 106,4), the *gnostic Basilides lived and taught at *Alexandria during the time of the emperors *Hadrian (117–138) and *Antoninus Pius (138–161). Basilides claimed the derivation of his teaching from a secret tradition going back to the apostle *Matthias (Hip., Ref. VII, 20,1-5); he also invoked Glaucias, Peter's interpreter, as his teacher. *Hegemonius's claim (Act. Arch. 67,4) that Basilides also taught in *Persia is confirmed by no other source. Twenty-Four Books on the Gospel are attributed to Basilides (Eus., HE IV, 7,7); he is accused by *Origen of having himself written a gospel (Hom. I in Lc.). Origen also said that Basilides wrote a book of Odes (In Job. 21,11; Pitra, Anal. S. II, 368). Interpretation of Basilides's thought is complicated not only by the nature of the sources (exclusively heresiological) but also by their lack of homogeneity: there is esp. a great difference between the full and detailed exposition of *Hippolytus, and those less extensive of *Irenaeus, Clement and Hegemonius. According to Hippolytus, Basilides held that from the "nonexistent" (οὐκ ὢν) God was derived the seed of the world, which contained all things in itself. From it, through successive generations, the world and a whole series of beings came about. Irenaeus does not mention the seed of the world, describing rather the series of successive emanations that, from the ungenerated Father, arrive at the angels, who in turn give origin to the 365 heavens: the angels of the last heaven created the world. Irenaeus also refers to Basilidian *Christology, which has traits typical of gnostic *docetism: the intellect sent by the Father was not crucified, but rather a certain Simon of Cyrene. Another description—more decisively *dualistic—of Basilides's thought is offered by the Acta Archelai (4th-c. anti-*Manichean writing). The passage, taken from the "thirteenth book of his treatises," is reported in a way that presents Basilides as a precursor of *Mani in the doctrine of the opposition between light and darkness. A critical judgment on this is particularly difficult, however, because here Basilides does not expound his own thought but reports that of others. Other aspects of Basilides's thought—more clearly anthropological—are reported by Origen (from whom we learn that Basilides accepted the doctrine of the transmigration of *souls) and by Clement of Alexandria, whose fragments on *evil, the intrinsic sinfulness of the soul and the consequent need for *expiation reveal Basilidian pessimism.

Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 24,3-7; Hippolytus, Ref. VII, 20-27; Clement Al., Strom. II, 113,3–114, 1; III, 1,1–3,2; IV, 81,1–83,1; 86,1; VI, 53,2-5; Act. Arch. 67,4-12; Origen, Com. Rom. V, 1; G. Quispel, L'Homme gnostique. La doctrine de Basilide: Eranos - Jb 16 (1948) 89-139; A. Orbe, Los "apéndices" de Basilide (Un capítulo de filosofía gnostica), Gregorianum 17 (1976) 81-107, 251-284; R.M. Grant, Place de Basilide dans la théologie chrétienne ancienne: REAug 25 (1979) 201-216; S. Pétrement, Le Dieu separé. Les origines du gnosticisme, Paris 1984, 459-473; M. Simonetti, Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, Milan 1993, 134-179; Marienlexikon 1,387.

A. Monaci Castagno

